"It is sometimes said that the basis of the carrier's liability for loss of goods or for their damage in transit is 'presumed negligence.' Hall & Long v. Railroad Companies (80 U. S.) 13 Wall. 367, 372 (20 L. Ed. 594). But the so-called presumption is not a true presumption, since it cannot be rebutted, and the statement itself is only another way of stating the rule of substantive law that a carrier is liable for a failure to transport safely goods entrusted to its care, unless the loss or damage was due to one of the specified causes [citing authorities]. * * *

"There is no language in the statute from which a purpose may be inferred to vary or limit the common-law rules governing proof of negligence as a fact in issue, and the shipper may follow these rules when he seeks to show that no notice of claim was necessary.

"The respondent therefore had the burden of proving the carrier's negligence as one of the facts essential to recovery. When he introduced evidence to show delivery of the shipment to the carrier in good condition and its delivery to the consignee in bad condition, the petitioner became subject to the rule applicable to all bailees, that such evidence makes out a prima facie case of negligence. Miles v. International Hotel Co., 289 Ill. 320 [124 N. E. 599]; Miller v. Miloslawsky, 153 Iowa, 135 [133 N. W. 357]; Dinsmore v. Abbott, 89 Me. 373 [36 A. 621]; Railroad Co. v. Hughes, 94 Miss. 242, 246 [47 So. 662, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 975]; Hildebrand v. Carroll, 106 Wis. 324 [82 N. W. 145, 80 Am. St. Rep. 29]. The effect of the respondent's evidence was, we think, to make a prima facie case for the jury."

The instructions complained of by appellant are supported by authority and are not contrary to the doctrine of Barrett v. Van Pelt, supra. These instructions were to the effect that proof of damage in transit and unusual delay in transit, or either, shifted the burden of proof to defendant to show its freedom from negligence, and also to the effect that it was incumbent upon the carrier to meet plaintiff's proof of injury in transit by showing that the injury resulted from one of the causes of liability expressly excepted in the shipping receipt.

[2-5] Moreover, the record is not clear that the plaintiff did not file a claim. In this case the plaintiff, while a witness, was asked if he had filed a claim against the defendant. He answered "Yes" before the objection was made. The objection was this—"immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent." This objection was sustained by the court, although it should have been overruled. The question, as put, did not call for secondary evidence as would be the case if the question had called for the contents of the claim instead of only a response as to whether or not one had been filed. The objection was made by counsel for the defendant and appellant, and it would be unjust to allow appellant to claim that the evidence which he objected to as immaterial is now material, or to claim the record is deficient in lacking what it kept out by this objection. Upon this point appellant attempts to justify the court in sustaining this objection by urging that the question was objectionable as calling for secondary evidence in the absence of preliminary proof showing that the best evidence was not available. We are not able to agree with this. Objections must be specific. Especially so where they are of such a nature that they may be obviated when attention is called to the defective nature of the testimony offered. This question with respect to the offer of secondary evidence against a general objection has been frequently passed upon. Eversdon v. Mayhew, 85 Cal. 1, 21 P. 431, 24 P. 382; St. Vincent's Institution, etc., v. Davis, 129 Cal. 20, 61 P. 477; People v. Louie Foo, 112 Cal. 23, 44 P. 453; Banister v. Campbell, 138 Cal. 460, 71 P. 504, 703; Root v. Conlin, 65 Cal. App. 241, 223 P. 1023.

[6] The questions raised by appellant relating to the insufficiency of the evidence to prove negligent icing or unreasonable delay in transit are perhaps sufficiently disposed of by what we have already said, but respondent, instead of relying on what is said in the quoted case to constitute a prima facie case, went much further in proving his case. In producing his testimony, he substantially assumed the same character of burden of proof contended for by appellant. The first car took 13 days and 20 hours to arrive, and the second 17 days and 17 hours to arrive at destination. The testimony concerning the customary or usual time consumed in this trip varied. Most witnesses put it around 13 days, but some put it as low as 10 or 11 days. There was sufficient evidence to entitle the jury to find that there had been an unreasonable delay.

[7] Negligence was also predicated upon the failure of the appellant to properly ice the refrigerator cars in which the grapes were shipped, independently of the alleged delay. Negligence in respect to either delay or icing alone would support the verdict. The testimony would support the inference that each of the cars went either 4 or 5 days without icing. Expert testimony was received of the probable effect of the failure to ice under different conditions. The appellant's car record showing a record of the transit of the cars from place to place on their journey, and also appellant's icing record, which purported to show the times, places, and manner of the re-icing of the cars were received in evidence. A comparison of these two records showed glaring discrepancies, indicating, in at least one instance, that a car was said to have been iced at a station through which it did not pass. The cars were not iced at all regular icing stations as provided in the bill of lading.

Appellant claims error by reason of the following facts: Upon the arrival at destination of the second car of grapes, the consignee rejected it. At the trial he gave two reasons for this. First, that he was not permitted to inspect the contents of the car by the local agent of the carrier; second, because he believed from his experience with the first carload of grapes received, and on account of the long delay in the arrival of this second carload, that the shipment would be too much deteriorated for use. On the third day after the arrival of this car at destination the agent, having communicated with his superiors or with the station where the shipment originated, did give permission to the consignee to inspect. Thereupon the consignee inspected and again rejected the shipment, this time signing a written rejection. Appellant claims that the testimony therefore does not establish that the grapes were spoiled at the very time they arrived at destination, or at the time delivery was offered without inspection. About 12 days from date of arrival at destination the shipment was sold at public auction for $450. The proceeds of the sale were applied upon the freight bill on the shipment, which was $675.73. The sale was apparently made by the carrier, as permitted in case of rejected perishable goods by sections 4c and 4d of the Bill of Lading. It does not appear why this sale was not made sooner.

[8] The shipment being of a highly perishable nature, its condition at least, if not its value at the time of arrival at destination, could be a matter of inference based upon its condition on the third day following particularly so in view of the length of time occupied in transporting the shipment to destination. However, if the tendered delivery without inspection was an insufficient discharge of the carrier's obligation, its liability thereafter until inspection by the consignee continued as that of a common carrier and not merely as a bailee as contended for by appellant.

Appellant offered an instruction to the effect that if the consignee refused to accept the shipment, the damages resulting thereafter could not be charged to the carrier. The court gave this instruction, but modified it by adding the clause "without lawful reason," following the expression "if the consignee refused to accept delivery."

[9-11] That goods are damaged in part does not justify the consignee in refusing to accept delivery. It is his duty to accept delivery in order to minimize the damage. Where a shipment, however, is damaged to the extent that it is practically valueless having regard to the expense of acceptance and use and to the purpose for which the shipment was intended, the consignee may reject. Where the shipment offered for delivery is apparently in a damaged condition but from outward appearances it is impossible to tell the extent of the damage, then the consignee is entitled to inspect the goods before determining whether he will accept or reject them. Brand v. Weir, 27 Misc. Rep. 212, 57 N. Y. S. 731; Berger-Critenden Co. v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 159 Wis. 256, 150 N. W. 496; McGrath v. Charleston & W. C. R., 91 S. C. 552, 75 S. E. 44, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 782, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 64 and 66; 2 Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 733; 4 R. C. L. § 285; 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 2299, note 98, and cases cited; 10 Corp. Jur. 253; Southern Cal. Com. Co. v. Alberti, 58 Cal. App. 84, 207 P. 1023.

[12] We hold, therefore, that the liability of the defendant continued to be that of a common carrier after the arrival of the shipment at destination, and until the consignee was permitted to inspect the same. The circumstances surrounding the arrival of the shipment were of a character to indicate that the grapes were damaged, and the consignee was entitled to inspect before determining whether he should accept or reject. If we are correct in this conclusion, it is not necessary to determine the precise value of the shipment on the date of arrival and determine again the same thing as of the date when the consignee formally inspected and formally rejected the shipment. It is sufficient that the evidence shows the grapes were apparently spoiled upon arrival at destination, entitling the consignee to inspect.

[14, 15] If the use of the expression is not justified by the use of substantially the same words in the statute, we find no conflict in the evidence of the reasons for rejection. Respondent, as a witness at the trial, gave his reasons for his rejection as we have indicated. Appellant has not pointed out any lawful excuse for its refusal to allow inspection. The payment of freight was guaranteed by bond. The fact that shipper and consignee were both interested in the grapes as joint adventurers does not make the consignee's rights different from other consignees' rights in respect of the right of inspection. The bill of lading as to this car did not prohibit inspection, but on the contrary implied that inspection was permissible. Section 7, Bill of Lading. In view of this record we cannot say that the modification of the instruction was error, or that it resulted in prejudice to the rights of appellant.

The evidence does not sustain the defense of act of God with respect to the delay of the second car. The evidence tended to show that some part of the delay would come under this defense, but such part was inconsiderable in comparison with the whole delay and had little, if anything, to do with the icing issue. The jury's implied finding against this defense is supported by the testimony.

[16] The sufficiency of the opinion testimony on the market value of the grapes at the point of destination was also a question for the jury. The testimony of the witnesses Cupoletti, Arko, and Burnett was sufficient to permit the jury to arrive at its conclusion upon this issue. Most of this opinion testimony seems to relate to the Zinfandel grapes, but the Petite Syrrah grapes were compared with the Zinfandels by some of the witnesses, who stated that they were worth more than the Zinfandels. There was other testimony to indicate that this difference was about $30 a ton. Damages for the more expensive variety, however, were apparently based upon the assumption that their value was the same as the less expensive variety. We cannot say that there is a failure of evidence upon this point.

[17] Defendant's requested instruction No. 1 was given in substance by instruction No. 6, and no error can be predicated upon the court's refusal to give this instruction twice.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCOTT v. BECK. (L. A. No. 8103).★

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 29, 1927.

Rehearing Granted Oct. 27, 1927.

1. Quieting title §44(4)—Evidence of possession by plaintiff's vendor at time of transfer held sufficient prima facie to establish plaintiff's ownership.

In action to quiet title, evidence as to actual possession by plaintiff's vendor at time of transfer held sufficient prima facie to establish ownership in plaintiff.

2. Taxation §679(1) — Law applicable when property was sold for delinquent taxes follows through all proceedings dependent thereon.

The law as it was at time when property was sold for delinquent taxes to state follows through all the proceedings dependent upon that sale.

3. Taxation §734(7)—Attempted tax sale without listing property as delinquent for previous year, nor naming owner in either delinquent or addenda list and tax deed, held void (Pol Code, §§ 3764, 3771, 3785b; § 3786, subd. 5).

Under Pol. Code, §§ 3764, 3771, 3785b, and section 3786, subd. 5, relative to sale of property for delinquent taxes, attempted sale wherein property was not contained in delinquent list for preceding year, and was in addenda list of property previously sold to the state as property assessed to another, was void and tax deed pursuant thereto invalid.

Action by Georgia E. Scott against S. Beck. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Superseding judgment of District Court of Appeal, 254 P. 637, reversing the superior court.

Earl P. Thompson, McKenna & McKenna, Hood & Riley, Catherine A. McKenna, and J. Irving McKenna, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Andreani & Haines, John L. Bisher, Jr., Frank E. Carleton, Clara Shortridge Foltz, and Elliott H. Barrett, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Emmet H. Wilson, of Los Angeles, amicus curiae.

CONREY, Justice pro tem. Action to quiet title to lot 93 in tract No. 909, situated in the city of Los Angeles. The statement of the case, as here quoted, is taken from the decision of the First District Court of Appeal, Division 1, rendered prior to the order for hearing in this court, and is adopted as part of this decision.

"The complaint alleged title in the plaintiff with right to possession. The averments of the complaint were denied by defendant, who alleged title in himself through a tax deed from the state of California. Neither of the parties to the action was in actual possession of the lot, which was unimproved. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff, from which the defendant appeals on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the allegations of the complaint and the conclusion of the trial court that defendant had no title to the property.

[1] "The, plaintiff in support of her complaint, introduced in evidence a deed dated October 16, 1911, executed by Clara G. Spring et al., which in terms transferred the tract mentioned to Lizzie J. Brent, a deed from the latter and her husband to Brent Investment Company, a corporation, conveying the same property, together with a deed from the corporation to plaintiff of the lot in question, the latter transfer being dated April 3, 1913. The testimony of an officer of the corporation sufficiently shows that Lizzie J. Brent was in actual possession of the entire tract, and that the corporation likewise was in possession at the time of the transfer to the plaintiff. This evidence was sufficient prima facie to establish ownership in the plaintiff. Holthoff v. Freudenthal, 22 N. M. 377, 162 P. 173; Mitchell v. Titus, 33 Colo. 385, 80 P. 1042; Rockey v. Vieux, 179 Cal. 681, 178 P. 712; Pearson v. Hellman Commercial T. & S. Bank, 199 Cal. 305, 249 P. 10; Kilfoil v. Warden, 46 Cal. App. 502, 189 P. 303.

"Defendant claims title as grantee under a tax deed dated August 4, 1919, executed by the tax collector of Los Angeles county. The deed recited that the lot described was duly assessed for taxation in the year 1913 to Lizzie J. Brent, and was thereafter, on the 3d day of July, 1919, duly sold to S. Beck by W. O. Welch, tax collector of the county of Los Angeles, for non-payment of delinquent taxes which had been legally levied in the year 1913 and were a lien thereon; further stating the total amount for which the same was sold, and that all taxes levied and assessed against the property prior to the year 1919 had been paid and discharged. * * *

"It appears from the evidence that the lot was assessed to the plaintiff in the years 1916 and 1920, inclusive, and that the taxes levied thereon after the year 1913 to and including the first installment of the year 1921 were paid by her with the exception of the second installment of 1919, which became delinquent, and the lot was again sold to the state in 1920. Defendant redeemed the property from the latter sale, and after the year 1920 the taxes levied thereon, with the exception of the first installment of 1921, were paid by him. The proceedings leading to the sale to defendant on July 3, 1919, were conducted under the provisions of sections 3764 and 3771 of the Political Code, as amended in 1913 (Stats. 1913, pp. 556, 557). In the addenda attached to the published tax list and notice of sale appeared the name of Lizzie J. Brent, the person to whom the lot which was therein described was assessed for the delinquent taxes of 1913. The name of the plaintiff, who was the record owner in the years 1918 and 1919, and to whom the property was last assessed next before the sale in question, did not appear in the list or in the notice mentioned above. Furthermore, it was not directly shown at the trial that the tax collector complied with the provisions of section 3771 of the Political Code by mailing a copy of the list or publication to the last known post office address of the plaintiff. It is contended by the plaintiff that it was essential to the validity of the published notice that her name, as the owner and the person to whom the property was last assessed next before the sale, be inserted therein, and that the evidence was insufficient to show a compliance with the statutory requirement of notice by mailing.

"It was provided by section 3764 of the Political Code (Stats. 1913, p. 556) that on or before the 5th day of June each year the tax collector must publish the delinquent list, which must contain, among other things, 'the names of persons and a description of the property delinquent,' and that before its publication the tax collector and auditor should jointly arrange the list so as to designate in some particular manner the property contained in the list which was sold to the state five years previous, under the provisions of section 3771 of the Political Code.

"It was provided by section 3771 of the Political Code (Stats. 1913, p. 557) that the property contained in the advertised list, as provided by section 3764 of the Political Code, which had not been redeemed from the previous sale to the state, be sold by the tax collector at public auction, and further that within five days after the first publication of the list the tax collector should mail a copy of the list or publication, postage prepaid thereon and registered, to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before such sale at his last known post office address. It was further provided by section 3785b of the Political Code (Stats. 1913, p. 558) that the tax collector should execute to the purchaser a deed to the property sold, this deed to contain certain recitals, those here material being as follows: That the property was duly assessed for taxation, the year assessed and the name of the person to whom assessed being stated, and was thereafter, on the date of the sale, duly sold by the tax collector to the grantee named for nonpayment of the delinquent taxes which had been legally levied in the year first mentioned, and were a lien on the property, no provision being made for a recital of the name of the owner or of the person to whom the property was last assessed next before the sale. It was also provided that no matters other than those stated in the section need be recited in the deed, which by subdivision 5 of section 3786 of the Political Code (Stats. 1911, p. 1102) was made primary evidence that 'at a proper time and place the property was sold as prescribed by law, and by the proper officer.'"

[2] It must be kept in mind that we are dealing with the law as it was in July, 1914, when the sale of this property was made to the state for delinquent taxes of 1913. That law follows through all proceedings dependent upon that sale. Biaggi v. Ramont, 189 Cal. 675, 679, 209 P. 892.

The provisions of section 3764, Political Code, for the publication of a delinquent list, primarily refer to the unpaid taxes of the immediately preceding tax year. Stats. 1913, p. 556. The reference therein to property sold to the state "five years previous under the provisions of section 3771 of this Code," etc., are incidental to the tax sale procedure that is to result from the current delinquency. This fact is rendered still more clear by reading section 3771 (Stats. 1913, p. 557), which, after first providing by general rule that the sales for delinquent taxes shall be made to the state, qualifies that rule by the proviso that any property "contained in the advertised list" as provided for in section 3764, "which has not been redeemed from the sale made to the state five years previously, shall be sold at public auction to the highest bidder. * * *" But the sale itself is authorized only as a sale of property contained in the advertised list, and for the then delinquent taxes for which no sale had been made before.

This is manifest from the further provisions that no bid shall be accepted for less than the amounts due "as shown in said advertised list," and that the purchaser is allowed 30 days within which to make redemption as provided in section 3785b, which section (Stats. 1913, p. 558) requires that no deed shall be delivered by the tax collector "until redemption has been made of such property and all taxes, penalties, interest, and charges have been paid which may have been accrued by reason of any previous tax sale or delinquency."

Briefly summarized, these provisions of the law are intended to provide a method by which, in cases of repeated delinquency in payment of taxes against the same property, the sale for the last delinquency shall be made to any purchaser who will buy, and who shall settle the state's claims in full by paying off all other tax liens outstanding against that property.

In the case at bar, the tax deed under which the defendant claims title shows on its face that it was issued pursuant to an attempted sale in the year 1919, for and on account of the taxes of the year 1913; and the deed was executed pursuant to sale so made at a time when the taxes of the year 1918 (assessed to the plaintiff and paid by her) were not delinquent. The property was not contained in the 1918 delinquent list, nor was the plaintiff's name shown therein. The property was, indeed, mentioned in the "addenda list" of property previously sold to the state, and is there given as property assessed to Lizzie J. Brent. The name of the plaintiff, to whom the property was last assessed (i. e., for the year 1918) is not found in the delinquent list, nor in said "addenda list."

[3] On the record thus shown, and even if the notice of sale had been mailed to the plaintiff, the tax collector was without any right to make the sale to defendant. Therefore the sale was void and the tax deed was void. Our decision on this point renders it unnecessary to discuss any other objections to the deed.

The judgment is affirmed.

LEVITT v. BLACK.

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 3, 1927.

1. Wills $\S$ 166(1), 324(3)—Proponent held required to present evidence of volition of testatrix, and undue influence was for jury, in view of circumstances surrounding execution of will.

Where proponent's relations with decedent offered opportunity to control testamentary act, decedent's condition permitted subversion of her freedom of will, and proponent, who unduly profited as beneficiary, was active in procuring instrument to be executed, proponent had obligation of presenting evidence of volition, and question of undue influence was for jury, though none of such circumstances standing alone creates presumption against validity of instrument.

2. Wills $\S$ 166(7)—Proof of opportunity to influence testatrix, though coupled with interest, will not alone sustain finding of undue influence.

Mere proof of opportunity to influence mind of testatrix, even though coupled with interest or motive to do so, does not sustain finding of undue influence, in absence of testimony showing that there was pressure operating directly on testamentary act.

3. Wills $\S$ 163(2)—One profiting unduly as beneficiary and occupying confidential relation to testator, who participated in procuring execution of will, must show it was not induced by coercion or fraud.

Where one who unduly profits by will as beneficiary thereunder sustains confidential relation to testator, and has actually participated in procuring execution of will, burden is on him to show that will was not induced by coercion or fraud.

4. Wills $\S$ 163(2)—Presumption of undue influence arises from confidential relation between testator and beneficiary unduly profiting by will, coupled with latter's activity in preparing it.

Presumption of undue influence arises from proof of confidential relation between testator and beneficiary unduly profiting by will, coupled with activity on part of such beneficiary in preparation of will.

5. Wills $\S$ 166(2)—Evidence held to support finding of undue influence in execution of will in favor of one in confidential relation with testatrix.

In action for revocation of probate of will, evidence held to support finding of jury that will was result of undue influence by proponent, who stood in confidential relation to testatrix, profited unduly by will, and participated in procuring execution of will.

6. Wills $\S$ 278—Will contestant may plead relative to execution of will by third person, whose affairs were interrelated with those of proponent and testatrix.

In action for revocation of probate of will on ground of undue influence, it was proper for contestant to plead relative to execution of will by another, where affairs of such other, decedent, and proponent, were interrelated.

7. Wills $\S$ 278—Facts constituting undue influence must be alleged in will contest.

Where ground of will contest is undue influence, it is insufficient for pleader to merely allege legal conclusion of undue influence, but facts must be pleaded from which court may determine as matter of law whether such facts constituted undue influence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Anna M. Graves, deceased. Action for revocation of probate of will by Maud Wilson Levitt, contestant, opposed by John R. Black, proponent. From a judgment for contestant, and an order denying a new trial, proponent appeals. Affirmed.

William J. Hanlon and Clarke & Bowker, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Edward T. Sherer and Welburn Mayock, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J. Maud Wilson Levitt, respondent here, a niece of Anna M. Graves, deceased, and her only heir, filed a contest, after probate of the will of the decedent, alleging unsoundness of mind of the testatrix at the time of the execution of the document, and that the will was procured by the undue influence of John R. Black, appellant, to whom the decedent bequeathed practically her entire estate. After due trial on the issues tendered by the answer of Black, the jury found that Mrs. Graves was of sound mind at the date of the execution of the will, but that it was procured through the undue influence of appellant. Judgment was entered in accordance with the findings of the jury, and motion for a new trial, interposed by Black, was denied. While an appeal was taken from the whole of the judgment, and from the order denying the motion, appellant is urging only that the judgment and the findings of the jury that Anna M. Graves was acting under the undue influence of John R. Black at the time she executed the will are erroneous.

Anna M. Graves was, at the time the will in question was made, 75 years of age. For 13 years she had been housekeeper for Augustus A. Harris, an old man about 5 years her senior. They lived in a house owned by them in common, and, together, were worth about $40,000. Near by John R. Black, a real estate agent, had his office, where Harris frequently visited him. In December, 1923, Harris had a stroke of paralysis, from which he never recovered. He died in February, 1924. The evidence establishes that, during that interval of about two months, Black was very active in the affairs of Harris and Anna M. Graves. He sold their home for $20,000, introduced his attorney to them, and advised that they make their wills, which were prepared by the attorney and witnessed by Black himself and one of his real estate salesmen. In both wills Black was named executor without bonds. Anna M. Graves was named as the principal beneficiary in the will of Harris, and Harris was made sole beneficiary in her will, with the provision that, in the event of his death prior to that of the testatrix, the estate should go to Black's grandson. When the home property was sold, the old people lived for a time with Charles Harris, the brother of Augustus, where the latter passed away.

The evidence indicates that during all of this time Mrs. Graves was a very sick woman, and occasionally "did queer things." According to the testimony, when 100 feet away from the house, she could not find her way back. On one occasion, partly clad, she wandered into the road, where she fell, and had to be picked up and taken into the house. At another time she built a fire in a pan in the middle of the room. The surroundings in the home of Charles Harris, to which the old people had been taken, were not pleasant or comfortable, and, on the death of Augustus Harris, Black, taking two doctors and his attorney with him, caused Mrs. Graves to be removed to a hospital, where she was examined. She was found to be suffering with bronchial pneumonia, and her condition was very grave. On the tenth day after her admission to the hospital her condition appears to have become very serious. In the afternoon of that day Black caused her removal to an apartment over the garage in the rear of his own house, where she lived until her death, some three months later, and where she was attended by doctors and nurses chosen by Black. On March 29, 1924, Mrs. Graves executed another will, the one here in question. Immediately prior to its signing, and at the apparent suggestion of Black, the doctors subjected her to a mental examination, and one of them and the attending nurse acted as witnesses. Other than Black, no other persons were present. He had previously discussed the will with the testatrix, and it had been prepared by his attorney. He was made the sole beneficiary (other than a provision in the will that if Mrs. Graves had any living heirs she gave unto each of them the sum of $100) and was named as executor without bonds.

In support of the contention of the respondent that the will was procured by the undue influence of Black, evidence of the foregoing and many other facts relating to Mrs. Graves' condition, personality, her age, health, and strength were admitted in minute detail. The circumstances attending the execution of the will were fully shown, and the situation of the parties to the transaction was placed before the jury. The appellant claims that his activity in the affairs of Harris and Mrs. Graves was brought about by the fact that during the illness of Harris the latter was in such condition that he could do nothing for himself, and refused to have doctors and nurses attend him; that he (appellant) daily cared for him, and performed the most menial tasks; that at the time of the death of Harris, which occurred at the home of his brother, conditions were bad, filthy, and unsanitary, and that Mrs. Graves had been neglected and poorly attended, and for that reason he saw that she was properly cared for, and in the manner already indicated. The further contention of the appellant is that respondent and Mrs. Graves had never corresponded, and did not know each other, and that Mrs. Graves was of the opinion, as expressed in her will, that she had no living heirs. He contends, in view of these facts and because of the kindnesses he had shown to the testatrix, that he "was therefore the person to whom naturally Mrs. Graves would desire to leave such property as she might have at the time of her death; * * * that in this respect the will was not unnatural, but that [he] was the natural object of her bounty." He contends that the testimony "is absolutely silent that this will was not the free and voluntary act of the decedent."

[1-5] We deem further statement or discussion of the detailed testimony unnecessary. Three well-established facts, among others, which are recognized as being indicative of undue influence, or a subversion of a decedent's volition, stand out clearly in the record: The relations between appellant and the decedent afforded to appellant an opportunity to control the testamentary act; the decedent's condition was such as to permit of a subversion of her freedom of will; the appellant was active in procuring the instrument to be executed. In addition, appellant unduly profited as beneficiary under the will. While none of these circumstances, standing alone, has the effect of creating a presumption against the validity of the instrument, their probative force, in combination, is to impose upon the proponent the obligation of presenting evidence of volition, and to make the question as to undue influence one of fact for the jury's determination. 26 Cal. Jur. pp. 647, 648. Appellant correctly contends that mere proof of opportunity to influence the mind of the testatrix, even though shown to be coupled with interest, or a motive to do so, does not sustain a finding of undue influence, in the absence of testimony showing that there was pressure operating directly on her testamentary act. Estate of Morcel, 162 Cal. 188, 194, 121 P. 733. But in this case it clearly appears that the appellant took an active part in securing the execution of the will at a time when there existed a confidential relation between himself and Mrs. Graves. The rule is well settled that:

"Where one who unduly profits by the will as a beneficiary thereunder sustains a confidential relation to the testator, and has actually participated in procuring the execution of the will, the burden is on him to show that the will was not induced by coercion or fraud' (Estate of Baird, 176 Cal. 381, 384 [168 P. 561]; Estate of Nutt, 181 Cal. 522, 528 [185 P. 393]), and that 'a presumption of undue influence arises from proof of the existence of a confidential relation between the testator and such a beneficiary, coupled with activity on the part of the latter in the preparation of the will' (Estate of Higgins, 156 Cal. 261 [104 P. 6])." Estate of Relph, 192 Cal. 451, 465, 221 P. 361, 367.

Appellant did not sustain the burden cast upon him in the lower court, and has not satisfied us that the finding of the jury, and the consequent judgment revoking the will, are incorrect as matters of law. In view of the surroundings in which the testatrix was placed, prior to and after making the will, we deem of little moment the fact that she lived about two months after its execution.

[6.7] The respondent, in her amended contest filed in the court below, set out in some detail the circumstances under which appellant "gradually became the confidant and business advisor" of Augustus A. Harris and Mrs. Graves, by reason of which he prevailed upon Harris to make the will in favor of Mrs. Graves, and to appoint Black executor without bonds. Appellant demurred and moved to strike out the portion relating to the execution of the will by Augustus A. Harris, claiming that the relations between appellant and Harris were not material or relevant to the issue whether or not Mrs. Graves was under the undue influence of appellant at the time she made her will. The affairs of the three were, however, so interrelated that it was proper for the pleader to set them out. Where the ground of a contest of a will is undue influence, it is not sufficient for the pleader to merely allege the legal conclusion of undue influence, but facts must be pleaded from which the court may determine as a matter of law whether the facts so pleaded constitute the alleged undue influence. Estate of Bixler, 194 Cal. 585, 589, 229 P. 704. The allegations here are, in effect, practically identical with those considered in the Bixler case, and of which it was said (page 590 [229 P. 706]) the allegations "clearly and sufficiently, without resort to conclusions of law, allege the ultimate fact that the will was the product of the undue influence of the person charged." The demurrer was properly overruled, and the motion to strike out was properly denied.

The trial court instructed the jury in the language of section 2235 of the Civil Code, that:

"All transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary during the existence of the trust, or while the influence acquired by the trustee remains, by which he obtains any advantage from his beneficiary, are presumed to be entered into by the latter without sufficient consideration, and under undue influence."

Appellant contends that the instruction has no application to the present case, for the reason that he was in no sense a trustee of an express trust, but only a trustee as executor of the last will of Augustus A. Harris, deceased, to handle, under direction of the court, the affairs of the estate in which Mrs. Graves was sole beneficiary. He does not further press his contention, and fails to point out the injury, if any, caused by the giving of the instruction. In answer to other contentions of appellant, it may be said that the trial court correctly instructed the jury at length, and with a great attention to detail.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SUTTER BUTTE CANAL CO. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA. ★

Rehearing Denied Oct. 26, 1927.

1. Constitutional law ☞81—Police power is attribute of state sovereignty, operating on property and property rights to extent necessary for protection of public health, safety, morals, and welfare.

The police power is one of the attributes of state sovereignty, and cannot be limited by contract, which operates on property and property rights, including contracts, to extent necessary for protection of public health, safety, morals, and welfare.

2. Public service commissions ☞6—Constitution commits execution of police power over public utilities to Railroad Commission (Const. art. 12, § 23; Public Utilities Act, §§ 31, 32, 67).

To the Railroad Commission has been committed execution of police power over public utilities in California, in view of Const. art. 12, § 23, and Public Utilities Act, §§ 31, 32, 67 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, p. 2702).

3. Waters and water courses ☞257(1)—Railroad Commission may remove discrimination between contract consumers and new consumers of water for irrigation.

Railroad Commission held authorized in fixing water rates to remove discrimination between consumers operating under continuous contracts and new consumers by paving way for release of contract consumers from their contracts.

4. Waters and water courses ☞257(1)—Contract consumer of water for irrigation, availing himself of status of noncontract consumer, held not entitled to return to former status if company protests.

Contract consumer of water for irrigation, who elects to avail himself of status of noncontract consumer under ruling of Railroad Commission, held not entitled to return to former status under contract if canal company properly protests.

5. Waters and water courses ☞249—Where dedication of water service was made for lands, duty to serve held not affected by consumers' contracts.

Where dedication of water service was made for certain lands, corresponding duty to serve resting on canal company is neither greater nor less by reason of contracts for water held by certain consumers.

6. Waters and water courses ☞257(1)—Where evidence sustains Railroad Commission's exclusion of item from water rate base, court cannot interfere.

Where evidence was sufficient to sustain order of Railroad Commission excluding certain sum from rate base in fixing water rate, it is not within power of court to interfere.

7. Waters and water courses ☞257(1)—Railroad Commission held authorized to determine it could base no conclusion as to reproduction cost on uncertain testimony in water rate case.

Railroad Commission held within its authority in determining it could base no conclusion as to reproduction cost in water rate-fixing order on testimony of witness who admittedly used a number of uncertain assumptions which would render estimate inaccurate.

8. Waters and water courses ☞257(1)—Railroad Commission, finding evidence insufficient, cannot be said to have arbitrarily refused to consider reproduction cost in water rate case.

It cannot be said that Railroad Commission arbitrarily refused to consider reproduction cost in rate-fixing order for canal company, where it considered evidence and found it insufficient on which to predicate action.

9. Waters and water courses ☞257(2)—5.28 per cent. held not, as matter of law, so low as to be confiscatory water rate.

5.28 per cent. rate of return on valuation fixed for canal company held not, as matter of law, so low as to be confiscatory, in view of many complications inhering in system of operation of particular utility.

In Bank.

Application for certiorari by the Sutter Butte Canal Company to review an order of the Railroad Commission of the State of California fixing water rates. Order affirmed.

Isaac Frohman and Devlin & Brookman, all of San Francisco, W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and Henry Ingram, of Gridley, for petitioner.

Carl I. Wheat and Reginald L. Vaughan, both of San Francisco, Arthur T. George, of Los Angeles, and Elmer W. Armfield and Arthur B. Eddy, both of Woodland, for Sutter Butte Water Users Ass'n.

PRESTON, J. By this proceeding petitioner seeks to have reviewed and annulled a decision and order of the Railroad Commission, designated decision No. 16289, made on March 20, 1926, relating to its water rates, complaint being made of the valuation of its property for rate-fixing purposes, the rate of return thereon, and the modification and practical abrogation of certain continuous contracts for the furnishing of water held by it with a certain class of consumers.

In previous decisions this court has had occasion to outline the history of petitioner as a public utility engaged in the business of appropriating water from the Feather river and selling and distributing the same for irrigation purposes in Butte and Sutter counties, in this state, and reference is made to the statements of fact set forth therein. Butte County Water Users' Ass'n v. Railroad Com., 185 Cal. 218, 196 P. 265; King v. Railroad Com., 190 Cal. 321, 212 P. 200; and Live Oak Water Users' Ass'n v. Railroad Com., 192 Cal. 132, 219 P. 65.

Petitioner, a public utility, admittedly subject to the power of the Railroad Commission, is in possession of a water right dedicated to the public use. Its consumers are divided into two classes—contract consumers and noncontract consumers. Water was originally furnished to the contract consumers under so-called "water right contracts," or continuous supply contracts, whereby the consumer paid an initial amount, usually $10 per acre, for the privilege of obtaining the contract, and agreed to pay a stipulated rate for irrigation water service each year thereafter upon the total acreage covered by the contract, and the company on its part agreed to furnish water as required for all of the acres covered thereby. Noncontract consumers or applicants, pursuant to order of the commission made in March, 1918, were served upon the basis only of applications for water made from year to year. This dual situation has existed since 1918, and the Railroad Commission has attempted to solve the problem presented by these two classes of consumers by various orders and decisions, the last two of which, the one here involved and the one prior thereto, may be briefly described as follows:

Decision No. 14422, rendered on December 31, 1924, after application by petitioner for a further increase in the water rates, increased the 1922 rates and abolished the differential in rates between contract and noncontract holders. It established a standby or service charge of $1.25 per acre, payable by both classes, effective as to noncontract holders for all of their lands covered by their applications during such time as they should continue on thereunder, and in any event for not less than three years, and to be continuously effective as to contract holders for all of the lands covered by their contracts, provided, however, by rule 3, that if such contract holder does not desire to use in any year the whole or any of said water which he is so entitled to receive, and "files with the company on or before February 1st of that year notice in writing of what he does desire in respect to the nonservice of water, he shall then be obligated to pay in that year, and in each year thereafter in which said notice remains in effect, on or before February 1st thereof, the service charge of $1.25 per acre of the land for which no water is desired as specified in said notice, and, as to the remainder of his land, such rates or charges based upon the extent and character of use of the water which he desires to use, as are in effect."

Thereafter, and in 1925, the proceeding which resulted in decision 16289, the validity of which is here involved, was "instituted on the commission's own motion for the purpose of making a complete and new investigation of the rates, charges, classifications, contracts, rules, regulations, and service of the Sutter Butte Canal Company, in view of the development of considerable protest and dissatisfaction following the fixing of rates on the Sutter Butte Canal Company system by this commission in decision No. 14422, dated December 31, 1924."

Said decision modified the previous rules so as to give to each continuous contract holder the right, at his option, either (1) to obtain water under applications for so much of his land as he desired to irrigate, similarly with applicants generally who were not holders of continuous contracts; or (2) to obtain water under his continuous contract, provided that if he so elects, he may still, by notifying petitioner that he does not desire "to use in any year the whole or any of the water which he is so entitled to receive, and files with the company on or before February 1st of that year notice in writing of what he does desire in respect to the nonservice of water, he shall then be obligated in that year, and in the next succeeding year thereafter, but for no further period in which said notice remains in effect, to pay, on or before February 1st thereof, the service charge of $1.25 per acre of the land for which no water is desired, as specified in said notice; * * *" or (3) to release himself from any obligation to pay any charge to petitioner under his continuous contract by giving notice that he does not desire any water for his land in any year, or to neither give notice nor use the water.

The substance of the order here under consideration is to pave the way for the release of all contract consumers. It is true that the contracts may be retained at the election of the consumer, but the whole plan is in reality, when stripped of its complications, an effort by the Railroad Commission to abolish all distinction between the two classes of consumers and to put them upon a parity in order that there may be removed from the controversy this source of friction and trouble.

The commission in this behalf, among other things, said:

"Rates fixed herein will therefore be on the basis that all service be charged for under a uniform schedule of rates and under application forms which will exclude any consideration of the continuous contract and preclude the making of charges for unirrigated lands under said contracts, as such."

[1, 2] The controlling question in the proceeding is, therefore, the extent of the power that may be exerted by the Railroad Commission upon the contracts between petitioner and the contract consumers. The police power is one of the attributes of state sovereignty and cannot be limited by contract. It operates upon property and property rights, including contracts, to the extent necessary for the protection of the public health, safety, morals, and welfare. To the Railroad Commission has been committed the execution of this power over public utilities in California. The scope of this power is defined in the state Constitution as follows:

Section 23, art. 12: "Every private corporation, and every individual or association of individuals, owning, operating, managing, or controlling any * * * canal, pipe line, plant, or equipment, or any part of such * * * canal, pipe line, plant, or equipment within this state, * * * for the production, generation, transmission, delivery or furnishing of heat, light, water or power * * * either directly or indirectly, to or for the public * * * is hereby declared to be a public utility subject to such control and regulation by the Railroad Commission as may be provided by the Legislature, and every class of private corporations, individuals, or associations of individuals hereafter declared by the legislature to be public utilities shall likewise be subject to such control and regulation. The Railroad Commission shall have and exercise such power and jurisdiction to supervise and regulate public utilities, in the state of California, and to fix the rates to be charged for commodities furnished, or services rendered by public utilities as shall be conferred upon it by the Legislature, and the right of the Legislature to confer powers upon the Railroad Commission respecting public utilities is hereby declared to be plenary and to be unlimited by any provision of this Constitution. * * *

The powers conferred are more specifically set forth in sections 31 and 32 of the Public Utilities Act (Deering's Gen. Laws of 1923, p. 2702).

The exercise of the power thus conferred upon the Railroad Commission may be reviewed only in the manner specified by the statute, which is in brief as follows:

"* * * The review shall not be extended further than to determine whether the commission has regularly pursued its authority, including a determination of whether the order or decision under review violates any right of the petitioner under the Constitution of the United States or of the state of California. The findings and conclusions of the commission on questions of fact shall be final and shall not be subject to review; such questions of fact shall include ultimate facts and the findings and conclusions of the commission on reasonableness and discrimination. The commission and each party to the action or proceeding before the commission shall have the right to appear in the review proceeding. Upon the hearing the Supreme Court shall enter judgment either affirming or setting aside the order or decision of the commission. * * *" Public Utilities Act, supra, § 67.

[3] The covenants of the contract here to be tested for the operation of the police power are as follows: That the canal company furnish water at the rate of one cubic foot per second for each 160 acres of land described in each contract for the purpose of irrigating the land. In cases where water is desired by the landowner, at his option, to be furnished by the canal company for producing rice, the contracts provide for the furnishing of water at the rate of 3 cubic feet per second for each 160 acres of land, and at a higher charge per acre than is provided for water furnished for the production of crops other than rice.

That the water covered by the contract shall be and become appurtenant to the land therein described, and can only be conveyed by and with a conveyance of the land; that all the covenants and conditions of the contract shall run with the land; that the use of the water must be confined to said land.

That the landowner shall construct and maintain a ditch from the company's ditch to his land, which at the option of the canal company may be taken over and operated by it; that the landowner grants to the canal company a right of way through his land; that the landowner shall pay to the canal company the specified rate for each acre annually on September 1 of each and every year; that all sums due or to become due to the canal company under the contract shall be and become a lien on the lands described therein and may be foreclosed as any other lien; that the heirs, successors and assigns of the respective parties are forever bound by the contract; that in case of water shortage each landowner is to be entitled only to a proportional share of the water available; that it is understood that the canal company will contract for the delivery of 1,000 cubic feet of water per second. Where a lump sum was provided to be paid annually by the landowner, such sum was computed by multiplying the rate per acre by the number of acres described in the contract.

The power to increase the charges for service has been twice exercised by the Railroad Commission at the behest of petitioner, as hereinabove pointed out. The times and terms of payment under said contracts have been changed by the same power. As far as the petitioner is concerned, its privileges and emoluments under the contracts have been greatly increased. So far as the consumer is concerned, however, the contract has slight, if any, benefit to him left in it. The only privilege he has apparently is to sit by and see the eleventh hour consumer, who has no contract, served with water upon less onerous terms than he who has borne the burden during the trying periods of earlier days. For the contract consumer must pay a service charge on the whole acreage under contract for all lands described therein upon which water is not used in a given season, while the new consumer only has to apply for water for lands which he intends to irrigate and only has to pay the service charge thereon for the acreage which he does not actually irrigate. And he may satisfy all demands against him in three years, if not sooner, and be completely released.

In other words, the new consumer has a chance for the exercise of his judgment and discretion upon the situation as it arises, whereas without the order in question the contract holder is firmly bound, not for a space of time but perpetually, without a single opportunity to exercise judgment or discretion in his efforts to better his condition. He is condemned to pay, and that forever, the charge annually accruing, which is a lien upon his inheritance. If the commission may not relieve this discrimination, then it must follow that since 1918 every new consumer has been illegally admitted to water service as such consumer was not required to sign a contract for perpetual service. For if the commission may allow a dedication of service to a new consumer without demanding of him a perpetual obligation, then it must follow that it has the power to remove discrimination thus created between the two classes of consumers. The legality of this dual classification has already been sustained by this court. King v. Railroad Com., supra; Live Oak, etc., Ass'n v. Railroad Com., supra. In these causes petitioner appeared and espoused the orders of the Railroad Commission. In fact, by a process originating in keen paternal interest, the commission has heretofore devised many plans to aid petitioner, all of which have been executed at the expense of the contract consumer. The order here in question is the only one to which petitioner has or could have objected.

The power of the Railroad Commission is little indeed, if it may not intervene to remove such palpable discrimination. The commission has found that the time has arrived for this action. Practically the only provision of the contracts not modified already by this court is the one changing the duration of the contract. But it must follow that if, in fixing rates, or in removing discrimination, the duration of the contract relationship is encountered, it must yield to the regulatory power lodged by the Constitution in the commission even to the extent of out and out termination or release of such contract.

Moreover, petitioner is in no position to urge that this conclusion is not correct, for it has on previous occasions successfully urged the commission to fix constructive periods of time for which noncontract consumers must obligate themselves to pay in order to get water service. Three years is the period mentioned as to them in the order here under review. If it is within the power of the commission to require a consumer to sign an agreement to pay for three years' service in order to get water for his present year's needs, it must surely be true that the power to add a constructive period to the obligation implies the power to curtail an indefinite period and thus place the two classes of consumers of the same utility on an equal basis. In other words, it is clear that it is well within the regulatory power of the commission to disregard altogether the contracts in so far as they provide for periods of future service and fix a present rate for water actually consumed, and disregard all paternalistic provisions in favor of petitioner at the expense of either class of consumers. It follows logically then that the order under review is not open to the criticism that it violates any of petitioner's constitutional rights under the contracts. Any language found in the case of Live Oak, etc., Ass'n v. Railroad Com., supra, which may seem to be at variance with these views, must be read in connection with the issue there involved, which was the validity of this dual classification among consumers of this utility and the right to charge against contract holders the service fee on the lands not irrigated. The power of the commission to disregard the duration period of said contracts was not there involved.

The holding we here make as to the power to modify or abrogate said contracts in the manner done by the order under consideration has been clearly foreshadowed in the following cases: Southern Pacific Co. v. Spring Valley Water Co., 173 Cal. 291, 298, 159 P. 865, L. R. A. 1917E, 680; Lamoneira Co. v. Railroad Com., 174 Cal. 232, 237, 238,

In Law v. Railroad Com., supra, at page 740 (195 P. 424), it is said:

"If the service contracted for was devoted to public use (Allen v. Railroad Com., 179 Cal. 68, 175 P. 466, 8 A. L. R. 249), the contract for the service was subject to the exercise of the police power and, the state having elected to confer upon the commission the power to prescribe uniform rates for the service, petitioner cannot complain if the exercise of this power results in the practical annulment of his private contract fixing compensation for a public service (Producers' Transp. Co. v. Railroad Com., 251 U. S. 228, 40 S. Ct. 131, 64 L. Ed. 239)."

In Manigault v. Springs, 199 U. S. 473, 26 S. Ct. 127, 50 L. Ed. 274, this principle is stated as follows:

"It is the settled law of this court that the interdiction of statutes impairing the obligation of contracts does not prevent the state from exercising such powers as are vested in it for the promotion of the common weal, or are necessary for the general good of the public, though contracts previously entered into between individuals may thereby be affected. This power, which in its various ramifications, is known as the police power, is an exercise of the sovereign right of the government to protect the lives, health, morals, comfort and general welfare of the people, and is paramount to any rights under contracts between individuals."

In Market St. Ry. Co. v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co. (D. C.) 6 F.(2d) 633, 635, it is said:

"On the question of the power of the state to regulate the contracts of its public utilities with their consumers the law is now well settled. The courts hold that all contracts relating to public service, entered into between the corporation operating a public utility and the private consumer, contain from the very nature of their subject-matter an implied reservation of the right of the state to lawfully exercise its police power for the general welfare, and that there is no impairment of the obligations of contract within the guaranties of the state or federal Constitution, even though said contract is thereby rendered partially or wholly invalid." In re Guilford Water Company's Service Rates, 118 Me. 367, 108 A. 446, 450; Union Dry Goods Co. v. Georgia Public Service Corporation, 248 U. S. 372, 376, 39 S. Ct. 117, 63 L. Ed. 309, 9 A. L. R. 1420; Producers' Transportation Co. v. Railroad Commission of the State of California, 251 U. S. 228,

In Union Dry Goods Co. v. Georgia Public Service Corp., 248 U. S. 372, 39 S. Ct. 117, 63 L. Ed. 309, 9 A. L. R. 1420, Mr. Justice Clarke, speaking for the court, concluded his examination of this subject with this observation:

"These decisions, a few from many to like effect, should suffice to satisfy the most skeptical or belated investigator that the right of private contract must yield to the exigencies of the public welfare when determined in an appropriate manner by the authority of the state.

[4, 5] It is no answer to this contention to say that the contracts still bind the petitioner, and it must as to these contract holders stand ready to serve the whole acreage therein mentioned and may not safely take on additional consumers for that reason. It is not for this court to say how much strength, if any, remains in these pacts, but one thing we may say, and that is that any contract consumer who elects to avail himself of the status of a noncontract consumer may not, if petitioner properly protests, return to his former status under the contract. Law v. Railroad Com., supra, at page 741 (195 P. 424). But a still more satisfactory answer to this contention of petitioner is the fact that, contract or no contract, dedication of water service has been made for these lands and the corresponding duty to serve is neither greater nor less by reason of the contracts. Leavitt v. Lassen Irr. Co., supra, at page 89 (106 P. 407); Byington v. Sacramento Valley, etc., Co., 170 Cal. 124, 133, 148 P. 791.

[6] Petitioner also complains that the Railroad Commission excluded from the rate base an item of $309,000 donated by landowners towards the cost of what is known as the Sutter County Extension. Where there is sufficient legal evidence found in the record to sustain the commission's order, it is not within the power of the court to interfere. Williamson v. Railroad Com., 193 Cal. 22, 35, 222 P. 803. This situation is best described in the language of the commission:

"The effect of the construction of the Sutter County extension by the company on the rates of the Sutter Butte Canal Company has been the subject of much controversy. It has been the belief of many of the landowners in Butte county that this extension was entirely unjustified, and that it has resulted in an extra and unreasonable burden on the water users in that county. Much testimony was introduced relative to this matter. It appears that in 1913 certain landowners of Sutter county negotiated with this company for a supply of water. In 1919, an agreement was entered into for the service of 14,400 acres by the construction of distribution laterals and the utilization of the Live Oak slough for the conveying of water to this general territory. The cost of the construction was to be paid in full by the landowners, and later to be refunded on the basis of one-seventh of the annual revenue received. In 1920, it was found necessary to extend the main canal to this district and discontinue the use of the Live Oak slough. A new contract was entered into whereby the landowners were required to advance $20 per acre, while the company agreed to complete the construction and install a pumping plant on Feather river. The total cost of the project was approximately $835,000, and the company's investment slightly over $526,000. This work was done at the peak of prices and, in addition, was rushed so that without question the cost exceeded a reasonable cost under present conditions and some additional cost over normal construction occurred at the time of the development. In past decisions, the amount of the rate base for this extension has been the amount invested by the company."

The commission for the reasons indicated above excluded the item and allowed only the investment by the company. There is no contention that the evidence does not warrant the observations above quoted. We see no ground upon which this court may intervene in such a situation. The fact that the item has been consistently excluded in previous orders to which the petitioner made no protest convinces us that it has placed its chief reliance upon the questions above discussed and not upon this action of the commission.

[7] As to the further contention that the commission arbitrarily refused to consider reproduction cost in its rate-fixing order, an examination of the record discloses that the commission only had before it on that subject the testimony of the witness Ryan, who had admittedly used a number of uncertain assumptions which would render his estimate inaccurate, and the commission was well within its authority in determining that it could base no conclusion upon this testimony. Of it the commission said:

"An estimate of reproduction cost new totaling $2,676,118 was presented through Mr. Ryan. This was based on the appraisal by Mr. Ware, applying price ratios with a view to determining the probable reproduction cost new under 1924 price conditions. This appraisal was of a very general nature and the evidence indicates a failure on the part of Mr. Ryan to take into consideration changes in the art of construction and the use by him of other general assumptions which would tend to give a figure in excess of reasonable." 27 C. R. C. 765, 773.

[8] The witness concerning his own testimony said:

"This is not an attempt to make a reproduction valuation of the property, or show the cost of reproducing it, but only to convert the investment actually made into terms of dollars of 1925 levels."

It is not a fair characterization to say the commission arbitrarily refused to consider this factor. On the contrary, the commission did consider the item of evidence and found it insufficient upon which to predicate action. The legality of the system of valuation employed is therefore not raised on this record.

[9] Complaint is also made that the estimated rate of return on the valuation fixed is only 5.28 per cent. We are pointed to no figures which show this estimate to be above question as to its accuracy. Moreover, no consideration of the value of the service to the consumers is taken into account. Much proof was introduced to show that existing rates were in excess of the value of such service. In view of the many complications inhering in the system of operation of this utility, we are unable to say, as a matter of law, that the rate of return is so low as to be confiscatory.

It would seem that the commission has been jealous of the rights of the petitioner, and that the order in question may go far toward forming a better basis for solving the problems of all concerned, and if discrimination results at any point from it, rectification by the commission will, no doubt, ensue.

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND
FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY et al.

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 23, 1927.

1. Homicide $\hookrightarrow$ 139—Indictment and Information $\hookrightarrow$ 189(8)—Information alleging defendant willfully and of malice aforethought murdered deceased held to charge murder in first degree and to include all subdivisions of murder, lesser degrees thereof, and manslaughter.

Information alleging that on specified date defendant "did then and there unlawfully, willfully, feloniously and of his malice aforethought kill and murder" deceased, held to charge murder in the first degree and to include all subdivisions of murder and lesser degrees thereof and manslaughter.

2. Homicide $\hookrightarrow$ 350—Where verdict was murder in first degree carrying penalty of death, court had no power to render judgment of murder in second degree carrying penalty of imprisonment (Pen. Code, §§ 190, 1157, 1385).

Where verdict found defendant guilty of murder in the first degree carrying with it the penalty of death, court was bound either to impose penalty of death or to grant new trial, and had no power to find that evidence did not sustain verdict of murder in first degree but did sustain verdict of murder in second degree, and thereupon adjudge defendant guilty of murder in the second degree with penalty of imprisonment, under Pen. Code, § 190, providing that every person guilty of murder in the first degree shall suffer death or imprisonment for life at discretion of jury, and section 1157, providing that jury must find degree of crime, in view of sections 1118 and 1238 and notwithstanding section 1385.

3. Homicide $\hookrightarrow$ 350—Punishment fixed by jury for murder in first degree cannot be increased nor mitigated (Pen. Code, § 190).

Verdict of jury fixing penalty for murder in the first degree is supreme, and punishment fixed cannot be increased nor mitigated, under Pen. Code, § 190, providing that every person guilty of murder in the first degree shall suffer death or life imprisonment at discretion of jury.

4. Homicide $\hookrightarrow$ 350—Verdict of guilty of murder in first degree not fixing penalty, carries penalty of death (Pen. Code, § 190).

Where jury returns verdict finding defendant guilty of murder in the first degree without fixing the penalty to be imposed under Pen. Code, § 190, the law fixes the penalty at death.

5. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 992—Statute authorizing court to dismiss action in furtherance of justice does not authorize it to pronounce sentence not responding to verdict (Pen. Code, § 1385).

Pen. Code, § 1385, providing that the court may of its own motion or upon application of district attorney and in furtherance of justice order an action or indictment dismissed, does not authorize court to pronounce sentence not responding to verdict.

6. Indictment and information $\hookrightarrow$ 141—Indictment cannot be dismissed as to one or more degrees therein and jurisdiction retained as to other degrees (Pen. Code, § 1385).

Law does not authorize splitting of cause of action, and indictment may not be dismissed under Pen. Code, § 1385, or otherwise, as to one or more degrees included in it and jurisdiction retained as to the other degrees.

7. Mandamus $\hookrightarrow$ 3(1)—State seeking mandate to compel court to render judgment of murder in first degree with death penalty in accordance with verdict held without plain, speedy, or adequate remedy (Code Civ. Proc. § 1068).

In proceeding by state for writ of mandate to be directed to court and judge thereof annulling judgment of murder in the second degree and requiring rendition of judgment of murder in the first degree with death penalty, where it appeared that court refused to recognize verdict finding defendant guilty of murder in the first degree or to take any steps thereon, state held without plain, adequate, and speedy remedy, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1068.

In Bank.

Application by the People for writ of mandate to be directed to the Superior Court in and for the County of Alameda and the judge thereof, annulling a judgment of said court imposing a sentence for murder in the second degree and requiring the imposition of a sentence for murder in the first degree in accordance with the verdict. Peremptory writ granted.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., Earle Warren, Dist. Atty., and J. Paul St. Sure, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Oakland, for the People.

Fred G. Athearn, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. [1] By an information filed in the superior court of Alameda county, Jesus Prudencio was charged with the crime of murder committed October 14, 1926, as follows:

"* * * That he did then and there unlawfully, willfully, feloniously and of his malice aforethought, kill and murder one Antonio Garcia."

The foregoing was an allegation of murder of the first degree and included all the subdivisions and lesser degrees of murder and also manslaughter.

[2] Upon trial had the jury, on January 12, 1927, returned its verdict finding the defendant guilty of "murder of the first degree, as charged in the information." In its charge the trial court specially instructed the jury in case it found the defendant guilty of murder of the first degree that—

"Then whether this defendant shall suffer death, or confinement in the state's prison for life is a matter committed solely to your discretion and conscience. If you determine that the death penalty shall not be inflicted, it will be necessary to expressly declare in your verdict that his punishment shall be by imprisonment in the state's prison for life; otherwise he shall suffer the extreme penalty of the law."

Four forms of verdict were prepared by the court, read to the jury, and taken by it to the jury room. The first was in the simple form, which, if returned, carried with it the death penalty as explained by the court. Stripped of formal verbiage, it read:

"We the jury find the defendant guilty of murder of the first degree, as charged in the information."

The second read:

"We the jury find the defendant guilty of murder of the first degree as charged in the information and fix the punishment at confinement in the state's prison for life."

The third read:

"We the jury find the defendant guilty of murder of the second degree, as charged in the information."

And the fourth was the simple form of "not guilty." Upon returning the first form of verdict into court properly signed by its foreman, the jury was polled and affirmed its verdict of murder in the first degree, which was duly recorded by the clerk.

Under the foregoing circumstances of trial and conviction upon the charge of murder of the first degree, the defendant was brought into court at the time fixed for pronouncing judgment, and in keeping with the usual procedure he responded to the interrogatory as to whether there existed any legal cause why judgment should not be pronounced upon him by a motion for a new trial upon all of the statutory grounds and also in arrest of judgment. After argument by counsel the court proceeded to and did pronounce a judgment not founded or based upon the verdict of murder of the first degree as returned by the jury, but assumed that there was a verdict before it finding the defendant guilty of murder of the second degree, and thereupon adjudged the defendant to be guilty of murder of the second degree upon said assumed verdict and sentenced him to imprisonment in the state's prison as by the statute prescribed in such cases. Incontrovertibly no such verdict was rendered in the case. In denying the motion for a new trial (the conviction having been obtained under an information charging murder in the first degree and the verdict rendered responding precisely to the charge), the court caused the following order to be made and entered:

"Thereupon the court finds and decides that there is no evidence to sustain a verdict of and defendant is not guilty of murder of the first degree, but that the evidence does sustain and that the verdict does find the defendant guilty of murder of the second degree as charged in the information, and that a new trial upon said charge of murder in the second degree be and the same is hereby denied, and that the defendant be arraigned for judgment. * * *"

It then pronounced the following judgment:

"The defendant, who, with his counsel, J. J. Rose, Myron Harris, and L. A. Sullivan, was personally present in court, was duly informed of the information filed against him on November 29, 1926, for the crime of felony, to wit, murder, committed on or about the 14th day of October, 1926, and of his arraignment and plea of 'not guilty' to the said information, of his trial and the verdict and finding against him rendered by the jury on January 12, 1927, and of the decision of the court that the evidence sustains and that the verdict finds that the defendant is guilty of murder of the second degree in the commission of a felony, to wit, an assault with a deadly weapon by means likely to produce death or great bodily injury as charged in the information; and that his motion for a new trial for murder of the second degree was denied.

"The defendant was then asked whether he had any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against him, and the defendant makes and submits a motion in arrest of judgment and the same is by the court denied.

"No sufficient cause being alleged or appearing to the court why judgment should not be pronounced, the court thereupon rendered judgment and ordered and adjudged that whereas the defendant Jesus Prudencio had been duly convicted in this court of the crime of felony, to wit, murder of the second degree, that he therefore be confined in the state prison of the state of California at San Quentin as prescribed by law, and that he be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of the county of Alameda and be by him taken and delivered to the warden of the state prison of the state of California at San Quentin."

Thereupon the defendant announced an appeal from the orders denying his motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, respectively, and from the judgment of conviction. At the same time the people appealed from the judgment. Upon the petition of the people an alternative writ was issued out of this court directed to respondent judge, commanding him to show cause why the judgment pronounced by him in said cause, entitled "In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Alameda, the People of the State of California, Plaintiff, v. Jesus Prudencio, Defendant," adjudging said Jesus Prudencio guilty of murder of the second degree should not be annulled and set aside as being in excess of jurisdiction and further commanding him to show cause why a peremptory writ of mandamus should not issue commanding him to pronounce judgment imposing the death penalty against said Jesus Prudencio as provided by law in such cases.

[3] No substantial grounds exist upon which the judgment as entered may be sustained. It is clearly without authority of law and does not purport to respond to any verdict rendered by the jury. The defendant was before the court for the purpose of receiving the sentence imposed by law. It was the legal duty of the court either to pronounce judgment upon the verdict as rendered in obedience to the law's mandate or grant a new trial, if so advised. The verdict of the jury adjudging the punishment which the accused shall suffer in first degree murder cases is supreme and cannot be increased or mitigated by the court in the slightest degree. Pen. Code, § 190. This principle or rule of law has been uniformly accepted by this court as a major premise in its consideration of a long line of cases in which the question here presented was necessarily involved. A partial list of such cases includes People v. Hall, 199 Cal. 451, 249 P. 859; People v. Arnold and Sayer, 199 Cal. 471, 250 P. 168; People v. Craig, 196 Cal. 19, 235 P. 721; People v. Wolfgang, 192 Cal. 754, 221 P. 907; People v. Connelly, 195 Cal. 584, 234 P. 374; People v. Cascade, 194 Cal. 679, 230 P. 9; People v. Perry, 195 Cal. 623, 234 P. 890;

People v. Lee Yune Chong, 94 Cal. 379, 29 P. 776; People v. Campbell, 40 Cal. 129; People v. Marquis, 15 Cal. 38. In People v. Leary, 105 Cal. 486, 39 P. 24, this court recognized the exclusive power of the jury to fix the penalty in first degree murder cases. It said:

"The law submits to the jury, under the instruction of the court, the question as to the degree of murder, if any, of which the defendant is guilty in any instance, and section 190 of the Penal Code further provides that one found guilty of murder in the first degree 'shall suffer death or confinement in the state prison for life, at the discretion of the jury.'"

"Whatever may have been the actuating consideration in the minds of the Legislature in enacting section 190, whether because they believed there are instances of murder falling within the definition of murder of the first degree, which, because characterized by a less degree of atrocity or other mitigating circumstance, call for a milder punishment than that of death, or whether their reason was something else, the fact remains that they have confided the power to affix the punishment within these two alternatives to the absolute discretion of the jury, with no power reserved to the court to review their action in that respect."

The decisions of this court could be no other way if the provisions of section 1157, Penal Code, are to be at all regarded. It provides:

"Whenever a crime is distinguished into degrees, the jury, if they convict the defendant, must find the degree of the crime of which he is guilty."

In People v. Arnold and Sayer, supra, as in other cases, in warning trial courts against encroaching in the smallest degree upon the exclusive statutory right and duty imposed upon the jury by section 190, Penal Code, to assess the penalty that an accused should suffer as a punishment of first degree murder, we not only recognized the right of affixing penalties in murder cases as being the exclusive prerogative of the jury unrestrained by judicial intimation, but we cautioned trial courts against giving instructions that might have a tendency to influence or hamper a jury in the exercise of its discretion as to the degree or quantum of punishment that might appear to the court to be appropriate in the case. If the court, as respondent contends, may totally disregard the verdict of the jury and determine for itself the punishment that should be imposed in murder cases the statute and the numerous decisions of this court that have been rendered in construing the law would be held at naught and the court, if such a course be sustainable, might well instruct a jury that all that is required of it, in case it believe the defendant guilty of murder, is to render a simple verdict of murder and the court will assume the responsibility of determining whether the penalty should be death or life imprisonment, or, indeed, do as the court attempted here to do, acquit the defendant of first degree murder in the face of a verdict finding the defendant guilty of a higher degree of crime.

[4] The law on this subject was early stated in an instruction given in People v. Iams, 57 Cal. 115, in the following language:

"Should the jury find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, without affixing the [death] penalty, the law in such cases adjudges the penalty, and that penalty is death."

The above instruction is substantially like the instruction given in the instant case and has for many years been consistently recognized as a correct statement of the law by all the courts of this state. Prior to the amendment of section 190, Penal Code, adopted March 28, 1874 (Amendments to the Codes 1873-74, p. 457), murder was punishable by death. No discretion was theretofore reposed in the jury to relieve the accused of the extreme penalty of the law upon a verdict finding the accused guilty of murder of the first degree. All murder of the first degree was punishable with death. The court was powerless to reduce the penalty. The only way the death penalty could be avoided was by returning a verdict in the second degree. The amendment of 1874 was adopted to give the jury—not the court—the discretion of relieving the defendant of the extreme penalty formerly made mandatory by the statute. Section 190, supra, amended to its present form, reads:

"Every person guilty of murder in the first degree shall suffer death, or confinement in the state prison for life, at the discretion of the jury trying the same. * * *"

The Legislature has clearly made it the arbiter as to the punishment that shall be meted out to persons guilty of murder in the first degree. No decision of this court can be found holding a contrary view.

The question before the court for determination was whether the evidence as a matter of law supported the verdict. If it did it had no alternative but to pronounce the sentence of the law. The people's right to proceed against the defendant for the crime charged cannot be defeated by the court substituting its verdict for the verdict of the jury. Its duty was to first pass upon the motion for a new trial. If it was advised that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict and for that reason granted a new trial, the people would have had the right to appeal directly from the order. (Section 1238, Pen. Code.) In the view of the trial court there was neither conviction had of murder in the first degree or judgment pronounced upon such a conviction. If this view be correct then the people's right of appeal may be defeated by a failure or refusal on the part of the court to comply with the mandatory provisions of the statute.

Under such a procedure the defendant would be secure against a new trial which if granted, as it should be if the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, would again place him upon his trial at the risk of having the case against him strengthened by new or additional evidence to the degree that a verdict carrying with it the death penalty would be impregnable to assault. This precise contingency happened as related in People v. Grill, 151 Cal. 592, 91 P. 515. Upon his first trial Grill was found guilty of murder in the first degree with punishment fixed at life imprisonment. Upon appeal taken he was granted a new trial, and upon the trial granted the jury returned a verdict of murder in the first degree, in consequence of which the death penalty was inflicted upon him. A person charged with murder is not acquitted of a higher degree until a valid conviction obtained in the law's form has become final. It is true that a conviction of manslaughter has been held to be an acquittal of murder. But in no case has it been held that a conviction of murder in the second degree, or in the first degree punishable with life imprisonment, upon a new trial granted, bars a conviction of murder carrying with it the death penalty. So zealous are the people that the prerogative of a jury shall not be invaded by courts in the determination of questions of fact that the Legislature has provided as follows:

"If, at any time after the evidence on either side has closed, the court deems it insufficient to warrant a conviction, it may advise the jury to acquit the defendant. But the jury are not bound by the advice." (Pen. Code, § 1118.)

[5] Respondent has attempted to bring to its aid section 1385, Penal Code, which provides that—

"The court may, either of its own motion or upon the application of the district attorney, and in furtherance of justice, order an action or indictment to be dismissed. The reasons of the dismissal must be set forth in an order entered upon the minutes."

This procedural section manifestly does not give the court the right to disregard the verdict of a jury and pronounce a sentence that does not respond to the verdict as rendered. The chapter under which said section is found shows that it has no relevancy to the question of the court's refusal to act upon the verdict in the manner provided in the Code. The dismissal of an action or indictment goes to the indictment as a whole, which may include a number of degrees of the crime pleaded.

[6] There has not been brought to this court's attention, and doubtless no such cases can be found, where a dismissal of the indictment as to one or more degrees included therein has been made and jurisdiction retained as to the other degrees. Such is not the system of this state and there is no authority of law for splitting up causes in this way. It would bring about confusion, but what is more important, such a procedure can have, under the Code, which specially prescribes the powers and duty of courts and juries with respect to verdicts rendered in criminal cases, no application whatsoever.

The case of People v. Sugarman and Passarello (Cal. App.) 251 P. 949, is cited as a precedent sustaining respondent's contention. In that case the defendants were charged with burglary. The jury found them guilty of burglary of the first degree, but the court "decided that the offense was burglary of the second degree, and sentenced them accordingly." No California case was cited sustaining the court's decision. A petition for a hearing by this court was not requested. That case presented an appeal taken from the judgment pronouncing the defendants guilty of the lesser offense. No writ, as here, was sought directing the court to act upon the verdict before it. Had such a remedy been invoked, we do not see how the trial court could have avoided the force of the statute. However, murder is placed in a class by itself. Those who deliberately take human life must answer as to the degree of crime and the punishment that shall be imposed upon them to a jury of their peers. Section 190, Pen. Code. The authorities are so uniform and numerous in this state sustaining the view we have taken of the main questions presented that we deem it unnecessary to review the authorities from other jurisdictions which, it is claimed, support respondent.

[7] The defendant in the instant case has not been arraigned for sentence upon the verdict rendered by the jury convicting him. Neither has sentence nor judgment been pronounced by the court upon said verdict. The court positively refuses to recognize the verdict received by it or to pronounce judgment thereon or take any steps whatever upon the verdict rendered, as shown by the return herein. The court was without jurisdiction to pronounce judgment upon an assumed verdict of murder in the second degree and the judgment so pronounced must be annulled. We are of the opinion that petitioner has no plain, speedy, or adequate relief in the premises. Section 1068, Code Civ. Proc. It appearing that the court without any lawful cause refuses to pronounce judgment upon the verdict of the jury as rendered, or to take other legal or appropriate action thereunder or perform acts which the law specially enjoins upon said judge and court as a duty resulting from the office which said judge occupies, it is ordered that a writ of mandate issue out of this court commanding said Hon. Fred V. Wood, as judge of the superior court of the county of Alameda, to arraign said Jesus Prudencio, defendant in said action pending in said court, for judgment under and by virtue of the verdict returned against him, to wit, conviction of murder in the first degree as charged in the information, and to hear and determine such motions as may properly come before him and to take such proceedings therein as are meet and proper in the premises and as by law provided.

LEFROOTH v. PRENTICE et al.

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 27, 1927.

1. Husband and wife $\S$ 49½(8)—Wife's testimony that she received bonds and had joint access to safe deposit box with husband will justify finding of intention to give, delivery, and acceptance of securities.

Testimony of wife that she received bonds from husband and actually had them in her custody, and that she had joint access to safe deposit box with husband, will justify finding that there was intention to give, delivery, and acceptance of securities.

2. Fraudulent conveyances $\S$ 96(2)—Gifts $\S$ 49(6)—Evidence held not to show gift of securities to children, so that father's subsequent use thereof was not consideration for transfer of land to children (Civ. Code, $\S$ § 1146, 1147).

Evidence held to show that there had been no gift of securities from father to children where there was no delivery, under Civ. Code, $\S$ § 1146, 1147, so that father's use of such securities could not be consideration for subsequent transfer of land to children.

3. Gifts $\S$ 2—Whether transaction constituted gift so as to show consideration for father's conveyance to children in another state depends on law of state where gift transaction was made.

Where question whether conveyance of land to children in California was supported by consideration depends on gift transaction in another state, whether latter transaction accomplished completed gift depends on law of such other state.

4. Evidence $\S$ 80(1)—In absence of showing as to what law of another state is, court must presume rule same as in state where action is brought.

Where law of Connecticut governs phase of case in California, and there is no showing as to what law of Connecticut is, courts must indulge presumption that rule there is same as rule in California.

5. Gifts ☞22—"Delivery" of gift may be symbolical, such as written instrument on which delivery might be compelled.

"Delivery" of gift may be symbolical, such as delivery of written instrument without physical delivery of securities, so long as instrument is one on which delivery might be compelled.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Deliver—Delivery.]

6. Gifts ☞28(2)—Where donor failed to surrender dominion over securities, delivery was ineffective to pass title.

Where donor failed to surrender complete dominion or any dominion over securities, delivery was incomplete and ineffective to pass title.

7. Trusts ☞44(1)—Evidence held insufficient to show creation of trust in certain securities, where purpose of trust and name of trustee cannot be ascertained.

Evidence held insufficient to show creation of trust in certain securities in favor of children as beneficiaries, where purpose of trust and name of trustee cannot be ascertained.

8. Trusts ☞17, 18(2), 44(3)—Trusts in personalty may be created verbally and proved by clear and unequivocal oral evidence.

Trusts in personalty may be created, declared, or admitted verbally and may be proved by parol evidence, but such evidence must at all times be clear and unequivocal.

9. Fraudulent conveyances ☞169—Transfer without consideration by insolvent party is void as to existing creditors regardless of whether grantee had fraudulent intent; "fraudulent conveyance" (Civ. Code, § 3442).

Transfer or incumbrance of property made voluntarily or without valuable consideration by party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency is fraudulent and void as to existing creditors, under Civ. Code, § 3442, regardless of whether there is fraudulent intent on part of grantee.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Fraudulent Conveyance.]

10. Fraudulent conveyances ☞298(1)—Evidence held insufficient to support finding that deed without consideration was not executed in contemplation of insolvency.

Evidence held insufficient to support finding that deed without consideration transferring land from father to wife and children was not executed and delivered in contemplation of insolvency.

11. Appeal and error ☞1011(1)—Finding on "conflicting evidence" will not be disturbed.

Finding of trial court on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed, but evidence to raise conflict must be such as to present fair and reasonable ground for difference of opinion.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Conflicting Evidence.]

12. Fraudulent conveyances ☞286(1)—In action to subject real property transferred by defendant to satisfaction of judgment, exclusion of testimony concerning business relations with son not made grantee held error.

In action to subject real property transferred by defendant to wife and three children to satisfaction of judgment, exclusion of cross-examination of defendant debtor concerning business relations with son, who was not made grantee in deed, held error.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Action by L. M. Lefrooth against George G. Prentice and others. Judgment for defendants was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wright & McKee and C. M. Monroe, all of San Diego, for appellant.

Sweet, Stearns & Forward, of San Diego, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. This is an appeal from judgment in favor of defendants in an action, under sections 3439 and 3442 of the Civil Code, to subject certain real property to the payment of a judgment obtained by appellant against defendant George G. Prentice.

In 1916 said defendant opened a general brokerage office in San Diego under the name of "George G. Prentice & Co.," his son, Gordon Prentice, being associated with him, and through a connection with the brokerage house of Logan & Bryan he bought and sold stocks and bonds on the leading exchanges of the country. In August of that year appellant opened an account with him, dealing in stocks and grain, buying and selling securities outright, and also operating on margin. She claims that in the early part of 1917 she became somewhat uneasy and suspicious of the status of her account, and thereafter had a number of interviews with Mr. Prentice, extending into late August and early September, at the last of which she insisted that he make good the losses he had caused her and threatened court action. She actually did bring suit against him on August 26, 1919, as a result of which on April 24, 1922, she obtained the above-mentioned judgment for $46,848.12, with costs.

On September 14, 1917, but a week or two subsequent to appellant's alleged threat of court action, said defendant conveyed to his wife and three of his children a large ranch situate in San Diego county, Cal. It is this conveyance which appellant alleges in her complaint herein was made without consideration, for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding defendant's creditors, particularly herself, and in contemplation of insolvency. Defendants, on the other hand, claim that the conveyance was made in good faith and for a valuable consideration. The evidence is without substantial conflict, as the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction were within the private knowledge of defendant and his family. It is admitted that at the time of making said deed on September 14, 1917, no immediate consideration passed to defendant George G. Prentice from his codefendants, but the circumstances relating to his alleged indebtedness to his family concerning a gift transaction in securities in the year 1911, in satisfaction of which they claim said deed was executed, are hereinafter set forth.

In 1911 the Prentice family moved from New Haven, Conn., to San Diego, Cal., where Mr. Prentice engaged in extensive and unfortunate speculations upon the stock market. In the spring of 1912 he purchased the ranch property in question for the sum of $105,000, although its present value is probably more than double that amount. He continued to speculate extensively and to lose money and used in his speculations certain bonds and securities alleged to have been given to his wife and children as hereinafter set forth. At the time the deed to the ranch was executed, Mrs. Prentice was visiting in the east and her first knowledge of it was when she received it through the mail. Her husband never parted with possession of the ranch property, but maintained his control thereof, and collected and used the proceeds from it, without an accounting of any kind to his wife or children. In 1921, however, he did open a new bank account in the name of "Prentice Ranch," to which he transferred the balance from his own account, and thereafter instead of signing checks in his own name, he signed them in the name of "Prentice Ranch," by himself as manager thereof. Some two months after said conveyance, defendant and his wife executed a deed purporting to grant to the San Diego Gas & Electric Company an 80-foot easement over said ranch property, and received the consideration therefor. The children did not join in this deed and received none of the proceeds from it. Apparently there has been no attempt to fix the undivided interests to which it is claimed they are entitled. Although the oldest daughter reached her majority and married, she received no accounting of her interest, nor did she receive any of the revenues from nor was she charged with any part of the expenses of said ranch. The same is true of the second daughter, who reached her majority in 1920. Subsequent to the conveyance defendant was appointed guardian for the minor son, Hillyer, but no accounting was ever made of the alleged interest of said minor son in the ranch. It will also be noted that the oldest son, Gordon Prentice, was omitted from the conveyance. Yet it appears that certain securities were also set aside for him by his father in 1911.

The trial court refused to receive evidence as to what became of them, but the record does show that they were no longer in the possession of the Prentice family at the time of the conveyance.

Appellant, through her counsel, makes earnest and spirited attack upon the judgment upon two general grounds, to wit, the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings in essential particulars, and errors of law in the exclusion of certain testimony. Under the first ground it is contended that at least as to the children of said defendant George G. Prentice the transaction represented by the deed was voluntary and without a valuable consideration to support it, the findings of the court to the contrary notwithstanding. And further, conceding the soundness of the above contention, she contends that the evidence shows without substantial conflict that said defendant was, if not actually insolvent, certainly acting in contemplation thereof in making the deed in question, also the findings of the court to the contrary notwithstanding. She further asserts that we may look at the facts existing and the events occurring shortly before and after the making of the deed in considering this contention. The testimony, the exclusion of which is complained of, was cross-examination of said defendant debtor concerning his business relations with his son, Gordon, who, as above pointed out, was not made a grantee under the deed before us.

After a careful study of the record of the case in the light of the principles applicable thereto we are constrained to uphold appellant in each of the above positions.

[1] In so far as the transaction between the husband and the wife is concerned, the wife testified that she actually received the bonds herself and actually had them in her custody; that she had joint access to the safe deposit box with her husband. This testimony under our decisions would justify the finding of the court that as to her there was an intention to give, a delivery, and lastly an acceptance of the securities by her. See Hynes v. White, 47 Cal. App. 549, 553, 190 P. 836, where a large number of decisions are reviewed, and where rehearing was denied by this court. This would form a sufficient basis for a transfer in exchange for the value of such securities.

[2] The only evidence in the record, from which it is claimed that the valuable consideration for such deed as to the three children of said Prentice is revealed, is that as to the so-called gift transaction in New Haven, Conn., about 1911 or 1912 above adverted to. This transaction may be partially stated in the language of the attorneys for defendant debtor:

"The testimony shows that Mr. and Mrs. Prentice and at least the two older children went to the office of a broker in New Haven where the bonds were purchased. That after the purchase the bonds were put in a safety deposit box in the Union-New Haven Trust Company with instructions to collect the coupons and credit the interest to the account of the children, each child having a separate account, George G. Prentice, trustee."

The evidence further shows that Prentice's instructions were carried out and the bonds remained in the Trust Company for three or four years. That during all that time the Trust Company collected the coupons and deposited the money in the respective children's names. A large number of statements of account were rendered from time to time by the Trust Company showing "Helen Sheldon Prentice, in account with the Union & New Haven Trust Company," and "Janet Elizabeth Prentice, Geo. G. Prentice, Trustee, in account with the Union & New Haven Trust Company," and "Janet Elizabeth Prentice, in account with the Union & New Haven Trust Company." The moneys in these accounts were used to pay for the schooling and current expenses of the children. It further appears that at the time of depositing the bonds a memorandum was made out by George G. Prentice in the case of each of the three children, which, in each instance, was substantially the same except as to name of the child. Taking Defendants' Exhibit B as an instance, such memorandum reads:

"Memorandum: Deposited to Hillyer Prentice in the Union & New Haven Trust Company, New Haven, December 25, 1912, held in trust the following: 10 Seattle Electric bonds; 10 Union Electric Light bonds; 10 Northern Texas bonds; 10 East Ohio Gas bonds. These memoranda were deposited with the Trust Company and remained there until the bonds were taken out—in the case of Hillyer Prentice, until March 25, 1916. They were then mailed to the children in San Diego, where the Prentice family was then residing, as shown by the envelopes in the various cases, the Hillyer Prentice memorandum being addressed to Hillyer Prentice, George G. Prentice, Trustee, 305 Spreckels Building, San Diego, Cal."

It will be noted that we are not here concerned with the deposits to the credit of the children other than what may be shown therefrom concerning the securities themselves. To the above testimony, however, should be added the fact that the safe deposit box referred to was the safe deposit box of said George G. Prentice, to which his wife had access, and to which it must be inferred that the bank also had access. So far as said children are concerned, there is no evidence that they had then or ever had access to the box, or that they ever had physical custody of any of the securities in question. There is no evidence whatsoever from which it may be found that said Trust Company received from said Prentice any instructions as to the custody, control, or disposition of the said securities themselves other than as to the coupons above referred to. The memorandum referred to was not delivered to the Trust Company, but was on a wrapper containing the securities and left, of course, with them in the safe deposit box.

There is no evidence from which it could be inferred that said Trust Company acted or agreed to act as the agent or trustee of the donees in connection with the securities. The testimony of Prentice himself in this connection may be profitably quoted here:

"Q. You kept the control of those bonds, did you? A. They were put in trust in the Trust Company, New Haven Trust Company. I was trustee.

"Q. They never went out of your control, did they? A. No.

"Q. Did you draw up any document appointing yourself as trustee? A. No; only notified the Trust Company. * * *

"Q. And then there was never any evidence of this transfer of the bonds to your children other than that you deposited them in the bank for safe-keeping, and had them credit the interest to the account of each one of these children and check out as trustee by you? A. That is the substance of it."

It is nowhere shown or contended that the father ever surrendered actually or symbolically the dominion or control of any of the securities at any time. This is further evidenced by the fact that without the consent of the Trust Company, the alleged donees, or any one else, he sold said securities and used the proceeds for his own personal benefit.

[3, 4] In reality to test the efficacy of said transaction to accomplish a completed gift the law of Connecticut should be expounded, as such law would control the transaction. In the absence of a showing as to what the law of Connecticut is, we are required to indulge the presumption that the rule there pertaining to such transaction is the same as the rule in this state.

Section 1146 of the Civil Code provides:

"A gift is a transfer of personal property, made voluntarily, and without consideration."

Section 1147 provides:

"A verbal gift is not valid, unless the means of obtaining possession and control of the thing are given, nor, if it is capable of delivery, unless there is an actual or symbolical delivery of the thing to the donee."

The rule announced by these sections has obtained without modification throughout all our decisions and may still be pointed to as correct. Another statement of the rule may be found in 28 Corpus Juris, 634, § 23, as follows:

"In order to constitute an effectual delivery, the donor must not only have parted with the possession of the property, but he must also have relinquished to the donee all present and future dominion and control over it, beyond any power on his part to recall. The surrender must be so full and complete that, if the donor resumes control over the property without the consent of the donee, he will be answerable in damages as a trespasser. The retaining of control in the hands of the donor over the subject of the gift, or the reservation by the donor of any right to retake the property or appropriate it to other purposes, avoids the gift."

[5] For the purposes of this case it may be assumed that George G. Prentice intended to make a gift of these securities to his children and also that, they being minors, of ages ranging from 14 to 4 years of age, the law would accept the benefits of the gift in their behalf. The real question presented is, Was there within the limitations set by the law a delivery of such intended gift? There is likewise no question but that delivery may be symbolical such as delivery of a written instrument without physical delivery of the securities themselves so long as the instrument is one upon which delivery might be compelled. "The interest intended to be transferred is, under section 1054 of the Civil Code, vested in the transferee upon the donor's delivery of the grant." Burkett v. Doty, 176 Cal. 89, 92, 167 P. 518, 520. But here we have no evidence upon which to base the contention that there was a written instrument. The memoranda on the wrappers, while in the handwriting of the alleged donor, contained no signature, nor did they contain any words purporting to be a grant or transfer.

The case of Giselman v. Starr, 106 Cal. 651, 656, 657, 40 P. 8, 9, is instructive in this discussion. There S. C. Hastings doubtless had a bona fide intention of making a gift to his daughter, Ella, who was incompetent. So apparent is this intention that it appears that he had himself appointed a guardian of the estate of his said daughter. In the inventory of her estate, which was duly verified by him, the note and mortgage in question were entered as the property of the incompetent. The note was exhibited to the appraisers by him and by them appraised at a valuation suggested by him. The testimony showed further that he expressed sympathy and anxiety for his afflicted child and said he was making provision for her and desired to make such provision while he was living. "He said he had not yet turned over anything, but expressed his desire to do so." Speaking of that transaction, the court said:

"This array of facts and circumstances makes a strong presentation of the intent of Hastings to give the note and mortgage to his daughter. It is established that upon one occasion, under oath, he declared them to be her property. But such a declaration, however binding in good morals, is not of itself sufficient to establish a gift. No legal duty was imposed upon Hastings to give this particular property to his daughter, and, if the intended donation lacked anything of consummation, the promises or declarations were but nudum pactum and not enforceable. It is not here a question of acceptance of the gift by the incompetent which, the gift being advantageous to her, the law would presume; but the question is whether the gift was so completely made as to enable the law to presume its acceptance. To every gift delivery is essential. Says Chancellor Kent, speaking of negotiable instruments: 'Delivery in this, as in every other case, must be according to the nature of the thing. * * * It must be the true and effectual way of obtaining the command and dominion of the subject. * * * If the thing given be a chose in action the law requires an assignment, or some equivalent instrument, and the transfer must be actually executed.' The Civil Code declares that 'a verbal gift is not valid, unless the means of obtaining possession and control of the thing are given, nor, if it is capable of delivery, unless there is an actual or symbolical delivery of the thing to the donee.' Civil Code, § 1147. Hastings' attempted or intended gift fell short of these requirements. Lacking his indorsement of the note, his possession remained a possession in his personal and not in his representative character, and the gift failed of completion."

In the case of Edwards v. Guaranty Trust, etc., Bank, 47 Cal. App. 86, 89, 190 P. 57, 59, after citing with approval the doctrine of Provident Institution for Savings v. Sisters of the Poor, etc., 87 N. J. Eq. 424, 100 A. 894, the court said:

"To constitute a valid gift inter vivos, the purpose of the donor to make the gift must be clearly and satisfactorily established, and the gift must be complete by actual, constructive or symbolical delivery, without power of revocation.' 20 Cyc. 1193. In order to accomplish this, 'there must be a parting by the donor with all present and future legal power and dominion over the property.' 20 Cyc. 1196; Tracy v. Alvord, 118 Cal. 654, 50 P. 757; Pullen v. Placer County Bank, 138 Cal. 169, 66 P. 740, 71 P. 83, 94 Am. St. Rep. 19; Simmons v. Savings Society, 31 Ohio [St.] 457, 27 Am. Rep. 521; [Matthews v. Hanson, 145 Va. 614, 134 S. E. 568]. That the law of this state is as stated in the Provident Case, supra, will be seen by a perusal of that and the other cases cited therein, citing and quoting from the California cases at length."

[6] A rehearing in this case was denied by the Supreme Court. A careful examination of many cases reveals no exception to the rule announced in the above authorities. There is no different rule applicable to minors of tender years in a transaction with their parents than applies to a transaction between adults for as far as the legal steps are concerned they are in the two cases identical. In re Acken's Estate, 144 Iowa, 519, 123 N. W. 187, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1166. The irresistible conclusion is that the father either did not intend to complete the gift or else, in attempting to execute his intention fell short of making a delivery of the securities as he failed utterly to surrender complete dominion or any dominion over the same. The delivery of the securities was therefore incomplete and ineffective to pass title.

It is difficult to gather clearly from the contention of respondent whether it is that the gift was completed by the donor constituting the bank the agent or trustee of the donees, or whether he contends that he, as the father, became the trustee of the property donated by him to his children. We have not only examined the transaction in testing it for the legal requirements of a gift, but also in order to ascertain whether or not it can be considered a declaration of trust in personal property in which the father may be considered the trustee for said children. The requirements of a voluntary trust are specified in section 2221 of the Civil Code as follows:

"* * * A voluntary trust is created, as to the trustor and beneficiary, by any words or acts of the trustor, indicating with reasonable certainty: (1) An intention on the part of the trustor to create a trust; and, (2) the subject, purpose, and beneficiary of the trust."

It is, of course, admitted that in personal property this trust relationship if existing, may be established by parol testimony, but the evidence above quoted including the testimony of George G. Prentice, fixes the limitations upon the transaction. It will be noted that, in addition to the testimony quoted above, he was asked the following questions and gave the following answers:

"Q. Did you draw up any document appointing yourself as trustee? A. No; only notified the Trust Company.

"Q. You put those bonds in the Trust Company under your name as trustee? A. No; under their names.

"Q. In the Trust Company's name as trustee? A. Under the individual child's name, and they collected the interest and credited the same to their account."

[7] From this testimony it is impossible to say whether the witness intended to constitute himself as trustee, or whether he intended the Trust Company as trustee, and if the latter, the trust relationship, at most, extended no further than the collection of the interest and the crediting it to the account of the respective child for which it was intended. But in any event taking the memoranda and all the facts surrounding the transaction, it is impossible to say that a valid trust in said securities in favor of said children as beneficiaries was created. Not only can it not be told who, if any one, was to be the trustee, but it cannot be ascertained from the evidence what the purpose of the so-called trust was. In other words, the duration of the estate granted, the nature and quantity of interest which the beneficiaries were to have, and the manner in which the trust was to be performed are undeclared and too uncertain to be called an estate of any kind in the said children.

[8] It is a cardinal rule that trusts in personalty may be created, declared, or admitted verbally and may be proved by parol evidence, but the authorities are uniform to the effect that such evidence must at all times be clear and unequivocal. Silvey v. Hodgdon, 52 Cal. 363; Sheehan v. Sullivan, 126 Cal. 189, 58 P. 543; Barker v. Hurley, 132 Cal. 21, 63 P. 1071, 164 P. 480. Mr. Pomeroy, in Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) § 1009, states the rule as follows:

"The declaration of trust, whether written or oral, must be reasonably certain in its material terms; and this requisite of certainty includes the subject-matter or property embraced within the trust, the beneficiaries or persons in whose behalf it is created, the nature and quantity of interests which they are to have, and the manner in which the trust is to be performed. If the language is so vague, general, or equivocal that any of these necessary elements of the trust is left in real uncertainty, then the trust must fail."

See, to the same effect, Wittfield v. Forster, 124 Cal. 418, 421, 57 P. 219, 221, from which we quote the following:

"If we apply the statutory declaration above quoted [section 2221, Civ. Code], and the principle found in the above language of Pomeroy, we see that the language employed in the instrument is entirely too vague and uncertain to constitute a valid trust. The duration of the estate attempted to be granted to the trustee, the nature and quantity of interest which the beneficiaries are to have, and the manner in which the trust is to be performed, are all left undeclared and without any reasonable certainty; and, of course, there is no statement of any of the purposes for which under section 857 an express trust may be declared. And this uncertainty also makes the attempted trust as to the personal property void."

See, also, Barker v. Hurley, supra, at page 28 (63 P. 1071, 164 P. 480); Estate of Budd, 166 Cal. 286, 291, 135 P. 1131; Estate of Webb, 49 Cal. 541; Noble v. Learned, 153 Cal. 245, 250, 94 P. 1047. The facts in the case at bar make fairly applicable the language of Govin v. De Miranda, 76 Hun, 414, 419, 27 N. Y. S. 1049, 1052:

"In no case has it ever been held as yet that a party may, by transferring his property from one pocket to another, make himself a trustee."

Having reached the conclusion that upon no theory can the evidence be held sufficient to sustain a finding that the deed in question was based upon a valuable consideration as to the three children of said Prentice, we pass next to a consideration of appellant's contention that the evidence is without substantial conflict that said deed was executed and delivered by said George G. Prentice in contemplation of insolvency.

[9] It must be borne in mind that, under section 3442 of the Civil Code:

"Any transfer or incumbrance of property made or given voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent, and void as to existing creditors."

Under such a showing, the fraudulent intent on the part of the grantee of such transfer is immaterial. Tobias v. Adams (Cal. Sup.) 258 P. 588; Chalmers v. Sheehy, 132 Cal. 459, 64 P. 709, 84 Am. St. Rep. 62; Judson v. Lyford, 84 Cal. 505, 24 P. 286; Knox v. Blanckenburg, 28 Cal. App. 298, 152 P. 59. It is also true that in such case the intent to defraud creditors is not required. See Atkinson v. Western D. Syndicate, 170 Cal. 503, 506, 150 P. 360, 361, where we said:

"If these conditions, to wit, a grant made without consideration by a person insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, are present, the intent of the grantor is immaterial and the transfer, regardless of the actual intent, is void as to creditors."

[10] The court found that respondent did not at the time of making said deed of September 14, 1917, anticipate that he would be insolvent with the property described in said deed gone, and also that said deed was not made for the purpose of placing said property out of reach of his creditors, particularly appellant; that it was not executed in contemplation of insolvency, but that said George G. Prentice was thoroughly solvent and abundantly able, out of other properties than the property covered by said deed, to pay all of his indebtedness.

The court also found in this connection that said George G. Prentice did not know he was indebted to appellant, nor, if he was indebted to her, the amount thereof. However, significant facts concerning this matter are contained in a previous finding as follows:

"That although defendant George G. Prentice well knew of his liability and duty to so account to plaintiff throughout all of the time heretofore mentioned during which said relationship existed, the said defendant George G. Prentice failed, refused, and neglected to so account to plaintiff, but concealed from her during all of said time the actual status of their mutual accounts and concealed from her profits made in the transactions hereinbefore mentioned, and concealed from her the fact that he was indebted to her in various amounts growing out of the transactions covering all of said period and aggregating the sum aforesaid."

It is impossible to reconcile the fact that the court found that said respondent Prentice concealed from appellant, during the whole period of her transactions with him, the status of her account and concealed from her the profits made in transactions for her and concealed from her the fact that he was indebted to her in various sums, aggregating $39,145.29, with the finding that he did not know whether or not he was indebted to her at all. Indeed, the whole finding as to the good faith and lawful intent and noncontemplation of insolvency of respondent Prentice is colored, if not discredited, by the finding that he was thoroughly cognizant of and was unlawfully concealing from appellant his indebtedness to her and had been so concealing it from her from the inception of their transactions together, and yet, "not knowing that he was indebted to said plaintiff in a large sum of money, and not knowing that he was indebted to said plaintiff at all, for a good, valuable, sufficient, and adequate consideration to him in hand paid by the other defendants in said action, did make, execute, and deliver and place of record a good and sufficient deed of conveyance," etc.

With a conflict in the findings directly reflecting upon the question as to whether or not defendant Prentice was contemplating insolvency in the execution of the deed, we approach the evidence on that question. It is true that at the time he made the deed, September 14, 1917, he was in the brokerage business, and that complete collapse and admitted insolvency did not overtake him until some time in 1919. It is also true that on the date said deed was made he had a measure of credit at the banks and in the stores. But it must be borne in mind that he had lost $250,000 in stock speculations just prior to 1916, the opening date of said brokerage business. After 1916 he continued to speculate in stocks and, presumably at least, to lose money therein. At the time in question he was also conducting a fast losing business as a brokerage house. The court in announcing its decision stated that said defendant had assets of $51,500 and debts to the amount of from $40,000 to $45,000. But counsel for appellant, with many grounds therefor, insists that the evidence shows only $46,500 in assets, as one item of $5,000 was duplicated in the court's footings of the schedule.

But whether it be the one amount or the other, the further facts are that within less than 30 days after making of the deed, complete insolvency occurred when said defendant used $10,000 of the amount on hand and borrowed an additional $5,000 to pay losses in the said business, a part of which, at least, must have existed on the day the deed was made. In less than four months these assets were reduced to something like $25,000 or $30,000, a state of hopeless insolvency. The property covered by the deed was 2,300 acres of valuable land for which defendant had paid some years previously $105,000, and which was valued by him at the time of trial at about $290,000. With this situation, including the facts detailed above, with plaintiff suspicious of him to the extent that she had closed her account with his company, and with his wife and children in the east and the wife "panicky" about her bonds, he made, executed and recorded said deed and mailed it to them. This deed presumably removed from legal process the only piece of property that was not easily convertible. Under these facts, can it be said that the finding that the debtor did not contemplate insolvency is supported by any competent evidence? What, pray, was he thinking about that so forcibly reminded him of the obligation to his wife and children that had for so many years been dormant? It is stretching credulity beyond the breaking point to say that substantial grounds exist for different conclusions from this evidence. The fact that bankers and merchants did not know of defendant's condition, or, if they did, that they still trusted him, does not point to a different conclusion as to what defendant had in contemplation when he made this deed.

[11] We are aware of and by no means intend to do violence to our rule that, as to a finding of the court below on conflicting evidence, the conclusion of the lower court will not be disturbed. In Tobias v. Adams, supra, 258 P. 591, we said:

"For, if a man keeps his bank account in the name of another, admittedly to prevent his creditor from reaching it by legal process, and then takes his entire estate, and either puts it in his wife's name, or deposits it in the name of his secretary, knowing that the judgments are in existence, his mere ipse dixit that it is not to defraud his creditor would hardly create a bona fide conflict in the testimony. 'While a finding will not be disturbed on appeal if there is a substantial conflict in the evidence from which it springs, "the evidence, in order to raise a conflict, must be such as to present a fair and reasonable ground for a difference of opinion." Field v. Shorb, 99 Cal. 661, 34 P. 504; Felsenthal v. Warring, 40 Cal. App. 119, 180 P. 67.' White v. Greenwood, 52 Cal. App. 737, 742, 199 P. 1095, 1098."

Cases similar to the one under consideration and where a similar holding was made are Judson v. Lyford, supra, at page 509 (24 P. 286), and Daugherty v. Daugherty, 104 Cal. 221, 223, 37 P. 889.

[12] Lastly, on cross-examination of said defendant Prentice, the following occurred:

"Q. Now at the time you made this disposition of these bonds, in trust, as you say, did you give any bonds to Gordon Prentice? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. He had none left at the time of making this deed.

"Mr. Stearns: That is objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.

"The Court: Objection sustained. (Plaintiff relies on exception.)

"Q. Gordon Prentice, your son, was manager of your business, was he? A. Yes.

"Q. During, and about the time of the transfer of this property? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you have any property in your hands, bonds, which you placed in trust for Gordon Prentice at the time of the transfer of this deed?

"Mr. Stearns: We object to that as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not within any issues in this case.

"The Court: Objection sustained. (Plaintiff relies on exception.)"

The testimony was surely material. Gordon Prentice, the oldest son, was manager of the brokerage business and as such might have been liable to appellant for her losses therein. Moreover, the transaction with this son was material as to the bona fides of the transaction with the other children and the wife and the intent with which the deed was made as this son was not mentioned therein. Still further, if the defendant was indebted to this son in an amount comparable with the indebtedness admitted to the wife (he being of age and capable of receiving his quota of the bonds direct), then the defendant was insolvent beyond question at the time of the execution of the deed. This error is prejudicial and permeates the whole judgment.

Defendant at the time of the trial of this action was in the possession and enjoyment of this large estate in practically the same way as before the deed was made, enjoying a large and valuable property while his judgment creditor was denied relief on an indebtedness which he had for several years concealed from her and then refused to honor. The law, as we conceive it to be, as well as justice which should, if possible, accompany it, requires a reversal of the judgment in this case, and it is so ordered.

BEVERLY v. FAIRMONT HOTEL et al.*

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 26, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 23, 1927.

1. Master and servant ⇐419—Application for compensation for new disability from former injury, filed more than 262 weeks thereafter, held barred by limitation (Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 11(c)).

Employee's application for compensation, on the ground that an injury for which compensation had already been received had caused a new and further disability, filed more than 262 weeks after the original injury occurred, held barred by Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 841) § 11(c).

2. Master and servant ⇐419—Running of limitations against claim for additional compensation held not tolled by treatment received (Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 11(c)).

Under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 841) § 11(c), physician's furnishing of services to injured employee without compensation or expectation of financial reward, though done at request of employer, held not to toll running of limitations against claim for additional compensation, particularly where the employee was not "totally disabled or bedridden," as required by statute.

Proceeding under Workmen's Compensation Act by H. M. Beverly, opposed by the Fairmont Hotel, employer, and the State Compensation Insurance Fund, insurance carriers. To review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission, denying compensation, employee applies for certiorari. Award affirmed.

Sloss & Ackerman, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

George C. Faulkner and Frank J. Creede, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. Petitioner brought this proceeding in certiorari to have annulled an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission, denying his application for compensation upon the ground that the same was barred by the provisions of section 11 of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 841).

[1] The record discloses the following facts: Petitioner on February 8, 1921, while employed as a stationary engineer at the Fairmont Hotel in San Francisco, sustained an injury to his back by falling from a tank. The State Compensation Insurance Fund was at that time the insurance carrier for said hotel and it immediately assumed liability, furnished petitioner with medical treatment, and paid him compensation until he was discharged from further medical treatment on April 30, 1921. Petitioner continued in the employ of said hotel, but for some time previous to October 28, 1925, complained of the condition of his back. On that date the paymaster of said hotel, named Bishop, sent him to Dr. S. N. Jacobs for medical treatment. The latter had no connection with the State Compensation Insurance Fund, which had ceased to be the insurance carrier for said hotel, but was in the employ of the company then carrying the insurance for said hotel. In response to the request made by Bishop, Dr. Jacobs treated petitioner several times a month, and during the course thereof, to wit, on February 23, 1926, petitioner filed the present application with said commission for an adjustment of his claim, at the same time continuing in the employ of the hotel until March, 1926, when he voluntarily quit because of his physical condition. He remained under the care of Dr. Jacobs, however, until June, 1926.

Petitioner's application for compensation is based upon the ground that the original injury had caused new and further disability. Section 11 (c) of said Workmen's Compensation Act provides in effect that such an application shall, in any event, except where the employee is "totally disabled and bedridden as a result of his injury," be filed by the injured employee and acted upon by the commission within 245 weeks after the happening of the original injury. Said section in this respect reads as follows:

"* * * Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to bar the right of any injured employee to institute proceedings for the collection of compensation within two hundred forty-five weeks after the date of the injury upon the grounds that the original injury has caused new and further disability; and the jurisdiction of the commission, in such cases, shall be a continuing jurisdiction at all times within such period."

As shown by the undisputed facts above set forth, petitioner's application was filed more than 262 weeks after the original injury occurred, which was more than 17 weeks after the expiration of the period of time fixed by the statute within which the commission is empowered to act. It is apparent, therefore, that the commission was barred from entertaining jurisdiction thereof.

[2] Petitioner contends, however, that commencing on October 28, 1925, his employer furnished him with medical treatment for several months, and that, therefore, the statute of limitations was tolled for a period of six months under another provision of said section 11 (c) of said act, which reads:

"The payment of compensation, or any part thereof, or agreement thereof, shall have the effect of extending the period within which proceedings for its collection may be commenced, six months from the date of the agreement or last payment of such compensation, or any part thereof, or the expiration of the period covered by any such payment."

As to whether or not petitioner's employer, the Fairmont Hotel, in fact furnished the medical treatment received by petitioner from Dr. Jacobs, is, however, a disputed question. It appears from the evidence, as petitioner contends, that Mr. Bishop, the paymaster, whose duty it was to provide injured employees with medical treatment, requested Dr. Jacobs to treat the petitioner, but it is made clear by the testimony of Dr. Jacobs, who, as before stated, was not connected with the State Compensation Insurance Fund, but was in the employ of the company succeeding the former as the insurance carrier for said hotel, that in giving petitioner medical treatment he was not acting for the Fairmont Hotel, but agreed to and did treat petitioner as a personal favor to Mr. Bishop, with the understanding that it was not an insurance case or a case for which either the Fairmont Hotel or the State Compensation Insurance Fund would be liable; that his services were rendered without compensation or expectation of financial reward; and that consequently he gave no notice of such treatment to said State Compensation Insurance Fund. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the testimony of Dr. Jacobs is sufficient to support the commission's conclusion that the medical treatment which petitioner received was not furnished, as petitioner claims, at the instance and request of his employer, the Fairmont Hotel, but was rendered by Dr. Jacobs as a personal favor to Mr. Bishop.

Assuming, however, that under the circumstances a contrary construction could be placed upon the evidence, and it could be held that the treatment was furnished by petitioner's employer, the Fairmont Hotel, the situation would not be altered, because under the provisions of said section 11 of said act above quoted, since petitioner was neither "totally disabled and bedridden as a result of his injury," the statute could not in any event be tolled beyond the 245 weeks' limitation fixed therein for the continuation of jurisdiction of said commission, and, furthermore, as stated in 27 California Jurisprudence, at page 461:

"Benefits furnished by an employer after an insurance carrier has assumed liability and the employee has accepted the benefits paid by it by reason of such assumption (which was the case here) are not effectual to prevent the running of the statute of limitations against any claim which the employee might have against the insurance carrier."

The latter rule is apparently based upon the legal proposition that the assumption of liability by the insurance carrier subrogates it to all of the rights of the employer.

We do not deem the case of United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 195 Cal. 577, 234 P. 369, cited and relied upon by petitioner, in point, because there the insurance carrier denied liability from the beginning, and, furthermore, the application for compensation was filed well within the period of 245 weeks from the date of the original injury.

For the reasons stated, we conclude that the commission's decision herein that petitioner's claim was not filed within the period of time allowed by the statute, and that consequently the commission was without legal authority to entertain or pass upon the same, must be sustained.

The award is therefore affirmed.

ENGLAND et al. v. BRYSON, Public Adm'r,

(Civ. 5838.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 19, 1927.

1. Wills $\S$ 130—Absence of period at end of concluding paragraph held, in absence of other punctuation, not to indicate that holographic will was incomplete.

Where testatrix did not use any periods in closing paragraphs and sentences in holographic will, fact that no period appeared at end of concluding paragraph held not to show that document was incomplete.

2. Wills $\S$ 133—Testatrix's signature at head of holographic will held sufficient.

Where holographic will appeared complete and showed testatrix's intention to make it her will, her signature appearing at head thereof in clause "last will of A. E." was sufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Anna England, also known as Mrs. I. W. England, deceased. Will contest by L. E. England and others against Frank Bryson, Public Administrator of Los Angeles County, administrator with the will annexed, and others. From a judgment admitting an alleged will to probate, and denying the contest, the contestants appeal. Affirmed.

Page, Nolan, Rohe & Freston and Hurt & Howard, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

John J. McMahon, William Fleet Palmer, and Clyde E. Holley, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. Letters of administration with the will annexed were issued to the proponent. Appellants filed a contest of the will, and appeal from the judgment declaring the will to be valid and denying the contest.

The ground of the contest is that the will was not entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testatrix, Anna England. No signature appears at the end of the document, which it is conceded by appellant is entirely in the handwriting of the decedent. The name "Anna England" appears in the caption only, and the question before this court on appeal is whether the decedent by writing her name in said place thereby "signed" the will. A photostatic copy of the document is here produced.

not in the customary place at the end of the instrument. The conclusion reached and adhered to in the decisions is that it must be established upon the face of the offered instrument that it is a complete and executed document; that notwithstanding that the usual place of signing, and so of evidencing due execution and completeness, is at the end of the instrument, the signature of a testator found elsewhere than at the end may be, if circumstances warrant it, a signature of execution, but that the only evidence which will warrant this conclusion must be found in and

The decision of this case is controlled by a recent decision of a very similar case (Estate of Morgan [Cal. Sup.] 253 P. 702), wherein it is said, at page 703:

"This court has, upon a number of occasions very recently, been called upon to consider the nature of the evidence permissible and sufficient to establish the due execution of an olographic will, where the signing thereof by the testator is on the instrument itself. Estate of McMahon, 174 Cal. 423, 163 P. 669, L. R. A. 1917D, 778. As stated in another case: 'The true rule, as we conceive it to be, is that, wherever placed, the fact that it was intended as an executing signature must satisfactorily appear on the face of the document itself. If it is at the end of the document, the universal custom of mankind forces the conclusion that it was appended as an execution, if nothing to the contrary appears.

If placed elsewhere, it is for the court to say, from an inspection of the whole document, its language as well as its form, and the relative position of its parts, whether or not there is a positive and satisfactory inference from the document itself that the signature was so placed with the intent that it should there serve as a token of execution. If such inference thus appears, the execution may be considered as proven by such signature.' Estate of Manchester, 174 Cal. 417, 421, 163 P. 358. * * * See, also, Estate of Streeton, 183 Cal. 284, 288, 191 P. 16; Estate of Bernard, 197 Cal. 36, 38, 239 P. 404; Estate of Devlin, 198 Cal. 721, 247 P. 577."

[1, 2] As in the foregoing case, so in the present case, the will in question makes complete disposition of the property. It in all respects appears to be a completed document. It lacks punctuation throughout, and the fact that no period appears at the end of the concluding paragraph does not indicate that the document was incomplete, since the testatrix did not use periods in closing other paragraphs and sentences in the will. If the words "last will of Anna England" appeared at the end of the will, all doubt that the signature was intended to be and was adopted as the final executing signature in authentication of and in execution of the document as a completed testamentary act would be removed. Viewing the instrument as a whole, we are of the opinion that, by the use of these words in the beginning of the instrument, it was the intention of the testatrix to thereby execute the document as a will. We are satisfied that the finding of the probate court that the signing of the document by the deceased at the beginning was intended as a signature, and that the said instrument was valid, is sustained by the inferences arising from an inspection of the document itself.

Judgment is affirmed.

SMITH v. HOLLANDER et ux. (Civ. 5797.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 22, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 21, 1927.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨706(6)—Driver's negligence in not giving suitable warning signal held for jury, where automobile struck pedestrian on sidewalk.

In pedestrian's action for injuries sustained when defendant's automobile ran onto sidewalk and struck him, evidence held sufficient to take case to jury on question whether defendant was negligent in not giving suitable warning signal.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨706(3)—Res ipsa loquitur doctrine applies when automobile runs on sidewalk and strikes pedestrian.

When automobile leaves its accustomed place of travel in street, runs on sidewalk, and strikes pedestrian, doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applicable.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨706(6)—Negligence in driving skidding automobile on sidewalk, causing injury to pedestrian, held for jury.

In action by pedestrian for injuries sustained when automobile ran upon sidewalk and struck him, whether defendant came upon sidewalk with automobile as result of negligence or of unavoidable skidding held for jury.

4. Negligence ⇨138(2)—Instruction on res ipsa loquitur doctrine is proper, where explanation leaves it doubtful whether ultimate cause of injury is negligence of party charged.

Where defendant's explanation in personal injury action leaves it doubtful as to whether ultimate cause of injury is negligence of party charged, it is proper to instruct as to res ipsa loquitur doctrine.

5. Negligence ⇨138(2)—Refusal of instructions on presumption of defendant's freedom from negligence held proper, where res ipsa loquitur instruction was authorized.

Where it was proper to instruct on res ipsa loquitur doctrine in personal injury action, it was proper for court to refuse defendant's requested instructions on presumption of defendant's freedom from negligence.

6. Trial ⇨228(3)—Interchange of expressions "burden of proof" and "burden of producing evidence" in instruction held not error.

Though "burden of proof" and "burden of producing evidence" are not the same, use of one expression instead of the other in instruction held not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Burden of Proof.]

7. Negligence ⇨134(1)—Defendant overcomes plaintiff's prima facie case when she balances it evenly without proving absence of negligence.

In personal injury action, defendant meets and therefore overcomes plaintiff's prima facie case when she balances it evenly without proving absence of negligence by preponderance of evidence.

8. Trial ⇨260(8)—In personal injury action, refusal of instruction on unavoidable accident and of instruction requiring defendant only to balance evenly plaintiff's proof held not prejudicial, in view of other instructions.

In personal injury action, refusal of instruction that defendant was only required to balance evenly plaintiff's proof and of instruction on unavoidable accident held not to result in miscarriage of justice, in view of defendant's weak explanation of accident and of other instructions defining burden of proof, though such refused instructions could properly have been given.

9. Trial ⇨192—Assumption in instruction of undisputed fact is not error.

Where fact assumed in instruction can be said to be undisputed in evidence, such assumption is not error.

10. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 296(9)—Assumptions of fact in instructions which are indirect or inferential and grammatically doubtful or based on undisputed facts are cured by instructions leaving question to jury.

Where claimed assumptions of fact in instructions are grammatically doubtful or based on undisputed facts, and are indirect or inferential only, they are reconcilable with, and cured by, other instructions properly leaving question to jury.

11. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 719(7)—Where error in instruction is not advanced as ground of appeal, reviewing court need not pass on it.

Where appellant has not advanced error in certain instruction as ground of appeal, it is not necessary to pass on such instruction, notwithstanding that respondent on rehearing presents authority and argument to show it was not erroneous.

12. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 296(3)—Instructions on degree of care required held to cure any error in instructions using expression "proper care" and "due care."

In personal injury action, any objection to instruction for use of expression "proper care" and "due care" held overcome by other instructions on degree of care required.

13. Pleading $\hookrightarrow$ 18—Demurrer for uncertainty lies for what is said with uncertain meaning and not for what is omitted.

Demurrer for uncertainty lies for what is said with uncertain meaning and not for what is omitted, since in personal injury action no description of injuries could be so complete that nothing more could be added.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by F. H. Smith against Arthur Hollander and wife, in which named defendant was granted a nonsuit. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Hattie Hollander appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 257 P. 577.

Cooley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Henry Eickhoff, Jr., and Gregory A. Harrison, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Appellant, Hattie Hollander, appeals from a judgment awarding damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff in being struck by said appellant's automobile. Her codefendant, Arthur Hollander, was granted a nonsuit.

The proof offered by the plaintiff was as follows: While walking westerly on the south sidewalk of Post street, plaintiff was struck and injured by appellant's automobile, which ran up onto the sidewalk unawares from behind him. He did not see it approach nor hear any horn or warning signal. The only eyewitness for the plaintiff testified:

"I saw (the) automobile coming down Post street going west, and I saw it suddenly skid completely around and go right on the sidewalk and knock (plaintiff) down, and back up across the street and go on the other sidewalk and stop. A building stopped it. * * * The street was wet."

[1] Plaintiff's wife testified to a telephone conversation with appellant, in which the latter said that she had lost control of her machine from Van Ness avenue to Buchanan street. This was all the testimony offered by plaintiff in chief concerning the manner of the accident. A motion for a nonsuit by appellant was denied. Apart from the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, the evidence warranted the submission of the case to the jury upon the question of whether defendant was negligent in not giving a suitable warning signal.

Defendant Arthur Hollander testified on behalf of appellant and himself that a misty rain had fallen for a period of about 15 minutes, and that the street was still wet at the time of the accident; that appellant's automobile was traveling on Post street from Van Ness avenue at a speed of not more than 15 miles per hour in a straight course and in second gear; that about 100 feet east of Buchanan street the forward end of the automobile suddenly skidded towards the left, ran up onto the south or his left-hand sidewalk, and struck the plaintiff. Appellant's testimony was substantially the same. She was the driver, and testified that, when the skidding commenced, there was nothing for her to do to bring the car back into control; that all she did was to hold onto the steering wheel. This was all the testimony for the defendants and appellant concerning the cause of the accident. There is therefore, no direct proof of what particular act or omission on the part of the appellant, driver of the car, caused it to skid and run upon the sidewalk.

[2] No contributory negligence was pleaded. Negligence was pleaded generally. The complaint alleged that the defendant negligently operated, handled, and drove an automobile, causing it to run upon the sidewalk and strike and knock plaintiff down from behind, and that plaintiff had no warning of any kind or knowledge of his danger prior to said collision. The plaintiff relied on the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. Some of the instructions given, when read together, inform the jury that it may infer negligence without knowing the specific act or omission which constituted the negligence, if it should find from the evidence that defendant's automobile ran upon the sidewalk and struck plaintiff unawares from behind. When an automobile leaves its accustomed place of travel in the street, runs upon the sidewalk, and there strikes a pedestrian, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur has been generally held to apply. Berry on Automobiles (4th Ed.) § 405; Huddy on Automobiles (7th Ed.) § 512. In such case all the elements necessary for the application of the doctrine are present. The injured person is not in a position to know the cause of the mishap. The one in control of the instrumentality causing the injury is or should be in a position to know. Such an occurrence does not usually happen in the absence of negligence on the part of the one in control of the automobile. In Scheuermann v. Kuetemeyer, 186 Cal. 225, 199 P. 13, the Supreme Court held facts similar in principle to those proven in this case, omitting skidding, to constitute a prima facie case, and to warrant, in the absence of any explanation or denial, an inference of negligence on the part of the driver of the car. Appellant urges that, conceding the doctrine to apply where the automobile runs upon the sidewalk, nevertheless we have here the additional fact of skidding on a wet street, which appears both from the case as a whole and from plaintiff's testimony in chief. It is said that skidding may or may not be negligent, and for that reason skidding in and by itself furnishes no evidence of negligence or at least that the fact of skidding is a sufficient explanation for running upon the sidewalk to take the case out of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.

[3-5] At most, it was for the jury to decide whether to infer negligence of the appellant from the fact that she came upon the sidewalk with her automobile, or whether to decide that the proof of the skidding of the automobile under the circumstances and in the manner testified to by the witnesses was a sufficient explanation to justify it in deciding that she was not negligent in the operation of her automobile. "Where the explanation leaves it doubtful as to whether or not the ultimate cause of the injury is the negligence of the party charged, it is proper to instruct the jury as to the res ipsa loquitur doctrine." Connor v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 189 Cal. 1, 6, 207 P. 378, 380 (26 A. L. R. 1462). See, also, Seney v. Pickwick Stages, 52 Cal. App. Dec. 951. Where it was proper to instruct on this doctrine, it was proper for the court to refuse defendant's requested instructions VIII and IX upon the presumption of defendant's freedom from negligence.

[6-8] Instruction XV requires the defendant to "overcome" plaintiff's prima facie case, and XXI states that, after proof of plaintiff's prima facie case, the burden then shifts to the defendant to show that she was not guilty of negligence. "Burden of proof" and "burden of producing evidence" are not the same, but the use of the one expression instead of the other has been held not to be error. Cody v. Market Street Ry. Co., 148 Cal. 90, 82 P. 666; Worden v. Central Fireproof Bldg. Co., 172 Cal. 94, 155 P. 839. The defendant meets, and therefore overcomes, plaintiff's prima facie case when she balances it evenly without proving absence of negligence by a preponderance of the evidence. Rathbun v. White, 157 Cal. 252, 107 P. 309; Scarborough v. Urgo, 191 Cal. 346, 347, 216 P. 584. One way for defendant to meet plaintiff's prima facie case is to offer evidence tending to show that plaintiff's injuries were the result of an unavoidable accident. Defendant's requested instruction III, that the defendant was only required to balance evenly the plaintiff's proof, and requested instruction V upon unavoidable accident, could properly have been given, but we are unable to see that the refusal to give them resulted in a miscarriage of justice, in view of the weak explanation of the accident offered on behalf of the appellant and in view of other instructions given properly defining burden of proof.

The instructions contain several indirect assumptions of fact which are assigned as error. This arises from expressions used without conditional qualification, such as the usual "if any." One such expression is "caused by the negligence of the defendant," in instruction XXII, and several such assumptions of fact are used in instruction XXIII, where the jury is instructed that—

"Such damages include:

"Subdivision 1. The pain and suffering endured by the plaintiff, etc.

"Subdivision 2. Any loss sustained by plaintiff by reason of the fact that he has been unable to work up to the present time.

"Subdivision 3. All charges incurred and paid by the plaintiff by reason of the injury; * * * and as well as such charges certain to be reasonably incurred in the future by reason of said injuries.

"Subdivision 6. The mental worry endured by the plaintiff up to the present time, due to his reasonable apprehension of future disability, which reasonable apprehension was the proximate result of his injuries.

"Subdivision 7. The permanent disability or lack of capacity for work in the future of the said plaintiff sustained by reason of his said injuries."

[9] Where the fact can be said to be undisputed in the evidence, such assumption has been held not to constitute error. 24 Cal. Jur. § 101, p. 843, cases cited in notes 18 and 19. In several decisions it has been held that, where the assumption of fact is indirect and inferential, it may be considered as cured by other instructions properly leaving the question to the jury. Ingalls v. Monte Cristo Oil Co., 23 Cal. App. 652, 656, 139 P. 97; Dawson v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 177 Cal. 268, 170 P. 603; Anderson v. Seropian, 147 Cal. 201, 216, 81 P. 521.

[10] The language used follows the wording of the instruction in Storrs v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 134 Cal. 91, 66 P. 72, although nothing is there said concerning assumption of facts. Some of the claimed assumptions of fact in these instructions are grammatically doubtful. Some of them are upon undisputed facts. All of them are indirect or inferential only, so that they are reconcilable with, and cured by, other instructions. On petition for rehearing, respondent has called attention to such curative instructions, one of which is:

"You will distinctly understand that in this charge the court in no manner or form is expressing or desiring to express any opinion on the weight of the evidence or any part of it, or on the truth or falsity of any witnesses' testimony, or that any alleged fact in the case is or is not proved."

[11] We conclude that, notwithstanding the inaccuracies in these instructions, the charge, taken as a whole, did not invade the province of the jury upon any disputed fact in the evidence. Upon rehearing, respondent has presented authority and argument to show that instruction XXIII was not erroneous for lacking the element of certainty of future incapacity for work. Inasmuch as appellant has not advanced this as one of her grounds of appeal, it is not necessary to pass upon the point.

[12] Some of the instructions use the expression "proper care" and "due care," but the instructions elsewhere, XII and XIV, instruct on the degree of care required of defendant, and this overcomes the objection.

There was sufficient foundation for the telephone conversation with defendant. Union Const. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co., 163 Cal. 298, 125 P. 242; 22 Corp. Jur. § 336, p. 302.

[13] Defendant's demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. The injuries detailed in the complaint were specific and detailed enough to advise the defendant of the character of proof to expect. Kuhns v. Marshall, 44 Cal. App. 588, 186 P. 632. A demurrer for uncertainty lies for what is said with an uncertain meaning and not for what is omitted. Callahan v. Broderick, 124 Cal. 83, 56 P. 782. No description of injuries can be so complete that nothing more can be added.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Agnes Thornton was convicted of arson in the first degree and of burning insured property with intent to defraud an insurance company, and she appeals. Affirmed.

Laurence D. Carter, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. The appellant, Mrs. Agnes Thornton, was tried upon an information containing two counts, the first charging her and one Bobby Clark with arson, and the second charging the same persons with burning insured property with intent to defraud an insurance company. The arson charged in the first count was the burning of a dwelling house at 3615 Paloma street, in the city of Los Angeles, and the second count charged the burning of the same dwelling house and the contents thereof, all upon the 27th day of July, 1926. At the trial the information was dismissed as to Bobby Clark, and she testified for the prosecution. Appellant was convicted upon both counts, the verdict specifying that the arson was of the first degree, and she appeals from the judgment. No briefs have been filed by either side, and we are dependent for information as to the grounds of appeal upon the oral argument and appellant's written application to the trial court for a transcript.

The evidence shows that appellant was the owner of the house referred to in the information, and of its contents, and that it was occupied as a residence by appellant, by Bobby Clark, and by appellant's two year old grandson, and at times by other persons. There is no question that a fire occurred at this house, to which the Los Angeles fire department was called early in the morning of Tuesday, July 27, 1926.

Several officers of the fire department were called as witnesses, and from their testimony it appeared that the first fire unit arrived at the house at 5:09 a. m. The fireman who first arrived saw smoke coming from the front part of the house, the front door open, and a man standing in the door with a garden hose. He looked in and saw in the living room a davenport and a chair, partly consumed and still burning. Within a few minutes several firemen arrived and examined the building carefully, and from their testimony the following facts appear: Fires or preparations for fire were found in five different places, of which only two were burning, and none of them had any connection with any other. In the living room the rug had been burned through and the floor deeply charred. In the back bedroom a fire was burning and had been burning for some time in a closet. This fire had charred the walls and the door on the inside of the closet, burned through the floor at the back and up through the ceiling, and had burned some clothes except a few fragments remaining on the floor. A screen at the bottom of the kitchen cooler had been broken loose and some newspapers thrust down through the opening, and these were found partly burned. Testifying from their experience as firemen and the appearance of the ashes, two witnesses said these papers had been burned from six to twelve hours before their examination was made. Two lath ventilators covering openings to the space under the house had been torn off, and piles of paper had been placed under the house opposite them. One of these piles, which was under the back bedroom, had been partly burned; the other pile, which was under the front bedroom, had not been burned, but one witness detected the odor of coal oil on it. None of the fires under the house had taken effect upon the building. Two of these witnesses also saw the remains of a fire in the dining room, where the carpet had been charred, and one of them saw a burned match and detected a strong odor of gasoline or coal oil at this point. One of the firemen, who arrived at 5:25 a. m., went to the front bedroom and found there appellant, who was in bed, Bobby Clark, and a small boy about two years old. A neighbor who left home for work about 4:30 a. m., testified that as he went out of the house he saw a dim light in the living room of appellant's house, but did not see or smell any smoke or fire, and the light did not flicker.

Thomas S. Brown testified that he was an insurance broker for Employers' Fire Insurance Company of Boston, Mass.; that on July 23 or 24, 1926, he went to appellant's house at 3615 Paloma street, at the request of a Mr. Tate, and spoke with appellant, who said she wanted insurance on the house, and after some discussion directed him to write a policy of $5,000 on the house, $1,000 on the contents, and $150 on the garage. She told him she had no ready money to pay the premium, but did not owe any money. He wrote the policy accordingly, and it was mailed to appellant on July 27th and received by her after the fire. The policy was introduced in evidence and proved to be a fire insurance policy dated July 22, 1926. Brown explained this date by saying that the policy was written to cover the property from the date of the application for insurance, which was before he inspected the property. The issuance of another policy on the house, with loss payable to a mortgage company, and payment of the premium thereon by that company, were also proved, but it was not certainly shown that appellant had knowledge of it.

Bobby Clark testified that she had no interest in the house, or its contents, or anything insured therein; that at the time of the fire she lived there with appellant and had lived there for a month or more, doing the work and caring for appellant, who was sick part of the time; that appellant's son and her grandson also lived there; that on the Sunday before the fire appellant suggested to the witness that they burn the house in order to get money to get the boy (meaning her son) out of trouble and pay debts; and that appellant directed the witness to go the next day and get some gasoline. This witness also testified that she was present at the placing of the insurance policy for $6,150 on the place with Mr. Brown on the Friday before the fire; that on Monday, July 26th, she got some gasoline and brought it to the house; that about 9 p. m. on Monday night the witness put some papers, which appellant handed to her for that purpose, under the house at the places where they were found by the firemen, and poured gasoline on them; that about 11 p. m. of that night appellant said it was time to light the fires, and the witness lighted the fires under the rear bedroom and the kitchen cooler, but did not light the papers she had put under the front bedroom, where she, appellant and appellant's grandson slept that night; that appellant started the other fires; that later the fires did not seem to be burning and appellant got up twice, took an umbrella and went into the front room to start the fire so it would blaze up; that about daylight the witness opened the door from the bedroom into the living-room and found the latter full of smoke, and becoming alarmed, got out of a bedroom window and went next door to call the fire department. Bobby Clark also testified that under appellant's direction she wrote two letters, charred the edges of their envelopes and addressed and mailed them to appellant, who told the witness the charred edges were a sign of arson. The first of these she mailed about two weeks before the fire, and the second was written on the Sunday before, and received by appellant on July 27th.

Appellant herself took the stand, denying her guilt in general and Bobby Clark's testimony in particular, and stated that she had not the least idea how the fire started; that she and Bobby Clark and her grandson were in the house, and her grandson was in bed with her all the night of the fire; that she heard no one in the house but Bobby Clark, but heard a noise outside, on that night.

[1] Appellant contends that as she was the owner of the house she could not be guilty of arson in burning her own property, and also that under the circumstances shown by the foregoing evidence she and Bobby Clark were equally guilty, and, as held in People v. Abrams, 174 Cal. 172, 162 P. 395, in order to make a case of arson in the first degree the building must be occupied by some one other than the persons concerned in the crime. These arguments are sufficiently answered by a reference to sections 452 and 454 of the Penal Code, and a brief consideration of the testimony already stated. From this testimony the jury must have found that appellant's grandson spent the night in the house, and that the fires were of incendiary origin and were started at some time during the night and while the boy was in the house. These conclusions may be reached without considering the testimony of Bobby Clark, and make out a case of arson.

[2] Appellant also argues that Bobby Clark was an accomplice, and that her testimony was not corroborated as required by section 1111 of the Penal Code. There can be no doubt that Bobby Clark was an accomplice as defined by this section. As we have already stated, the commission of the offense charged in the first count by some person is sufficiently shown without considering her testimony.

Upon the second count, an intent to defraud or prejudice an insurance company is a material element of the offense. It has been held that such intent may be inferred from the facts that the defendant owned the property burned, that he burned it, and that at the time of burning it was insured against loss by fire (People v. Vasalo, 120 Cal. 168, 52 P. 305), to which, according to a later decision, must be added the fact that defendant knew of the insurance, before the inference can be drawn (People v. Rose, 38 Cal. App. 493, 176 P. 694). The evidence we have already stated other than that of Bobby Clark shows that the fire was of incendiary origin; that the property was owned by and insured in the name of appellant, and that she knew of the insurance, but does not show that she burned the building, and it is therefore insufficient as a basis for any inference of intent to defraud the insurance company. There is, however, other evidence in the case. Since the fact which is lacking on this point would also tend to corroborate Bobby Clark on both counts by showing defendant's connection with the fire, these two points may be discussed together.

The evidence corroborating Bobby Clark is not strong, but there are several circumstances tending to connect appellant with the commission of the offense. Mrs. Sadie Ford lived next door to appellant, and testified that before the fire department arrived she went to turn the hose on the house, and appellant forbade her to do so. Norman A. Danskin, an investigator for the fire department, testified that he had a conversation with appellant on the morning of the fire, in which she said she had no idea what caused the fire, but that no one had been in the building during the night other than herself, her grandson, and Bobby Clark; that she was a very sick woman and had not been up during the night; that she was the owner of the property; that her insurance had run out about six months before and she had renewed it because she had received a threatening letter about three weeks before, but she was not sure the policy was in effect; that one end of this letter was burned off and she was under the impression that some one was going to burn the house, and called an insurance man, whose name and address she did not know, the next day after receiving the letter.

Paul T. Wolfe, another investigator for the fire department, testified to several talks with appellant. The first one occurred about 9 a. m. of July 27th, at which appellant said she had slept in the house that night, but heard nothing unusual and did not know how the fire started; that she had not been up during the night, as the doctor had given her something to make her sleep; and that she had had this doctor's services for three weeks, but did not know his name. Just after this a Dr. Robinson came into the room, and in answer to questions by Wolfe said in appellant's presence that he, the doctor, had given appellant nothing to make her sleep, but had given her some quinine and atropin, and that appellant was able to get up without any bad effect if she did not stay on her feet any considerable length of time, to all of which appellant made no reply or objection. At this conversation appellant also said to Wolfe that her insurance on the building and contents had run out several months previous, and she had not renewed it; that there were no debts against the place; that she owed a few little bills, but they did not amount to anything; that she had received a threatening letter; and that enemies had started the fire, but she did not name anybody, though asked to do so. On July 28th, Wolfe had another talk with appellant, in which appellant said she had mentioned insurance to a friend named Tate, who would send an insurance man to see her or place the insurance himself, but she had never heard from Tate or the insurance company and did not know whether any insurance was placed. She also told Wolfe she had received another black hand letter and gave it to him. He tried to read it, but could not on account of the smallness of the writing, and Bobby Clark stood behind him and read it. Wolfe also got the first threatening letter from appellant's attorney.

These letters were introduced in evidence. The first was dated July 5, 1926, and the second July ———, 1926, and both were signed "Revenge." The first letter threatened death to appellant, and the second, while rather vague, can be construed as referring to the fire and threatening further mischief. Testimony was given by a handwriting expert that he had compared the handwriting in these two letters with specimens written by Bobby Clark, and that both were written by the same person.

Wolfe further testified that on the nights of July 29th and 30th he watched the house from 8 to 12 o'clock to see if any one was molesting the place, and saw no one; that about midnight on the second night he went to appellant's house and knocked at the door, and appellant answered, when he told her not to be alarmed as he was watching the house; that previous to that everything was as still as could be, but after he made this statement appellant seemed to be in considerable pain, and he heard her groaning a considerable part of the time; that he stayed there about 30 minutes after seeing appellant. He further testified that on August 15th he met appellant at the office of an insurance broker and asked her what she was doing there, and asked her if she had any insurance, to which she replied, "No." He then stepped out of the office and appellant followed him into the hall and said, "I lied to you in there, I have insurance; just a few hundred dollars, $1,000 on my furniture." On September 7th, Wolfe again saw appellant at her house, asked her if she had found any more insurance and she said "No." He asked her if she had a lot of liens against the place, which she at first denied, but then admitted there were a considerable number of liens secured against the property, and that the same was true of the furniture.

[3] From the evidence the jury could have found that a fire was built, but not lighted, under the room occupied by appellant; that she forbade a neighbor to attempt to put the fire out; that appellant made false statements in order to show that she could not have been out of bed on the night of the fire; that she stated to investigators that she did not know whether she had any insurance and had not seen an insurance man, although in fact she seen one and placed insurance with him three or four days before; that when she learned the house was being watched by a fire department investigator she began to groan and act sick, although she had not done so before; that she denied having any debts or incumbrances on the house, but later admitted them; that she referred to the threatening letters for an explanation of her effort to get insurance, although these letters had been written by her household assistant, Bobby Clark; that she gave the same explanation to the investigator of the meaning of the burned edges of the letters as, according to Bobby Clark's testimony, she had given to the latter; that although attributing the fire to enemies appellant was unable to name or identify them; that she was in fact in debt and in need of money; and that these various false statements were made in an attempt to mislead the investigator and divert suspicion from herself. Perhaps no one of these facts, if standing alone, would be sufficient to uphold the verdict, but taking them all together we are unable to say that there is no substantial evidence tending to connect appellant with the commission of the offense charged. People v. Woo, 181 Cal. 315, 328, 184 P. 389.

[4, 5] Appellant also claimed upon the argument that the court committed error in admitting in evidence the two letters above referred to. We think they were material in connection with appellant's conduct in reference to them, but appellant is in no position to raise this point now, for no objection was made to these letters at the trial.

The foregoing are all the points made in support of the appeal at the argument, but in view of the fact that no briefs were filed and that appellant's attorney stated at the argument that he was not well prepared therefor because he had been expecting that other counsel would be substituted for him in this court, we have examined the entire record and find no prejudicial error.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

(259 P.)

SHASTA LUMBER CO. v. McCOY, Sheriff.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 17, 1927.

1. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨308(2)—Sale of 123,326 feet of lumber by sawmill company to company in business of buying and selling lumber is not, as matter of law, within statute respecting bulk sales; "ordinary course of trade;" "regular and usual practice and method of business;" "stock in trade" (Civ. Code, § 3440).

Sale of 123,326 feet of lumber by sawmill company to company engaged in business of buying and selling lumber is not, as a matter of law, out of the "ordinary course of trade" or the "regular and usual practice and method of business of the vendor," within Civ. Code, § 3440, providing that bulk sale of stock in trade so made will be conclusively presumed fraudulent as against existing creditors of vendor, unless specified notice of intended sale is given, in view of term "stock in trade" meaning "stock of merchandise."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Stock in Trade.]

2. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨300(1)—Finding that sale of lumber was for value, and not fraud on creditors, held sustained by evidence (Civ. Code, § 3442).

In action against sheriff for attachment and sale of lumber, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that bank, authorized to sell debtor's lumber and to apply proceeds on its debt, sold lumber for valuable consideration, and that sale was not void as to creditors, under Civ. Code, § 3442.

3. Sheriffs and constables ⇨138(3)—In action against sheriff for attaching and selling lumber, finding that bank sold lumber for debtor before attachment held sustained by evidence (Civ. Code, § 1140).

In action against sheriff for value of lumber attached by him and sold, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that bank, authorized to sell debtor's lumber and to apply proceeds on its debt, had sold the lumber prior to the levy of the attachment, under Civ. Code, § 1140, providing that title to personal property passes when parties agree on present transfer and thing is identified.

4. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨297—Evidence held not to show insolvency of partnership or contemplation of insolvency, within statute respecting fraudulent conveyances (Civ. Code, § 3442).

Testimony that bank officer told partner that partnership business was in very poor condition and that the partners should go through insolvency held not to establish that partnership was insolvent, or that subsequent sale of lumber was in contemplation of insolvency, so as to make applicable Civ. Code, § 3442, declaring certain transfers void as to creditors.

5. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨121, 122(1)—In absence of statute, debtor may prefer creditors by payment or security (Civ. Code, § 3432).

In absence of express statutory provisions to the contrary, a debtor, though insolvent or in failing circumstances, may validly prefer one or more of his creditors by making payments in money or other property, or by giving security, in view of Civ. Code, § 3432.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1058(2)—Excluding questions held not prejudicial, where witness answered in other parts of testimony.

Sustaining objections to questions on cross-examination held not prejudicial error in instances where witness fully answered question put to him in other parts of his testimony.

7. Appeal and error ⇨205—Excluding question held not ground for complaint because matter would have developed rendering it proper, where record did not indicate development would have appeared and counsel did not suggest it at trial.

Sustaining objection to defendant's question held not ground for complaint by defendant on the ground that if the question had been permitted a matter would have soon developed which would have rendered it proper, where nothing in the record showed that the development suggested would have appeared, and no suggestion thereof was made to the trial court or any explanation of the purpose of the question, but the matter was immediately dropped after objection was sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action to recover the value of lumber sold, brought by the Shasta Lumber Company against Chas. J. McCoy, Sheriff of the County of Yuba. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dozier, Kimball & Dozier, of San Francisco, for appellant.

W. H. Carlin and Richard Belcher, both of Marysville, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. In an action prosecuted by the Chicago Lumber Company against Leal & Sons Lumber Company, a writ of attachment was duly issued and placed in the hands of the defendant, who, pursuant to the authority thereof, seized certain lumber claimed by and in the possession of the plaintiff herein. Judgment in that action was rendered in favor of the plaintiff therein, and the defendant herein sold the lumber to satisfy the judgment. This action was thereafter commenced to recover the value of the lumber so sold. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

There is evidence to show the following facts: Leal & Sons Lumber Company is a copartnership composed of Manuel Leal and his sons, George and Edward, and was engaged, at the times herein mentioned, in the business of operating a sawmill at Brownsville, Yuba county, and selling the output of the mill. In the early part of the year 1924 the company was indebted in the sum of more than $20,000 to the Rideout Branch of the Bank of Italy. It was also indebted to the Chicago Lumber Company and probably to others. The plaintiff owned and was operating a lumber yard in Marysville, where it had been engaged for many years in the business of buying and selling lumber. Early in May, 1924, the plaintiff purchased certain lumber, not involved in this action, from Leal & Sons Lumber Company, and about the same time the latter company entered into an arrangement with the bank and the plaintiff to the effect that Leal & Sons Lumber Company would deliver certain lumber at plaintiff's lumber yard, the bill of lading, or tag, of each truck load to be indorsed, "Sold to Bank of Italy. Delivered at Shasta Lumber Co." The plaintiff was to sell the lumber "for the benefit of the Bank of Italy and Leal & Sons Lumber Company jointly," the latter to be given credit therefor by the bank. The bank acted as the agent of Leal & Sons Lumber Company in selling the lumber. The plaintiff was given no commission for its services, but was paid the cost of labor in handling the lumber. George Leal testified that in the early part of May, 1924, J. C. Dooley, a representative of the bank, directed the immediate delivery of the lumber, saying:

"We want it hauled out of here so nobody can come up here and put an attachment on it."

The witness further testified that:

Dooley "instructed me how to mark the tags, 'Sold to the Bank of Italy.' * * * I said this lumber wasn't sold to the Bank of Italy. He said, 'We want it marked that way so nobody can put any attachment on the lumber down in Marysville.'"

It does not appear that this testimony was directly contradicted, but W. B. Swayne, assistant vice president of the bank, who had charge of the matter, testified that he instructed Dooley to direct Leal & Sons Lumber Company to ship the lumber, but did not direct him to state to that company "that they should ship that lumber down right away so it wouldn't be attached by creditors of Leal & Sons Lumber Company," and that "we told the Leals we wanted the lumber brought down here where it could be handled. They were not able to sell it or move it."

A large quantity of lumber was delivered under this arrangement at the plaintiff's lumber yard and, after a part thereof had been sold, the bank asked the plaintiff to make an offer for the purchase of the remainder thereof. June 28, 1924, the plaintiff gave the bank a detailed statement of the remainder of the lumber, amounting to 123,326 feet, and offered to purchase the same at $45 per thousand. The offer was oral, the only memorandum thereof in writing being a pencil notation on said statement, substantially as follows: "123,326 ft. @ $45 per M. $5,549.67." Swayne "said it was all right with the bank but he would rather have the Leals confirm it and he would send them down." Swayne testified that thereafter, on the same day, "all three" of the Leals appeared at the bank, and "I showed them the offer * * * made by Mr. Bryan (plaintiff's manager). I told them I would like them to go down and talk to Mr. Bryan and look over the lumber, see the grading and pricing he had made on it. They said they didn't care to go down, that the lumber belonged to the bank; the bank could do as it pleased with it. I said, 'I would like you to go down,' and they did go down at my request." The Leals then went to the plaintiff's place of business and said to Bryan that "it was the Bank of Italy's lumber, they could do as they pleased about it." The Leals did not report back to the bank. Swayne testified that on June 30, 1924, "Mr. Bryan reported to me that the Leals came down and they were satisfied with the grading and price, so I told him the lumber was his." The plaintiff made an entry in its ledger, crediting the bank with the purchase price of the lumber, $5,549.67. This entry "was either made on June 30th or the following day." The lumber was attached, as stated, July 8, 1924, and, of course the plaintiff had notice of the attachment. July 10, 1924, the bank made and delivered to the plaintiff a bill for the lumber so purchased, dating the bill "June 30, 1924." August 19, 1924, plaintiff gave its promissory note to the bank for the amount of this purchase and other indebtedness to the bank. August 21, 1924, the bank gave Leal & Sons Lumber Company credit for the amount of the sale made to the plaintiff. No record of the sale was made by either the plaintiff or the bank prior to the execution of such promissory note, except as herein stated.

The evidence shows without conflict that Leal & Sons Lumber Company authorized the bank to sell the lumber in question and apply the proceeds to the company's indebtedness to the bank, and the important question here is whether the bank made a valid sale to the plaintiff prior to the levy of the attachment. There is sufficient evidence to support a finding either way on that issue. Had the attachment been levied prior to June 30, it would undoubtedly have taken precedence over the sale to the plaintiff. The lumber was already in the possession of the plaintiff, and therefore no question as to its delivery is presented. "The title to personal property, sold or exchanged, passes to the buyer whenever the parties agree upon a present transfer, and the thing itself is identified, whether it is separated from other things or not." Civ. Code, § 1140. Of course, the provisions of this section are subject to the rules relating to fraudulent transfers.

[1] Appellant contends that the sale is void

under the bulk-sales provisions of section 3440 of the Civil Code, to the effect that the sale "of a stock in trade, in bulk, or a substantial part thereof otherwise than in the ordinary course of trade and in the regular and usual practice and method of business of the vendor * * * will be conclusively presumed to be fraudulent and void as against the existing creditors of the vendor," unless prior notice of the intended sale be given as therein prescribed. Admittedly, no such notice was given of the sale in question. The evidence does not show what other lumber, if any, Leal & Sons Lumber Company had at the time of the sale. It cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the sale of 123,326 feet of lumber by a sawmill company to a company engaged in the business of buying and selling lumber is out of "the ordinary course of trade" or "the regular and usual practice and method of business of the vendor." It has been held generally that statutes substantially in the terms of section 3440 do not apply to vendors of articles manufactured by themselves. 27 C. J. 878; Connecticut Steam Brown Stone Co. v. Lewis, 86 Conn. 386, 85 A. 534, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 495; Cooney, Eckstein & Co. v. Sweat, 133 Ga. 511, 66 S. E. 257, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 758. The case last cited involved a sale of lumber by the operator of a sawmill. The term "stock in trade" appearing in section 3440 was doubtless used as the equivalent of "stock of merchandise." In Swift & Co. v. Tempelos, 178 N. C. 487, 101 S. E. 8, 7 A. L. R. 1581, it is said:

"The words, 'stock of merchandise,' in our statute are used in the common and ordinary acceptance of those terms, and mean the goods or chattels which a merchant holds for sale, and are equivalent to 'stock in trade,' as ordinarily used and understood among merchants and tradesmen."

In Phillips v. Byers, 189 Cal. 665, 671, 209 P. 557, 559, it is said:

"One who simply manufactures an article and sells it is not a merchant and * * * although a manufacturer may also be a merchant if he buys and sells goods, he does not become one by disposing of the goods he has produced, at a manufacturer's profit."

[2-4] Appellant next contends that the transfer to plaintiff "was voluntary and without a valuable consideration and made by said copartnership while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, and was therefore fraudulent and void as to existing creditors," and that there is no evidence that the sale to the plaintiff was consummated prior to the levy of the attachment. A mere reading of the evidence herein set out is a sufficient answer to these contentions except as to the question of the company's insolvency. The evidence upon which appellant relies to show that the copartnership was insolvent or contemplated insolvency proceedings was given by Edward Leal as follows:

"Q. What, if anything, did Mr. Swayne say concerning a trust deed? A. He said that our business was in very poor condition, the best thing we could do was to go through insolvency."

The witness testified that this conversation took place June 28, 1924. Such evidence is insufficient to show either that the copartnership was insolvent or that the transfer was made in contemplation of insolvency. The provision of section 3442 of the Civil Code "that any transfer or incumbrance of property made or given voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent and void as to existing creditors," has no application to the facts of this case, because the transfer was not voluntary, but was made for a valuable consideration.

[5] "It is well settled that in the absence of express statutory provisions to the contrary, a debtor, although insolvent or in failing circumstances, may prefer one or more of his creditors by payment in money or other property or by giving security for the debt, and that the preference thus given will be valid, notwithstanding the claims of other creditors will thereby be delayed or defeated." 27 C. J. 613. "A debtor may pay one creditor in preference to another, or may give to one creditor security for the payment of his demand in preference to another." Civ. Code, § 3432.

[6, 7] Complaint is made of certain rulings by which the court sustained objections to questions asked witnesses for plaintiff on their cross-examination by counsel for defendant. In each instance, however, with one exception, the witness fully answered the question in other parts of his testimony. In the excepted instance Swayne was asked:

"Upon what theory were you ordering Leal & Sons Lumber Company to ship the lumber?"

In appellant's opening brief it is said:

"It is apparent that if the question had been permitted it would have soon developed that the lumber was shipped down for the sole purpose of preventing the attachment thereof by the existing creditors of the copartnership."

There is nothing in the record to show that the suggested development would have appeared. This suggestion was not made to the trial court, nor was any explanation given of the purpose of the question, but the subject was immediately dropped upon the sustaining of the objection. Under such circumstances, appellant cannot be heard in this court to complain of the ruling.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeals from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Separate actions by George W. Phillips, Tina Stocks, and Mary M. Crothers against the Pickwick Stages, Northern Division, Inc. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals; the appeals being consolidated. Affirmed in each case.

Sarau & Thompson, of Riverside, and Joe Crider, Jr., and B. P. Gibbs, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WARNE, Justice pro tem. The above-entitled actions were brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by each of the plaintiffs by reason of the alleged negligence of the defendant in the operation of one of its autostages, in the city of Ventura. Having grown out of the same accident and having involved the same facts relative to the accident, the actions were by stipulation tried together on the same evidence. The cases were tried before a jury. The plaintiffs recovered judgment in each case, and the defendant appeals. The appeals have been consolidated, and the grounds of appeal are the same in each case.

Briefly, the facts are as follows: On the morning of July 4, 1924, the American Legion were having a parade in the city of Ventura, which was proceeding along Main street in an easterly direction to California street, thence southerly down California street on the west side of the street. The intersection of the street was crowded with people, among whom were the plaintiffs, and the street was closed to traffic at this point by reason of the people extending out into the street. But east of this corner, and on the south side of the street up as far as Chestnut street, the street was open to traffic.

On the morning in question, appellant was operating one of its stages from Los Angeles to Santa Barbara, and a part of its route extended through the city of Ventura. Coming into Ventura, when the stage reached the corner of Main and Chestnut streets, which is 400 feet east from California street, the point of the accident, the driver turned down Main street, traveling at a rate of speed not exceeding 10 miles an hour towards the line of parade. It is a down grade from Chestnut to California street. Shortly thereafter the driver saw the crowd of people lined across California street at the corner, and, knowing he was going to be obliged to stop, he put the stage in low gear and rolled down the hill. Shortly thereafter he started to stop the stage by means of the use of the foot brake, and in so doing the foot pedal which operated that set of brakes suddenly broke, rendering it useless. The driver headed the stage for a lamp post on the south side of the street, but before reaching it a child stepped out into the street between the lamp post and the stage, and he turned the stage in order to avoid hitting the child and proceeded towards the crowd. The driver was not able to stop the car by use of the emergency brake and the three plaintiffs, who were standing out more or less in the street with their backs to the direction of the autostage intently watching the parade, were struck by the stage and injured. The driver did not sound his horn either before or after the foot brake pedal broke. Automobiles were standing in three rows and occupying the right half of Main street for most of the block immediately east of the point of accident. The left side was unobstructed.

The first point raised by appellant is that the verdict is contrary to law in this: "That the proof discloses no negligence on the part of the defendant." Appellant contends that the accident was caused solely by the sudden breaking of the foot pedal, due to a latent defect therein, not known to defendant and not discoverable upon a most careful inspection, and that there was no negligence upon the part of the defendant. Concededly, if the sole proximate cause of the accident was due to the breaking of the foot pedal due to a latent defect which could not have been discovered upon a careful examination and inspection, appellant would not be liable. Lawrence v. Green, 70 Cal. 417, 11 P. 750, 59 Am. Rep. 428; McCall v. Pacific Mail S. S. Co., 123 Cal. 42, 55 P. 706; Roberts v. Sierra Ry. Co., 14 Cal. App. 180, 111 P. 519, 527; McKeon v. Lissner, 193 Cal. 297, 223 P. 965.

The complaint alleges as follows:

"That said accident was caused alone by the negligence of the defendant (a) in the operation, management, and control of said autobus; and (b) in negligently operating said autobus with defective brakes thereon."

The answer denies negligence upon the part of the defendant, and as a separate and affirmative defense alleges that the accident was unavoidable by reason of the fact that the brake foot pedal suddenly broke while being used to stop said stage at the time and place of the accident, and that the breaking of said brake foot pedal was caused by a latent defect in said brake foot pedal, which was unknown to defendant under constant use and careful inspection.

[1, 2] Both questions thus mentioned were issues of fact, and, if there is substantial evidence to sustain either, the verdict will stand. Worley v. Spreckels Bros., 163 Cal. 60, 124 P. 697; Bergen v. Tulare, etc., Co., 173 Cal. 714, 161 P. 269. We think the question as to whether the autobus was equipped with brakes adequate to promptly check its speed and stop it, as required by section 94 of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1923 (St. 1923, p. 545), was a question for the jury to decide under all the facts and circumstances, as was also the question of negligent operation of the motorbus. The autostage in question, as is universally the custom to-day, was equipped with two sets of brakes; that is, the customary foot brakes operated by means of a foot pedal and a so-called emergency brake operated by means of a hand lever. Upon the breaking of the foot pedal, it was not possible to operate the foot brake, and according to the testimony of the driver of the autostage, the emergency brake was not adequate at the time to stop the car, due to it not being in "prime condition." It is apparent that, if the emergency brake had been in prime condition the autostage could have been brought to a stop and the accident avoided. However this may be, there is still the question as to whether the driver was negligent in failing to sound his horn at the time and also the manner in which he was operating the autostage. The jury believed that the defendant was negligent in some respect, and, there being substantial evidence to warrant the finding, it is not for us to say to the contrary.

[3-5] It is next contended that the court erred in instructing the jury upon the question of contributory negligence. The defendant as a separate defense set up in its answer contributory negligence upon the part of the plaintiffs. It is claimed the appellant abandoned this defense at the trial by not having offered any evidence to support this plea, and therefore the court should not have instructed the jury upon this question. While instructions in a particular case are to be determined, not alone by the pleadings therein, but also by the evidence in support of the issues between the parties, and, even though an issue is raised by the pleadings, it is not proper to give an instruction thereon, although it may be abstractly correct, where there is no basis for it in the evidence (14 R. C. L. 786), still it must appear that injury resulted therefrom in order to warrant a reversal (2 Cal. Jur. 1027; Estate of Clark, 180 Cal. 395, 181 P. 639; George v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 126 Cal. 361, 58 P. 819, 46 L. R. A. 829, 77 Am. St. Rep. 184). We do not see where injury resulted to the appellant by the giving of said instructions. It was clearly pointed out to the jury that these instructions were only applicable to the issue of contributory negligence, and we fail to see wherein the jury was misled. It appears to us that, if any one was prejudiced by the giving of these instructions, it was the plaintiff.

Lastly, it is contended the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions requested by appellant. It will suffice to say that we have examined the record in the case, together with all the instructions given, and are of the opinion that the jury were fully instructed in the premises, and therefore the court did not err in refusing to give the offered instructions.

The judgment is affirmed in each case.

MARSHALL v. WILLIAMS, City Auditor.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 21, 1927.

1. Statutes $\S$ 206—Different sections of an act should be so construed as to harmonize and give effect to each.

Different sections or provisions of an act should be so construed as to harmonize and give effect to each.

2. Statutes $\S$ 181(1)—In construing statutes, courts must give effect to intent of framers of instrument and seek for that intent in every legitimate way.

It is duty of courts, in construing statute, to give effect to intent of framers of instrument and seek for that intent in every legitimate way.

3. Statutes $\S$ 190—Where provisions of statute are clear, intention of lawmaking power thus indicated will prevail.

Statute itself furnishes best means of its exposition, and, if its provisions are clear, intent of lawmaking power thus indicated will prevail.

4. Statutes $\S$ 194—Where general intention is expressed in act and also particular intention incompatible therewith, particular intention must be considered as exception, and both must have effect in their respective spheres.

When general intention is expressed in an act and also a particular intention incompatible with general intention, particular intention is to be considered in nature of an exception, and both are to have effect in their respective spheres.

5. Municipal corporations $\S$ 182—Oakland charter held to show intention to exempt office of chief of police from civil service provisions.

Provisions of charter of city of Oakland, when construed together so as to produce harmonious whole, held to show intention of framers of charter to exempt office of chief of police from any and all civil service provisions thereof.

6. Municipal corporations $\S$ 182—Under Oakland charter, chief of police may be selected from police department.

Under provision of charter of city of Oakland providing that council may consolidate and place in charge of one chief official functions and duties of two or more such chief officials, which makes any chief official, irrespective of age or other civil service requirement, eligible to office of chief of police, a chief of police may be selected from out the police department, indicating that civil service restrictions should not control in the manner of his appointment.

7. Municipal corporations $\S$ 184(2)—Charter provisions prescribing qualifications for members of police department held controlled by express civil service provisions (Charter of City of Oakland, arts. 13, 14, $\S\S$ 87-89).

Charter of City of Oakland, art. 14, $\S\S$ 87-89, prescribing qualifications of members of police department, are limited and controlled by express civil service provisions contained in article 13 of the charter.

8. Municipal corporations $\S$ 139—Courts cannot ignore plainly expressed civil service provisions in charter and by unreasonable construction defeat expressed intention.

Where civil service provisions were plainly expressed in charter of city of Oakland, and intent of framers of charter was clear, courts have no power to ignore such express provisions and by forced or unreasonable construction defeat clearly expressed intention of lawmaking power.

9. Municipal corporations $\S$ 182—General provisions of Oakland charter relating to organization of police department held to apply to permanent members only and not to chief of police.

General provisions of charter of city of Oakland relating to organization of police department held to apply to permanent members of that department only and not to office of chief of police.

10. Mandamus $\S$ 101—Chief of police held entitled to writ of mandate against city auditor directing auditor to allow salary demand approved by council.

Chief of police of city of Oakland held entitled to writ of mandate directing city auditor to allow salary demand approved by city council, where petitioner was properly appointed and was eligible for said office and had qualified.

Petition by Donald L. Marshall for writ of mandate to be directed to Harry G. Williams as Auditor of the City of Oakland, to require him to approve salary demand of petitioner as Chief of Police. Writ granted.

Raymond Benjamin, of San Francisco, and M. C. Chapman, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Preston Higgins, City Atty., and John W. Collier, Deputy City Atty., both of Oakland, for respondent.

Snook, Snook & Chase, of Oakland, amici curiæ.

TYLER, P. J. Application for writ of mandate, prayed to be directed to the auditor of the city of Oakland to approve a salary demand. Upon the filing of the petition, an alternative writ issued from this court commanding respondent to allow said demand or show cause to the contrary. In response thereto, he has appeared and demurred to the petition. The facts and legal contentions in reference thereto are as follows: The city of Oakland is a municipal corporation existing under and by virtue of a freeholders' charter, duly enacted by the people of said city and approved by the Legislature of the state of California. Respondent Harry G. Williams is its duly elected, qualified, and acting city auditor. On the 11th day of July, 1927, at a regular meeting of the council of said city, petitioner, Donald L. Marshall, was appointed chief of police by the commissioner of public health and safety, which appointment was, on said day, duly and regularly confirmed by the unanimous vote of the council. At the time of his appointment and confirmation as chief of police, petitioner was a citizen of the United States, of the age of 37 years, and it is alleged that he possessed all the qualifications required by law and said charter to render him eligible for said office. Immediately after his appointment Marshall qualified as chief of police by subscribing to the prescribed oath and filing the same with the city clerk. On the 29th day of July, the council of the city considered and approved his demand for salary on the treasurer in the sum of $304.84, which demand was drawn on the proper fund in favor of petitioner; the amount thereof representing the sum he was entitled to from the date of his appointment to and including the 31st of July, 1927. The demand as approved was thereupon presented to respondent, as auditor, for his allowance as prescribed by the charter, but was rejected by him upon the ground that, in his opinion, petitioner was ineligible to the office to which he was appointed, for the reason that he had passed the age requirement provided for in the charter for members of the police department and had never passed a civil service examination, for which reasons his appointment was without authority. Accordingly, it is here claimed by respondent that the chief of police is a member of the Oakland police department, and in common with other members of such department must have passed a satisfactory civil service examination before his appointment, unless he was previously a member of the department, and that to become such a member he must have, at the time of his appointment, been not more than 35 years of age. It is admitted that petitioner was not a member of the department before his appointment, and that he was over 35 years of age at that time, and had never passed a civil service examination to become such a member. It is petitioner's claim that the civil service requirements for members of the police department do not apply to the office of chief of police, as such office is specially excluded from the operation of the charter provisions.

It is apparent that the solution of the question depends upon the proper construction to be given to the various charter provisions relating to the subject. Article 14, § 87, of that instrument provides, in substance, that the police department shall consist of a chief of police, captain of inspectors, who shall act as chief of police in the absence of the chief, and such captains, inspectors, sergeants, corporals, and bailiffs as in the judgment of the council the needs of the service may require. Section 88 provides that no person shall become a member of the department unless he shall be a citizen of the United States, a resident of the city of Oakland for a stated period, and be not less than 25 nor more than 35 years of age, and before his appointment pass a satisfactory examination under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the civil service board. Section 89 provides, among other things, that the chief of police, captains of inspectors, sergeants, corporals, bailiffs, patrolmen, and all other officers and members shall be appointed by the commissioner of public health and safety, subject to the civil service provisions of the charter, and the appointment of the chief of police shall be subject to confirmation by the council. The civil service requirements referred to in the foregoing provisions are found in article 13 of the charter. Section 80 of that article declares that its provisions shall apply to all appointed officers and employees of the city in and under any of the departments enumerated in section 72 of the charter, except the chief officials of the city enumerated in article 7, § 30, of that instrument. Section 30 defines the chief officials to be the city attorney, treasurer, who shall be ex-officio tax collector, city clerk, city engineer, chief of police, chief of fire department, street superintendent, health officer, and superintendent of electrical department. This section further provides that the council shall by ordinance prescribe the duties of all the chief officials, and may, by an affirmative vote of four members, consolidate and place in charge of one such chief official the functions and duties of two or more such chief officials. The council is also given the power under the section to remove from office any of the chief officials of the city. The qualifications of certain of the chief officials are also there prescribed, but there are none with reference to the chief of police, who, together with the chief of the fire department and health officer, are appointed by the commissioner of health and safety, subject to confirmation by the council, and they are assigned to that department. In addition to these chief officials, article 13, § 80, further exempt from the civil service provisions, "the building inspector, the city wharfinger, license inspector, bacteriologist, city chemist, sanitary inspector, the market and food inspector, the plumbing inspector, mayor's secretary, assistant city attorneys, the members of the board of library directors, board of play ground directors and board of park directors," and certain other persons not necessary to here enumerate.

[1-5] It will be noticed that, while the provisions of the charter relating to the organization of the police department declare it shall consist of a chief of police and certain other officers (article 14, § 87, supra), and that no person shall become a member of the department unless he shall have passed a civil service examination, and be not less than 25 nor more than 35 years of age (article 14, § 88), the civil service provisions expressly exempt the chief of police and certain other officers from the operation thereof (article 13, § 80, supra). It is this seeming conflict that we are asked to interpret. The different sections or provisions of an act should be so construed as to harmonize and give effect to each. The propriety and necessity of so construing them are imperative when the purpose is to harmonize one part of an act with another in accord with its general intent. It is the duty of courts, in construing statutes, to give effect to the intent of the framers of the instrument and seek for that intent in every legitimate way. The statute itself furnishes the best means of its own exposition; and, if its provisions are clear, the intention of the lawmaking power thus indicated will prevail. When a general intention is expressed in an act and also a particular intention incompatible with the general intention, the particular intention is to be considered in the nature of an exception, and both are to have effect in their respective spheres. A statute is passed as a whole and not in parts or sections, and is animated by one general purpose and intent. Consequently, each part of a section should be construed in connection with every other part or section and so as to produce a harmonious whole. So construed, we are of the opinion that it was the intention of the framers of the charter to exempt the office of chief of police from any and all of the civil service provisions thereof. Any other construction would result in the entire emasculation of the civil service provisions which expressly exempt the officers there enumerated from their operation. The provisions exempting these officers are clear and unambiguous, and mean just what they declare, or they mean nothing. That this is so, there can be no question.

[6-10] A civil service employee acquires his standing through the possession of certain qualifications, and the passing of an examination, and his removal is subject to a hearing which is provided for. Article 13, § 82. The chief of police, on the contrary, is expressly declared to be one of the chief officials of the city, as they called, and these officers, together with others, are by express civil service provisions exempt from any civil service requirements. In both appointment and removal, therefore, the chief of police is distinguished from other members of the department. Some of the officials must possess certain prescribed qualifications to hold their office, but none are expressly imposed by the charter under its civil service provisions for the office of chief of police. The only qualifications he is required to possess, therefore, are such which the general law imposes upon persons holding public office. He is appointed in a manner different from all other members of the police department. They are appointed under civil service provisions, and their tenure of office is of a permanent character. His appointment, on the contrary, is made by the commissioner of public health and safety, and his removal is not subject to civil service provisions; the city council having the power by the affirmative vote of three of its members to retire him from office with or without cause. Then again, by article 7, § 30, the council may, at any time, through four of its members, consolidate and place in charge of one chief official the functions and duties of two or more such chief officials. By virtue of this provision any chief official, irrespective of his age or other civil service requirement, is eligible to the office of chief of police. This provision indicates not only that the chief of police may be selected from out the police department, but also that it never was intended that the civil service restrictions should control in the manner and mode of his appointment. The matter is one that is left entirely to the sound discretion of the appointing power. When appointed, the chief of police is assigned to the department of public health and safety of which the police department is a part. In a broad sense he thus becomes a member of the police department, but he is not such a member as is contemplated in the general provisions relating to the organization of that department, which require all members to possess the qualifications that it is here claimed the chief of police should possess. Sections 87, 88, and 89 of article 14, which prescribe these qualifications, are limited and controlled by the express civil service provisions contained in article 13 of the charter hereinabove recited, which specially relate to the office in question, and which provisions, as we have pointed out, are incompatible with respondent's contention, as they expressly negative any such purpose. We do not consider further discussion to be necessary. To our minds the civil service provisions are plainly expressed, and the intent of the framers of the charter is clear, and there is little or no room for interpretation. Under these circumstances, courts have no power to ignore express provisions of an act and by any forced or unreasonable construction defeat the clearly expressed intention of the lawmaking power.

We conclude, therefore, that the general provisions of the charter relating to the organization of the police department apply to the permanent members of that department only, and do not, and were never intended to, apply to the office of chief of police, who acquires his office contrary to those provisions, and the tenure of which is in no manner controlled thereby, but may be terminated in a manner not countenanced by civil service requirements.

For the reasons given, petitioner is entitled to, and it is hereby ordered that, a writ of mandate issue directing respondent as auditor of the city of Oakland to allow said demand so approved by the council in favor of petitioner.

YOUNG v. VALLEJO ELECTRIC LIGHT & POWER CO. (Civ. 3276.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 29, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Nov. 28, 1927.

1. Trial ☞105(2)—Hearsay evidence, admitted without objection, held to show notice of position of electric light wires.

In action against electric light company for destruction of house by fire, hearsay evidence, on cross-examination of plaintiff's witnesses, that he stated, several months before fire, while roof was being shingled, that he had notified defendant to remove wires resting thereon, held sufficient to show that defendant had notice of position of wires at such time, though it would have been error to admit such evidence over objection.

2. Electricity ☞19(5)—Evidence held to show fire was caused by electric wires resting on roof of house.

In action against electric light company for destruction of house by fire, evidence held to show that fire was caused by current carried through wires resting on roof.

3. Electricity ☞19(6)—Nonsuit held properly denied, in view of uncontradicted evidence of negligence in transmitting electricity through wires resting on roof of house.

In action against electric light company for destruction of house by fire, defendant's motion for nonsuit was properly denied, where evidence showed without contradiction that defendant was grossly negligent in transmitting electricity through service wires for five or six months, with actual notice that such wires were resting on roof of house.

4. Electricity ☞19(12)—Negligence in building house with roof in contact with insulated electric light wires held for jury.

Whether one, suing electric light company for destruction of house by fire, was negligent in so building house as to place roof in contact with insulated wires crossing lot, under assumption that defendant would perform its duty to remove them within reasonable time before destruction of insulation by friction, held for jury.

5. Electricity ☞19(3)—Electric light company's right to maintain wires over another's lot, to exclusion of building thereon, cannot be presumed.

Though it may be presumed that electric light company was not a trespasser in maintaining service wires over another's vacant lot, it cannot be presumed, contrary to common experience, that it had right to maintain wires in their present position, to exclusion of any building erected on lot by owner.

6. Electricity ☞16(5)—Electric light company, notified of erection of building on lot, held bound to change location of wires, so as to avoid contact with roof.

On notice of erection of building on lot, across which electric light company maintained service wires, it became its duty to so change location of wires as to avoid contact with roof of building.

7. Appeal and error ☞1064(1)—Errors in instructions on contributory negligence held harmless, in view of uncontradicted testimony that act complained of would lessen danger.

In absence of evidence contradicting testimony of plaintiff's witness that placing of piece of rubber hose around electric light wires resting on roof of plaintiff's house would lessen danger from fire, any errors in instructions as to plaintiff's contributory negligence in so doing were harmless.

8. Electricity ☞19(3)—Burden was on electric light company, sued for destruction of house by fire, to prove contributory negligence.

In action against electric light company for destruction of house by fire, burden was on defendant to prove contributory negligence in enclosing service wires resting on plaintiff's house in piece of rubber hose.

9. Electricity ☞16(7)—Electric light company's transmission of current through wires resting on roof of house held sole proximate cause of fire.

Electric light company's continuous transmission of electricity through service wires, resting on roof of house, for five months or more before fire, with knowledge of situation, held sole proximate cause of fire, even if owner of house was negligence in so erecting it as to place roof in contact with wires and in not removing them.

10. Negligence ☞80—Instructions that contributory negligence is defense only against ordinary negligence held erroneous.

In action against electric light company for destruction of house by fire, due to destruction of insulation by friction between roof and service wires resting thereon, instructions that contributory negligence is defense only as against any ordinary negligence of defendant held erroneous.

11. Appeal and error ☞1064(1)—Erroneous instructions on contributory negligence held not prejudicial, in absence of proof of such negligence.

In action against electric light company for destruction of house by fire, due to destruction of insulation by friction between roof and service wires resting thereon, error in instructions that contributory negligence is defense only as against any ordinary negligence of defendant held not prejudicial, in absence of proof of contributory negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by Carrie S. Young against the Vallejo Electric Light & Power Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank E. Powers, of San Francisco, and Joseph M. Raines, of Fairfield, for appellant, Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, and Francis McInnis, of Fairfield, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The complaint alleges that William S. S. Young, being in possession under a contract of purchase of a certain vacant city lot, over and across which the defendant maintained two service wires for the purpose of furnishing light, heat, and power to the occupants of a house on another lot, erected a one-story frame building on his said lot, "and said house was so placed upon the said premises that when the same was erected the said electric wires rested upon its roof"; that during the course of construction of the building Young "called the attention of defendant's officers and agents to the said wires upon his premises and requested them to remove the same, but the said defendant and its officers, agents, and employees carelessly and negligently failed and neglected to remove said wires, and carelessly and negligently maintained the same * * * upon his roof until the fire which burned said house as hereinafter alleged, and the defendant and its officers, agents, and employees well knew at all of said times that its wires were stretched over the premises of said Young and upon the roof of his house, and that their maintenance in said position was dangerous to his property and willfully, wantonly, carelessly, and negligently maintained the same thereat; * * * that by reason of said willful, wanton, careless and negligent acts on the part of said defendant, and its officers, agents, and employees, and on or about the 20th day of July, 1920, the electric current conveyed by said wires caused the said house of said Young to ignite and take fire at or about the place where said wires rested upon its roof, and that the said house, together with its contents, was burned and entirely destroyed by said fire," to his damage in the amount of the value thereof; and that the plaintiff has succeeded to Young's claim against the defendant for such damages.

The answer denies all alleged acts of negligence and, as a separate defense, alleges:

"That, prior to the destruction of the aforesaid house by fire on or about July 20, 1920, said William S. S. Young negligently inclosed two of defendant's live electric wires in a piece of rubber hose about 3 feet in length, about $3\frac{1}{4}$ inches in circumference, about $\frac{3}{4}$ of an inch in diameter and about $\frac{1}{2}$ of an inch thick, and negligently caused said two electric wires so inclosed in said rubber hose to come in contact with and to rest upon the roof of said house at points on said house, and that, if the fire which destroyed said house as aforesaid was in any way the result of the contact of said two electric wires so inclosed in said rubber hose with the roof of said house, then and in that event the said negligence of said William S. S. Young as in this paragraph alleged directly and proximately caused or contributed to the destruction of said house by said fire."

The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed from the judgment entered thereon.

[1] It appears from the evidence without conflict that the service wires of the defendant, one a No. 10 wire and the other a No. 8, both being insulated and carrying 110 volts of electricity, rested upon the roof of the Young house, as alleged in the complaint, and that the fire started at or near the point of contact of the wires with the roof. On cross-examination of a witness for the plaintiff, the defendant proved that Young stated, five or six months before the fire, while the roof was being shingled, that he had notified the defendant to remove the wires. Similar proof was made by defendant on the cross-examination of the other witnesses. This hearsay evidence introduced by defendant, although it would have been error to admit it over objection, is sufficient to establish the fact that the defendant had notice of the position of the wires at the time stated. The plaintiff testified that, about six weeks before the fire, she heard Young notify William Aden, the defendant's superintendent of construction, that "he wanted the wires taken off of the house because he was afraid of fire." Aden was a witness for the defendant at the trial, but he did not deny the plaintiff's said testimony. Young died prior to the trial. Several weeks before the fire Young inclosed the wires, at their point of contact with the roof, in a piece of ordinary garden hose about four feet in length. He "slit the hose and then inclosed the two wires in it."

[2] C. R. Otterson, fire chief of the city of Napa for eighteen years, testified:

"The movement of those wires on the shingled roof, caused by the wind, if there was any, would wear the insulation out, and if it wore off the insulation and then the wires happened to swing together, it would create an arc. The pair of wires marked Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 5 (taken from the service wires in question) shows evidence of a short; they show that they have been making and breaking, making an arc, causing the wires to burn. * * * Pitting on one of these wires indicates a short. A short created and shown by that pitting might have caused the fire. * * * A piece of garden hose about one-quarter of an inch in thickness is a good insulator if it is solid. If a short was created within the interior of the four-foot piece of rubber hose around the wires, the hose would be burned if the arc created by that short was heavy enough. * * * The placing of a hose around the wires would lessen the danger from fire."

Another witness testified:

"Both of the wires touched the roof, up here near the peak along the south side of the back gable; they were resting on the roof, so that they patted on the roof; they rested on the roof for several months prior to the fire. When I first saw the fire * * * the south end of the house, up towards the roof, was afire. The fire was directly under the wires, and the top of the house above the screen was all afire up to the top of the gable. There was no fire below the screen when I saw it. * * * The fire was above the screen, at the top of the roof, when I first saw it."

Much testimony to the same effect was given by other witnesses. The house was completed immediately before the fire, and it had not yet been occupied. There were no live wires about the building, except the two service wires mentioned. The only reasonable inference from the evidence is that the fire was caused by the current carried through those wires. There is no evidence tending in the slightest degree to show that the fire had its origin in any other cause.

Appellant contends that the court erred in overruling its general demurrer to the complaint. It is unnecessary to discuss separately the objections here urged against the complaint, because such objections are disposed of by what is said in respect to other contentions of the appellant. It may be stated further that the case was tried upon the theory that proper issues were raised by the pleadings.

[3, 4] The court properly denied defendant's motion for a nonsuit. The evidence shows without contradiction that the defendant was grossly negligent in transmitting electricity through its service wires for five or six months, during all of which time it had actual notice that such wires were resting on the roof of Young's house. Whether or not Young was negligent in placing his roof in contact with the insulated wires, under the assumption that the defendant would perform its duty of removing them within a reasonable time, and before the destruction of the insulation thereof by friction with the roof, was a question of fact for the determination of the jury; but the uncontroverted facts show that the defendant was guilty of negligence as a matter of law.

[5, 6] It does not appear by what right the defendant maintained its service wires over the Young lot prior to the erection of the building, and it may be presumed that it was not a trespasser; but it cannot be presumed, contrary to common experience, that the defendant had the right to maintain the wires in their then position to the exclusion of any building which the owner of the lot might see fit to erect thereon. Upon notice of the erection of the building in question, it became the duty of the defendant to so change the location of its wires as not to interfere therewith.

[7, 8] The remainder of the alleged errors relied on by appellant relate to the giving and refusing of instructions. In both the opening and the reply briefs of appellant it is repeatedly said:

"Charles Otterson, a witness for plaintiff, testified that the placing of a piece of rubber hose around the wires would lessen danger from fire. No evidence to the contrary was given; hence there was no evidence upon which to base a finding by the jury that the inclosing of defendant's wires in a piece of garden hose contributed to any danger from fire."

The burden being on defendant to prove contributory negligence, the foregoing statement is correct. This eliminates from the case the only contributory negligence alleged in the answer, and renders harmless any errors in the instructions relating to such alleged negligence.

[9] Appellant contends, however, that the allegations of the complaint and the evidence introduced by the plaintiff show that Young was guilty of contributory negligence in placing the building in contact with the wires, and in not himself removing the wires, and that, since such negligence is so made to appear, the defendant may avail itself thereof as a defense without pleading it. If Young was negligent in so erecting the building, it does not appear that such negligence was the proximate cause of the fire. He had the right to erect the building upon his lot, and it was the defendant's duty to remove the wires, over which it had complete control. Young's negligence, if any, ceased when the roof was completed, five months or more before the fire. He certainly was not required, in the exercise of ordinary care, to remove the building in order to avoid the danger, or, as appellant contends, to cut the wires, thereby injuring the defendant's property. Can it be said that by reason of Young's original act of negligence, if such it was, he was forever barred from recovery of damages caused by the defendant's continuous subsequent wrongful conduct and negligence? The presence of the wires on the roof constituted a situation which became dangerous only when a current of electricity was passed through them. The situation was created by the combined acts of Young and the defendant; but the danger was created solely by the defendant's act of transmitting electricity through the wires. This it did continuously for a long period of time and with full knowledge of the situation. The only rational inference to be drawn from the evidence is that such negligence on the part of the defendant was the sole proximate cause of the fire.

[10, 11] Appellant sets out some 25 instructions, either given or refused, and contends that the action of the court in relation thereto constituted error. In several of them the court stated that contributory negligence is a defense only "as against any ordinary negligence of the defendant." This was error. Tucker v. United Railroads, 171 Cal. 702, 704, 154 P. 835. There being no proof, however, of contributory negligence, the error was not prejudicial.

The other instructions of which complaint is made are too numerous to be discussed in detail. It is deemed sufficient to say that they have been carefully examined, and that no prejudicial error has been discovered in any of them. None of such instructions have any bearing upon the issue as to whether the fire was caused by electricity carried through the wires, and therefore could not have influenced the implied finding of the jury that it was so caused. With that finding as a basis, it appears from the uncontradicted evidence, as a matter of law, that the fire was caused by the defendant's negligence, and that no negligence of the plaintiff contributed thereto. From an examination of the whole cause it appears, not only that the errors complained of have not resulted in a miscarriage of justice, but that any other verdict than that returned by the jury would have been a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

JONES et al. v. ALAMEDA. (Civ. 3310.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 26, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 26, 1927.

1. Marriage ⚭60(6)—Complaint to annul marriage on ground of minority held to state cause of action (Civ. Code, § 83, subd. 1).

In action by father and daughter to annul marriage of daughter on ground of minority, brought under Civ. Code, § 83, subd. 1, complaint alleging that plaintiffs were residents of county, that daughter was 15 years old, that father had been appointed her guardian ad litem, that daughter married defendant on specified day within state while she was residing with her parents, without their consent, and that daughter at time of marriage, and at present time, was under parents' custody, held to state a cause of action.

2. Parties ⚭54—Additional plaintiff may be brought in by amended complaint.

One may properly bring in an additional party plaintiff by means of an amended complaint.

3. Appeal and error ⚭170(3)—Where demurrer to complaint was sustained with general leave to amend, permitting plaintiff to bring in additional plaintiff by amended complaint without special permission, if error, was harmless (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Where court sustained demurrer to complaint to annul marriage with general leave to amend, denying motion to strike amended complaint which brought in additional plaintiff, made on ground that special permission was necessary to bring in an additional plaintiff, if error, was not reversible, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, forbidding reversal for error of pleading or procedure in absence of miscarriage of justice.

4. Action ⚭50(3)—Action to annul marriage because girl was under age of consent does not improperly join two causes of action because both girl and father are plaintiffs (Civ. Code, § 83, subd. 1).

Persons who may maintain action to annul a given marriage for minority, under Civ. Code, § 83, subd. 1, have but one cause of action, and hence an action to annul a marriage on the ground that the girl was under the age of consent and did not secure the consent of her parents to the marriage does not improperly join two causes of action because it is brought by both the girl and her father.

5. Marriage ⚭60(5)—In action to annul marriage because party thereto was under age of consent, both minor and his parent are proper plaintiffs (Civ. Code, § 83, subd. 1).

While an action to annul a marriage brought under Civ. Code, § 83, subd. 1, on the ground that one party thereto was under the age of consent, and did not have the consent of his parents to the marriage, may be prosecuted either by the minor or by his parent, both are proper parties plaintiff.

6. Appeal and error ⚭1039(4)—That complaint did not allege that one appointed plaintiff's guardian ad litem continued as such held not reversible error, where judgment rendered was proper (Civ. Code, § 83, subd. 1).

In action to annul marriage brought by girl by her guardian ad litem and another, under Civ. Code, § 83, subd. 1, on ground that girl was under age of consent, that complaint alleged merely that a designated person was appointed the girl's guardian for the purposes of the action, and did not allege that he continued to be guardian ad litem, held not ground for reversing the judgment, where evidence showed that no other judgment could be rendered.

7. Appeal and error ⚭909(1)—Appellate court might presume that guardian ad litem took oath of office, if oath was necessary, where record was silent.

Appellate court might presume, in support of judgment, that guardian ad litem of minor took oath of office, if oath of office was necessary, where record presented to court was silent as to whether he took oath, and contained only papers brought up by appellant.

8. Pleading ⚭125—Answer denying that named person was, by order "duly" made, appointed guardian ad litem, did not raise issue.

Where answer denied that, on specified day or at any other time, at specified place, or at any other place, named person was by order duly given and made appointed guardian ad litem of minor for purposes of action, it raised no issue as to fact of appointment, in view of use of word "duly."

9. Appeal and error ⚭1073(3)—That action was brought by minor and parent and judgment went for minor only was not reversible error, where complaint stated cause of action as to each.

Where action to annul minor's marriage was brought by both minor and her parent, fact that judgment was rendered in favor of minor only, was not ground for reversal, where the complaint set forth a cause of action good as to each plaintiff.

10. Appeal and error $\S$ 1036(3)—Making minor an additional plaintiff to marriage annulment action without order held not reversible error, in view of statute permitting intervention.

If minor was erroneously brought into action to annul her marriage as additional party plaintiff, without order authorizing it, this was not reversible error, in view of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 387, permitting her to intervene.

11. Action $\S$ 50(3)—Where complaint to annul minor's marriage was filed by her father alone, amended complaint making minor a party plaintiff did not state additional cause of action (Civ. Code, $\S$ 83, subd. 1).

Where original complaint to annul marriage of minor girl was filed by her father alone, under Civ. Code, $\S$ 83, subd. 1, amended complaint making the girl by her guardian ad litem a party plaintiff did not state a new cause of action arising after the filing of the original complaint; there being but one cause of action which either of the two plaintiffs could maintain, and petition for appointment of guardian being made by minor and complying in all respects with Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 373.

12. Constitutional law $\S$ 42—Constitutionality of statute permitting parent as well as minor child to sue to annul marriage of child could not be raised, where both were plaintiffs (Civ. Code, $\S$ 83, subd. 1).

Question whether Civ. Code, $\S$ 83, subd. 1, was constitutional in so far as it purported to authorize a parent as well as his minor child to sue to annul child's marriage, could not be raised by defendant, where both parent and child were parties plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Action to annul a marriage, brought by J. M. Jones against Joseph Alameda. Alice Jones Alameda, by J. M. Jones, her guardian ad litem, was made a party plaintiff by an amended complaint. From a judgment annulling the marriage, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Louttit, Stewart & Louttit, of Stockton, for appellant.

R. C. Pardoe, of Stockton, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Judgment annulling marriage of Alice Jones Alameda to Joseph Alameda was entered in this case, and from this judgment the defendant appeals.

The original complaint filed in this action was by J. M. Jones, the father of the minor, Alice Jones Alameda. A demurrer to this complaint was sustained with leave to amend. Thereafter an amended complaint was filed, joining Alice Jones Alameda, a minor, as party plaintiff; the minor appearing by her guardian ad litem. The defendant demurred to the final amended complaint filed by the plaintiffs, and also interposed a motion to strike out the amended complaint. The motion was directed also to particular paragraphs of the amended complaint. The defendant's motion was denied, his demurrer overruled, and thereupon the defendant answered plaintiffs' final amended complaint. Certain extraneous matters were set forth in the defendant's answer which need not be considered herein. The points made for reversal herein are that the minor could not be brought in as a party plaintiff by an amended complaint, that the amended complaint does not state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action, and that there was no proof introduced of the appointment of J. M. Jones as guardian ad litem of the minor.

[1] The amended complaint contains the following allegations, which we will epitomize: That the plaintiffs appeared by leave of the court first had and obtained and filed their amended complaint, and alleged, first, that the plaintiffs are residents of the county of San Joaquin, state of California; second, that Alice M. Jones Alameda is under the age of 18 years, to wit, of the age of fifteen years; third, that on the 29th day of July, 1925, at Stockton, the above-named J. M. Jones was, by order duly given and made by the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of San Joaquin, appointed the guardian ad litem of the above-named Alice Jones Alameda, for the purposes of this action; fourth, that on the 29th day of May, 1925, at the city of Columbia, county of Tuolumne, state of California, the said Alice Jones Alameda intermarried with the defendant, Joseph Alameda; fifth, that at the time of her said marriage the said Alice Jones Alameda was residing with her parents near Ripon, in the county of San Joaquin, state of California, that at the time of her marriage she was under the age of 16 years, to wit, of the age of 15 years, and that her said marriage was contracted and consummated without the consent and against the will of her parents; sixth, that the said J. M. Jones is the father of Alice Jones Alameda, plaintiff above named, and joins with her as a parent and as guardian ad litem in maintaining this action, and that until the time of her marriage as above stated, the said Alice Jones Alameda resided with, and has been under the care, custody, and charge of, her said parents, and still is under the care, custody, and charge of her said parents. The prayer of the complaint asks a decree of the court annulling said marriage on the ground of the minority of the said Alice Jones Alameda.

[2] The defendant's motion, as set forth in the transcript, asks the court to strike out all of the various six paragraphs, moving the court for the striking out of each one of them separately, or as separately specified. A reading of the amended complaint leads inevitably to the conclusion that the motion was properly denied. The complaint sets forth all the substantial facts necessary to show a cause of action. The motion is also made to strike out the complaint on the ground that it is improper to bring in an additional plaintiff by way of an amended complaint; also on the further ground that leave had not been obtained to file an amended complaint bringing in an additional party plaintiff. The demurrer goes to the sufficiency of the complaint in stating a cause of action, and objection is also made that two causes of action are improperly joined.

Whatever the rule may formerly have been under the old common-law practice and under the strict rules of pleading as laid down in some of the early cases, the contention of the appellant as to bringing in an additional party plaintiff by an amended complaint is squarely answered by the cases cited in support of the rule stated in section 34, 20 California Jurisprudence, p. 537. It is there said:

"New parties may also be brought in by amended and supplemental proceedings after order of the court therefor. Where the plaintiff obtains leave to amend generally, he may join a proper party defendant without any special permission so to do. And it is held the court may allow the complaint to be amended by adding the name of another party plaintiff after the close of plaintiff's evidence if the substantial rights of the parties are not affected"—citing a number of authorities.

[3] General permission was given to amend in this case, and, whether permission was or was not given, in so many words, to the plaintiff to bring into the action as a coplaintiff the minor, Alice Jones Alameda, by her guardian ad litem, we think is a technical error, if error at all, which is abundantly covered by section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution, where it is said:

"No judgment shall be set aside, * * * for any error as to any matter of pleading, or for any error as to any matter of procedure, unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

The testimony in this case shows beyond peradventure that Alice Jones Alameda was only 15 years of age at the time of the marriage referred to, and that it was entered into between said minor and said defendant without the consent and against the will of the parents of said minor.

[4, 5] Appellant's contention that two causes of action have been improperly joined is likewise without merit. Section 83 of the Civil Code sets forth in subdivision 1 the causes of action for which an annulment proceeding may be prosecuted, and also the person or parties who may prosecute such an action, and the time within which such action must be prosecuted. It is only one cause of action which may be prosecuted by any one of the persons mentioned in subdivision 1 of section

83 of the Civil Code. In other words, two parties have a right to maintain the same cause of action; not that two causes of action may be prosecuted by two different persons. The cause of action and the object to be attained is the annulment of the marriage; simply that and nothing more. While either the minor or the parent may prosecute the action, both are proper parties, and we think the reasonable construction of the subdivision of the section to which we are referring is that the minor and the parent are proper parties plaintiff in the prosecution of any such action, as the action has for its purpose the accomplishment of one end to which and in which both the minor and the parent are interested.

[6, 7] Appellant makes the further objection that the amended complaint does not show that the said J. M. Jones was the guardian ad litem of Alice Jones Alameda at the time of filing the amended complaint, in that paragraph III of said complaint simply states that on the 29th day of July, 1925, at Stockton, the above-named J. M. Jones was, by order duly given and made by the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of San Joaquin, appointed the guardian ad litem of the above-named Alice Jones Alameda for the purposes of this action. Such complaints usually do contain the words or allege that the plaintiff was appointed and now is the duly appointed and acting guardian ad litem. This objection reaches the extreme of technicality, and, as no possible prejudice could have been suffered by the defendant by reason of the lack of the words "now is," etc., in the complaint, we think a judgment, which the evidence shows is the only one that could be entered, ought not to be disturbed for such a trifling defect in the pleadings. It is likewise urged that there is no showing that J. M. Jones took the oath of office as a guardian ad litem. No authorities are called to our attention requiring the guardian ad litem to take an oath of office, but, as the record is absolutely silent as to whether J. M. Jones did or did not take an oath of office, and also as the record shows that only the papers requested by the appellant are brought up for our consideration, we can only say that, if the taking of an oath was necessary, it will be presumed to have taken place.

[8] It is also urged that the appointment of a guardian ad litem is an issuable fact, and must be alleged and proved. The authorities seem to so hold. There is no testimony introduced in this case concerning the appointment of the guardian ad litem, although the judgment roll contains the petition for, and the order of appointment, but we will consider the case from the standpoint that evidence of the application and appointment was not introduced at the trial. But this does not affect the validity of the judgment.

The answer filed by the defendant, in so far as it attempts to raise the question of the appointment of the guardian ad litem, is in the following words:

"Denies that on the 29th day of July, 1925, or at any other time, at Stockton, or at any other place, that J. M. Jones was, by order duly given and made by the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of San Joaquin, or by any other superior court of the state of California, or any other county, appointed the guardian ad litem of Alice Jones Alameda, for the purposes of the action herein."

By this denial the defendant did not raise any issue as to the appointment of the guardian ad litem, and therefore the allegations of the complaint as to the appointment must be taken as true and justify a finding by the court to that effect. By a careful reading of the defendant's answer, which we have above set forth, word for word, it will be seen that the defendant only denies that the order was "duly" given. This raises no issuable fact, and did not tender any question to the court as to the appointment. This has been squarely decided by the Supreme Court of this state, and one authority from this state only need be cited. In Miles v. McDermott, 31 Cal. 271, the court, in passing upon the use of the word "duly," as to raising an issuable fact, it is said:

"Probative facts have no place in a pleading, and will be stricken out on motion. Omit the word 'duly' from the allegation in question, and all cause for criticism is removed. Such words as 'duly,' 'wrongfully,' and 'unlawfully,' so frequently used in pleadings, might better be omitted. They tender no issue, and serve only to detract from that logical directness and simplicity of statement which ought always to be observed in a pleading. But while they do no good, and should not be used for the reason suggested, they do not vitiate the pleading, for they are but surplusage, and may be disregarded."

[9] Judgment in this action went for the minor only, and it has been definitely held in this state that, where there are two parties plaintiff and a cause of action in favor of each is set forth in the complaint, and the evidence admitted was relevant to both causes, reversible error is not shown by reason of the presence of a party plaintiff in whose favor no judgment is entered. Harker et al. v. Sou. Cal. Edison Co. (Cal. App.) 256 P. 848. Hearing of this case in the Supreme Court was denied. That a denial simply that anything was duly performed raises no issue. See, also, notes 33, 34, and 35, 19 C. J. p. 833, and cases there cited.

[10-12] It is further urged that there is no court order authorizing the coming in of the minor as a party plaintiff. While we have before touched upon this objection, it may be further stated that the minutes of the court are not presented to us, and we cannot determine whether there was or was not an order of the court to such effect, but, assuming that there was no such order, we do not think it lays the foundation for any valid objection on the part of the defendant. The minor appeared, and there is no reasonable difference, so far as the defendant is concerned, between the minor appearing as a party plaintiff, or in appearing as an intervener under the terms of section 387 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Again, objection is further raised that the amended complaint states a cause of action arising after the filing of the original complaint. This, of course, loses sight of the fact that there is but one cause of action, and that an action for the annulment of the marriage. The appointment of a guardian ad litem does not create another cause of action or give rise to another cause of action. It is simply a method of procedure provided for the minor to join in maintaining the one cause of action. The record shows that the petition for the appointment of the guardian ad litem was made by the minor, and was in all respects according to the provisions of section 373 of the Code of Civil Procedure. However, as we have said, in failing to deny the appointment of the guardian ad litem, and confining his denial simply to the question that the appointment was not duly made, the defendant is not in a position to raise any of these questions. Again, the appellant urges that section 83, Civil Code, in so far as it purports to authorize a parent to maintain such an action as this, is unconstitutional. We do not see how this question can be raised because if it be admitted that a parent has no such right, and that the cause of action exists only in the minor, the defendant has no cause of complaint because the minor is a party to this action, and no harm has come to him by joining the father with the minor. The fact to be determined by the court was: Did the defendant contract a marriage with the minor while she was under age, to wit, of the age of 15 years, without the consent and against the will of the parents? This abundantly appears from the testimony, and is practically undenied.

A number of cases have been cited by the appellant, but, as none of them, when properly interpreted and applied, affect the conclusion reached by the trial court, we do not deem it necessary to extend this opinion in an analysis or consideration of the cases presented.

This appeal is founded entirely upon technical objections which do not affect any matter of substance tendered to the trial court for determination, and, as we have shown, the errors alleged, if errors, are covered by section 4½ of the state Constitution, it follows that the judgment of the trial court must be, and the same is hereby, affirmed.

In re MELVIN'S ESTATE.

MELVIN et al. v. SIMINGTON.

(Civ. 5839.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California. Sept. 29, 1927.

1. Wills ⚡384—Comment by judge in will contest, intimating testator was of sound mind, held prejudicial error.

Statement by judge in will contest, to jury returning from deliberation, that he did not think a judge would grant testator a divorce if latter was of uncertain mind, held prejudicial error, especially where will was executed and divorce granted on same date.

2. Appeal and error ⚡217—Objection for first time on appeal to remarks of trial judge is permissible, where record fails to show whether counsel were present.

A party is not precluded from objecting for first time on appeal to remarks of trial judge to jury returning for further instructions, where record does not show whether counsel were present.

3. Appeal and error ⚡217—Failure to object to judge's remark to jury returning for further instructions does not preclude raising them on appeal.

Failure to object to remarks of judge to jury returning for further instructions does not preclude party raising them on appeal, since all objections are deemed to be taken to instructions given to jury.

4. Witnesses ⚡240(4)—Sustaining objections to questions on ground they were "leading," held error, in view of answers (Code Civ. Proc. § 2048).

Sustaining objections to questions on ground that they were leading held error, in view of answers; question being "leading" under Code Civ. Proc. § 2048, when it suggests to witness answer which examining party desires.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Leading.]

5. Appeal and error ⚡1046(5) — Comments and prejudicial rulings of court, indicating hostile attitude, held to require new trial.

Comments of court on evidence and its value, constant interference, and prejudicial rulings, indicating court's hostile attitude, held to have resulted in miscarriage of justice, requiring new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Petition by Martha E. Melvin and others for revocation of the probate of the will of M. E. Melvin, deceased, opposed by Mabel Melvin Simington, executrix of the last will and testament of M. E. Melvin, deceased. Judgment for proponent, and contestants appeal. Reversed.

Robert F. Shippee and Henry I. Broulett, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Lucian J. Clarke and Clarke & Wilson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal taken from a judgment in favor of respondent on a petition for a revocation of probate of the will of M. E. Melvin, deceased. The contest was on three grounds: first, that the decedent was of unsound mind at the time of the execution of the will; second, that the purported will was not executed in the manner required by law, in that the purported will was not, in the form in which it now appears, signed by the decedent in the presence of the witnesses, nor signed by the witnesses in the presence of the deceased; third, that the execution of the purported will was procured by undue influence exercised upon the decedent by his daughter named executrix of the will, Mabel Melvin Simington, and a sister of the deceased, May Melvin. After the contestants had rested, the court granted respondent's motion for a nonsuit as to the second and third causes of action or grounds of contest, and denied the motion as to the first cause of action. Upon submission of the case, a verdict was returned that the deceased was of sound mind at the time of the execution of the will.

Appellants concede that the trial court properly granted a nonsuit as to the second ground of contest, but urge that the court erred in granting respondent's motion for a nonsuit on the third ground of contest, namely, that the will was executed under undue influence. Believing the case must be reversed upon other grounds, discussion of this point will be omitted.

[1] The will of the deceased was executed July 13, 1922. During the trial, for the purpose of showing that the surviving wife had no interest in the estate, respondent introduced in evidence certified copies of a decree of divorce granted by the district court of Marshall county, Iowa, on July 13, 1922, the same day the will was executed, wherein the plaintiff, M. E. Melvin, deceased, was divorced from Martha E. Melvin. The respondent also introduced a certified copy of the ruling of the Supreme Court of Iowa affirming the judgment of the lower court. The case was submitted to the jury upon the sole issue as to whether the testator was of sound mind at the date of execution of the will, July 13, 1922. After the jury had deliberated for an hour and three-quarters, the jury returned into court, and the following proceedings occurred (italics ours):

"The Court: I understand you have not agreed yet?

"The Foreman: No, your honor. This lady wishes to ask a question.

"The Court: What is the question?

"A Juror: Shall I ask it here or from the desk?"

"The Court: Yes; ask it there."

"The Juror: I wanted to ask if the fact that he was granted a divorce—does that prove that he was of sound mind?"

"The Court: That is for the jury to determine, whether it does or not. You have to consider that fact."

"The Juror: They argue that that proved he was sound."

"The Court: The fact that it appears from the testimony that he was there during all that trial, and also there was testimony as to whether the question of his soundness or unsoundness was raised at that time—it is for the jury to determine the effect that trial would have; how much proof that is. It is for the jury to determine from the facts, whether he was of sound or unsound mind, and the fact that he went through that trial is one of the facts. Any other questions?"

"Another Juror: I would like to ask a question. Would a judge in Iowa grant a decree of divorce to any one that was not in proper mental condition?"

"The Court: I cannot answer you that."

"The Juror: Did they have a jury trial?"

"The Court: I don't know whether they did or not. I would not answer that, if I did know. I will answer this, that a judge—I don't think that a judge would grant a divorce if he was satisfied he was of unsound mind. Any further I won't go. Is that all?"

"The Foreman: Yes."

It thus appears clearly that the jury was attempting to secure an opinion from the trial judge as to whether in his opinion the testator was of sound mind. They finally succeeded in getting an expression of an opinion as to what the Iowa court would do if satisfied the testator was of unsound mind.

The jury then retired and returned a verdict that deceased was of sound mind at the time of the execution of the will; the court having expressed his opinion on a question of fact that he did not think a judge would grant a divorce if he was satisfied that the plaintiff (testator) was of unsound mind. In our opinion, under the circumstances in this case, this was prejudicial error; the issue in the case being whether the testator was of sound mind at the date of the execution of the will, which date was identical with the date when the divorce was granted to the deceased.

[2, 3] The record does not show whether counsel for appellants were present when the foregoing remarks were made by the trial court. The respondent contends that a party cannot object for the first time on appeal to remarks of the trial judge which were allowed to pass at the time without objection. If counsel were not present, they had no opportunity to object. Moreover, these remarks were not made during the trial, but were made when the jury returned for further instruction, and all objections are deemed to be taken to instructions given to the jury. The testimony was in direct conflict; several witnesses testifying that in their opinion the testator was of unsound mind, others that he was of sound mind, at the date of the execution of the will.

Certain remarks made by the court during the trial were prejudicial to the rights of contestants. Many of these are quoted in appellants' brief, but lack of space forbids their repetition here. For illustration, we quote from the record:

"Q. You say you did not say that the only thing you noticed was that he was excitable, that was all? A. No; I didn't say that."

"The Court: He did say just that."

"Mr. Anderson: Well, I say that is his answer."

Commenting on the evidence, the court says:

"The Court: Well, I think I will say, Mr. Anderson, right here, that for a real estate agent to go to anybody and try to get him to sell a house is not an indication of unsound mind."

"Mr. Anderson: I am inclined to agree with you, but I think that is a matter of argument."

"The Court: I don't care whether it is or not. It is a fact."

"Mr. Anderson: I will reserve an objection to the comment of the court on that."

Further comment by the court on the value of evidence appears:

"The Court: In all these cases, and in this case, Mr. Anderson, the testimony is offered of what was said, for the purpose of showing his unsoundness of mind, and then it is used for some other purpose; and I don't believe that testimony shows he was of unsound mind."

The court's rulings in sustaining objections to questions on the grounds that they were leading, when in fact they were not, frequently led to the exclusion of material and competent evidence. Among others to which reference is made by appellants, we quote:

"Q. How was he as to being able to carry on a connected conversation, whether he would talk about one thing connectedly straight through or whether he would branch off on other subjects?"

"That is objected to as leading."

"The Court: Objection sustained."

"Mr. Anderson: Very well. (The answer omitted is as follows: 'A. He always branched off on subjects about his family and his self.')

"Q. What is the fact as to whether she became apparently more devoted to him than she had prior to that time?"

"That is objected to as leading, your honor."

"The Court: Objection sustained."

"Mr. Anderson: Very well. (The portion stricken out of the deposition is as follows: 'A. She said she left her housework and went to the courtroom because she expected him to die in the courtroom.')

"Q. What is the fact as to whether or not that seemed to be the chief topic on his mind when you would visit him?"

"That is objected to as leading, your honor."

"The Court: Objection sustained."

"Q. In these several conversations, what is the fact as to whether or not he would repeat about the same line of conversation each time?

"Mr. Clarke: That is objected to as leading.

"The Court: Objection sustained."

"Mr. Anderson: The next question is: 'Q. What is the fact as to whether you noticed that same line of conduct on his part in later years?'"

"Mr. Clarke: That is objected to as leading.

"The Court: Objection sustained."

[4] A question is leading when it suggests to the witness the answer which the examining party desires. Code Civ. Proc. § 2048. Tested by this rule, we believe the court erred in sustaining objections to the questions propounded on the ground that they were leading.

[5] Frequent rulings were made by the court against the admissibility of evidence without any objection being made by respondent, as shown by appellant's brief. By constant interference and prejudicial rulings the hostile attitude of the court toward appellants must have been clear to the jury. In our opinion the conduct of the trial court was such that the appellants did not have a fair trial.

After examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, we are not prepared to say that the jury would have reached the same conclusion had these errors not been committed by the trial court, and we are of the opinion that the errors complained of resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

It is ordered that the judgment be reversed.

PEOPLE v. LEDBETTER. (Cr. 1387.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 21, 1927.

1. Criminal law § 369(5)—That evidence was also sufficient to prove other crime is of no consequence when supporting conviction for embezzlement (Pen. Code, § 508).

Where evidence in prosecution under Pen. Code, § 508, for embezzlement as an agent, was sufficient to support conviction, it is of no consequence that evidence on some other theory was sufficient to prove some other crime.

2. Embezzlement § 35—That evidence showed defendant received and appropriated smaller sum than that charged held immaterial (Pen. Code, §§ 508, 1131).

That evidence in prosecution under Pen. Code, § 508, for embezzlement as an agent, showed that defendant actually received and appropriated to his own use the sum of $700, rather than the full sum of $1,050, as charged in information, held immaterial, under Pen. Code, § 1131.

3. Embezzlement § 47—Evidence of defendant's agreement to sell automobile for prosecuting witness and invest proceeds held for jury (Pen. Code, § 508).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 508, for embezzlement as an agent of money received from sale of an automobile, evidence relative to defendant's agreement to sell automobile for prosecuting witness and invest proceeds held for jury.

4. Criminal law § 1129(3)—Appellate court need not consider alleged error in instructions on mere statement that some error occurred.

Where it is alleged on appeal that court misdirected jury in matters of law, with nothing further as to such errors, except mere statement that some errors occurred, appellate court need not consider such points.

5. Criminal law § 682—Testimony of defendant's false representations, while attempting to satisfy complaining witness that he had invested funds, held admissible, notwithstanding it anticipated defense.

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 508, on embezzlement as an agent, testimony of false representations by defendant, while he was attempting to satisfy complaining witness, that he was investing funds in accordance with agreement, held admissible to meet defendant's claim that money was received as a loan, notwithstanding testimony was received in presentation of main case, thus anticipating defense.

6. Criminal law § 371(2)—Evidence of other acts of embezzlement of like character held admissible to show intent (Pen. Code, § 508).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 508, for embezzlement as an agent, evidence of other acts of embezzlement of a like character was admissible for purpose of showing intent of defendant in particular transaction.

7. Criminal law § 1130(2)—Appellate court need not consider points raised by statement that prejudicial statements were made in trial followed only by citations to reporter's transcript.

Appellate court need not consider point raised by statement in brief that inadmissible and prejudicial statements were made during course of trial followed by citations to numerous pages in reporter's transcript, but without attempt to show error or prejudice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

D. S. Ledbetter was convicted of embezzlement as an agent, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Myron Harris, of Oakland, and Leo Sullivan, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and E. F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. The defendant was tried upon an information charging a violation of section 508 of the Penal Code, covering the crime of embezzlement as an agent. From the judgment following the verdict of guilty and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial he has appealed upon a typewritten record.

The defendant and the complaining witness were on very intimate terms during the early part of the year 1926 and were engaged to be married. While enjoying the confidence and trust of the complaining witness, the defendant persuaded her to transfer to his possession an automobile, which he agreed to sell for the sum of $1,050 and agreed to invest the proceeds of that sale in stock of the National Ice Cream Company. Having obtained possession of the car and the written evidence of ownership for this purpose, the defendant sold the car for $300 in money and a Ford coupé valued in the trade at $450, which he later sold for the sum of $350. All this money the defendant admittedly appropriated to his own use, while he continued to assure the complaining witness that he had received the full sum of $1,050 with which he would purchase the stock of the ice cream company as soon as he could reach the manager of that concern. A short time thereafter the defendant obtained from the complaining witness the further sum of $450 upon his representation to her that he would invest that amount in an automobile finance company. It developed at the trial that this company had not been incorporated, but in fact had been refused incorporation by the state commissioner of corporations, and the defendant appropriated this sum to his own use. About the time the automobile was transferred the defendant executed and delivered to the complaining witness his promissory note in the sum of $1,050 bearing interest at 12 per cent. per annum. It was the theory of the state that this note was in the nature of a receipt given to the complaining witness to allay her fears caused by defendant's failure to deliver to her the stock in the ice cream company. The defendant, however, claimed that the note was given as evidence of a loan from the complaining witness of the money received from the sale of the automobile and that the difference of $350 between the face of the note and proceeds of the sale was a bonus which the defendant voluntarily gave to the complaining witness for the use of this sum of $700.

[1, 2] On this appeal it is argued that the verdict of the jury is contrary to law, in that the evidence discloses that the defendant was guilty of the crime of embezzling the automobile and that he could not therefore be guilty of the crime of embezzling the proceeds of the sale of the automobile as charged in the information. In support of the argument it is said that the evidence failed to show that the appellant ever received the sum of $1,050 from the complaining witness, as charged in the information, but that it is conceded that he received no more than $700 from the sale of the automobile, and that, if he is guilty of any crime in relation to the disposition of the proceeds of the sale, it must be that of larceny or that of obtaining money by trick and device. It would serve no purpose to enter into a discussion of the fine distinctions drawn between the crimes of embezzlement, larceny, and obtaining money by trick and device. As is usual in cases of this character the appellant concedes on the appeal that he has been guilty of one of these crimes, but insists that it must be one other than that charged in the information. Section 508 of the Penal Code provides that every agent who fraudulently appropriates to his own use property of another which has come into his control or care by virtue of his employment as such agent is guilty of embezzlement. This is the charge upon which the appellant was tried and the evidence amply supports the verdict. It is of no consequence that under some other theory the evidence was also sufficient to prove some other crime. That the evidence showed that the appellant actually received and appropriated to his own use the sum of $700 rather than the full sum of $1,050 as charged in the information is likewise immaterial. Section 1131, Pen. Code; People v. Gray, 66 Cal. 271, 277, 5 P. 240.

[3] It is argued that the verdict of the jury is contrary to the evidence because the appellant testified that the transaction with the complaining witness was that of a loan only, as evidenced by the promissory note, and denied that he had agreed to invest the proceeds of the sale in stock of the ice cream company, and also because it appears that the complaining witness, though on very friendly terms with some of her friends who were called as witnesses, had not disclosed to them the agreement with the appellant to make such investment. The answer is that the complaining witness testified in plain terms that such an arrangement had been made with the appellant and it was for the jury to determine the truth of the transaction.

[4-6] It is argued that the court misdirected the jury in matters of law and erred in the decision of questions of law during the course of the trial. Nothing further is said as to errors in the instructions than the mere statement that some errors occurred. We are not required to consider points presented in this manner. People v. McLean, 135 Cal. 306, 309, 67 P. 770. In reference to the admission of testimony of the false representations made by the appellant while he was attempting to satisfy the complaining witness that he was investing her funds in accordance with his agreement, this evidence was admissible for the purpose of meeting the claim of the appellant that the money was received by him as a loan and that he had not agreed to invest it as claimed by the complaining witness. It is true that the testimony was received in the presentation of the main case by the state and thus anticipated this defense, but during the course of the opening statement by the district attorney appellant's counsel set forth the defense upon which he would rely, and we therefore can see no prejudice in having this evidence come in out of order. The evidence of other acts of embezzlement of a like character was admissible for the purpose of showing the intent of the defendant in this transaction.

[7] The statement is made in appellant's brief:

"That many inadmissible and prejudicial statements were made during the course of the trial which prejudiced the minds of the jurors against the defendant and prevented him from having a fair and impartial trial."

This is followed by citations to numerous pages in the reporter's transcript, but without any attempt to show error or prejudice. We are not required to consider a point raised in this manner. People v. McLean, supra.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SELIGMAN v. SELIGMAN. (Civ. 3284.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 28, 1927.

1. Husband and wife ⚭257—Profits of real estate owned by husband before marriage were his separate property, save as to portion attributable to his earnings after marriage (Civ. Code, § 163).

Rents, issues, and profits derived from real estate owned by husband before his marriage were his separate property, save as to portion thereof which was attributable to his earnings after marriage by reason of management, labor, or control, under Civ. Code, § 163.

2. Husband and wife ⚭258—Improvements made with community funds on lands constituting separate property of one spouse become his separate property.

Ordinarily improvements made with community funds on lands constituting the separate property of one of the spouses follow the character of the land and become his separate property.

3. Husband and wife ⚭262(1)—There is no presumption that money used in improving real estate was community property or separate property.

Court cannot presume that money used in improving real estate of one spouse was his separate property, nor can it presume that it was community property.

4. Husband and wife ⚭264—Finding that money used in improving husband's separate lands was his separate money rather than community money, and that improvements were his separate property, held sustained by evidence.

In action to quiet title to land owned by husband prior to his marriage, evidence held to show that improvements thereon were made with husband's separate money rather than with community money, that the improvements thereon were his separate property rather than community property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action to quiet title, brought by Louis Seligman against Sadie Margaret Seligman. From a judgment quieting title in plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Vincent W. Hallinan, of San Francisco, and Russell & Heid, of Tulare, for appellant. Leroy G. Smith, of Dinuba, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff had judgment in an action to quiet title to certain tracts of land lying and being in the county of Tulare; also to certain city lots in the town of Kingsburg, in the county of Fresno, and to an undivided one-half interest in a certain 10-acre tract in Springfield Colony, in the county of Fresno. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The lands involved are described as the west half of the southwest quarter of section 8, in township 17 south of range 23 east, M. D. B. & M.; the northwest quarter of section 32, in township 17 south, range 26 east, M. D. B. & M.; an undivided one-half interest in lot 4 in block 35 of the city of Visalia; also lots 9, 10, 23, 24, and 25 in block C of the city of Kingsburg, Fresno county; and an undivided interest in the 10-acre tract above mentioned.

All this property was owned by the plaintiff to the extent of his ownership therein at the time of his marriage with the defendant, and had been owned by the plaintiff for a number of years previous to said marriage. Plaintiff also owned an interest in a general merchandise business conducted in the town of Dinuba, in the county of Tulare. The testimony is to the effect that the plaintiff had invested in said merchandise business, at the time of said marriage, the sum of at least $26,000. The marriage of the plaintiff and the defendant took place during the year 1910. Since the marriage of the plaintiff and the defendant, the plaintiff has expended considerable sums of money in the improvement of certain portions of the property herein referred to. The testimony is to the effect that the plaintiff expended, during the three years preceding the commencement of this action, the sum of approximately $43,000 on the 160-acre tract herein referred to, and that he had expended the sum of $1,200 on the city lots mentioned for his portion of the costs of macadamizing streets on which said lots abutted. The testimony also shows that, since the marriage of the plaintiff and the defendant, the plaintiff has expended the sum of $4,000 at least in erecting a building on one of the lots situate in the town of Visalia. The money for this improvement, however, was borrowed from a building and loan association, and was repaid to said association out of the rents, issues, and profits derived from the building erected as aforesaid.

Upon this appeal the appellant contends that the money used by the plaintiff in improving his real property, subsequent to his marriage with the defendant, was community property, and that the money was acquired by reason of the personal character, energy, labor, and industry of the plaintiff in carrying on his business; that the money consisted of such earnings and profits acquired by the plaintiff from his business; that the plaintiff applied these profits and earnings, and expended them as improvements on the lands referred to; that the improvements placed on said real property greatly enhanced its value, and were and are permanent and substantial in their nature; that, by reason of these acts, the improvements became and are community property; and that the defendant acquired, and now owns, a community interest therein. On the part of the respondent, it is contended that the improvements were placed on the real property with money that was the separate property of the respondent, and that the appellant has no interest therein. The finding of the trial court is to the effect that all of the property mentioned in plaintiff's complaint was and is the separate property of the plaintiff. The real question to be determined is whether the finding of the court is supported by the testimony. In this particular the plaintiff, upon cross-examination, testified that since his marriage he had made improvements on 40 acres of the 160-acre tract referred to, and had expended thereon the sum of about $18,000 in leveling the land, planting the same to vineyard, preparing it for irrigation, and installing an irrigation system; that he had paid $1,200 expenses for macadamizing the streets on which the lots in the town of Kingsburg abutted. The plaintiff further testified that during the three years preceding the trial of this action he had expended between $15,000 and $16,000 "for my purposes," which we interpret as living expenses or household expenses, $43,000 in improvements on the 160-acre tract herein referred to, and about $10,000 in payment of expenses incurred while the plaintiff was ill. During this period of time the testimony also shows that the plaintiff withdrew from the capital investment in the merchandise business to which we have referred the sum of $26,000. The testimony further shows that there was associated with the plaintiff in the management and carrying on of the merchandise business in the town of Dinuba, a brother by the name of Emil, and we think the trial court was justified in coming to the conclusion, from the testimony set out in the transcript, that the brother Emil was in fact the manager of the merchandise business referred to, and that the plaintiff only exercised a secondary function in the conduct and management thereof. The record further shows that no salary was ever allotted to, drawn by, or paid from the merchandise business to either the plaintiff or his brother Emil, but that at the end of the year the profits, if any, were divided. The transcript further shows that all the receipts arising from the expenditures incurred upon the real estate by the plaintiff, to which we have referred, were carried into the same general account kept by the bookkeeper of the general merchandising store in which the plaintiff was interested. The record is silent as to whether the profits arising from the real estate belonging to the plaintiff during the period of time that has elapsed since his marriage with the defendant, were greater or less than the expenditures made thereon. So far as the record is concerned, it is absolutely silent upon the question of receipts from the agricultural lands owned by the plaintiff. The record does show something in relation to the receipts arising from the improvements made upon one of the city lots in Visalia. This improvement consisted of a moving picture theater building, and, as we have stated, the mortgage thereon was paid out of the rents, issues, and profits of the building. The record is also silent as to the reasonable earning capacity of the plaintiff in connection with the management of the merchandising business referred to, and also silent as to the reasonable value of his services. The appellant apparently bases her argument upon the theory that whatever was received by the plaintiff from his properties constituted community property. The argument of appellant is as follows:

"By reason of the foregoing premises we arrive at the following conclusions: That the profits of the business constituted community property, and that respondent improved certain parcels of his real property subsequent to his marriage with these earnings. We shall now proceed to show on what parcels of real property the community funds thus derived were expended," etc.

[1] This, of course, is not a correct statement of the law. The profits of the real estate and of the merchandise business being derived from real estate owned by the plaintiff before his marriage would be separate property, save and except as to that portion thereof which might be attributed to the earning capacity or the ascertained earnings of the plaintiff by reason of his management, labor thereon, or control, thereof. Not the profits of the business, but only the earnings of the plaintiff from his individual efforts, or what might be called his salary or wages, would be community property. The testimony of the plaintiff is further to the effect that his living expenses ran in the neighborhood of $5,000 per annum. The argument is made by appellant that this sum is excessive, but, so far as we have been able to discover, there is no testimony in the record to the contrary. According to the testimony of Milton Seligman, the bookkeeper for the two brothers, who kept all the accounts of the merchandise business conducted by the plaintiff and his brother Emil, and also of the receipts and expenditures of the plaintiff, the profits of the merchandising business ranged all the way from $112 per year for each partner up to $5,000 a year for each partner, that the plaintiff, at the time of his marriage, had invested in the merchandising business the sum of $26,000, and that during the last few years the plaintiff had withdrawn from his capital investment in the merchandising business practically all of his interest therein, and that at the time of the trial the plaintiff's capital investment had been reduced to the sum of about $400. The bookkeeper testified that the sum withdrawn by the plaintiff was about $26,000, and that this sum had been spent in the plaintiff's household expenses, his sickness, and in improving a certain 160 acres, being one of the tracts of land to which we have referred, that there was a sharp decline in the capital investment owned by the plaintiff in the merchandising business during the period of time he was improving the parcel of real estate to which we have referred. The testimony further shows that up to the time the plaintiff took sick he was accustomed to going down to the store and spending several hours there each day going over the books and otherwise taking an interest in the business, that the plaintiff, at the time of the trial, was between 73 and 74 years of age.

We find in appellant's brief an itemized statement or calculation which would indicate a community interest in the property to which we have referred, in the sum of $120,000. This apparently includes all the improvements and all the enhancements in value of the properties referred to, but the estimate of the value of the lands is clearly beyond and largely in excess of the real value thereof even after making the improvements thereon. The contention of the appellant as to values is apparently based upon the testimony of the defendant that the plaintiff stated he would not take less than a certain sum for the property. Instead of any of the land being worth $1,000 per acre, even though improved, as argued by appellant, we think the reasonable value thereof is much more nearly approximated by the testimony of the witness Cross, a real estate dealer called on the part of the defendant. His testimony was to the effect that one of the tracts of land called the "Travers Place," including 80 acres, was worth about the sum of $33.50 an acre; that 160-acre tract, 20 acres being in figs, was valued at about $150 an acre; that 40 acres of the 160-acre tract, being planted in Malaga grapes, was worth about $450 per acre, and that the remainder of the tract, being fairly level, was of the value of about $150 per acre; that the improved portion or the portion in grapes, as bare land, was worth about $80 per acre; that the 10 acres of land in which the defendant owned a half interest, was worth as a whole tract $5,500. This witness also testified that the 40 acres of the improved portion of the 160-acre tract referred to was probably worth $300 an acre more than bare land. This witness further testified that he had bought similar land, being land adjoining the quarter section belonging to Seligman, for $95 an acre and sold the same for between $110 and $120 an acre.

[2] Irrespective of the value of the agricultural land, however, either before or after the improvement thereof, the record shows that at least $26,000 of the capital investment in the commercial business in the city of Dinuba was withdrawn by the plaintiff and invested in improvements referred to. Under such circumstances, no part thereof can be considered as community property. The record is silent as to whether there was any income from the 245 acres of agricultural land owned by the plaintiff during the period of time elapsing between the marriage of the plaintiff and defendant and the institution of this action. It is likewise silent as to the source from which was obtained the difference between the $43,000 testified to by the plaintiff as expended in improvements on the agricultural lands owned by him and the $26,000 that came out of the capital investment in the store. Thus there is no basis whatever for an inference that any portion of the money expended in the improvement of the lands and premises owned by the plaintiff prior to his marriage was paid for by community property. It is simply a matter of surmise or guess, and, if any inference could be drawn in relation thereto, it was just as reasonable for the trial court to infer that it was paid out of that portion of the profits arising from plaintiff's property, whether agricultural or the mercantile business conducted by him in the city of Dinuba attributable to that portion which would be the plaintiff's separate property as the income properly allowable thereon, as to the portion attributable to his individual exertion. Under section 163 of the Civil Code, all the rents, issues, and profits of the property in question would ordinarily be the separate property of the plaintiff. Likewise, ordinarily improvements made out of community funds on lands constituting the separate property of one of the spouses follows the character of the land and becomes separate property. 5 Cal. Jur. 298. This rule, of course, has its limitations. It cannot be applied where there is an agreement between the spouses to the contrary, nor where creditors establish that the money was put into such improvements for the purpose of defrauding them, nor where the improvements are made by the husband for the purpose of depriving the wife of her interest in the community property. So far as the record shows, none of the limitations are applicable to this case. The profits, if any, all came from separate property, and no question of fraudulent intent or purpose is presented to us for determination.

[3] Again, the increase in the value of the real estate does not necessarily show that any community property has been added thereto or that any portion of the increase in the value of the real estate should be considered and divided between the spouses as community property. So far as the record is concerned, the inquiry at the trial was directed solely to the amount of money that was expended in the way of improvements, and nothing further is presented to guide the trial court in determining how the ownership therein should be allocated further than that in some way it came out of the profits to some extent from the business, and to a considerable extent out of the capital investment. Under such circumstances we do not very well see how the case of Pereira v Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 103 P. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107, and others following the same principle, can be considered as applicable. In the Pereira Case the court said, referring to the property in question:

"This capital was undoubtedly his separate estate. The fund remained in the business after marriage and was used by him in carrying it on. The separate property should have been credited with some amount as profit on this capital. It was not a losing business but a very profitable one. It is true that it was very clearly shown that the principal part of the large income was due to the personal character, energy, ability, and capacity of the husband. This share of the earnings was, of course, community property."

Nothing of this kind appears in this case. It is not shown that the principal part of the income was due to the personal character, energy, ability, or capacity of the husband, but it does appear that the principal sum of money invested in the way of improvements upon the agricultural lands referred to came from and was taken out of the capital investment in the commercial enterprise conducted by the plaintiff and his brother in the city of Dinuba. It is also shown by the testimony of the bookkeeper that the money withdrawn by the plaintiff for his household expenses during a considerable portion of the time at least was in excess of the plaintiff's portion of the net income of the merchandise business. As said in Thompson v. Davis, 172 Cal. 491, 157 P. 595, there is no presumption as to the source from which the money came that entered into the improvement of the real estate, as the court cannot presume that use is made of the community property rather than of the separate property, and in this case, just as in the case of Thompson v. Davis, supra, the best that can be said is that the source of the money is left doubtful. Likewise, as is said in the Estate of Gold, 170 Cal. 621, 151 P. 12, where a business has been carried on a capital invested therein by a man before his marriage, the entire profits therefrom after marriage are not necessarily separate property of the husband, but a portion thereof is chargeable to his activity, ability, and capacity. And this would be true here if there was any testimony in the case upon which the trial court could say that the improvements made upon the real property was taken out of any portion of the profits of the business carried on by the plaintiff, reasonably classed as community property, and that the moneys withdrawn from the business for household purposes did not reasonably equal the earning capacity of the husband.

[4] Upon the whole case the findings of the trial court appear to be sufficiently supported.

The judgment is affirmed.

COX et al. v. CENTRAL CALIFORNIA TRACTION CO. (Civ. 3025.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 26, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 26, 1927.

1. Carriers ⇐320(13)—Evidence of street railway's negligence, showing passenger caught ring on thread end of bolt on exit gate, held for jury.

Evidence of negligence of street railway company in that passenger alighting from street car caught her ring on the thread end of a projecting bolt on gate used to close exit held for jury; such bolts being placed on other cars with their heads toward passengers.

2. Negligence ⇐59—That accident has never happened before does not necessarily show it was not to be reasonably anticipated.

The mere fact that a particular accident has not been known to happen before does not, under all circumstances, show such accident one which might not reasonably have been anticipated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Action by Fannie M. Cox and another against the Central California Traction Company to recover for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Butler, Van Dyke & Desmond, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Mark L. Burns, of Sacramento, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. The plaintiffs had judgment in the above-entitled action, and the defendant appeals.

[1] The record in this case discloses that on or about the 21st day of March, 1924, the plaintiff Fannie M. Cox was a passenger on a street car then owned and operated by the defendant in the city of Sacramento. That at the intersection of Eighth and K streets, in said city, the car in question came to a stop and the plaintiff prepared to alight, by using the exit and steps at the front end of the car. That the front end of the car was guarded by an iron gate which doubled back upon itself when placed in position for passengers to alight. The gate in question was controlled by hand lever operated by the motor-man. While the gate was folded back and in a position for the plaintiff to alight, the plaintiff moved toward the steps of the car, and as she was doing so, was jostled a trifle by another passenger, also proceeding to alight, and when jostled, placed her left hand on the gate above referred to, and in so doing, a ring on one of her fingers caught upon the threads of a projecting bolt running through the crossbar constituting a portion of the material of which the gate was constructed. This bolt protruded through the nut about one-quarter of an inch.

The testimony further shows that on both sides of the exit were stanchions or hand-holds for the use of passengers, but that the plaintiff was prevented from using the same to steady herself by the presence of other passengers attempting to alight. That while plaintiff's left hand rested against said gate, it was moved by her somewhat and came in contact with the thread end of a projecting bolt on said gate, as above stated. The plaintiff's hand was severely injured, and no question is made as to the amount of recovery allowed by the jury.

The appellant, at the close of the trial, moved for a directed verdict. Also, for a verdict notwithstanding the judgment. These motions were denied by the trial court, as well as the defendant's motion for a new trial. Appellant's statement that the ring upon the hand of the plaintiff caught upon a bolt head used to fasten the hand lever to the gate is slightly inaccurate, as the record shows the ring did not catch upon a bolt head, but upon the threads projecting through a nut on the nut end of the bolt. Upon this appeal it is insisted that there is absolutely nothing in the record which can in any way serve as a guide to the jury and authorize the holding that the defendant was guilty of any negligence. It is further contended that the verdict is the result of mere speculation, and that Mrs. Fannie M. Cox suffered an accident that was unavoidable and caused through no fault of the defendant.

In addition to what we have above stated as to how the accident occurred, and also as to what caused the accident, the record shows that during the course of the trial three photographs were introduced by the defendant of gates used by it on its cars to guard the places of entrance and exit. It may be here stated that the defendant maintains and operates upon its line in the city of Sacramento five cars of similar design; that the car in question was numbered 103, and was and is of the same design and pattern as the other four cars then used by the appellant. These photographs, used as exhibits, all show that the bolts used in holding the crossbar in place and used in the construction of the gate which we have described and mentioned are so placed that when the gate is closed the bolt heads on the crossbar are all toward the passengers when entering, and also when alighting from the car. The testimony on the part of the defendant is that the photographs introduced by the defendant and used as exhibits, and made a part of the transcript, show the standard equipment of the cars belonging to the appellant. Assuming that this testimony is correct, the standard equipment of the cars belonging to the appellant shows that no accident or injury could have occurred to the plaintiff as that alleged and set forth in plaintiff's complaint in this action if the car from which the plaintiff was then alighting had been so equipped. There seems to be no question but that car No. 103, on the 21st day of March, 1924, was equipped with a standard gate, as shown by the exhibits, but the manner of constructing the gate, or rather the manner of inserting the bolts in the standard gate, is shown by the testimony to have been exactly the opposite of that claimed by the witnesses for the defendant to be the standard manner of construction. The gate itself was not defective in the sense that it was either weak or inefficient in its operation, or not well calculated to prevent the exit of passengers while the car was in motion or until it had been folded back by the motor-man to admit of either the ingress or egress of passengers.

The alleged negligence in this case is based upon the fact that in inserting three of the bolts in the crossbar referred to they had been inserted in such a way as to present the thread ends thereof to the passenger side of the gate. By the exhibits introduced, the standard form or manner of construction shows six bolts used in the crossbar, the head ends of which are all toward the passenger side of the folded gate. The thread ends or rough ends of the bolts, upon which anything would likely be caught, are folded away from the passenger side of the gate. In other words, accepting the testimony of appellant's witnesses as to the exhibits being correct photographs of standard equipment, the testimony, in the transcript shows that the manner of inserting the bolts in question on car No. 102 departed from the standard form. Alleging that the facts which we have set forth do not show negligence, the appellant argues that it was necessary for the plaintiff to go further to prove negligence; that the facts in this case do not take it out of the general rule that negligence must be proved; it being further argued that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur cannot be relied upon to sustain the respondents' cause. Before advertng to the rule of res ipsa loquitur, we will examine further as to whether the plaintiff produced any evidence upon which the verdict of the jury can properly be based, and in so doing we will analyze, somewhat, the authorities cited by the appellant in support of its contention that there is no such testimony.

The first case called to our attention by the appellant in this behalf is that of Stebel v. Connecticut Co., 90 Conn. 24, 96 A. 171. It appears in this case that the plaintiff was injured by her dress catching and throwing her to the ground as she was stepping off the running board of an open trolley car after it had stopped. The evidence of negligence on the defendant's part consisted of photographs of the car which were admitted in evidence and showed that the running board used by passengers in getting on and off the car was constructed with a riser or toe board between the floor of the car and the back edge of the running board, which riser was made in three sections with openings between the sections. The testimony was that the plaintiff's skirt caught on or about one of these openings, but in what manner or for what reason it caught did not appear. Upon these facts the court held, quoting from the syllabus:

"That proof of the happening of the accident did not make a question for the jury under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, without showing that the running board was not an approved construction in general use, adequate, and, judged by previous experience, safe for its intended use, or that there was anything abnormal or unusual about its condition at the time of the accident, as defendant was not an insurer, but was only bound to exercise the highest degree of care in the selection, maintenance, inspection, and use of its cars and their appliances, and the facts did not indicate that it had not done so."

The crucial fact in that case was that there was nothing abnormal or unusual about the condition of the car at the time of the accident. In the case at bar there was something abnormal or unusual about the appliance of the car in question at the time of the accident. If the standard form used upon the gate, or, rather, the standard manner of construction of the gate, is to place the smooth or the head end of the bolts on the crossbar toward the passenger side of the folded gate so that nothing might catch thereon, then the insertion of three of the bolts on the crossbar on car No. 103, in a different manner, and in a manner so as to present the rough or thread ends of the bolts toward the passenger side of the folded gate, then the case of Stebel v. Connecticut Co., supra, cited by appellant, would be an authority for the upholding of the verdict against the appellant.

In Pendergrast v. Durham Traction Co., 163 N. C. 553, 79 S. E. 984, the Supreme Court of North Carolina had before it a case where a passenger had caught a very thin finger ring in a screw at the bottom of the handhold of a street car, the handhold being one intended for the use of passengers. This case is presented as being controlling here. An examination of the facts in that case, however, shows a distinguishing principle. The facts as set forth in the opinion of the court in that case are substantially as follows: As the street car, on which the plaintiff was a passenger, approached a certain point, plaintiff asked the conductor to slow up so that he could get off, and attempted to get off while the car was going some three or four miles per hour. In preparing to get off the plaintiff took hold of the grab-handle on the front platform of the car with his left hand, and as he attempted to alight, his left hand glided down the rod, and a ring on his little finger caught in the screw head which was projecting at the bottom of the rod, and the plaintiff was seriously injured. Just before the plaintiff got off, the motorman said to him:

"Mister, if you want to get off, wait a minute and I will stop the car."

The screw head upon which the plaintiff's ring was caught projected about one-sixteenth of an inch from the surface. Under these circumstances, the court held that negligence on the part of the company could not be regarded as the proximate cause of the injury. That case differs from this in that the plaintiff disregarded the precautionary advice given to him by the defendant's employee not to attempt to alight until the motorman had had an opportunity to stop the car. While not so expressly decided, it is evident the court had in mind that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence barring recovery.

In Keller v. Hestonville M. & F. Passenger R. Co., 149 Pa. 65, 24 A. 159, it appears that the plaintiff was nonsuited in an action where he was injured while riding on an open street car, called a "summer" street car, that had a step running along its full length on the side

13 inches below the floor of the car. Back of the step and resting on it was a board 4 inches wide, above this an open space $3\frac{3}{4}$ inches wide, and above the latter, another board $5\frac{1}{4}$ inches in width which extended to the car floor. It was held that the car was sufficiently safe and the company was not liable for injuries to a plaintiff, who, in passing from the step to the floor, got his foot caught in the open space between the two boards by stepping on the lower one. An examination of the facts of the case, as set forth in the opinion, indicates that the plaintiff was injured by reason of his foot giving way on account of the weight of his body, the plaintiff's testimony being:

"My foot gave way with the weight of my body, and it slipped forward."

The court, in its opinion, passing upon the claim of negligence stated:

"The car did not differ in construction from other summer cars in common use in the city, and there was no evidence of any defect in construction, or that any accident had before happened from a like cause. While it is the duty of the railway company to provide safe and reasonably convenient means of ingress to its cars, it is equally the duty of a passenger to use the means provided with reasonable circumspection and care."

Here the case under consideration by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania differs from the one at bar in that the car with which we have to deal does differ in construction from the standard manner of inserting the bolts in the crossbars on the gates guarding the open end of the cars. It may be further stated that the language in the case just quoted indicates that the court was passing upon a question of fact which would be a question for the jury to decide in this state. The court there says:

"It is equally the duty of the passenger to use the means provided with reasonable circumspection and care."

To determine this and whether the passenger has so acted is a question of fact upon the testimony, and not simply a question of law for the court, unless it is a case where reasonable minds would not differ, which we cannot hold is the case at bar.

In the case of Del., Lack. & W. R. R. Co. v. Napheys, 90 Pa. 135, by a divided court, it was held that where a passenger, on stepping from the lowest step of the platform of one of the cars to the ground, a distance of 13 inches, slipped and fractured the kneecap, no presumption of negligence was raised by the fact of such occurrence. The facts as detailed are as follows: On stepping down from the lowest step of the car platform plaintiff advanced her left foot first to the ground, leaning her right foot upon the step, and while in that position, without any apparent cause, her right kneecap snapped and was fractured. This case is so dissimilar in its facts that the mere statement thereof shows its inapplicability to any questions here presented.

In Perkins v. Bay State R. R. Co., 223 Mass. 235, 111 N. E. 717, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover upon the following facts: The plaintiff was a passenger upon a street car, and in attempting to leave the car, caught the heel of her boot in the cleats or guides at the threshold of the door of the car, causing her to be thrown into the vestibule. The car was new, and no claim was made that it was defective or out of repair. The contention was made that the construction was unsafe. In passing upon these facts the court says:

"And in the absence of proof of information or of reasonable knowledge from experience that injury to passengers was likely to happen from their use, there is no evidence from which the jury could say the defendant should have foreseen, that, with everything plainly visible, passengers using the thresholds ordinarily might be expected to stumble and fall from contact with the cleats, or would be caught 'between the cleats and the floor of the car.' If the construction was not mechanically improper or defective, and no practicable method having been suggested of guarding against the use of such thresholds in the usual way except to discontinue the use of that kind of car, there was no positive evidence from which negligence could be found. The plaintiff's injury resulted from an accident under circumstances where the defendant had taken every reasonable precaution."

Here the facts differ from the Perkins Case in that there was presented to the jury evidence from which the jury might conclude that the construction, to wit, the manner in which the bolts were inserted through the crossbar of the folding gate, was mechanically improper, if not defective, as that word is usually employed. The evidence in this case shows that there is a practical method of obviating the danger which was presented to the plaintiff in the instant case. The standard construction, as shown by the photographs, differs from the method used upon car No. 103. We may here state that the transcript also shows that shortly after the accident the thread ends of the bolts to which we have referred were smoothed down and painted over by the defendant. There is no testimony in the record as to how long the bolts had been allowed to remain as they were on March 21, 1924. Therefore there can be no argument based upon continuous use without previous accident. A different adjustment of the bolts is presented from that found upon the other cars belonging to the appellant, and the error in the adjustment was corrected after the accident. We do not find anything in the case of Cary v. L. A. R. R. Co., 157 Cal. 599, 108 P. 682, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 764, 21 Ann. Cas. 1329, which militates against the plaintiff in this action. As cited by counsel, that case holds:

"A carrier of passengers is not obliged to proceed to provide against casualties which have not been known to occur before and which may not reasonably be anticipated. That which never happened before and which in its character is such as not naturally to occur to prudent men to guard against its happening at all, cannot, when in the course of years, it does happen, furnish good ground for charge of negligence in not foreseeing its happening and guarding against that remote contingency" (citing Holt v. S. W. Mo. E. R. Co., 84 Mo. App. 443).

The cases cited by appellant show that practically just such an accident has happened before, where the plaintiff caught a finger ring upon a projecting screw on the handhold or grab bar, as it is sometimes called, and as we have stated, was not allowed to recover because of his contributory negligence in attempting to alight before the car had stopped, after having been cautioned not to alight. In other words, it is a case of history repeating itself, and not of an accident unknown to have previously happened. While not dwelt upon in the opinion, this court had before it in the recent case of Szasz, by His Guardian ad Litem, v. Joyland Co. (Cal. App.) 257 P. 871, an accident first of its kind, and it was there held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

[2] The language of the text-writer in 4 Cal. Juris. 935, § 88, is pertinent:

"It is not true, under all circumstances, however, that because a particular accident has not been known to happen before, such accident is not of the character of those casualties which may reasonably be anticipated in the sense that it is a duty to exercise reasonable care in guarding against their occurrence."

And further, in the same section:

"A carrier is bound to use the best precautions in known practical use to secure the safety of the passengers."

The testimony in this case shows that on the car in question the company had not used the best known means to insure the safety of its passengers, but had departed from the standard form of construction followed or used in the gates of other cars.

The questions which we are considering are not, however, exactly open ones in this state. In the case of Sander v. L. A. R. R. Corp., 38 Cal. App. 222, 175 P. 90—a case not called to the attention of the court by counsel for either the appellant or respondent, and one where a hearing was denied by the Supreme Court—we have an almost parallel state of facts, and one, when applied to the circumstances which we are considering, absolutely conclusive. In the Sander Case the plaintiff, a passenger upon a street car belonging to the defendant, and at a time when the car had stopped to discharge passengers, was injured by her skirt catching upon a knob at the exit provided for the discharge and receipt of passengers. The facts are thus stated by the court: As plaintiff reached the space opposite the steps, she had a package in her right hand and took hold of the hand guard with her left. As she stepped downward upon the steps, her skirt caught on a protruding knob affixed in the floor toward the left of the exit and she was thrown to the street, where she struck upon her back. In her complaint, the negligence charged against the defendant was that the knob was negligently placed in its position by the defendant, and so placed as to constitute a dangerous contrivance. This is similar to the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint in the case at bar, save and except that the pleading in the Sander Case is more direct. In that case, as in this, no question is made as to the damages awarded the plaintiff. The sole contention was that no negligence whatsoever was shown by reason of which the defendant could be chargeable with any amount of damages. The knob upon which plaintiff's skirt was caught was a small contrivance which served as a bumper to intercept the sliding iron gate which closed the exit. A glance at the drawing reproduced and shown on page 224 of the opinion (175 P. 901) demonstrates the applicability of that case to the case at bar. In the Sander Case, the knob, or catch, or contrivance, or bumper, or by whatever language it may be called, is shown at the lower part of the gate, where it would catch a skirt. The rough bolts in the crossbar were on the upper portion of the folding gate and on the opposite side, where the left hand of a passenger would reasonably be placed. In that case, as in this, it was argued that the defendant was not liable because no previous accident had occurred. In the Sander Case, however, the argument had a much stronger ground upon which to find a basis than in the case at bar. Here it is not shown how long the alleged defective appliance had been used, but in the Sander Case it was shown that cars having a similar bumper attachment had carried 88,236,273 passengers without any claim having been made of a similar injury or of any accident arising out of the manner in which the bumper was placed or used by the defendant. The court, in speaking of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur as applied to that case, said:

"It is true enough that negligence will not be implied from the mere fact of injury, and it is also true that the plaintiff, at the time she rested her case, had furnished the trial court with no information as to the construction of the bumper, its character, or location upon the car. She did, however, show that she was injured through the catching of her skirt upon an appliance affixed to the car by the defendant, and we are inclined to the view that enough was supplied, under the rule adverted to as affecting the carriers of passengers, to entitle her to the presumption of negligence until the defendant had excused itself by evidence.

"In Steele v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 168 Cal. 375, 143 P. 718, the court states that before negligence will be implied, 'it must first be shown that the injury came from the movement of the car by those in charge of it, or from something connected therewith, or in control of the defendant.' She did show that her skirt caught upon the bumper and that the bumper was an appliance connected with the car."

In speaking of the bumper, the court emphasizes the words "from something connected therewith, or in control of the defendant." The court in its opinion further adverted to the fact that a simple contrivance would have obviated the danger. This is true here. Placing the bolts through the crossbar in an opposite direction would have eliminated all danger or injury. The court in that case further holds that the contention of nonliability because of no previous similar accident was untenable and expresses itself in a quotation from the case of Seller v. Market Street R. R. Co., 139 Cal. 268, 72 P. 1006, where contributory negligence was urged as a reason for taking the case from the jury:

"As a general rule, it is a question of fact for the jury, an inference to be deduced from the circumstances of each particular case, and it is only where the deduction to be drawn is inevitably that of negligence that the court is authorized to withdraw the question from the jury. This is true even where there is no conflict in the evidence, if different conclusions upon the subject can be rationally drawn therefrom. If the conceded facts are such that reasonable minds might differ upon the question as to whether or not one was negligent, the question is one of fact for the jury."

For the reasons which we have hereinbefore set forth, and especially upon the authority in the case of Sander v. L. A. R. R. Co., supra, it must be held that the verdict of the jury is sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

In re FRITZE'S ESTATE.

KINAHAN et al. v. MALONE.

(Civ. 5841.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 20, 1927.

1. Wills §527—Will stating that relatives other than those mentioned should not share in estate did not make testatrix's sister named in will residuary legatee.

Paragraph of will reading, "It is my will and intent that not any of my relatives or heirs, other than as hereinbefore set forth, shall take or receive any share or portion of my estate," held not to make testatrix's sister named in will residuary legatee, since in no part thereof is intention of testatrix expressed that surplus of estate shall be taken by person there designated.

2. Descent and distribution §48—Testator must make valid disposition of his property before heirs' right of succession can be cut off.

Testator must do more than show intention to disinherit before heirs' right of succession can be cut off; he must make valid disposition of his property.

3. Wills §440—In construing will, testator's intention as disclosed by words he has used must be ascertained (Civ. Code, § 1317).

Under Civ. Code, § 1317, in construction of will, testator's intention must be ascertained as disclosed by words he has used and not from undeclared purpose which may be supposed to have been in his mind.

4. Wills §435—Court cannot, under guise of construction, make will.

Court cannot, under guise of construction, make will for testatrix in place of one she has made.

5. Wills §435—That testatrix failed to anticipate every contingency furnishes no excuse for execution of will by judicial construction.

That testatrix did not anticipate every contingency does not furnish excuse for execution of a will by judicial construction.

6. Descent and distribution §48—Where no residuary legatee capable of receiving property willed was named, and gift to charities lapsed under statute, residue must be distributed to heirs, though testatrix had shown intention to disinherit certain sisters (Civ. Code, § 1313).

Where there was no residuary legatee capable of receiving property as to which lapse occurred because property bequeathed to charity amounted to more than one-third of estate in violation of Civ. Code, § 1313, sister of testatrix named in will could not claim lapsed gift, but residue had to be distributed under section 1313 to heirs or next of kin, although testatrix had shown intention to disinherit her other sisters.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Proceedings between Margaret Kinahan and another and Mary Malone, in the matter of the estate of Rose Fritze, deceased. From part of an order directing distribution of the estate, Margaret Kinahan and another appeal. Reversed.

Frank J. Barry, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

H. A. Massey and Meserve, Mumper, Hughes & Robertson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by Margaret Kinahan and Catherine Mongan from that part of the order of distribution in the matter of the estate of Rose Fritze, deceased, which adjudges that said Margaret Kinahan and Catherine Mongan are not entitled to share in the distribution of the sum of $3,766.56, the amount of said estate given by the will of said deceased to charity in excess of that allowed by law and not otherwise disposed of by said will, and which adjudges that Mary Malone, sister and legal heir of said deceased, is entitled to all of said $3,766.56, to the exclusion of said Margaret Kinahan and Catherine Mongan.

Rose Fritze died in Los Angeles, Cal., on June 6, 1925, leaving her surviving as heirs at law and next of kin three sisters, Mary Malone, Margaret Kinahan, and Catherine Mongan. On March 27, 1925, the deceased executed her last will, the relevant sections of which are as follows:

"First: I hereby revoke all former wills by me made;

"Second: I declare that I am of the age of 74 years and that I am the widow of the late John Fritze;

"Third: I direct my executor hereinafter named, as soon as he has sufficient funds in his hands, to pay my funeral expenses and the expense of my last sickness and all just debts;

"Fourth: I give and bequeath all my clothing, household goods, furniture and furnishings to Saint Vincent de Paul Society of Los Angeles, California;

"Fifth: I give, devise and bequeath to my good friend, Jack E. Lundin, who resides with me, lot 18 and the west 10 feet of lot 19, in block O of the Estrella tract, in the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, state of California, as per map thereof recorded in book 59, page 86 of Miscellaneous Records of Los Angeles county, except so much thereof as I may have sold;

"Sixth: I hereby direct my executor, hereinafter named, to sell all other property owned by me and convert the same into cash; and the proceeds thereof I hereby give and bequeath:

"1. To my said good friend, Jack E. Lundin, the sum of one thousand ($1,000.00) dollars;

"2. From the remainder, if any, to my good neighbor, Maggie Peery, the sum of two hundred ($200.00) dollars;

"3. From the remainder, if any, to my dear sister, Mary Malone, residing at Dundalk, Ireland, provided she survive me, the sum of one thousand ($1,000.00) dollars; and in the event she does not survive me, then the said one thousand ($1,000.00) dollars to the parish priest of Saint Patrick's Church of Dundalk, Ireland, to be by him distributed to the poor of Dundalk;

"4. From the remainder, if any, to K. Nishio, I. Yasuda and Tom Sekigucki, my tenants on East First Street, Los Angeles, California, each the sum of two hundred ($200.00) dollars; and

"5. Any and all remainder to the Little Sisters of the Poor, First and Mott streets, Los Angeles, California;

"Seventh: It is my will and intent that not any of my relatives or heirs, other than as hereinbefore set forth, shall take or receive any share or portion of my estate. I do not leave anything to my sisters, Margaret and Catherine, of Malden, Massachusetts, as each of them has plenty of this life's possessions."

The net value of the estate of the deceased is the sum of $16,599.83. Of this amount the will of the deceased attempted to give to the St. Vincent de Paul Society of Los Angeles household furniture and furnishings of the appraised value of $200, and to the Little Sisters of the Poor of Los Angeles the sum of $9,099.83, making a total of $9,299.83 left by said will to charity, and being $3,766.56 in excess of the amount allowed by section 1313 of the Civil Code to be left to charitable institutions.

The appellant assigns as error, first, that the sum of $3,766.56 being the excess given to charitable institutions constituted the intestate estate of deceased, and should have been distributed equally among the legal heirs of the deceased, there being no residuary legatees capable of receiving the same, and that it was error for the court to have distributed said $3,766.56 to Mary Malone to the exclusion of Margaret Kinahan and Catherine Mongan; second, that the attempted disinheritance of Margaret Kinahan and Catherine Mongan did not have any effect, no disposition having been made of the lapsed legacy, and that the court erred in construing that the will gave said $3,766.56 to Mary Malone, and denying the petition of said executor to have same distributed equally between Mary Malone, Margaret Kinahan, and Catherine Mongan, the legal heirs of said deceased.

The case resolves itself into two propositions, namely: (1) The status of property accruing from a lapsed legacy where there is no residuary legatee capable of receiving the same; (2) the effect of an attempted disinheritance of heirs in case of a lapsed legacy where there is no residuary legatee capable of receiving the property as to which the lapse occurs, and where no other disposition is made of said lapsed estate.

The statute governing this case is found in section 1313 of the Civil Code, which read as follows at the time of the death of testatrix:

"No estate, real or personal, shall be bequeathed or devised to any charitable or benevolent society or corporation, or to any person or persons in trust for charitable uses, except the same be done by will duly executed at least thirty days before the decease of the testator; and if so made, at least thirty days prior to such death, such devise or legacy and each of them shall be valid; provided, that no such devise or bequest shall collectively exceed one-third of the estate of the testator, leaving legal heirs, and in such case a pro rata deduction from such devises or bequests shall be made so as to reduce the aggregate thereof to one-third of such estate; and all dispositions of property made contrary hereto shall be void, and go to the residuary legatee or devisee, next of kin, or heirs, according to law; and provided, further, that bequests and devises to the state, or to any state institution, * * * which is exempt from taxation under section one of article thirteen of the Constitution of the state of California, or for the use or benefit of any such educational institution, are excepted from the restrictions of this section; provided, however, that nothing in this section contained shall apply to bequests or devises made by will executed at least six months prior to the death of a testator who leaves no parent, husband, wife, child or grandchild, or when all of such heirs shall have by writing, executed at least six months prior to his death, waived the restrictions contained herein."

Since the deceased was survived by legal heirs and her will was executed less than six months prior to her death, any charitable bequests made by her in excess of one-third of her estate were void and lapsed under the provisions of section 1313 of the Civil Code. Under the statute in question, the excess must be distributed either to the "residuary legatee or devisee, next of kin, or heirs according to law." The respondent contends that the first sentence of the seventh paragraph of the will is the general residuary clause of the will, and that it constituted Mary Malone the residuary legatee. The said sentence reads as follows:

"It is my will and intent that not any of my relatives or heirs, other than as hereinbefore set forth, shall take or receive any share or portion of my estate. * * *"

In paragraph 6, subd. 3, the testatrix's sister Mary Malone was mentioned, and no other relative or heir was mentioned in the will preceding paragraph 7 thereof. The other legatees and devisees mentioned in the will were either charitable institutions or strangers in blood to the testatrix. Respondent contends that the words, "any of my relatives or heirs other than as hereinbefore set forth," necessarily implies that the heir or heirs, if any, thereinbefore set forth should take or receive such portion of the estate as would fall into the residue thereof. It is argued by respondent that, if the testatrix had intended merely to evince an intention to disinherit, she would have omitted the first sentence of paragraph 7, since the words "I do not leave anything to my sisters Margaret and Catherine, * * *" are sufficient to evince an intention to disinherit the two sisters named. Respondent relies upon the rule laid down in Estate of Upham, 127 Cal. 90, 98, 59 P. 315, 318, which reads:

"No particular mode of expression is necessary to constitute a residuary legatee. It is sufficient, if the intention of the testator be plainly expressed in the will, that the surplus of the estate, after payment of debts and legacies, shall be taken by a person there designated."

[1, 2] In our opinion paragraph 7 of the will does not meet the requirements of the foregoing rule. In no part thereof is the intention of the testatrix expressed that the surplus of the estate shall be taken by a person there designated. A testator must do more than merely evince an intention to disinherit before the heir's right of succession can be cut off—he must make a valid disposition of his property. Estate of Walkerly, 108 Cal. 627, 41 P. 772, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97; Campbell-Kawannanako v. Campbell, 152 Cal. 201, 207, 92 P. 184.

[3-5] The rules of construction to be applied in cases of this character are well settled. The primary purpose of all such rules is to ascertain the testator's intention (section 1317, Civ. Code), not some undeclared purpose which may be supposed to have been in his mind, but the intention disclosed by the words he has used. If the plan adopted by the testatrix cannot be given effect because it violates the rules of law, the court is not authorized to substitute for the illegal provisions some other which it may suppose would have been adopted by her if she had known that the directions actually given could not be carried out; in other words, the court cannot, under the guise of construction, make a will for the testatrix in place of the one she has made. Estate of Spreckels, 162 Cal. 559, 567, 123 P. 371; Estate of Young, 123 Cal. 337, 55 P. 1011. As in the case of innumerable wills, the testatrix did not anticipate the invalidity of her gift to charity and did not provide for the disposition of the lapsed gift in the event of such invalidity, which she could easily have done if she so desired. What her actual intent may have been in the event of the invalidity of such gift to charity we have no means of knowing. It cannot be assumed that she would have given all of this excess to her sister Mary Malone. She might have given it to Lundin, the favored beneficiary, or she might have divided it equally among all of the legatees, or given it to other persons not mentioned in her will at all, or she might perhaps have given it to her sisters Margaret and Catherine. The situation is one where, as in the Estate of Hittell, 141 Cal. 432, 75 P. 53, the testatrix did not anticipate every contingency. That she so failed furnishes no excuse for the execution of a will by judicial construction.

[6] It follows that Mary Malone cannot claim the lapsed gift under the residuary clause, and that the residue must be distributed under the provisions of section 1313 of the Civil Code to the heirs or next of kin.

Judgment is reversed.

MCMILLAN et al. v. GREER. (Civ. 5207; L. A. 8162.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 24, 1927.

Application for Transfer to Supreme Court Denied Nov. 21, 1927.

1. Slaves ⇐25—Child of married slave parents, illegitimate in state of birth, held legitimate under California Inheritance Law.

Child born in Alabama of slave parents, who had been married by negro preacher, held legitimate under California Law of Inheritance (Civ. Code, § 1387), though such child was considered illegitimate under law of Alabama.

2. Attorney and client ⇐109—Where property of estate was properly distributed, no recovery may be had for attorney's negligence in representing those claiming interest.

There can be no recovery against attorney for negligence in representing those claiming an interest in estate, where property of estate was properly distributed.

3. Courts ⇐89—Supreme Court's denial of application for transfer of case decided by District Court of Appeal is not approval of statements of law involved.

Denial of application for transfer of case decided by District Court of Appeal is not to be taken as affirmative approval by Supreme Court of statements of any matter of law involved so as to bind appellate courts in succeeding cases.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Luvenia McMillan and another against George L. Greer. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Scarborough, Forgy & Reinhaus, of Santa Ana, for appellants.

S. L. Carpenter, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an action based upon the alleged negligence of respondent, who is an attorney at law practicing in Los Angeles. Respondent was retained by appellants to represent their interests in the estate of Russell Wayman, deceased, which estate at the time of respondent's employment was in the course of probate in the superior court of Los Angeles county, and this action was brought after the decree of distribution was made and entered in the Wayman estate alleging damage suffered by appellants by reason of the negligence of respondent as their attorney in representing their interests therein.

There is no conflict in the evidence, all of which, oral and documentary, was admitted without objection from either side. The evidence shows and the court found that one Martha Wayman, a negress and a slave, had two children. The elder was Taylor Christian, the son of a white man and unquestionably illegitimate. After the birth of Taylor Christian, Martha Wayman and a negro slave, Cyrus Wayman, were married by a negro preacher, and to them was born Russell Wayman. Prior to the birth of Russell Wayman and prior to the Civil War the master of Cyrus Wayman took him to Texas or Tennessee. Martha Wayman and Cyrus Wayman never saw each other again, and thereafter there was no cohabitation between them. Martha Wayman and Cyrus Wayman both died before Russell Wayman, Cyrus dying first. Taylor Christian predeceased Russell Wayman, and the latter resided in Alabama with his mother until 1900, when he moved to Los Angeles. Russell Wayman never married. The appellants are legitimate children of Taylor Christian.

The estate of Russell Wayman was distributed to Winnie Thompson and Callie Leah Lewis, sisters of Cyrus Wayman, deceased, the father of Russell Wayman. The court found that Russell W. Wayman mentioned in the pleadings died intestate, a resident of Los Angeles county, in June, 1920, leaving estate in said county; that petition for letters of administration was filed August 21, 1920, by the public administrator naming appellants next of kin and heirs of said deceased. Subsequently one Winnie Thompson and one Callie Leah Lewis claimed in said court the right of succession to said estate as heirs, and that on September 16, 1921, the estate was distributed to them. The court further found that after the exhibiting of the claims of heirship of Winnie Thompson and Callie Leah Lewis and while the administrator's final account and petition for distribution was pending, to wit, in the month of August, 1921, the defendant, an attorney at law, engaged in practice in the county of Los Angeles, was employed by plaintiffs to represent them in respect to their claim to succeed to said estate; that defendant did not enter his appearance for the plaintiffs in the administration proceedings, but on the day the matter of distribution was in the first instance set for hearing, viz., on September 15, 1921, took up the matter at chambers with the judge of the probate department and after a discussion of the facts of the case as shown by the depositions said judge expressed very decidedly the conclusion that the plaintiffs were without legal right to the estate. The hearing was continued until the following day, but the defendant, being convinced that the view expressed by the probate judge at the discussion in his chambers was correct, made no further efforts in plaintiffs' behalf, and the estate was distributed to the opposing claimants.

The court made no finding upon the question whether or not Russell Wayman was legitimate, although the effect of the finding is that he was legitimate; nor does the court find upon the question of the negligence of respondent, but finds in effect that even though he were negligent appellants were not entitled to recover.

It is conceded by both respondent and appellants that there are but two questions for determination by this court: What was Russell Wayman's status in respect of legitimacy in the state of California? and, was respondent negligent?

[1] H. A. Bradshaw, whose deposition was introduced, testified he is an attorney at law residing in Florence, Ala., admitted to practice in all the courts of the state of Alabama and the federal courts, and had been engaged in the practice in Florence, Ala., for 17 years, and that he was familiar with the law of the state of Alabama regarding slave marriages and the issue of such marriages; that prior to the Civil War and the emancipation enactments the so-called marriages between slaves had no legal status; that prior to the enactment of the ordinances of the constitutional convention of 1865 slaves could not legally enter into the marriage state; children of such slaves were illegitimate—they had no legal status; as a matter of law Russell Wayman, being a child born prior to the Civil War of Cyrus Wayman, a slave, and Martha Wayman, who was a slave, was under the law of Alabama an illegitimate child; Cyrus Wayman several years prior to the civil war having been removed to Texas by his owner and having continued to live there until his death and not living together with Martha Wayman at the time of the enactment of the ordinances of the constitutional convention of 1865, Russell Wayman was an illegitimate child under the laws of Alabama.

[2] Appellant has cited us to the ordinances of the constitutional convention of Alabama and to several decisions of the Supreme Court of that state which were read into the record to establish the fact of the illegality of the marriage contracted between Martha Wayman and Cyrus Wayman and to the illegitimacy of their child Russell Wayman. Unquestionably the marriage contract entered into between Martha Wayman and Cyrus Wayman was null in law and under the law of Alabama Russell Wayman was an illegitimate child, but is he not in this state under section 1387 of the Civil Code relieved of the stain of bastardy? This is the determinative question presented by this appeal. If it be declared that he was a illegitimate child, the judgment must be reversed; but if it be declared that his status at the time of his death was that of a legitimate child, the judgment should be affirmed, for, notwithstanding respondent's negligence, if Russell Wayman was legitimate under the law of this state and the property of his estate was properly distributed, no recovery may be had.

state, that the illegitimacy of children born of slave marriages has been directly passed upon, and cites us to Estate of Campbell, 12 Cal. App. 707, 108 P. 669, 676, decided by the District Court of Appeal of the Third District, in which the same question was involved.

It appears from the record Wayman died in California in 1920, being at the time of his death and for several years prior thereto a resident of and domiciled in this state. He was the child of a slave marriage contracted in the state of Alabama before emancipation. The marriage was solemnized by a colored preacher, confirmed by subsequent cohabitation, and admittedly would have been a valid marriage except for the fact that under the laws of that state as they existed during the slavery period marriages between slaves were declared to be void for want of capacity of the parties to contract the same, and the children thereof were declared to be illegitimate. Ever since California was admitted to statehood, however, it has carried upon its statute books as a part of its law of inheritance a provision that "the issue of all marriages null in law * * * shall be legitimate." Stats. 1850, p. 219; Civ. Code, § 1387. The opinion in Estate of Campbell contains a very able and elaborate discussion by Mr. Presiding Justice Chipman of the effect of slave marriages in the states where contracted and of their legal standing under the laws of this state and in conclusion holds in effect that the issue of such marriages, if not legitimated by statutes enacted subsequently in the state wherein the marriage was contracted, are deemed to be illegitimate in this state. But nowhere in the opinion in that case does the author deal with the question of the application of the provisions of section 1387 to the status of the children born of such marriages nor of the purpose or meaning of that provision. In other words, the question of the application of the very provision of our statute which apparently was designed and intended to cover just such cases was not discussed or directly ruled upon therein.

[3] A petition for the transfer of that case was filed with the Supreme Court, but by a majority of the members thereof was denied. Mr. Justice Shaw dissented and in the concluding sentence of his dissenting opinion said: "I think it proper to add that the denial of a rehearing in this court does not necessarily mean an approval of the opinion of the district court. People v. Davis, 147 Cal. 350 [81 P. 718]."

People v. Davis, cited, establishes the following rule relating to the question of the conclusiveness of a decision of the District Court of Appeal after denial of a transfer by the Supreme Court:

"It is proper to add that the denial in any case of an application for the transfer of a case decided by a District Court of Appeal is not to be taken as an expression of any opinion by this court, or as the equivalent thereof, in regard to any matter of law involved in the case and not stated in the opinion of that court, nor, indeed, as an affirmative approval by this court of the propositions of law laid down in such opinion. The course to be pursued by this court in the exercise of its power in any case is a matter in which the objects above stated are the controlling considerations, and it will not hold itself bound even where questions of law alone are involved, to order a transfer of the cause, after a decision of the district court, except where it shall appear necessary in order to carry out the above-stated purposes of securing uniformity of decision and the settlement of important questions of law. The significance of such refusal is no greater than this—that this court does not consider that the interests of justice, or the purposes for which the power was given, require its exercise in the particular case.”

The rule stated has never been repudiated, but, on the contrary, has been cited approvingly up to and including In re Stevens, 197 Cal. 424, 241 P. 88.

Assuming, therefore, that the Estate of Campbell may have involved the question of the application of the provisions of section 1387, it is apparent from the face of the opinion that such question was not considered, and, if so, was not expressly passed upon. Consequently, it would seem that the decision therein cannot be taken as an adjudication of the inapplicability of the provisions of the section to the status of children born of slave marriages, which would preclude this court in the present case from giving full consideration to and passing directly upon that question.

If the question of legitimacy be dealt with as one of first impression, we are of the opinion that the provisions of the sections should be given full application to the situation herein presented for the following reasons: All of the cases cited and discussed by Mr. Presiding Justice Chipman in the Estate of Campbell holding that slave marriages were void and that the offspring thereof were illegitimate are grounded upon the legal principle that on account of statutory inhibitions existing in the slave states prior to emancipation slaves did not have legal capacity to enter into contracts of marriage. As early as 1852, however, the Supreme Court of this state expressly declared in the case of Graham v. Bennet, 2 Cal. 503, that the children of marriages which were void in law because of lack of capacity of the parties to contract the same were deemed to be legitimate within the meaning of the provisions now embodied in section 1387. In Graham v. Bennet the husband, having a lawful wife living, contracted a second marriage, as the result of which two children were born. When the second wife learned that the marriage was bigamous she took her children to an adjoining state, but they were subsequently returned to this state by their father, and the question arose as to their care and custody. The determination of that question depended upon whether under the law of this state the children were deemed to be legitimate or illegitimate. The court said:

“The ceremony, therefore, which took place between the plaintiff and defendant, as shown by the complaint, was sufficient to constitute them man and wife, if there had been no legal disability. But with such disability existing, it would then come within the meaning of the act above quoted and is a ‘marriage deemed null in law.’ The results, however, of such invalidity, as they would affect the issue of the marriage at common law, are here provided against. The ceremony which was instituted by the parents, although illegal and void as to them, is declared sufficient to protect their offspring against the stain of bastardy, and its accompanying conditions. The law declares they shall be legitimate. They are, therefore, in relation to their father, the inheritors of his name, his heirs-apparent and entitled to look for, and demand of him his care, maintenance and protection. On the other hand, he has the unquestioned right to their custody, control, and obedience, to the same extent as if they were the issue of a valid marriage.”

The law as thus declared has never been overruled. Estate of Baldwin, 162 Cal. 471, 123 P. 267. We can see no difference in principle between that case and the present one. In each the marriage was void because of the lack of capacity of the parties to enter into the marriage contract. The statute itself does not differentiate between the kinds of void marriages. It includes “the issue of all marriages null in law”; and this latter term “marriages null in law” has been held to include void marriages other than those which may be annulled for the causes enumerated in section 82 of the Civil Code. Estate of Shipp, 168 Cal. 640, 144 P. 143. What logical reason then can be assigned for extending the humane provisions of section 1387 to the children of a void bigamous marriage and denying the same to the children of a void slave marriage? If such provision be held not to apply to children of slave marriages, then it is entirely meaningless.

Of course, if there had been no pretense of marriage, then a different case would be presented. A child born under such circumstances is not a child of a “marriage null in law” and could not claim to be legitimate under section 1387; its right of inheritance would be controlled by section 1388 of the Civil Code—but that is not this case. As said by Mr. Justice Shaw in his dissenting opinion:

“If there ever was a law which should be broadly and liberally construed, it must be admitted that this law [section 1387] is of that class when applied to a marriage which, in all respects except the capacity to enter into it, was as formally solemnized and as faithfully observed as that of free persons. I can conceive of no sound reason for refusing to apply this statute to the children of a marriage which is null only because the man and woman who entered into the relation were slaves. The question is of little future importance, but I cannot allow a doctrine which I deem so repugnant to humanity to receive even the silent sanction of acquiescence without a protest."

We are of the opinion that the provision carried upon the statute books as a part of the law of inheritance since California was admitted to statehood that the issue of all marriages null in law are legitimate has application here, and therefore the judgment should be affirmed. It is accordingly so ordered.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank, Denying Application for Transfer.

PER CURIAM. The application for transfer to this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 1, is denied.

The application is based, in part, on a conflict between this decision and the decision rendered by the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District, in Estate of Campbell, 12 Cal. App. 707, 108 P. 669, 676. In so far as that case is inconsistent with the decision in the above-entitled case, the decision in Estate of Campbell is overruled.

PEOPLE v. COAN. (Cr. 986.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 26, 1927.

1. Criminal law § 369(1)—Evidence of other disconnected crimes is inadmissible.

It is improper, on trial of defendant for one crime, to prove that he has committed other crimes having no connection with one under investigation.

2. Criminal law § 369(3)—Evidence that defendant struck stepdaughter years before held inadmissible in prosecution for killing wife.

In prosecution of defendant for killing wife, evidence that he had hit stepdaughter in face 7 or 8 years before, and after being struck on head with chair, held inadmissible.

3. Criminal law § 369(3)—Evidence of defendant's assault on another woman several years prior to marriage held inadmissible in prosecution for killing wife.

In prosecution of defendant for killing wife, evidence of assault, several years prior to his marriage with deceased, on another woman, who had previously illegally assumed with him relation of wife, held inadmissible.

4. Criminal law § 1186(4)—Admission of evidence of other crimes held reversible error in prosecution for killing wife, notwithstanding verdict of "involuntary manslaughter" (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In prosecution for killing wife, admission of evidence of other crimes held reversible error, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, notwithstanding that jury returned verdict of guilty of "involuntary manslaughter," which is killing of human being without malice, in commission of unlawful act not amounting to felony, or of legal act which might produce death in unlawful manner or without due caution and circumspection.

5. Witnesses § 277(4)—Cross-examination of defendant on subject not touched on in direct examination is improper.

In prosecution for murder, cross-examination of defendant on subject not touched on in direct examination, and not having any relation thereto or bearing on it, is improper.

6. Criminal law § 369(3)—Cross-examination of defendant as to previous bigamous relations held inadmissible in prosecution for killing wife.

In prosecution for murder of wife, cross-examination of defendant as to previous marriage with woman, who had another husband living at time of marriage to defendant, held improper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Alfred G. Coan was convicted of involuntary manslaughter, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. E. Duncan, Jr., and Mrs. Alta Hengy, both of Oroville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. By an information filed on the 9th day of February, 1927, the defendant was accused of the crime of murder, in that the defendant did, on or about the 25th day of December, 1926, at the county of Butte, in the state of California, wrongfully, willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and with malice aforethought kill and murder one Aleata Pearl Coan. Trial was had upon this information, and on the 26th day of March, 1927, the jury in said cause returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty of involuntary manslaughter. The defendant's motion for a new trial being denied, the defendant appeals therefrom and from the judgment entered upon the verdict returned, as above stated.

The transcript shows that the defendant and Aleata Pearl Coan were husband and wife. That for some period of time they had resided in the county of Butte, state of California. That on the evening of December 24, 1926, the defendant and his wife, Aleata, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Ford, made a visit to the home of Mrs. Lockerman, the mother of Mrs. Coan. That upon arriving there, they found also present Robert Childress and Francis Cory. Shortly thereafter a brother of Mrs. Coan's, Tyson Lockerman, arrived at the same residence. Tyson Lockerman invited the defendant and Thomas Ford to accompany him to a bootlegging "joint." Liquor was there procured and brought back by Lockerman to the Locker-man residence where the party was assembled. After the return from the bootlegging "joint," some time was spent in games, singing, social conversation, and drinking. There does not appear to have been any quarreling or dissension. About 12:30 or 1 a. m. of December 25, 1926, the Coans and Fords started for their respective homes. When the Coans residence was reached, Ford and his wife stopped there, and some time was spent in listening to a radio. Then the Fords left and went to their own home. While the Fords were at the residence of the Coans, the defendant suggested to his wife, Aleata, that they open certain Christmas presents, but to this Aleata replied that she did not want them opened until Christmas Day. Left to themselves, after a short interval, the Coans retired for the night, Mrs. Coan going to bed first. After going to bed, Mrs. Coan called to her husband to come to bed. He did so, but forgot to put out the light. Mrs. Coan then said the last one to get into bed was the one to put out the light. Defendant, according to his statement, said it was her turn to put out the light. There is nothing to show that this conversation was other than friendly. Thereafter a scuffle ensued between the two, and the defendant pushed his wife partly out of bed with his feet. According to the defendant's statement, Aleata put her hand on the floor as her head was hanging over the side of the bed, and said, "Look out, you're hurting me." Thereupon the defendant pulled her back into the bed, placed himself across her chest, and taking her head between his hands, shook it from side to side; then placed his hand on her nose, rubbing her face. Defendant suddenly noticed that Mrs. Coan had ceased to struggle with him and had become white and still. Thereupon, he went to the kitchen, got water, and tried to revive her. His efforts to revive Aleata proving unavailing, he put on his clothing and went to the Lockerman home, a distance of about a quarter of a mile, for help, told Tyson Lockerman he had killed his wife, and begged him to come at once and help. He then left the Lockerman home; started back to his own residence. When Lockerman and Childress, who accompanied Lockerman, reached the Coan residence, they found that Aleata was dead. One of them telephoned to the sheriff, and thereafter the defendant was arrested.

Just what occurred at the time of the tragedy is disclosed only by the defendant's testimony which, as to that occurrence, is set here forth in full:

"And she went to bed and called me and after I got in bed, she said to put out the light, and I told her it was her turn, that she should put the light out; and when I did that I took my foot and started to push her out of the bed, and she said 'Look out, you are hurting me,' and she leaned her face over the bed. Her head was leaning over the bed, I mean, and I took hold of her and pulled her back in the bed again; and she slapped me on the covers, on the arm; and then I got up and stood up, and I dropped down on to her with my knees, and then I sit astraddle of her and took her by the face and shook her head, and I shook her nose with my hand, rubbed her nose, and I looked at her and her—her face—her lips was white, and she looked white; her mouth; and I asked her what was the matter, and she never answered me; she had her eyes shut so I went and got some water and put the water on her face; and I talked to her, and she never said anything; she never answered me; and I put the water in her mouth—I don't know—I don't know what I done—I put my clothes on, and then I went for Ty, and I got up there, and I told Ty that I had killed Aleata and he—I don't know what Ty said, but he said 'All right' I guess or something like that, I guess—I don't know what he said; but anyhow I went back home; I started home, and when I got part way there Ty and Bob came along and put me in the automobile."

An examination of the deceased showed that death had resulted from the dislocation of a vertebra of the neck. The neck was not broken, nor was there any evidence that the deceased had been choked. There were no marks upon the body of the deceased indicating that any blow had been struck, although the defendant, in response to a question that night, stated that he must have struck her. The only mark or dislocation was the swelling on the neck of the deceased on the right side in the region of the dislocation. The defendant was a man accustomed to hard work and had rough or calloused hands. According to the testimony in the transcript, the deceased had an unusually long neck, and due to this fact, according to the testimony, a dislocation of this kind would be more easily produced than in a person of ordinary build.

During the course of the trial considerable testimony was introduced by way of cross-examination of the defendant as to his having gone through a marriage ceremony with a woman supposed to be a divorced woman, prior to his marriage with the deceased, and his separation from the first woman upon discovering that she was not a divorced person; also, there was testimony introduced as to certain offenses alleged to have been committed against the person of said woman known as Emma Ward, and also against Eva Ward, a daughter of Emma Ward by her legitimate husband. To the introduction of this testimony the defendant objected, and to the overruling of the defendant's objections and the admission of such testimony the appellant here assigns his reasons why a new trial should be granted. This testimony related to separate and distinct offenses alleged to have been committed long prior to the act for which the defendant was placed on trial. Under the theory that the testimony in question was admissible to show motive or intent, the prosecution placed the witness Eva Ward upon the witness stand, and, over the objections of the defendant, the court permitted her to testify as follows:

"I reside in San Jose. I know the defendant. He lived with my mother about 10 years, I suppose. It was in Monterey county. We lived at the coal mine and on a homestead. I was about 14 or 15 years of age.

"Q. At that time and place do you remember any relations that you had with Mr. Coan? A. There was a pencil box, and it seems that Mr. Coan accused my brother of taking a pencil out of that box. We were all sitting around the table, and he accused her kid, and he swore and went into the room and brought out the pencil box and said to my mother, 'Now I will show you that that God damned kid of yours did take the pencil out of there,' and my mother caught him opening the pencil box, and he grabbed her by the neck and stood her against the wall, and I said, 'Let my mother alone,' and the children were all hollering, and he kept on, and I picked up a chair and hit him on the head with it, and he let my mother go and said, 'Here, you son of a bitch, take this,' and he hit me in the eye."

This alleged occurrence took place, if at all, 7 or 8 years prior to the commission of the offense for which the defendant was upon trial.

For a like purpose, and upon a similar theory, the prosecution was permitted by the court, over the objection of the defendant, to elicit from the witness Mrs. Emma Davis testimony concerning an event which took place some 4 years prior to the 24th day of December, 1926. After testifying that the defendant and the woman heretofore referred to with whom the defendant had lived as his wife were in the basement of the lodging house kept by the witness, the witness, in response to a question as to what happened there in her presence, testified as follows:

"Well, he had her down on the floor and was choking her, and she hollered for me, and I went to help her, and I saw him jerk her up from the floor, and she had black marks on her; she had black marks on her side, and he hurt her so that she was in bed for two weeks under the doctor's care. I heard her holler 'Mamma D,' and told him to quit that, and she screamed, and I went down there, and he jerked her up off the floor and was brushing the dirt off of her."

And in response to a question as to what the defendant said, the witness testified:

"He said, 'Oh, hell, why didn't you stay out of here?'"

There was further testimony indicating the illicit nature of the alleged assault. The testimony of the witness was further to the effect that the defendant and the woman with whom he had been living, and with whom the trouble is alleged to have occurred, had not then agreed to a separation on account of the fact that the woman had a husband living at the time of her purported marriage with the defendant.

So far as the record shows, the court made no ruling limiting the purpose for which his testimony was admitted, but the statement contained in the record of one of the prosecuting officers discloses what the prosecution had in mind. We quote from the language of Mr. White:

"I understand that one of the issues in this case is the motive or the intent of the defendant at the time of what he claims to be an accident. * * * And we have a right to show the defendant's inclination and the reasons and the way he treated other people and the offenses of a similar character with the people in the same relations with him, and it will give some light to the jury and will help them to understand why he acted as he did on Christmas Morning. Now, here is a case where the defendant has another wife and lived with her 10 years and had 4 children, and it was his privilege, as he claims, to attack them occasionally, and if he would attack his wife or his prior wife, it is reasonable to assume that he would attack any other wife that he had if he was in the mood for it. It would show his disposition in that direction. I understand that is the reason for the introduction of this testimony."

Further on the district attorney made the following statement:

"Now, this case resolves itself as follows: Mr. Coan admitted that he killed Aleata, but he never said whether he did it on purpose or not, or whether it was an accident, but the testimony that he put in goes to that effect. Now, every crime consists of two elements, the act itself and the intent. If the intent is lacking a man goes scot-free, because we have to assume that it was an accident, if so proved; but if it is not proved in the case either by the prosecution or the defense, then the law assumes a malicious intent and that he did it on purpose. But all the evidence that Mr. Duncan could get in to show that it was an accident would remove that malice and criminal intent, and we could not introduce other acts, as Mr. Duncan has said. * * * We could not put it on for that purpose because the defendant is entitled to be tried on this one charge—the murder of Aleata. We could not bring in a charge that he killed some one else to prove that he had killed Aleata, because he has admitted that he killed her; but we bring it in for the purpose of showing his bodily feeling, or his mental feeling, or what kind of a man he is with respect to the conditions that are shown up in the evidence."

So far as the transcript discloses, up to the time of the admission of this evidence, no claim had been made by the defendant one way or the other, save and except as the plea of not guilty had been entered by him, and the defendant had detailed the events of the night of December 24 and the morning of December 25, 1926. We assume, however, that the cause was argued to the jury by counsel for the defendant upon the hypothesis that no murder or serious bodily injury was intended.

the contrary, the unbroken line of decisions in this country and in this state is to the effect that it is improper, on the trial of a defendant for one crime, to prove that he has committed other crimes having no connection with the one under investigation. Admitting, generally, the correctness of this rule, respondent calls our attention to a few English cases holding to the contrary, and then cites certain California cases where evidence of other offenses has been admitted under the exception that evidence of other crimes is admissible when the intent accompanying the act is equivocal or where it otherwise becomes an issue in the trial, as where it is claimed that the act in question was free from a felonious intent or was the result of mistake, accident, or inadvertence.

In People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 216, 46 P. 153, the first case relied upon by the respondent, the defendant Sanders was placed upon trial for forgery. The forgery consisted in simulating the name of one William Wootton, the charge being that Sanders had forged the name of said Wootton to a draft drawn upon Kutner-Goldstein Company of Fresno. For the purpose of showing the fact of forgery, certain evidence was introduced tending to show, and which in all reason did show, that William Wootton had been feloniously put out of the way by Sanders prior to the date of the alleged forgery, and as an occurrence or event leading up to the forgery in consummating a plan previously conceived by the defendant, and by him carried into execution in an attempt to secure for himself property belonging to the said William Wootton. Being part and parcel of the same transaction, the evidence was held admissible under the exceptions to the rule excluding evidence of other offenses than the one for which the defendant was being tried.

Again, in the case of People v. Craig, 111 Cal. 460, 44 P. 186, the defendant was placed on trial for killing his wife, a member of the Hunter family. The evidence showed that the defendant went to the home of the Hunters, where he found his wife, who was a daughter of the Hunters, and also a brother of his wife; that he, then and there, being armed with two revolvers, killed both of said persons. Upon the trial testimony was admitted that the defendant had made threats against the Hunter family and stated that something would happen. Being part and parcel of the same transaction, and the two persons killed being members of the Hunter family, such evidence was unquestionably admissible, irrespective of the exception which we are considering, excluding evidence of other crimes, and showed the purpose and intent, in common language, to "get" the Hunter family.

In People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 334, 83 P. 43, where the defendant was on trial for the murder of one Kreiger, and claimed that the act was committed in defense of the honor of his daughter, the court permitted the prosecution to prove that the defendant had had incestuous relations with his daughter, and that defendant feared Kreiger knew of such acts or would succeed in winning the favor of the girl and discover his criminal relations with her. Thus a direct motive for the murder is shown, and, as stated by the court, evidence which is relevant to any material fact in issue in a criminal case cannot be excluded because it may prejudice the defendant by proving him guilty of some other crime than the one for which he is on trial, citing People v. Walters, 98 Cal. 141, 32 P. 864; People v. Lane, 101 Cal. 513, 36 P. 16; People v. Wilson, 117 Cal. 688, 49 P. 1054; People v. Valliere, 123 Cal. 576, 56 P. 433; People v. Brown, 130 Cal. 594, 62 P. 1072. The court in that case also further said:

"But in order to render evidence of this character admissible, it must have a direct tendency, in view of the surrounding circumstances, to prove the motive or intent or other material fact and whether it is relevant or not is a question for the court; and in several instances this court has reversed convictions for the admission of evidence of distinct offenses, upon the ground that such evidence had no tendency to prove the charge made in the information" (citing People v. Lane, 100 Cal. 379, 34 P. 856; People v. Wright, 144 Cal. 165, 77 P. 877).

In People v. Argentos, 156 Cal. 720, 106 P. 65, where the defendant was on trial charged with the crime of murder, the prosecution was allowed to prove certain facts showing that the deceased was upon the bond of the defendant, the defendant being out on bail; that the deceased was about to withdraw from the bond of the defendant, and the defendant started with the deceased to show him certain claimed mining property in order to induce the deceased not to withdraw from the defendant's bond. These claims, it appears, the defendant had agreed to convey to the deceased. No such claims existed. Evidence of these facts were admitted in connection with testimony showing that the deceased and the defendant had started to where the alleged mining property was said to be located—all showing motive. The statement of facts contained in the opinion showed that all the acts admitted in evidence were related and led up to the commission of the main offense for which the defendant was being tried.

In People v. King, 23 Cal. App. 259, 137 P. 1076, the principal case relied upon by the respondent, it appears that the defendant was on trial for embezzlement; that during the course of the trial a witness named Davila was permitted to testify that the defendant, as his agent, in the latter part of the year 1913, had misappropriated and embezzled a certain sum of money; and, further, that the prosecution was permitted to show that in 1908, several years prior to the time of the commission of the offense charged for which the defendant was being tried, he had rented a horse and wagon which he failed to return to the owner, and that as a consequence the defendant was arrested and subsequently pleaded guilty to a charge of misdemeanor and embezzlement, and also permitted a witness named Faria to testify in effect that about a year previous to the trial then being had, the defendant had embezzled the sum of $3 which had been intrusted to him by the witness for the purpose of making the first payment on the purchase price of a horse. According to the opinion of the appellate court, all the testimony just referred to was admitted by the trial court upon the theory that it tended to prove prior offenses similar in character to the crime charged in the information and for which the defendant was being tried, and was therefore admissible for the purpose of showing the guilty intent of the defendant in his dealings with the complaining witness. The appellate court then said:

"We are satisfied that the trial court erred, to the prejudice of the defendant, in admitting the testimony complained of."

The opinion of the appellate court in that case contains the following language, upon which the respondent places much stress in this case:

"It is a well-settled rule of evidence that proof of an offense distinct from and wholly disconnected with the particular crime charged against a defendant is not admissible in evidence. Unquestionably this general rule is subject to certain well-defined exceptions, one of which is that evidence of the commission of similar offenses, although separate and isolated from the crime charged, is admissible for the purpose of showing a guilty intent whenever in any given case the existence of such intent is material and either disputed or doubtful. For instance, in a case where a defendant admits the doing of the act charged in the information but defends upon the ground that such act is free from felonious intent, proof of the commission of precisely similar acts, even though they be independent and disconnected, and were committed either before or after the commission of the crime charged, is relevant and competent for the purpose of showing a guilty intent. Such evidence is admissible as an exception to the general rule upon the theory that if it be shown that a defendant has been repeatedly guilty of similar offenses, it may be reasonably and logically inferred that the act charged against him in the information was accomplished with felonious intent."

The language of the court here referred to, in order to be an accurate statement of the law, should have added thereto the following, which we quote from 8 California Jurisprudence, p. 64, supported by abundant authority:

"Furthermore, in order to render the evidence admissible, it must have a direct tendency, in view of the surrounding circumstances, to prove the motive or intent or other material fact. It is true that it is not necessary that the collateral evidence, whether prior or subsequent, should conclusively prove the guilt of the accused of the offense for the commission of which he is being tried, in order to render it admissible in evidence; but as evidence of another distinct offense manifestly tends to his prejudice, there ought to be some clear connection between the two offenses by which it may be logically inferred that if guilty of one, he is of the other. For example, the shooting of one person by another cannot be proved to show the intent with which the latter shot a third person at a different time, and for a different cause, unless it is also established that the two shootings were so connected in time and place and circumstances as to make them part of one common plan or design. [For example] upon a prosecution for larceny or burglary, with intent to steal, evidence that the defendant had at another time stolen other property is inadmissible to show intent."

In People v. Byrnes, 27 Cal. App. 79, 148 P. 944, the rules which we have above stated covering the admission of such testimony were set forth, and the cause was reversed because of the admission of testimony tending to show the commission of similar offenses not connected with the offense for which the defendant was on trial.

[2, 3] Giving the exception to the rule excluding evidence of other offenses the broadest possible application, it nevertheless remains the law, as declared by all the decisions, that such testimony must have some relation to or bear upon some fact necessary to be established by the prosecution in order to warrant a conviction of the defendant upon the immediate charge pending before the court and upon which he is being tried. It is not sufficient that the defendant has, at some previous time, committed a similar offense. Measured by the rule set forth in the California cases relied upon by the respondent, we do not very well see how it can be logically concluded that the defendant on the night of the 24th of December, 1926, assaulted his wife with a malicious and willful intent to take her life simply because, at a period some 7 or 8 years antedating December 24, 1926, the defendant, after being struck upon the head with a chair, turned and hit his stepdaughter in the face. Nor do we very well perceive how it may be reasonably concluded that the defendant, on the night of the 24th of December, 1926, maliciously and willfully intended to kill his wife because several years prior to his marriage with his then wife he sought to have carnal relations with another woman who had previously thereto illegally assumed with the defendant the relation of wife. That such testimony may establish the all-around bad character of the defendant is clearly apparent, but that it leads or tends to lead to the conclusion that the defendant had any malicious intent to murder his legitimate wife, whom he had married some years after these events, requires at least a higher degree of casuistry than has been accepted by any of the decisions of this country to which our attention has been called. The theory that the defendant intended to dislocate his wife's neck, because, at a time 7 or 8 years previous thereto, he slapped a girl in the face requires only to be stated in bald language in order to carry its own refutation. Nor does it bear in the least upon the question whether the dislocation of the wife's neck, on the night of the 24th of December, 1926, was or was not accidental in any particular whatever. The same is true of the alleged criminal assault upon another woman some 4 years previously. It seems scarcely necessary to cite authorities to show the inadmissibility of such testimony. However, we will review a few cases directly in point establishing the rule to the contrary. The most recent case upon this question is that of People v. Anthony, 185 Cal. 152, 196 P. 47, where the defendant was on trial charged with the offense of lewd and lascivious conduct upon the body of a female child under the age of 14 years. A reversal of this case was ordered because the prosecuting attorney repeatedly asked the defendant if he had not had illicit intercourse with other young girls. Here, no testimony as to such acts was in question, but simply the improper questioning of the defendant as to such occurrences was held sufficient, in an evenly balanced case, to compel a reversal of the judgment and the ordering of a new trial.

In the case of People v. Glass, 158 Cal. 650, 112 P. 281, the questions here presented were considered at length. The defendant was on trial for bribery. Testimony as to other similar, but disconnected offenses, was admitted, and the cause was ordered reversed on account of the error of the court in relation thereto.

In People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 334, 83 P. 43, the rule that we have stated, that there must be some connection between the two offenses in order to permit testimony as to the former, is thus stated. We quote from the syllabus:

"When some distinct offense is so connected with the crime charged in the indictment that proof of the former, in connection with other evidence, would sustain a probable inference of guilt as to the latter, such distinct offense may be proved to show a motive on the part of the defendant to commit the crime charged, or the intent with which an equivocal act was done."

Many cases are cited in the opinion in the Cook Case, all holding substantially as we have stated.

In People v. Carpenter, 136 Cal. 391, 68 P. 1027, the defendant was on trial charged with subornation of perjury. The prosecution was permitted, over the objections of the defendant, to introduce testimony tending to prove that the defendant, prior to the trial of the cause referred to, was guilty of the crime of advising the same witness to conceal himself for the purpose of avoiding the service of a subpoena, and thus of persuading him from attending upon the trial. The court held that this was error, and said:

"Nothing is better settled or more rational than that an indictment for one crime cannot be supported by proof of another."

For this error the cause was reversed.

In the case of People v. Elliott, 119 Cal. 593, 51 P. 955, where the defendant was on trial upon an information on the charge that she willfully, unlawfully, etc., induced an unmarried female into a bawdy house, testimony of three other young girls was allowed to be introduced by the prosecution, over the objection of the defendant, that the defendant had asked each of them to go to her house for illicit purposes. This was held error, necessitating a reversal of the judgment. In the case just cited the alleged offenses were identical in character but not otherwise connected or bearing upon each other.

In People v. Stewart, 85 Cal. 174, 24 P. 722, the defendant was on trial charged with the crime of assault with intent to commit rape. Testimony as to lewd conduct by the defendant with other girls was admitted, over the objection of the defendant. The court held this action reversible error and said:

"The admission of this evidence was clearly reversible error. There is no general rule more firmly settled than that the prosecution cannot prove the commission by a defendant of other offenses, for the purpose of increasing the likelihood that he committed the particular offense with which he is charged."

Here it was necessary to make out the fact of intent before the defendant could be convicted of the offense with which he was charged and the court squarely held that testimony as to other like offenses could not be admitted under the rule because the separate offenses had no relation to or bearing upon each other. Had the different assaults been made upon the same person, then the exception would apply and testimony in relation thereto would be admissible. Likewise, where the offenses are committed in the carrying out of some connected plan or scheme, such testimony, the authorities hold, may be admitted. Without further citation of authorities we may here state that in a lengthy note appended to the case of People v. Molineux, 168 N. Y. 264, 61 N. E. 286, as reported in 62 L. R. A. beginning on page 193, the authorities, dealing with the questions we are here considering, are collected, and the rules which we have set forth clearly established.

[4] The jury found the defendant guilty of involuntary manslaughter, which offense is described as follows:

"The killing of a human being, without malice, in the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony; or, in the commission of a legal act which might produce death, in an unlawful manner, or without due caution and circumspection."

Thus the element of malicious intent has been excluded from this case by the verdict of the jury, and the question they had to decide under the evidence as measured by the offense of which the defendant was found guilty was whether the defendant and his wife had been engaged in a scuffle after having imbibed too freely of intoxicating liquors, or, to put it in other words, engaged in a drunken scuffle, or did the defendant commit what in fact and in law would constitute an assault upon the person of his wife, or was he engaged in some lawful act which might produce death in an unlawful manner, or was he acting without due caution and circumspection. Under such circumstances, was the inadmissible testimony to which we have referred prejudicial? We think this question really answers itself. To introduce to the jury testimony that the defendant was a rough, violent, uncouth, hard-handed man was very well calculated to induce the jury to believe that such a person would at all times act without due caution or circumspection, or without full appreciation of the consequences which might ensue. That conviction would more readily occur if the jury had before it a picture of the rough, uncouth conduct of the defendant previous to the commission of the offense upon which he was being tried, as well as the degraded character which the testimony all tended to establish, seems to us beyond controversy.

We do not need to review the cases or attempt any further explanation or interpretation of the meaning and intent of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution of this state. That is fully covered in the case of People v. Adams, 76 Cal. App. 178, 244 P. 106. Omitting the objectionable testimony, this case does not present one where we can say that the jury could not have reasonably found a verdict other than the one at which they arrived. Under the most favorable circumstances, the admission of such testimony tends to bring about the conviction of a defendant on the ground that such a person needs a good lesson, even though the testimony does not otherwise legally justify conviction upon the charge for which he is being tried.

[5] Appellant also urges that the court erred in permitting the cross-examination of the defendant as to his former marriage with the woman to whom we have referred in this opinion as having had a husband living at the time of her marriage to the defendant. As the cause must go back for retrial for other reasons, it is not necessary to go into this question at length and decide whether the contention of the appellant is or is not well taken as to such error being sufficient ground for reversal. So far as we have been able to ascertain, the cross-examination of the defendant referred to was upon a subject not touched upon in the direct examination of the defendant, or having any relation thereto or bearing upon the same, and the objections of the defendant should have been sustained.

[6] The recent case of People v. Frank, 75 Cal. App. 74, 241 P. 924, deals with the question of the court's examination of a defendant as permitted by section 1323 of the Penal Code, and the reasoning of the court in that case and the decisions cited sufficiently establish that the objections of the appellant should have been sustained. As conducted by the prosecution, the examination sought to show bigamous relations of the defendant and also of the woman passing as his wife. The record is utterly devoid of any testimony from which it could be concluded that there was any thought in the mind of the defendant of making away with his legitimate wife on the night of the 24th of December, 1926, on account of any bigamous or other illicit relations with the woman to whom we have referred. Such being the case, the testimony should have been excluded.

It is further urged that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in his argument before the jury, but as such argument had relation principally to the testimony which we have held should have been excluded, it is not probable that a repetition of such argument will occur, and therefore need not be dwelt upon herein.

The order and judgment of the trial court are reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PEOPLE v. VASQUEZ. (Cr. 976.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 26, 1927.

1. Criminal law ⚡24—One grossly and wantonly reckless in exposing others to danger is held to have intended natural consequences.

One grossly and wantonly reckless in exposing others to danger is held to have intended natural consequences of his act, and guilty of willful and intentional wrong.

2. Criminal law ⚡24—That defendant convicted of assault, drove automobile on dark night without headlights held to justify finding that he intended natural and probable consequences (Vehicle Act, §§ 99, 100; Pen. Code, § 240).

In trial under Pen. Code, § 240, for assault with deadly weapon, uncontradicted evidence that defendant recklessly drove automobile on public highway on very dark night without headlights, in violation of Vehicle Act §§ 99, 100 (St. 1923, p. 546), held to justify jury's finding that he intended natural and probable consequences of such act.

3. Criminal law ⚡1172(8)—Instructions as to felony charges held not prejudicial to defendant convicted of misdemeanor.

Instructions clearly relating to felony charges of assault with deadly weapon and involuntary manslaughter held not prejudicial to defendant, convicted of misdemeanor assault, if erroneous as not stating particular offense of which defendant should be found guilty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Timoteo Vasquez was convicted of assault, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Ira B. Langdon, of Stockton, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem. The defendant was charged by information with the crime of assault with a deadly weapon or instrument and by means and force likely to produce great bodily injury, and in a second count thereof with involuntary manslaughter; both alleged offenses growing out of the same transaction. The defendant entered a plea of "not guilty" on each count, the cause was tried, and the jury returned a verdict of "not guilty" on each one of the felony charges, but found the defendant guilty of assault. The court sentenced him to pay a fine of $500 and to imprisonment in the county jail of Stanislaus county for the term of six months, and from this judgment defendant appeals.

Appellant contends that there is no evidence to sustain the verdict of guilty of assault, because there was no intent shown to commit the offense.

The facts are as follows: About 9 o'clock on the evening of July 30, 1926, the defendant was driving a motorcar on a public highway of Stanislaus county. He was driving on the right-hand side of the road, but without headlights, and the evidence discloses that it was a dark night. About 500 feet west of the city limits of Modesto his car struck some object, and he stopped his car and got out to investigate. About 225 feet west from where the defendant stopped his car several state traffic officers were testing headlights. They heard the impact of the car against the object it had struck, and immediately ran to the scene, and, by the aid of flash lights discovered there was a man under the car. They immediately lifted the car from him and carried him to the side of the road. He was bleeding from a cut on the head and was unconscious. He was recognized by one of the traffic officers as one Clarence Knowles. While the officers were endeavoring to render aid to Knowles, another automobile approached them from the west, traveling at a high rate of speed, and, before the officers could move the unconscious man from its path, it struck him and dragged him about 13 feet, and, when the officers again reached him, he died before they could pick him up or render any assistance.

Defendant testified that his lights had gone out about three-quarters of an hour before he hit Knowles, and that he had tried to fix them, but was unable to do so, and he thereupon resumed driving, and was proceeding at the rate of about 8 or 10 miles an hour when his car struck Knowles.

The witness Randall testified that he had seen the defendant shortly before he struck Knowles, and he was driving without headlights, and the witness Morrison stated that defendant said his lights went out when he hit Knowles.

The crime of assault is defined by section 240 of the Penal Code, as follows:

"An assault is an unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability, to commit a violent injury on the person of another."

The court instructed the jury that the necessary elements of the crime of assault are three: The intent to commit a violent injury on the person assaulted, a present ability to do so, and, in addition, the actual attempt to commit such injury.

[1] Counsel for appellant contends that no intent was shown by the evidence, and therefore one of the essential elements of the crime was lacking. This question, so far as we are advised, has not been before the Supreme or appellate courts of this state, where the alleged assault was committed with an automobile, but there are many decisions from other jurisdictions where it has been held that, where a party intentionally does an unlawful act, such as driving a car at a reckless rate of speed or at nighttime without lights, or on the wrong side of the road, the party may be convicted of the crime of assault.

In Bleiweiss v. State, 188 Ind. 184, 119 N. E. 375, 122 N. E. 577, it is said:

"There can be no doubt that an assault and battery may be committed by striking another with an automobile (Luther v. State [1912] 177 Ind. 619, 624, 98 N. E. 640), although, of course, there must be some evidence of a criminal intent. 'But the intent may be inferred from circumstances which legitimately permit it. Intent to injure may not be implied from a lack of ordinary care. It may be from intentional acts, where the injury was the direct result of them, done under circumstances showing a reckless disregard for the safety of others, and a willingness to inflict the injury, or the commission of an unlawful act which leads directly * * * to the injury.' Luther v. State, supra, 177 Ind. 625, 98 N. E. 642."

And upon a rehearing (188 Ind. 186, 122 N. E. 577) the court applied to the defendant's conduct the well-recognized common-law rule "that the law holds him to have intended the natural and probable consequences of his unlawful and reckless acts."

In Brimhall v. State, 255 P. 165, the Supreme Court of Arizona said:

"Where a party intentionally does an unlawful act, such as driving his car at a reckless rate of speed, or at nighttime without headlights, or on the wrong side of the road, * * * and while so violating a positive law recklessly and wantonly, and without regard for the life and limb of others, runs into and injures another person, the rule seems to be that his conduct imputes to him * * * to do what in fact he does do; and, in such circumstances, the courts unhesitatingly hold such party guilty of manslaughter, and we see no good reason why he may not be held for the lesser offense of aggravated assault."

In Banks v. Braman, 188 Mass. 367, 74 N. E. 594, it is said:

"The law is regardful of human life and personal safety, and if one is grossly and wantonly reckless in exposing others to danger, it holds him to have intended the natural consequences of his act, and treats him as guilty of a willful and intentional wrong."

The foregoing rule has been sustained in Shorter v. State, 147 Tenn. 355, 247 S. W. 985; State v. Lewis, 4 Pennewill (Del.) 332, 55 A. 3, and State v. Schutte, 87 N. J. Law, 15, 93 A. 112.

[2] Applying the foregoing principle, which we believe is sound, to the facts of this case, the evidence shows without contradiction that the defendant, on a very dark night, on a public highway of this state, was driving an automobile without headlights, in violation of sections 99 and 100 of the California Vehicle Act (Stats. 1923, p. 517), and the jury were justified in holding that by such conduct on his part he intended the natural and probable consequences of his unlawful and reckless act.

Appellant further complains of certain instructions given by the court and of its failure to give other instructions offered by the defendant, but, as they all relate to the question of specific intent, the foregoing opinion answers the objections raised.

[3] Objection is also made that certain instructions given by the court are uncertain and misleading in that they conclude with the language, "you should find the defendant guilty," or similar expressions, and without stating of which particular offense the defendant should be found guilty. In our opinion the instructions are not subject to the criticism, but, conceding that counsel is correct in his view, the instructions clearly relate to the felony charges contained in the information, and, as defendant was convicted of the lower offense of misdemeanor, prejudicial error cannot be predicated thereon.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Corporations ⇐425(5)—Corporation which went into possession of premises and paid rent for 6 months cannot defend action for rent by denying secretary's authority to execute lease.

In action against corporation to recover rentals under lease, defendant is estopped from raising defense that secretary executing lease was without authority to execute it, where company went into possession and paid rent for 6 months, since relation of landlord and tenant arose, irrespective of lease.

Allowance or disallowance of amendment of answer in midst of trial is within sound discretion of trial court, and its ruling will not be disturbed unless such discretion has been clearly abused.

3. Pleading ⇐236(3)—Refusal to allow amendment of answer during midst of trial to set up defense of fraud in execution of lease held not abuse of discretion.

In action against corporation to recover rentals under written lease, refusal of trial court to allow defendant to amend answer in midst of trial so as to set up defense of fraud in execution of lease held not abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by Gerald H. Hagar and another against the Home Stores, Inc. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fabian D. Brown, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George M. Naus and Hugh Kenneth Forsman, both of Oakland, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. [1-3] Action to recover certain rentals under a written lease entered into by appellant corporation, as lessee, and one J. A. Turgeon, as lessor, on May 1, 1925. The lease was for a term of 3 years from the date thereof and provided for a monthly rental of $100. At the time it was entered into, the property therein described was owned by said lessor, but was subsequently transferred and conveyed by him to respondents herein. Appellant occupied the premises from the date of the execution of the lease until about December 1, 1925, when it vacated them and refused to pay any further rentals. At the time the action was commenced 5 months' rental had accrued and was unpaid, and before the action was brought to trial an additional 2 months' rental had accrued. A supplemental complaint was filed to recover for the additional term, making the total claim $700 at the date of the trial. Plaintiff recovered judgment for this amount, from which judgment this appeal has been taken. The points urged for reversal are (1) that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment, and (2) that the court erred in refusing to allow defendant to amend its answer so as to set up the defense of fraud in the execution of the lease. In support of the first contention it is claimed that as a necessary requisite to support the judgment it was incumbent upon respondents to have proved that the lease was executed by the corporation. It appeared at the trial that the lease was executed on the part of the company in the following manner: "Home Stores, Inc., by C. H. Brown, Secretary," with the corporation seal attached. It is appellant's claim that while this prima facie evidence was sufficient to prove the execution of the lease by defendant company, it became insufficient when such company offered indisputable evidence to the effect that the secretary of the corporation had no power, under the by-laws of the corporation, to execute instruments under seal.

The by-law which was introduced in evidence contained a provision that when any instrument was signed by the secretary it should be countersigned by the president or one of the vice presidents of the company. It also appeared in evidence, however, that the company occupied the premises and paid the rent from the date of the lease until the following November. Under these circumstances, the company is estopped from raising this defense. Assuming want of authority in the secretary to execute the lease on behalf of the company, the relation of landlord and tenant nevertheless arose, irrespective of the lease, when the company went into possession and enjoyed the use and occupation of the premises. Newton v. Johnston Organ, etc., Co., 180 Cal. 185, 180 P. 7; McQuaide v. Enterprise Brewing Co., 14 Cal. App. 315, 111 P. 927; 24 Cyc. 883. Nor is there any merit in the contention that the court erred in refusing to allow defendant to amend its answer at the trial.

The allowance or disallowance of an amendment in the midst of a trial is within the sound discretion of the trial court, and its ruling will not be disturbed unless it clearly appears that such discretion has been abused, and here there is no such showing. Allen v. Los Molinos Land Co., 25 Cal. App. 206, 143 P. 253; Milliken v. Valencia, 47 Cal. App. 16, 189 P. 1049. There is no merit in the appeal.

BORDEN et al. v. THOMAS, Marshal, et al.
(Civ. 5733.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 27, 1927.

Courts  472(7)—Los Angeles municipal court and Santa Monica justice court have concurrent jurisdiction of suit, involving under $300, against residents of latter city (Const. art. 6, § 5; Municipal Court Act, § 29).

Under Const. art. 6, § 5, and Municipal Court Act (St. 1925, p. 658), § 29, Los Angeles municipal court and the justice court in Santa Monica, Los Angeles county, have concurrent jurisdiction of suit, involving less than $300, against residents of latter city.

Application by Lewis E. Borden and another, individually and as copartners doing business under the firm name and style of the Peerless Dye Works, for a writ of prohibition to Charles R. Thomas, Marshal of the Municipal Court of the City of Los Angeles, and others. Writ discharged.

F. W. Shapleigh, of Santa Monica, and Charles E. Salisbury, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, and R. C. McAllister, Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents Municipal Court and Charles R. Thomas.

W. H. Thomas, of Los Angeles, for respondent Yale.

HOUSER, J. As disclosed by the prayer of the petition herein, the purpose of petitioners is to prohibit the respondent municipal court from proceeding in an action therein pending in which respondent Yale is the plaintiff and the petitioners herein are the defendants. From the petition it also appears that each of such defendants is a resident of the city of Santa Monica, of the county of Los Angeles, in which said city is located a justice court, and that the amount involved in such action is a sum less than $300—of which amount, as well as of the subject-matter of the action, the justice court would have jurisdiction.

The ultimate point urged by petitioners is that the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles is without jurisdiction.

With one exception the identical points raised by petitioners herein were urged in the case of Burge v. Municipal Court of the City of Los Angeles (Cal. App.) 258 P. 164, and therein adverse rulings were made as against each of petitioners' several contentions, including that of the constitutionality of the act in question. Among other things, it is there held in substance that in an action arising in the county of Los Angeles, where the amount involved is no more than $1,000, the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles has jurisdiction.

In the Burge Case neither of the defendants was a resident of the city of Los Angeles; the action, as in the case at bar, was brought in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles, and the amount involved therein was the sum of $800. The only fact in the instant case which would differentiate it from the Burge Case is that the amount involved in the action upon which this proceeding is founded is less than $300, and, consequently, that in ordinary circumstances the justice court would be presumed to have jurisdiction thereof.

Section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution provides in part that:

"The process of any municipal court shall extend to all parts of the county * * * in which the city is situated where such court is established."

Section 29 of the Municipal Court Act (Stats. 1925, p. 648) includes the following provisions:

"* * * Each municipal court shall have exclusive original jurisdiction of all cases at law in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to $1,000 or less. * * * Each municipal court shall have concurrent original jurisdiction with the superior court or the justices' courts of all such cases arising within the county in which such court is situated. * * *

Assuming the correctness of the several rulings in the Burge Case, it would follow from the constitutional provision and the language of the statute to which reference has been had that the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles has concurrent jurisdiction with the justice court located within the city of Santa Monica, in the county of Los Angeles.

The writ should be discharged; it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. ROBERTS. (Cr. 983.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 29, 1927.

1. Embezzlement $\S$ 26—Indictment for embezzlement that on specified date defendant, as agent and bailee of corporation, feloniously appropriated its money to use not in lawful execution of his trust, held sufficient (Pen. Code, $\S$ 504).

Indictment for embezzlement, alleging that on specified date, defendant, as agent and bailee of named corporation, was intrusted with money of such corporation, and on day specified feloniously appropriated such money to use not in lawful execution of his trust, held sufficient under Pen. Code, $\S$ 504.

2. Embezzlement $\S$ 35—Proof of cashing of check held not at variance with allegation of embezzlement of money.

Proof in embezzlement prosecution, that defendant received checks and cashed them in usual course of business, held not at variance with allegation of indictment of embezzlement of money.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 369(5)—Evidence of prior embezzlements, held competent to show general shortage, where defendant used money to cover previous shortages.

Evidence of prior embezzlements held competent for purpose of showing a general shortage, where defendant used money alleged to have been embezzled to cover up previous shortages, and fact that previous shortages were barred by statute of limitations was immaterial.

4. Witnesses $\S$ 277(4)—Cross-examination as to embezzlements prior to date testified on direct examination held proper, where money was used to cover previous shortages.

Where defendant in embezzlement prosecution testified on direct examination that he had taken no money since certain date, cross-examination showing that sums had been taken prior to such date was proper, where evidence showed that money alleged to have been taken was used to cover up previous shortages.

5. Witnesses $\S$ 277(4)—Cross-examination on details of subject testified generally by defendant held proper as testing truth of defendant's statement in chief.

Where entire direct examination of defendant in embezzlement prosecution was statement that he had taken no money since specified date, thus testifying generally on subject, cross-examination as to prior embezzlement was proper as testing truth of defendant's statement in chief.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 1170½(5)—Cross-examination consisting of questions and answers carrying no meaning held not prejudicial.

Cross-examination of defendant, though beyond scope of direct, was not prejudicial where questions and answers carried no meaning.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 1186(4)—Cross-examination, though erroneous, held not to result in miscarriage of justice, in view of evidence of defendant's guilt (Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½).

Though extending scope of cross-examination beyond that of direct was erroneous, no miscarriage of justice resulted under Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½, in view of evidence of defendant's guilt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County, J. B. Landis, Judge.

W. M. Roberts was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

K. D. Robinson, of Auburn, and Wallace Shepard, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem. The defendant, W. M. Roberts, was convicted on two charges of embezzlement, and was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. The charging part of the first count of the information is as follows:

"That the defendant 'was the agent and bailee of Pacific Gas & Electric Company, a private corporation organized under the laws of the state of California and doing business in Placer county, Cal., and by said corporation intrusted with and having in his possession and under his control the sum of $6,498, lawful money of the United States, by virtue of his said trust, then and there the property of said Pacific Gas & Electric Company, a corporation, did then and there, to wit, on the 10th day of August, 1925, at Auburn, in the said county of Placer, state of California, willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and fraudulently embezzle and appropriate said money to a use and purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his said trust, as such agent, bailee, and person intrusted with and having said money in his possession and under his control."

The second count is the same in substance as the first, except the crime is alleged to have been committed on October 12, 1925, and the amount alleged to have been embezzled the sum of $1,885.50.

The evidence shows the the Pacific Gas & Electric Company is a California corporation, and at all the times herein mentioned was engaged in the business of furnishing water to the public for irrigation. We will hereafter refer to it as the water company.

The evidence further shows that at all of the times herein mentioned until January 6, 1926, the defendant was the division accountant for the water company, and as such officer in charge of its office at Auburn, Placer county, and in full charge of all the accounts for the irrigation water furnished by the water company to its consumers, and also the collection of the money therefor. The method of handling these accounts was as follows: Prospective water users were sent blank applications to fill in for the number of inches of water they desired. On signing and returning these applications to the water company, they were entered by the latter in a book called "the Register of Irrigation Accounts," and there carried in dollars and cents as due from the consumer to the water company. The irrigation season was divided into five months from May to September, both inclusive, and the charge for water to the consumer was $9 per inch per month.

The water company maintained another department called the "water department," where there was kept a record of all the water actually furnished the consumer, but this department was not under the charge of the defendant. In the due course of business, the water department furnished the accounting department each month a record of the number of inches of water actually furnished to each consumer. Among others, the water company furnished water to the Silva-Bergtholdt Company of Newcastle and to the Penryn Fruit Company of Penryn.

On August 7, 1925, the Silva-Bergtholdt Company issued and mailed to the water company, in payment of the May and June 1925, water account its check for $6,498. The check was indorsed with the water company's name with a rubber stamp indorsement, and cleared through the Capital National Bank of Sacramento on August 12, 1925, and returned in due course to the Silva-Bergtholdt Company. The last-named company was not credited on the books of the water company with this amount, until in January, 1926, after the defendant was out of the employ of the water company.

On August 11, 1925, there was deposited in the Placer County Bank at Auburn to the credit of the water company $6,129.85. There was also issued by the said bank at said time a draft in favor of the water company for $368.15. The evidence also shows that the check of the Silva-Bergtholdt Company was given to the bank in payment of these amounts. On the last-named date four credit items appear on the books of the water company aggregating said sum of $6,129.85; one of these items being a credit to the Newcastle Fruit Growers' Association in the sum of $3,958 and another item is a credit to the Penryn Fruit Company in the sum of $1,311. Both of these items appear on the books of the water company to be for payments for balance due to the water company for water furnished during the year 1924. But, as a matter of fact, both companies had paid their 1924 water bill in full long prior to the date on which they were given credit therefor on the books of the water company.

In support of the charge alleged in the second count, the evidence shows that the Penryn Fruit Company issued and mailed to the water company, on October 12, 1925, its check for $1,885.50, and that it was deposited to the credit of the water company on November 2, 1925, in the following form: Cash, $582.49; a draft to the Pacific Fruit Company for $342.16, the latter being given to the Pacific Fruit Company in payment of a debt by the water company to it. There was another draft issued at the same time to the water company for $960.41. The Penryn Fruit Company had been furnished water to the amount of $1,885.50, but was not given credit on the books of the company therefor until in January, 1926, after the defendant was out of the employ of the water company.

The evidence further discloses that it was the duty of the defendant upon the receipt of money to credit it on the books of the water company to the party paying and to deposit the amount to the credit of the water company in the bank.

Evidence was also received that during the years from 1918 to 1923, inclusive, except during the year 1921, a large number of payments, made to the water company for water furnished by it to its consumers, were embezzled by the defendant. These payments aggregate many thousands of dollars more than the items which are specifically charged by the indictment to have been embezzled by the defendant. None of these items, however, were within three years prior to the filing of the indictment.

On January 7, 1926, the defendant stated to H. E. Sheldon, the traveling auditor of the water company, that he had confessed to Mr. Cooper that he was short in his accounts and that he had also told Mr. Cooper that Mr. Sheldon knew all about it.

Mr. Cooper, division manager of the water company, testified that defendant had told him that there was something wrong, and he wanted him to know it. Defendant also stated to E. W. Hodges, general auditor of the water company, that there was a shortage and said that he would make restitution to the amount of his financial ability. He later gave Mr. Hodges a list of his financial assets, and did make transfers of his property to representatives of the water company.

The defendant became a witness in his own behalf, and testified in response to a question asked him by his counsel that he had never taken a dollar from the company since December 17, 1923.

[1] The appellant contends that the indictment is uncertain, and his demurrer thereto should have been sustained; the specific objection being that it does not state the conditions of the trust, nor the purpose for which the money came into the defendant's possession, nor to what purpose or use not in the due and lawful execution of his trust he appropriated it.

The indictment is framed under section 504 of the Penal Code, which so far as is material to this case, reads as follows:

"Every officer, director, trustee, clerk, servant or agent of any association, society, or corporation (public or private), who fraudulently appropriates to any use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust, any property which he has in his possession or under his control by virtue of his trust, or secretes it with a fraudulent intent to appropriate it to such use or purpose, is guilty of embezzlement."

Appellant cites in support of this point the case of People v. McMahon, 4 Cal. App. 225, 87 P. 404, but in that case the indictment does not set forth the crime either in the language of the statute, nor does it allege the facts necessary to show that the offense denounced by the statute had been committed.

In People v. Terrill, 127 Cal. 99, 59 P. 836, it is said:

"It is an elementary principle of criminal law that the indictment or information must state that a crime has been committed, either by direct and positive averment in the language of the statute or its equivalent, or by stating facts which show that such crime has been committed."

Viewing the indictment in the instant case in the light of the above section and of these decisions, both counts allege that on a specified date the defendant was the agent and bailee of a named private corporation and as such agent and bailee he was intrusted with a specific sum of money, being the property of said corporation, and that on the day specified he feloniously and fraudulently appropriated such money to a use and purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his said trust as such agent. This is sufficient to answer the requirements of the statute; the conditions of the trust, the purpose for which the money came into defendant's possession, and to what use he appropriated it, being matters of proof.

[2] It is also claimed that there is a material variance between the allegations of the indictment and the proof, in that the former alleges the embezzlement of money and the proof shows, if anything, the embezzlement of a check, but this contention has been directly answered in People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 472, 98 P. 194. It is there held in a prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses the fact that the money was obtained by the defendant is sufficiently shown to sustain a conviction, by evidence that the prosecuting witness gave a check therefor to the defendant, and further evidence indicating that such check had been cashed in the usual course of business.

In the case at bar, the defendant received the checks and thereafter cashed them in the usual course of business, and this is sufficient proof to sustain the allegations of the indictment, and does not constitute a variance.

[3] Objection is also made that the court erred in admitting evidence of other and distinct offenses than those charged in the indictment; the contention being that evidence of another crime is not admissible to prove the charge alleged, and for the further reason that all of the said offenses were barred by the statute of limitations. Respondent claims that such evidence was properly admitted to show a general shortage, and because the money which it is alleged was embezzled by the defendant had been used to cover up the previous shortages.

This case is similar in its facts to the cases of People v. Rowland, 12 Cal. App. 6, 106 P. 428, and People v. Forman, 67 Cal. App. 693, 228 P. 378.

Counsel for appellant undertakes to differentiate between these two cases and the one at bar because in the cases cited the indictments allege the secretion of the money embezzled, while in the instant case there is no allegation of secretion. But this contention is without merit and is answered in the Rowland Case, supra, in this language:

"So, as stated, if, in the case here, the money was either secreted within the meaning of the statute, or used to cover up other shortage or actually taken from the vaults of the bank and used in some transaction with which the bank had no connection, the crime is, in either event, proved."

This language is cited with approval in the Forman Case, supra. Further, in this case there is no attempt to either allege or prove the secretion of the money embezzled. The facts of the Forman Case are as follows: Forman was the cashier of a freight office of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, and received from a shipper a check in payment of certain specific freight charges. He receipted the original freight bills of the shipper and then and there deposited the checks in the bank to the credit of the railroad company, but, instead of making any entry in the cash book of the railroad company of the payment of said freight bills of said shipper, wrongfully carried those bills as being unpaid and credited the amount represented by the check to the payment of other freight bills of said shipper, which, in fact, had been previously paid, but upon which credit of payment had not been given, for the reason that the money which had been received by the railroad company in payment thereof had been previously embezzled by the said defendant. This was held to constitute the crime of embezzlement. The evidence of other embezzlements was competent for the purpose of showing a general shortage where, as in this case, the money wrongfully taken was used to cover up previous shortages. People v. Rowland, supra; People v. Forman, supra; People v. Wardwell (Cal. App.) 246 P. 97.

While it is true that no exact balance was struck showing a specific amount of the general shortage, the amount which was actually short was many thousands of dollars more than the amount alleged in the indictment to have been embezzled. Nor does the fact that the previous shortages were barred by the statute of limitations make any difference, as the money used to cover up these previous defalcations was not barred by limitations. In the Forman Case, a somewhat similar contention was advanced, but the court negated the claim in the following language:

"The concluding point made by appellant is that, if the appellant was guilty of any crime at all, it was that of the embezzlement of the smaller amounts, which constituted a misdemeanor, part of which were repaid by the appellant out of the amount represented by the check in question, and that, since those smaller amounts were appropriated by the appellant more than a year prior to the date of the finding of the indictment, the misdemeanors resulting from said transactions were barred by the statute of limitations. It is obvious, we think, without discussion, and from what has already been said, that appellant was not charged with embezzlement of the smaller amounts, but with the misappropriation on November 5, 1923, of the sum of $6,468.54, in lawful money of the United States; therefore there is no merit in the point last made."

[4-6] The last claim urged for a reversal is that the court committed prejudicial error in permitting counsel for the people to cross-examine the defendant as to matters which it is claimed he had not testified to in chief. On his direct examination his counsel asked the defendant the following question:

"Q. Will you state whether or not, at any time in three years, from and after December 17, 1923, you ever took a dollar of the money of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company? Ans. Not a dollar since December 17, 1923."

The foregoing was the entire direct examination of the defendant.

The appellant claims that the cross-examination of the defendant as to the acts which had taken place prior to December 17, 1923, was improper and prejudicial, but, the defendant having testified that he had taken no money from the company since December 17, 1923, it was proper to allow the district attorney to show what sums of money had been taken prior to that time, as the evidence already before the court showed that the money alleged in the indictment to have been taken was used to cover up these shortages, and that, having testified generally upon the subject, it was proper that the cross-examination should be permitted to go into the details as testing the truth of the defendant's statement in chief. Furthermore, a consideration of the questions asked on cross-examination, together with the answer elicited to the questions, could not have been prejudicial to the defendant, because those answers carried no meaning. As an example, a question was asked:

"I show you these check, * * * and will ask you if these checks didn't pay in full for the money set out on your books owing to the Pacific Gas & Electric Company by the Penryn Fruit Company?"

And the answer was:

"There is no way to determine."

[7] However, if error be conceded and that the scope of the cross-examination was broader than it should have been under a strict interpretation of the law, the evidence, which includes admissions of shortages made by the defendant, satisfies us that said examination did not result in a miscarriage of justice under the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, and that the defendant was properly convicted.

No substantial error appearing in the record, the judgment and the order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Action by the Safeway Stores, Inc., against W. A. Buhlinger. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

I. W. Stewart and Arvin B. Shaw, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henry G. Bodkin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. On April 6, 1922, the appellant corporation (under the then name of "Sam Seelig Company") made and executed to George Helwig and W. A. Buhlinger a lease of certain floor space in appellant's store on Santa Monica boulevard, in the city of Los Angeles, for the period of 8 years from May 1, 1922. Paragraph 7 of said lease contained the following provision:

"This lease, or any part thereof, shall not be assigned, by operation of law, or otherwise, nor any part of said premises sublet, without the written consent of the lessor; * * * no waiver of a breach of any covenant, agreement or provision herein contained shall be construed as a waiver of any subsequent breach of the same or any other covenant, agreement or provision. * * *

It is admitted that the respondent and Helwig were copartners, and that on or about November 1, 1922, respondent purchased Helwig's interest in the business and in the lease, and that the latter assigned all of his right, title, and interest therein to the respondent. Thereafter Helwig had no interest in the business, nor in the leasehold, and he visited the store only occasionally, for the purpose of buying merchandise from his ex-partner.

The lease contained a common provision giving the lessor the right to declare the term ended and to re-enter the premises in case of default in the payment of rent or in the performance of any of its covenants or provisions. On March 10, 1925, the appellant notified respondent, in writing, as follows:

"* * * It has just come to the knowledge of the undersigned that a part of the lease hereinafter mentioned, to wit, the interest of George Helwig therein, has heretofore been assigned without the consent of the lessor and in violation of the terms of said lease, and that thereby said lease has been terminated, and you are hereby notified to quit said premises and to restore the possession of said premises to the undersigned. * * * You are hereby required to deliver over said premises to the undersigned within 3 days after the service upon you of this notice, and in default thereof action will be commenced to recover possession thereof, together with such damages as the undersigned will be entitled to recover."

Respondent continued in possession of the premises, and on April 4, 1925, appellant commenced this action for restitution, damages, attorney's fees and costs. Appellant alleged in its complaint that the assignment from Helwig to Buhlinger constituted a violation of the covenant against assignment or transfer of a part of the lease, that it was made without the plaintiff's consent in writing or otherwise, that the plaintiff had no knowledge of said assignment prior to March 9, 1925, and that the defendant unlawfully held and continued in possession, without the plaintiff's consent, all of which respondent denied in his answer. Upon a trial before the superior court without a jury, each of the allegations of the complaint last mentioned was found to be untrue, judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

[1-3] The only question necessary for decision of this case is as to whether or not a breach of one of the conditions of the lease resulted from the assignment of Helwig's interest to respondent, without the consent of the lessor. That such was not the legal effect is clear from the principles laid down in Spangler v. Spangler, 11 Cal. App. 321, 104 P. 995, and Randol v. Tatum, 98 Cal. 390, 33 P. 433. But appellant insists that the lease here in question may be differentiated from those involved in the decisions mentioned, in that there the covenant was against assignment of any part of the lease. Language not distinguishable from this was employed in the lease passed upon in Adelstein v. Greenberg (Cal. App.) 247 P. 520, wherein it was provided that an assignment "of this lease or any interest therein" was prohibited upon penalty of forfeiture, but the principle running through all of these cases is that an assignment by one joint lessee to another does not violate a covenant against assignment of the lease or an interest therein, because it requires the joint act of the colessee to effect an assignment, whereas in the case of one lessee assigning to the other the joint act does not occur. See, also, Jameson v. Chanslor-Canfield Co., 176 Cal. 1, 167 P. 369. It follows that only where assignment is made to a stranger to the original agreement is the covenant against assignment violated.

Where there is a claim made that a forfeiture of rights under a written instrument has occurred, the burden of proof is upon the party making the point "to show that such was the unmistakable intention of the instrument" (Quatman v. McCray, 128 Cal. 285, 60 P. 855); "and that the courts tenaciously cling to the rule that forfeiture of estates and restraints upon alienations should not be enforced except when the terms of the conditions are so plain as to be beyond the province of construction" (Stratford Co. v. Continental Mortg. Co., 74 Cal. App. 551, 241 P. 429). In the latter case a hearing in the Supreme Court was denied. The plaintiff has not brought itself within either branch of the rule above quoted, hence the judgment should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

In re MAHONEY'S ESTATE.

MAHONEY et al. v. CITIZENS' TRUST & SAVINGS BANK. (Civ. 5840.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Sept. 28, 1927.

1. Wills ⚡249—Husband's domicile held not that of wife suing for divorce, so as to give probate court at his domicile exclusive jurisdiction to probate wife's will (Civ. Code, § 129, as amended by St. 1925, p. 482; Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 2978).

In view of Civ. Code, § 129, as amended by St. 1925, p. 482, and Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 2978, domicile of wife, residing in Texas at time of her death while her divorce suit was pending therein, was not that of husband in Illinois, so as to give probate court of latter state original, primary, and exclusive jurisdiction to probate will, and preclude appointment of nominee of executors securing probate of will in Texas, as administrator with will annexed in California.

2. Executors and administrators ⚡21(1)—Surviving spouse, being relative, can nominate administrator with will annexed, only if entitled to personal estate (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1350a, 1365, subd. 1).

Surviving husband or wife being relative of deceased, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1365, subd. 1, is entitled to administer estate or nominate another to administer or apply for letters of administration with will annexed, under section 1350a, only when entitled to succeed to personal estate or portion thereof.

3. Executors and administrators ⚡21(1)—Husband expressly excluded from succession by will of wife residing in another state, cannot nominate administrator with will annexed (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1350a, 1365, subd. 1).

Surviving husband, expressly excluded from succession to any part of wife's estate by her will, could not assert his dower rights, under law of his domicile, to wife's property in another state, wherein she resided at time of death, nor in California, and hence could not administer estate or nominate administrator with will annexed, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1350a, 1365, subd. 1.

4. Executors and administrators ⚡21(1)—Foreign executor's nominee may be appointed administrator with will annexed at court's discretion, in absence of application by one with prior right (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1365, 1379).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1379, letters of administration with will annexed may be granted to competent appointee, not otherwise entitled thereto, on written request of foreign executor, at court's discretion, in absence of application by person with prior right under section 1365.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Petitions by the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank and by the Pacific-Southwest Trust & Savings Bank, as nominee of Joseph P. Mahoney, for letters of administration with the will of Nonie Boren Mahoney, deceased, annexed. From a judgment and orders admitting the will to probate, appointing the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank as administrator, denying the contest of Joseph P. Mahoney, and overruling his objections to the probate of the will, he and the Pacific-Southwest Trust & Savings Bank appeal. Affirmed.

Hahn & Hahn, of Pasadena, for appellants.

Holland, Bartlett, Thornton & Chilton, of Dallas, Tex., and Zach Lamar Cobb and Earl A. Littlejohns, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. The contestants appeal from the judgment and orders of the trial court admitting a foreign will to probate, appointing Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank administrator with the will annexed, denying the contest of Joseph P. Mahoney, and overruling his objections to probate of said foreign will.

On May 28, 1926, respondent, Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation of Los Angeles, at the request of the executors, filed its petition for letters of administration with the will annexed, together with a copy of the will and an order admitting the same to probate in Dallas county, Tex., duly authenticated, as required by the provisions of section 1323 of the Code of Civil Procedure. On September 13, 1926, Joseph P. Mahoney, the surviving husband of the decedent, filed his amended special appearance for the purpose of objecting to the court's jurisdiction, and to the right of petitioner Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank to letters of administration with the will annexed, and alleging that Joseph P. Mahoney and decedent, Nonie Boren Mahoney, were husband and wife at the time of her death, and that they were domiciled in Chicago, Ill.; further alleging that on the 31st day of August, 1926, he had filed a petition with the probate court of Cook county, state of Illinois, requesting the probate of said will of the above-named decedent in said court; that said court had original and primary jurisdiction to order the probate of said will of said decedent; and that as soon as said letters were granted said petitioner would designate some proper person residing in Los Angeles county to petition the court for ancillary letters of administration with the will annexed. Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank filed an answer to said amended contest, denying the allegations therein, and alleging that Nonie Boren Mahoney was at the time of her death and for many years prior thereto permanently separated from the contestant Joseph P. Mahoney; that she had established and during all of said years had maintained her home and domicile upon property owned by her in her separate right and estate located in the city of Dallas, county of Dallas, state of Texas, that the said decedent voted in Dallas county, Tex., every year since women were given the franchise in Texas up to the date of her death, namely, from 1919 to 1926; that decedent filed suit in the district court of Dallas county, Tex., for a divorce against her husband, Joseph P. Mahoney, on April 6, 1921; that said case resulted in a mistrial, and that on September 29, 1923, the decedent dismissed said case; that on February 16, 1924, decedent filed in the district court of Dallas county, Tex., a second suit for divorce, and that said suit was pending at the time of the death of said decedent; and denying that Joseph P. Mahoney was entitled to succeed to a portion of the estate of said decedent; and alleging that by the express terms of the will decedent provided that no part of her estate should be permitted to pass into the hands of said Joseph P. Mahoney.

The issues raised by the petition for letters by the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank and the amended contest of Joseph P. Mahoney were tried on the 14th day of September, 1926, and taken under advisement. On the 6th day of November, 1926, the Pacific-Southwest Trust & Savings Bank filed its petition as the nominee of Joseph P. Mahoney, husband of decedent, for letters of administration with the will annexed, together with an exemplified copy of the will and of the order admitting the will to probate in the probate court of Cook county, Ill., which were introduced in evidence, together with the nomination of the Pacific-Southwest Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation, by Joseph P. Mahoney, to act as the administrator with the will annexed, which was filed November 15, 1926. The court then had before it for consideration the petition of the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles as the nominee of the Texas executors of the will, and the petition of Pacific-Southwest Trust & Savings Bank as the nominee of Joseph P. Mahoney, husband of decedent. The court thereupon denied the petition of the Pacific-Southwest Trust & Savings Bank and granted the petition of the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank. The court made its findings that Nonie Boren Mahoney died on the 20th day of March, 1926, in the county of Kaufman, state of Texas; that at the time of her death and for a long time prior thereto she was a resident of and domiciled in the county of Dallas, state of Texas; that said decedent left a written will with a codicil thereto; that said will and codicil were duly proved, allowed, and admitted to probate in the county court of the county of Dallas, state of Texas; that said court at the time of making said order was a court of competent jurisdiction and had jurisdiction of said matter and of all persons interested in the estate of said decedent; that said will was executed according to the laws of the state of Texas, in which state it was made and in conformity with the laws of the state of California; that a duly authenticated copy of the will and codicil and the probate thereof in the county court of the county of Dallas, state of Texas, was presented by the petitioner Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank and filed in the records and papers of said cause. The court further found, as to the contest of Joseph P. Mahoney, that he was the husband of said decedent, and a resident of the city of Chicago, county of Cook, state of Illinois; that said contestant was not entitled to succeed to any portion of the estate of said decedent which is situated in the state of California; that the county court of Dallas county, Tex., had jurisdiction to admit the last will of the said decedent to probate; and that the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank is one of the persons enumerated in section 1365 of the Code of Civil Procedure who is entitled to letters of administration with the will annexed in the above-entitled matter.

It appears that Joseph P. Mahoney and the decedent were married at Dallas, Tex., on January 31, 1899, and soon thereafter took up their residence in the city of Chicago. That Mrs. Mahoney first began to travel and stay away from home in 1904 or 1905. That beginning with the year 1910, and to and including 1919, she spent more than six months each year away from the home of her husband. The last time she was at her husband's home was in September, 1919. That during all of this time and until her death, March, 20, 1926, Mr. Mahoney always maintained a home in Chicago. He testified that he never informed his wife directly or indirectly that he desired her to live apart from him. On April 6, 1921, Mrs. Mahoney began an action for divorce against her husband in the district court of Dallas county, Tex. This action was dismissed September 29, 1923, after trial, which resulted in a disagreement on the part of the jury. A second action was filed by Mrs. Mahoney in the district court of Dallas county, Tex., February 16, 1924, and was thereafter dismissed. The decedent declared her domicile in the city and county of Dallas, Tex., by her will dated December 23, 1924, and in the codicil dated March 12, 1926. Contestant admitted that he had not contributed to her support since 1921. Several witnesses testified that Mrs. Mahoney lived on Browder street, in Dallas, Tex., for a period of many years before her death.

[1] The evidence is sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that the decedent resided in Dallas county, Tex., at the time of her death, but appellant contends that decedent was then domiciled in Chicago, Ill., by reason of the fact that the domicile of the husband is the domicile of the wife, and that according to the law of Texas the filing of a complaint for divorce by the wife is not in itself conclusive evidence of acquiring a separate domicile, and before she is entitled to acquire a separate domicile the cause must be tried and the court must find that her husband was guilty of the cause of separation, citing Michael v. Michael, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 630, 79 S. W. 74, where the court held that:

"It is a rule of law that the domicile of the husband is the domicile of the wife and would so remain so long as he was not guilty of the offense which is the cause of the separation."

The foregoing language may be regarded as obiter dictum, since the question at issue in the Texas case was whether the plaintiff had acquired a residence in Bexar county, Tex., while living therein for a period of three months only, while article 2978 of the Revised Statutes of 1895 of the state of Texas, as quoted in the Michael Case required a residence of six months in said county before filing of suit for divorce. Said article reads as follows:

"No suit for divorce from the bonds of matrimony shall be maintained in the courts unless the petitioner for such divorce shall, at the time of exhibiting his or her petition, be an actual bona fide inhabitant of the state, and shall have resided in the county where the suit is filed six months next preceding the filing of the suit."

It thus appears that the statutes of Texas recognized the right of a wife to file a suit for divorce in Texas after residing in the county where the suit is filed six months next preceding the filing of the suit. McGrew v. Mutual Life Insurance Co., 132 Cal. 85, 64 P. 103, 84 Am. St. Rep. 20, has settled the rule in California, where it is said:

"The theoretical unity of husband and wife dissolves in the presence of a legal proceeding, the direct and only purpose of which is to destroy that unity. This is admitted to be so where the wife brings the suit for divorce.
* * *"

The principle is recognized by section 129 of the Civil Code, as amended by St. 1925, p. 482, which reads:

"In actions for divorce neither the domicile nor residence of the husband shall be deemed to be the domicile or residence of the wife. For the purpose of such an action each may have a separate domicile or residence depending upon proof of the fact and not upon legal presumptions."

We see no merit in appellant's first contention that at the time of her death decedent was domiciled in Chicago, Ill. Appellants' second and third points that the probate court of Cook county, Ill., had original, primary, and exclusive jurisdiction to order the will of decedent to be probated, and that the order admitting said will to probate in Dallas county, Tex., was ancillary, are necessarily disposed of by our decision on appellants' first point.

[2] Appellants claim that Joseph P. Mahoney, as the surviving husband of the decedent, was entitled to nominate some fit and proper person to act as administrator with the will annexed under the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 1365 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the court erred in refusing to appoint Pacific-Southwest Trust & Savings Bank as such nominee. This section reads:

"Administration of the estate of a person dying intestate must be granted to some one or more of the persons hereinafter mentioned, the relatives of the deceased being entitled to administer only when they are entitled to succeed to his personal estate or some portion thereof; and they are, respectively, entitled thereto in the following order:

"1. The surviving husband or wife, or some competent person whom he or she may request to have appointed. * * *

"10. Any person legally competent. * * *"

[3] Section 1350a of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, where an executor named in the will fails to apply for letters or appear and qualify, letters of administration with the will annexed must be issued as designated and provided for in granting of letters in cases of intestacy. Section 1365 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that relatives of the deceased are entitled to administer only when they are entitled to succeed to the estate or some portion thereof. The surviving husband or wife are relatives of the deceased within the meaning of said section and are entitled to administer only when they are entitled to succeed to the personal estate or some portion thereof. The rule applies equally to the nominee of such surviving husband or wife. Estate of Crites, 155 Cal. 392, 101 P. 316; Estate of Cook, 173 Cal. 465, 472, 160 P. 553. In the present case the husband, Joseph P. Mahoney, was not entitled to succeed to any portion thereof. Item IV of the will reads as follows:

"Item IV. I also direct that no part of this my estate shall ever be permitted to pass into the hands of Joseph P. Mahoney, of Chicago, Illinois, either in his individual, personal, or in any representative capacity, and I do direct that the court do not appoint him to any position of trust whatsoever in reference thereto."

[4] In view of the provisions of the will, and in view of the fact that the deceased had established a residence in Texas, as held both by the Texas court and the trial court, the husband, Joseph P. Mahoney, could not assert his dower rights under the Illinois law to property of the decedent situate either in the state of Texas or in the state of California, and therefore was not entitled to succeed to any portion of the estate of decedent. Under the terms of section 1379 of the Code of Civil Procedure administration may be granted to one or more competent persons, although not otherwise entitled to the same, at the written request of the person entitled, filed in the court. Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank was appointed administrator with the will annexed at the request of the foreign executor. In such case letters may be granted at the discretion of the court in the absence of any application by a person with a prior right under section 1365 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Estate of Meier, 165 Cal. 456, 464, 132 P. 764, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 858, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 121.

It is ordered that the judgment and orders be affirmed.

TANNAHILL v. GREENING et al.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 30, 1927.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 712—Appellate court must rely upon copies of pleadings, findings, judgment of court, and bill of exceptions in transcript for statements of facts or evidence.

Appellate court is compelled to rely on copies of pleadings, findings, judgment of court, and bill of exceptions shown in transcript for statements of facts or evidence.

2. Quieting title $\S$ 44(1)—In action to quiet title, wherein plaintiff claimed grantee's name was written in blank deed without authority, burden of proof was with plaintiff except as to his consent.

In action to quiet title, wherein plaintiff alleged that he was induced to make deeds with grantee's name in blank to the properties described in action, that deeds were placed in escrow, and that defendants' names were written in as grantees without his authority or consent and defendants claimed that plaintiff consented to insertion of name, burden of proof was with plaintiff, except as to his consent to insertion of name of grantee.

3. Deeds $\S$ 32—Grantor, not being present when grantee's name was inserted in deed placed in escrow, and his consent not being in writing, deed was void.

Where grantor made deed with grantee's name in blank, which he placed in escrow, and grantor was not present when grantee's name was inserted, and his consent was not in writing, deed was void.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 731(5)—Specifications of insufficiency of evidence to warrant findings, referring to findings by number, are sufficient.

Specifications of insufficiency of evidence to warrant findings, which referred to findings by number, held sufficient.

5. Quieting title $\S$ 43—Where defendant, in action to quiet title, claims title through plaintiff, plaintiff need not prove his title.

In action to quiet title, where defendant claimed title and possession through plaintiff, it was not necessary for plaintiff to prove his title.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action to quiet title by J. M. Tannahill against F. S. Greening, alias Fanny S. Greening, and another. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. R. Jaffray, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Adair & Winder, of Riverside, for respondents.

PEAIRS, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff alleges that he was induced to make deeds, with grantee's name in blank, to properties described in this action, and that the deeds were placed in escrow with one Mollie L. Ramey; that the name of Mollie L. Ramey was later written in as grantee and then erased and the name of F. S. Greening written instead, all without his authority or consent. The defendants admit the filling in of grantee's name in the deeds, but allege that both plaintiff and his wife were present and consented to the insertion of the name of F. S. Greening as grantee. Bill of exceptions does not show either presence of plaintiff or consent in writing.

The defendants also allege that plaintiff later signed an agreement to transfer a certificate of water stock running with the land described in said deeds. Defendants further allege that plaintiff, after expressing dissatisfaction with aforesaid deal, accepted, in full settlement of all claims against all defendants, conveyance to him of certain properties in Canada, California, and New Mexico.

[1] This court is compelled to rely upon the copies of pleadings, findings, judgment of the court, and bill of exceptions shown in the transcript for all statements of facts or evidence.

[2] The law places the burden of proof with the plaintiff except as to his consent to the insertion of the name of grantee.

There are three points indicated by this bill of exceptions to which the court will give attention: First, whether a deed in which the grantee's name has been inserted without plaintiff's consent in writing, or not in his presence, is valid; second, the failure of appellant to express in what respect the evidence was insufficient to warrant certain designated findings; and, third, plaintiff's title.

[3] In regard to the first point, as it does not appear that the plaintiff was present when the grantee's name was inserted, nor that his consent was in writing, we think the deed is unquestionably void. In this connection we cite the following California cases: Videau v. Griffin et al., 21 Cal. 390, 392; Upton v. Archer, 41 Cal. 85, 10 Am. Rep. 266; Wunderlin v. Cadogan et al., 50 Cal. 613; Harris v. Barlow et al., 180 Cal. 142, 179 P. 682, and Jones v. Coulter, 75 Cal. App. 540, 243 P. 487.

[4] As to the second point, the insufficiency of the evidence to warrant the findings, the specifications refer to the findings by number, and in Harris v. Duarte, 141 Cal. 497, 499, 75 P. 58, former Chief Justice Beatty says: "A specification is sufficient when it points to a particular finding. * * *" This is also stated by Justice Olney in Mills v. Brady, 185 Cal. 317, 320, 196 P. 776. In Polkinghorn v. Riverside Portland Cement Co., 24 Cal. App. 615, at page 618 (142 P. 140) the correct rule is quoted, and again in Calexico Lumber Co. v. Emerson, 54 Cal. App. 239, at page 243 (201 P. 612, 614), Justice Works says:

"The moving party is required to set forth so much of the evidence (and no more) as may be necessary to explain the points specified in his statement or bill of exceptions; and when such statement or bill of exceptions is settled, it will be presumed that it contains all the evidence given in the cause, which was necessary to be stated in order to explain the points specified; and that it would not have presented a different case in respect to the specified points, had it contained also the omitted evidence. It is desirable that counsel shall consider this point as settled."

Taking into consideration that the evidence quoted in the bill of exceptions relates directly to the findings Nos. 1 and 2, and that under the California cases cited above the specifications of insufficiency of evidence to justify the findings are in accordance with the requirements of the Code, the appellant's contentions must be sustained.

Judgment reversed.

PEOPLE v. FINLEY. (Cr. 1332.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 28, 1927.

1. Witnesses $\Rightarrow$ 263—Witness testifying that defendant wore cap during robbery held properly permitted to resume stand and testify that he wore hat.

In robbery trial, there was no error in allowing one of two identifying witnesses to resume stand and testify that defendant wore a hat, at time of robbery, instead of a cap, as was first testified.

2. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 1036(1), 1037(1), 1129(1)—Admission of robbery confession, and prosecutor's references to subsequent robbery attempt, by appellant's codefendant, held not available error, in absence of proper objection or assignment.

Admission of codefendant's confession, and district attorney's references to codefendant's attempted robbery of oil station, in trial for prior robbery of grocery store, held not available to appealing defendant, where not preserved by proper objection or assignment by either defendant.

3. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 673(4), 730(13)—Admission of robbery confession, and prosecutor's references to subsequent robbery attempt, by appellant's codefendant, held not prejudicial, where limited to codefendant.

Admission of codefendant's confession, and district attorney's references to codefendant's attempted robbery of oil station, in trial for prior robbery of grocery store, held not injurious to appealing defendant, where limited to codefendant by objection and ruling.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

William Finley was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. H. Lomasney, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KOFORD, P. J. This as an appeal from a judgment of conviction of the crime of robbery. The evidence showed that the appellant entered the grocery store of Salvatore Turco in San Francisco and by means of threats with a gun robbed Turco's person and his cash drawer, and also the person of Charles A. Prince, who happened to be in the store at the time. Appellant's codefendant, Webb, sat in an automobile outside the store in aid of appellant during the robbery. Both defendants were jointly tried, and were both convicted, but only Finley has appealed. A few days after this robbery Special Police Officer Green saw Webb at an oil station with a gun in his hand. The circumstances indicated that he was about to commit robbery. After a violent struggle for possession of this gun, in which Webb was severely beaten, he was placed under arrest. From statements and a confession made by him the arrest of appellant followed.

[1] The prosecuting witnesses, Turco and Prince, identified appellant as the robber, first at the police headquarters, and later in court. One of the identifying witnesses, who at first testified that appellant wore a cap at the time of the robbery, was afterwards permitted to resume the witness stand and testify that it was a hat, and not a cap, that was worn. The other identifying witness testified that appellant wore a hat. There was no error in allowing the witness to correct or change his testimony. This was a matter for the jury to take into consideration. Evidently they were satisfied with the identification made of the appellant by the witnesses.

[2, 3] Testimony of Webb's statements and confession were received in evidence at the trial, but by objection and ruling were limited to defendant Webb alone. Appellant makes some strictures on the voluntary character of the confession, and upon the references made by the district attorney to Webb's attempted robbery of the oil station. These points were not preserved by proper objection or assignment by either defendant, and, even if they had been so preserved, and thus made available to defendant Webb, they were not in any event injurious to appellant, Finley.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. RUSSO. (Cr. 1335.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 28, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 27, 1927.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 1144(1/2)—Ruling will be assumed correct on appeal, when matter is not incorporated in record, nor its substance stated.

Ruling of trial court will be assumed correct on appeal, when appellant does not incorporate matter in record, nor state its substance.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 1170(1)—Error in excluding question as to having seen others than defendant held not injurious, in view of identification of defendant by nearby eyewitnesses.

Error in sustaining objection to question as to whether witness had seen any one else but defendant running away after shooting held technical and not substantial or injurious, in view of nearby eyewitnesses and their identification of defendant.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 1120(6)—Exclusion of question as to where letters of defendant were written held not error, where relevancy of matter was not shown.

Sustaining objection to question as to where letters written to defendant's mother were written from cannot be complained of, where no further questions or offer of testimony was made to show relevancy of matter inquired about.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 787(2)—Unrequested instruction, that defendant's failure to take stand should not be held prejudicial, held proper (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1323).

Unrequested instruction, that fact that defendant did not take stand should not be held by jury to be prejudicial to any of his rights, being substantially in accord with Pen. Code, $\S$ 1323, held proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Rocco Russo was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan C. Coghlan and Walter Duane, both of San Francisco (Austin W. Arnold, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KOFORD, P. J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of murder in the first degree. Upon recommendation of the jury, the sentence was imprisonment. The testimony shows that the defendant shot and killed Rosilina La Fata upon a public street in San Francisco on February 27, 1924. Defendant was identified by Witness Robert Lantz, who was standing within a few feet of the deceased at the time of the murder, and also by Witness Martin M. Armstrong, who heard the fatal shots fired and saw the defendant fleeing the scene of the murder.

The assignments of error are certain rulings sustaining objections to evidence, and one instruction given.

[1, 2] On cross-examination, Witness Lantz was asked if he had any particular business that took him to the soft drink parlor which was in the neighborhood of the crime, where he had met the deceased. A general objection to this question was sustained. Appellant suggests several possible ways in which an answer to this question might be of benefit to the defendant, but they are not called for by the question. Also the record shows that the cross-examination of the witness did not restrict inquiry into the subject-matters now suggested by appellant. The defense was not permitted to ask this witness a question concerning a certain part of his testimony shown in the transcript of proceedings before the grand jury. The objection made was that it was not impeachment. Appellant has not incorporated this matter in the record, nor even stated its substance, and consequently we must assume that the ruling complained of was correct. An objection was sustained when this witness was asked, on cross-examination, whether he had seen any one else but the defendant "run down that way" after the shooting. This question could properly have been allowed as testing the witness' recollection in the discretion of the court, or as a part of the res gestæ, but the ruling does not appear to have been injurious. In view of the nearby eyewitnesses to the murder and their identification of the defendant, which in no way depended upon what happened after the shooting, this was not an important part of the res gestæ. The error was technical, and not substantial.

[3] The defendant's mother was permitted to testify that she had received letters from her son after about the middle of February, 1924. An objection was sustained to the question, "Do you know where those letters were written from?" Apparently the question called for the witness' opinion or conclusion. Upon this objection being sustained, no further proof was offered on the subject. If appellant sincerely desired to prove that defendant had written and mailed letters at a time and place indicating his absence from the place of the crime on February 27, 1924, he was not foreclosed by this ruling from putting proper questions and offering proper testimony upon that point.

[4] The appellant did not testify in his own behalf. He offered no instruction concerning this fact. The court instructed the jury, upon its own motion, that "the fact that he does not take the stand should in no sense be held by you to be prejudicial to any of his rights." This is substantially the same meaning as expressed in Penal Code, $\S$ 1323, by the expression "cannot in any manner prejudice him." The instruction given in People v.

Emmons, 13 Cal. App. 487, 492, 493, 110 P. 151, was different, for, as was pointed out in People v. Ruef, 14 Cal. App. 576, 610, 114 P. 48, 54, instead of stating that his failure to take the stand should not create a prejudice or unfavorable inference against him, it called the jury's attention to the fact that had the defendant been a witness he could have been cross-examined. The instruction here does not contain this objectionable part and was properly given.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 30, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 28, 1927.

1. Counties ⇐62—County supervisors held authorized to adopt system of civil service regulations for county offices pursuant to power given by charter (Const. art. 11, § 7½).

Where charter adopted by county pursuant to Const. art. 11, § 7½, clearly manifested intention to give supervisors power to regulate appointments to county offices by ordinance, such supervisors were authorized to adopt a system of civil service rules and regulations to determine fitness of those seeking appointments.

2. Counties ⇐62—Charter held to authorize county supervisors to require civil service commission to conduct examinations for candidates for appointment to county offices (Const. art. 11, § 7½).

Under provision of charter adopted by county pursuant to Const. art. 11, § 7½, requiring supervisors to provide by ordinance for creation of commissioners other than those required by Constitution and state laws, such supervisors were authorized to provide that civil service commission should prepare rules and regulations and hold examinations to determine fitness of candidates for county offices, and to provide that deputies should be appointed from eligible list to be created by commission.

3. Counties ⇐62—Charter provisions held not to contemplate that civil service positions should not take effect until passage of appropriation ordinance by county supervisors (Const. art. 11, § 7½).

Provisions of county charter adopted pursuant to Const. art. 11, § 7½, that classification of positions in civil service should not be final until approved by supervisors in annual appropriation ordinance, held not to contemplate that positions should not take effect until passage of such ordinance.

4. Counties ⇐62—County ordinance relating to civil service and appointment of deputies to county offices held valid and to supersede general law (Const. art. 11, § 7½).

Ordinance of supervisors of county which had adopted charter pursuant to Const. art. 11, § 7½, providing for civil service and method of appointing deputies for county offices, held valid, and to supersede provisions of general law.

Application by Robert E. Pullen for writ of mandate, prayed to be directed to E. F. Garrison, as auditor of the County of Alameda. Writ denied.

Snook, Snook & Chase, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Earle Warren, Dist. Atty., and Frank M. Ogden, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Oakland, for respondent.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, and Homer I. Mitchell and R. C. McAllaster, Deputies County Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for intervener, County of Los Angeles.

John L. Reith, of Oakland, amicus curiæ.

CASHIN, J. A proceeding in mandamus to compel respondent, as auditor of the county of Alameda, to pay to petitioner compensation as a deputy sheriff of that county for the month of June, 1927. It was stipulated by the parties:

That at the general election held on November 2, 1926, a charter was adopted for the county of Alameda, which charter was ratified and approved by the Legislature on January 18, 1927; that on the latter date, and subsequent to the act of the Legislature, the board of supervisors of the county adopted two emergency ordinances, neither of which has been repealed, numbered 162 and 163, the first providing for a civil service for the county, and the second for the number and compensation of deputies employed in the offices and institutions of the county; that since January 19, 1927, Leon A. Clark, E. C. Lyon, and O. D. Hamlin have been and now are the appointed, qualified, and acting civil service commissioners of the county, and as such constitute the civil service commission thereof; that ever since January 3, 1927, B. F. Becker has been the duly elected, qualified, and acting sheriff of Alameda county; that on that date Robert E. Pullen, the petitioner herein, was appointed by the sheriff a deputy sheriff of the county and that he qualified and commenced his duties as such; that on January 18, 1927, and subsequent to the ratification of the charter and the adoption of the above ordinances, the sheriff again appointed petitioner to the position of deputy sheriff and at the same time appointed 17 other persons to like positions; that none of the persons so appointed had been an appointive officer or employee of the county or any subdivision thereof for six months prior to the taking effect of the charter; that the salary fixed for each of said 18 positions was and is the sum of $180 per month, and that petitioner again on the last-mentioned date qualified as a deputy sheriff and has continued to perform the duties of the office; that on April 16, 1927, the said civil service commission prepared and held an open competitive examination in order to test the relative fitness of all applicants for appointment to the position of deputy sheriff; that petitioner applied for appointment to one of the positions and as such applicant and candidate participated in said examination; that the positions to which said examination pertained included the 18 positions above mentioned; that of the number of applicants taking such examination 95 passed the examination with a rating of over 70 per cent.; that the rating of petitioner was 78.18 per cent.; that upon the grading of the 95 persons who passed the examination with a rating of over 70 per cent., commencing with the person who had the highest rating, followed by the remaining applicants in a uniformly descending scale of percentage, petitioner was the forty-fifth person appearing upon such list; that on May 10, 1927, the civil service commission created and adopted an eligible list for the said positions of deputy sheriff and that the name of petitioner appeared thereon; that on May 16, 1927, the civil service commission certified to B. F. Becker, as sheriff, a list of 20 names, to wit, the first 20 names appearing on said eligible list as eligible to appointment to 18 positions as deputy sheriff; that the name of petitioner did not appear on said list; that the sheriff has never notified the civil service commission that the 18 positions are to be filled, and subsequent to January 18, 1927, has never appointed as deputy sheriff any of the 20 persons whose names appear on the list last mentioned, or reappointed any of the 18 persons appointed on January 18, 1927; that since January 3, 1927, petitioner has continuously performed the duties of deputy sheriff in a manner satisfactory to the sheriff, has not been removed or discharged by any act of the latter, and has received from the county his salary in full to and including the month of May, 1927, but has received no salary or compensation for the month of June, 1927.

The charter was framed and adopted pursuant to section 7½ of article 11 of the Constitution, which provides:

"That it shall be competent in all charters framed under the authority given by this section, * * * in addition to any other provisions allowable by this Constitution, and the same shall provide, for the following: * * *

(4) For the powers and duties of boards of supervisors. * * * (5) For the fixing and regulation by boards of supervisors, by ordinance, of the appointment and number of assistants, deputies, clerks, attaches and other persons to be employed, from time to time, in the several offices of the county, and for the prescribing and regulating by such boards of the powers, duties, qualifications and compensation of such persons, the times at which, and terms for which they shall be appointed, and the manner of their appointment, and removal. * * *

The section also provides that:

"All charters framed under the authority given by this section, in addition to the matters herein above specified, may provide * * * for offices other than those required by the Constitution and laws of the state, or for the creation of any or all of such offices by boards of supervisors, * * * for the manner of such appointment, * * *" and, further, "that whenever any county has framed and adopted a charter, and the same shall have been approved by the legislature, * * * the general laws adopted by the legislature in pursuance of sections 4 and 5 of this article, shall as to such county, be superseded by said charter as to matters for which, under" section 7½ "it is competent to make provision * * * and for which provision is made therein, except as otherwise expressly provided."

Section 11 of the charter provides:

"That the board of supervisors shall have all the jurisdiction and powers which are now and which may be hereafter granted by the Constitution and laws of the state of California or by this charter."

And by section 12 it is made the duty of the board of supervisors:

"(b) To provide by ordinance for the compensation of elective and appointive officers, assistants, deputies, clerks, attaches and employees unless such compensation is otherwise fixed by this charter; * * * (d) to provide by ordinance for the number of assistants, deputies, clerks, attaches and other persons to be employed from time to time in the several offices and institutions of the county; * * * and (e) to provide by ordinance for the creation of offices, boards and commissions otherwise than required by the Constitution and laws of the state, and for the appointment of persons to fill such offices, board and commissions, and to prescribe their powers and duties and fix their compensation."

The charter makes direct provision for a system of civil service, section 33 thereof providing in part as follows:

"There is hereby created a civil service commission consisting of three electors of the county. * * * The board of supervisors shall within two weeks after this charter takes effect appoint three electors of the county as members of the commission, to take office as soon as appointed and qualified."

By section 15 the members of the commission are made appointive county officers. By section 35 the civil service of the county is divided into an unclassified and a classified service, in the latter class being placed the position of deputy sheriff to which the petitioner was appointed. It was made the duty of the commission to provide for the standardization and classification of all positions in the classified service, the classification to be based upon and graded according to the duties and responsibilities of such positions, and to prepare and hold competitive examinations in order to test the relative fitness of all applicants for appointment in the classified service. Charter, § 36.

It is provided by section 63 that each county officer shall appoint from the eligible civil service list, except as otherwise provided in the charter for either permanent or temporary service, all deputies, clerks, etc., in the office or department of such officer, and by section 37 that, whenever a position in the competitive classified civil service is to be filled, the appointive authority shall notify the commission of that fact, and the commission shall certify the names and addresses of the three candidates standing highest on the eligible list for the class or grade to which such position belongs, and the appointing authority shall appoint to such position one of the three persons certified to him. It is also provided by section 45 that:

"If any portion of this charter relating to civil service should be held to be unconstitutional the board of supervisors shall by ordinance provide for a civil service of the county, prescribe the duties of the civil service commission and such civil service rules and regulations as they shall deem proper to govern the appointment of any and all officers, assistants, deputies, clerks, attaches and other persons to be employed in the several offices and institutions of the county."

The board of supervisors by Ordinance No. 162 also provided for a complete system of civil service; the provisions of the charter relating thereto, except section 45, being embodied therein. The ordinance also adopted the provisions of section 63 of the charter and required that each county officer should appoint from the eligible civil service list, except as therein provided, the exceptions being those of the charter, for either permanent or temporary service in the office or department of such officer, all deputies, etc., as the number is fixed by the board of supervisors, and, further, that each county officer might appoint any person without reference to the eligible list to fill a vacancy in the classified civil service in the office of such officer whenever no examination had ever been held for such position, or whenever there should be no eligible civil service list for such position, such appointee to serve until an eligible civil service list for such position should be created and an appointment made therefrom, but in no event to exceed 20 days after the creation of such eligible list.

Ordinance No. 163 fixed the number and compensation of the deputies in the several county offices, including that of the sheriff, and provided that such deputies should hold their respective positions and be transferred, reduced, or discharged according to the provisions of the charter and the ordinance and rules adopted thereunder by the board of supervisors and the rules of the civil service commission.

Petitioner claims that the provisions of the general law empowering the sheriff to appoint deputies and fixing their qualifications have not been superseded by the charter, but remain in full force and effect. In support of this contention it is claimed that the charter contains no provision, as required by section 7½ of article 11 of the Constitution, for the fixing and regulation by the supervisors of the qualifications and manner of appointment of deputies; that the sections of the charter providing that their qualifications be determined in accordance with civil service rules and regulations, and that appointments be made from eligible lists created by the civil service commission, are violative of the above section of the Constitution, which, according to the contention of the petitioner, requires that such matters be fixed and regulated by ordinance and not by the charter; and, further, that if the board of supervisors were empowered to provide by ordinance for a system of civil service, as a condition to the exercise of the power it was made essential by section 45 of the charter that the civil service provisions thereof should have been held unconstitutional.

[1] It is held in Jones v. De Shields, 187 Cal. 231, 202 P. 137, that section 7½ of article 11 of the Constitution does not authorize the Legislature, or a county by means of a charter, to provide directly for the appointment of deputies, but, as prescribed by subdivision 5 of the section, the charter must provide for the fixing and regulation of such appointments by the board of supervisors by ordinance; otherwise, the general law is not superseded. In the present case, however, while the charter does not in express terms provide for the fixing and regulation by the supervisors of the qualifications and manner of appointing deputies, section 11 thereof provides that the "board of supervisors shall have all the jurisdiction and powers which are now or which may be hereafter granted by the Constitution * * * or by this charter," and section 45 makes it the duty of the supervisors, in the event any portion of the charter relating to civil service should be held unconstitutional, to provide by ordinance for a civil service for the county. The latter section prescribes the exercise of a power which is not only recognized as existing, but which by implication the section confers upon the supervisors. Moreover the power is not limited by the section—only the duty to exercise it. These sections clearly manifest the intention to give the supervisors power to regulate appointments by ordinance, and were a sufficient compliance with the requirement that provision therefor be contained in the charter. Having the power, that the supervisors might in its exercise adopt a system of civil service rules and regulations, whereby the relative fitness of those seeking appointment could be determined and appointments made accordingly, admits of no serious question.

[2] As stated, section 33 of the charter creates a civil service commission of three members, who were, as therein provided, appointed by the supervisors. The commission was created pursuant to the above section of the Constitution, which authorizes a provision "for offices other than those required by the Constitution and laws of the state, * * *" and by subdivision (e) of section 12 of the charter it was also made the duty of the supervisors to provide by ordinance for the creation of offices, boards, and commissioners other than those required by the Constitution and laws of the state, and to prescribe their duties and powers. Under this provision it was competent for the supervisors to provide, as was done by ordinance No. 162, that it should be the duty of the commission to prepare rules and regulations and hold examinations for the purpose of determining the relative fitness of candidates for appointment, and, further, under their general power to regulate appointments, to provide that deputies should be appointed from the eligible list to be created by the commission.

[3] Petitioner further contends that the provision of the charter—which was also adopted by the ordinance—that no standardization or classification of positions in the civil service as to salaries made by the commission should be final, until approved by the supervisors in their annual appropriation ordinance, contemplated that the civil service provisions should not take effect until the passage of the annual appropriation ordinance on the first Tuesday of September, 1927, and, further, that the ordinances, although adopted as emergency measures, did not take effect until 30 days after their passage. We find no merit in the first contention, and both ordinances took effect in any event before the examinations were held and the eligible list prepared, and, so far as appears, before civil service rules and regulations were adopted by the commission.

[4] It is our conclusion that the ordinance providing for civil service was valid, and that its provisions relating to the method of appointing deputies superseded those of the general law. It will therefore be unnecessary to consider the question of the constitutionality of the civil service provisions of the charter. And it appearing that the appointment of petitioner under the provisions of the ordinance terminated 20 days after the eligible list was created by the civil service commission, the writ prayed for is denied.

Eric Lyders, of San Francisco, for appellant.

SEAWELL, J. Claus Albert Clausen died testate April 3, 1925, a resident of the county of Marin, this state. He was unmarried and left neither children, nor father, nor mother surviving him. He left as his sole heirs at law seven brothers, three sisters, four children of a deceased sister, and five children of a deceased brother. By his will he bequeathed and devised to his brothers and sisters and to the children or issue of any deceased brother or sister (such children or issue to take by right of representation) all property of which he might die seized or possessed. The heirs whose distributive shares are the concern of this proceeding are the children of said deceased brother and sister and are residents of the Kingdom of Denmark. The executor of said estate, having brought the proceeding to the stage where it was proper to make partial distribution of the same, petitioned the court to make a decree to that effect, which was accordingly made and entered by the court, whereupon Fin Lund, as the accredited consul of Denmark, whose consular district embraced the whole state of California, filed a petition wherein he prayed that the executor of said estate be ordered to pay the distributive shares of said foreign heirs to him to be by him remitted through the agency of the government of Denmark to the proper distributees, and that the petitioner be directed to furnish evidence of such remission. A general demurrer to the petition was sustained and an order subsequently made and entered denying said petition. It is from this order that the appeal was taken. Said consul claims by authority of his official station as consul of Denmark the right to receive and receipt for the shares of said estate ordered by said decree to be distributed to the children of said sister and brother of decedent, respectively, all of whom are residents of and subjects of the King of Denmark. This right is asserted under and by virtue of the provisions of the treaty existing between the United States of America and the King of Denmark, ratified August 10, 1826, and proclaimed by the President of the United States October 14, 1826 (8 U. S. Stats. 340). Said treaty is entitled "General Convention of Friendship, Commerce, and Navigation," and it has not been modified during its one hundred years of existence in any material respect. Said treaty by its express provisions is strictly a treaty of commerce and navigation. Those are the only subjects treated of therein. Every article of said treaty deals with commerce and navigation between the two nations and does not purport to deal with any other subjects. The preamble, or introductory para-

In re CLAUSEN'S ESTATE. (S. F. 12491.)
Supreme Court of California. Oct. 10, 1927.

1. Treaties ⇨8—Most favored nation clause of Danish commercial treaty does not entitle Danish consuls to receive Danish heirs' shares in decedents' estates (Treaty of Oct. 14, 1826, with Denmark [8 Stat. U. S. 340]; Treaty with Germany [44 Stat. U. S. p. 2153].

Provision of Treaty of Oct. 14, 1826, with Denmark (8 Stat. U. S. 340) that Danish consuls shall enjoy all rights of consuls of the most favored nation does not entitle such consuls to receive and receipt for Danish heirs' distributive shares in decedents' estates because Treaty with Germany (44 Stat. U. S. p. 2153) gives German consuls such right as to shares of German heirs; Danish treaty relating to navigation and commerce only.

2. Ambassadors and consuls ⇨5—Consul's right to receive foreign subjects' shares in decedents' estates must be granted by treaty.

Right asserted by consul to receive and receipt for distributive shares of subjects of foreign nation in decedents' estates is more than a right, privilege, or immunity ordinarily accorded representatives of foreign powers and naturally within purview of comity of nations, but must be granted by treaty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

In the matter of the distribution of the estate of Claus Albert Clausen, deceased. From an order denying a petition by Fin Lund, Consul of Denmark, for payment to him of the distributive shares of the Danish heirs residing in Denmark, he appeals. Affirmed.

graph, sets out very clearly and specifically the subject-matter of said treaty in the following language:

"The United States of America and His Majesty the King of Denmark, being desirous to make firm and permanent the peace and friendship which happily prevail between the two nations, and to extend the commercial relations which subsist between their respective territories and people, have agreed to fix, in a manner clear and positive, the rules which shall in future be observed between the one and the other party, by means of a general convention of friendship, commerce, and navigation.
* * *

[1] Because the "most favored nation" clause appears in article 8 of said treaty, which is regulatory of commercial and navigation relations between the two nations, it is claimed that whatever treaty rights or privileges any other nation may have secured to itself by reason of its treaty agreements with the United States are, ex gratia, it would appear, extended to all other nations though not parties to said treaty agreements, provided the treaties with said nations which are strangers to said treaty agreements contain the "most favored nation" clause. The article of the Danish treaty which is relied upon as conferring upon the consul of Denmark the right to receive and receipt for the distributive shares of Danish heirs, because such a right is given to a consular officer of Germany in express terms, provides:

"Article 8.

"To make more effectual the protection which the United States and His Danish Majesty shall afford in future, to the navigation and commerce of their respective citizens and subjects, they agree mutually to receive and admit consuls and vice consuls in all the ports open to foreign commerce, who shall enjoy in them all the rights, privileges, and immunities, of the consuls and vice consuls of the most favored nation, each contracting party, however, remaining at liberty to except those ports and places in which the admission and residence of such consuls may not seem convenient."

By the language of the article above set out, it is manifest that the rights, privileges, and immunities guaranteed to consuls are relative to navigation and commerce, granting to the consuls of each contracting nation the rights, privileges, and immunities that are germane to and tend to assist or promote commerce and navigation, and such other rights and privileges as friendly nations accord to one another. Said Danish treaty contains no words equivalent to the language expressly inserted in the German treaty which appellant seeks to adopt by reference. That treaty provides:

"A consular officer of either high contracting party may in behalf of his nonresident countrymen receipt for their distributive shares derived from estates in process of probate or accruing under the provisions of so-called Workmen's Compensation Laws or other like statutes provided he remit any funds so received through the appropriate agencies of his government to the proper distributees, and provided further that he furnish to the authority or agency making distribution through him reasonable evidence of such remission." 44 U. S. Stats. part 3, p. 2153, U. S. Treaty Series No. 725.

Our treaty with Denmark was ratified almost a century before the right contended for by appellant was given to any nation or inserted in any treaty to which this nation was a party. Obviously it was not within the contemplation of either of the powers in our treaty with the King of Denmark to confer upon the consul or vice consul of Denmark a right not then given to other nations. Neither is there anything in said Danish treaty that would justify the construction sought by appellant to be placed upon it. In fact, it does not contain the provisions found in numerous modern treaties made by this nation with other nations to the effect that future privileges and immunities accorded to the consuls of the most favored nations will inure to the benefit of Denmark. It may, however, by a reasonably liberal construction, be held that any privileges, rights, or immunities granted to consuls of other nations, if within the scope of the subject dealt with in our treaty with Denmark, would also inure to the benefit of the Danish consuls or other representatives.

[2] The right asserted by appellant is not a mere right, privilege, or immunity ordinarily accorded to consular or other representatives of a foreign power which may be said to naturally come within the purview of the comity of nations. It is obviously something more. Whether or no either of the treaty-making powers, the United States or Denmark, intended to confer upon its consular officers the authority claimed by appellant nowhere appears in the treaty, and an American court might properly be chargeable with unwarranted presumption should it attempt, in the absence of language plainly expressing or necessarily implying such intent, to confer upon the consulate of foreign nations powers or privileges in important matters not conferred upon them by the nations which they represent. In other words, the policy of imposing upon consuls and other representatives the duty of receiving and receipting for property transmissible to subjects of the nation they represent from foreign jurisdictions is a matter of high concern to the subjects and the ruling powers with which no other nation may properly interfere. If the Kingdom of Denmark desires to depart from the long-established practice of transmitting to its subjects their distributable shares of estates due them from foreign lands, it is most reasonable to assume that it would negotiate a treaty to that effect or express its desire in some other official form. It is to be kept in mind that this nation also is charged with a duty and obligation in the premises, for the discharge of which duty its officers and agents can be held to strict accountability under the law.

[3] Applying the well-recognized rule that treaties are subject to the same rules of interpretation as other documents, and aided by the further consideration that those nations which have deemed it wise to change the rule of transmitting property acquired from estates in foreign lands to their subjects to whom distribution is ordered, have done so by express treaty provisions, we conclude that inasmuch as the treaty made between the United States and the King of Denmark contains no such provision or article, the appellant is without authority to maintain this proceeding.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

LONDON GUARANTEE & ACCIDENT CO., Limited, v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (L. A. 9762.)*

Rehearing Denied Oct. 27, 1927.

1. Master and servant §373—Injury direct result of earthquake neither arises out of, nor is proximately caused by, employment (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6a).

Injury to employee as direct result of an earthquake does not arise out of employment and is not proximately caused thereby, within Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 834) § 6a.

2. Master and servant §371—Injury must be natural consequence of risk of employment to be compensable (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6a).

To recover compensation under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 834) § 6a, there must be causal connection between employment and injury, originating in, and flowing as rational and natural consequence from, risk connected with employment, and mere fact that employment brought injured party to place of injury is insufficient.

3. Master and servant §417(5)—Court must assume, where evidence was conflicting, that award for employee's death was based on evidence of improper construction of building destroyed by earthquake.

Where there was substantial conflict in evidence as to manner of construction of building destroyed by earthquake, Supreme Court must assume that award of compensation for death of employee by falling walls was made by Industrial Accident Commission in reliance on evidence that building was constructed of inferior materials or by improper workmanship.

4. Master and servant §373—Death of janitor of building, which might not have fallen in earthquake, if properly constructed, arose out of employment.

Death of janitor by collapse of building, which might not have fallen from effect of earthquake shock, except for inferior character of its construction, was due in part at least to nature of employment, and hence could reasonably be said to have arisen out of employment; deceased being exposed to greater risk than public generally.

Certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Louisa Mosteiro for compensation for the death of Segismundo Mosteiro, employee, opposed by decedent's employer and the London Guarantee & Accident Company, Limited, insurance carrier. Compensation was awarded by the Industrial Accident Commission, and the insurance carrier brings certiorari. On hearing after judgment of the Court of Appeal (253 P. 323) annulling the award. Award affirmed.

Heaney, Price & Postel, of Santa Barbara, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

W. P. Butcher, Jr., of Santa Barbara, for respondent Louisa Mosteiro.

Faries & Williamson, of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

CURTIS, J. Proceeding brought to review and annul an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of Louisa Mosteiro for the death of her husband, Segismundo Mosteiro, who was killed by the falling walls of the San Marcos building in the city of Santa Barbara. Segismundo Mosteiro was employed as a janitor in said building. The walls of the building collapsed during an earthquake which occurred in said city on the morning of June 29, 1925, at the hour of 6:45. The evidence is without conflict that Mosteiro was struck and killed by the falling walls of said building while performing services arising out of his employment. The finding of the commission was that—

"Segismundo Mosteiro, deceased, while employed as a janitor on June 29, 1925, at Santa Barbara, Cal., by defendants, * * * sustained injury occurring in the course of and arising out of his employment as follows: Was struck by portions of the building in which he was working, proximately causing his death the same day."

[1, 2] If the injury sustained by Mosteiro was the direct result of the earthquake, the award cannot be sustained. Such an injury did not arise out of the employment, nor in the terms of section 6 (a) of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 834) is it "proximately caused by the employment." There must be some connection between the injury and the employment other than the mere fact that the employment brought the injured party to the place of injury. There must be a causal connection between the employment and the injury which had its origin in a risk connected with the employment, and flowed from that source as a rational and natural consequence." Larson v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 193 Cal. 406, 409, 224 P. 744, 745; California Casualty Indemnity Exch. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 190 Cal. 433, 213 P. 257. As was said by this court in the recent case of Storm v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 191 Cal. 4, 7, 214 P. 874, 875:

"To render an injury compensable there must be discernible some relationship of cause and effect between the employment and the injury, 'It is not sufficient for a workman to say, 'I should not have been injured unless I had been where I was and doing the work which I was employed to do.'" Cooper v. Northeastern Ry. Co., 9 B. W. C. C. 129. It must be shown, in addition, that the injury was a natural or probable result of the employment, or of the conditions thereof. Such would seem to be the meaning of the requirement that it must have been 'proximately caused by the employment.'"

The responsibility of an employer for an injury sustained by his employee resulting from an earthquake or other like peril has frequently been the subject of judicial determination, and the rule applied by the courts almost universally is as follows:

"As a general principle, the employer is not responsible for damages caused to his workmen by lightning, storms, sunstroke, freezing, earthquake, floods, etc. These are considered as 'force majeure,' which human vigilance and industry can neither foresee nor prevent. The victim must bear alone such burden, inasmuch as human industry has nothing to do with it and inasmuch as the employee is no more subject thereto than any other person. Every human being is liable to suffer from events in which he has no share of responsibility." 28 R. O. L. 806; State v. District Ct., 138 Minn. 260, 164 N. W. 917, L. R. A. 1918F, 921; Griffith v. Cole, 183 Iowa, 415, 165 N. W. 577, L. R. A. 1918F, 923; Klawinski v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 185 Mich. 643, 152 N. W. 213, L. R. A. 1916A, 342.

[3, 4] However, in support of said award the respondent relies upon the finding of the commission that the injury sustained by deceased arose out of his employment and that the proximate cause of his death was that he was struck by portions of the building in which he was working. Respondent contends that there was evidence before the commission which justified this finding. The evidence so relied upon was that which was offered for the purpose of establishing that the fatal injury suffered by decedent proximately resulted not wholly from the earthquake, but in part, at least, from the defective construction of the building which would not have fallen from the effect of the shock of the earthquake had it not been constructed of inferior materials. Upon the question of the proper or improper construction of the building, a large amount of evidence was introduced before the commission. It was shown that the earthquake of June 29, 1925, was the most serious disturbance of its kind that had occurred in said city during its history of over 100 years; that many apparently substantial buildings in the near vicinity of the San Marcos building had been destroyed or severely injured as the result of said disturbance and that some 13 persons lost their lives as a result thereof; that the San Marcos building was constructed according to plans and specifications prepared by a qualified architect and by structural engineers; that all materials such as rock, sand, cement, and steel which went into the construction of said building were thoroughly tested before being used; that the mechanical construction of the building was in accordance with the accepted standards and methods in use at the time it was built; and that after the earthquake a chemist had subjected specimens of the cement taken from the building to a scientific test and found that the specimens so tested showed a sustaining strength of more than 1,400 pounds, whereas the general average of all standards of cement is 1,000 pounds. On the other hand, there was evidence that buildings in the near vicinity of the San Marcos building and similar in character were only slightly damaged by said earthquake; that the San Marcos building was a reinforced concrete building; and that specimens of concrete from the building showed that it was improperly mixed, resulting in an improper bond between the cement and the gravel or other material in which it was mixed. One witness testified that a drill would go through the cement "like a piece of cheese." O. H. O'Neill, a witness before the commission, whose occupation was that of engineer and surveyor and who testified that he had had 10 to 12 years' experience in the use of cement in constructing bridges and highways, also testified as follows:

"A. What I saw—it was a very superficial examination—I noted that the fractures through the beams or columns were not fractures through the coarse aggregate or rock used in the material, and instead of breaking on through as a homogenous would they separated around the particles of crushed rock or gravel used in the construction.

"Q. What would that indicate? A. That would indicate a lack of perfect bond between the cement or mortar, which is composed of sand and cement and the rock aggregate used in the material.

"Q. Would that result either from not a proper mixing or too hasty mixing? A. It would result from the use of too much water or dirty sand or lack of proper mixing.

"Q. What do you mean by lack of proper mixing? A. The theory of concrete is that each particle of sand must be coated with cement and each stone coated with cement and then the mortar bonding all that together; and if you do not mix it long enough each particle of sand does not get coated with cement, neither does each portion of aggregate get bonded together with the mortar."

T. W. Osgood, assistant superintendent of the department of safety, California Industrial Commission, testified before the commission as follows:

"A. At the time I first saw the building it was in collapse; there were two or three points that I noted, one of them was the fact that the concrete in a great many instances was stripped from the reinforcing rods, and that the mass of concrete as a whole broke rather fine in the collapse. I picked up three pieces of concrete the size of a man's head, approximately, and pounded them either on the pavement or one against the other, in which three cases there appeared lack of cohesion between the coarser aggregate.

"Q. You mean cohesion between the reinforcing aggregate and the mortar? A. Between the stones making up the coarser aggregate. The reinforcing steel at the joints where I observed it was joined with pipe, ferrules, the reinforcing steel being butt-ended together inside a ferrule which was approximately 12 to 14 inches in length. That at one time was considered perhaps suitable construction; it is past, however; I don't know of any construction where that system is used."

He further testified in answer to questions propounded to him:

"Q. Could you without a test of the cement form a conclusion as to its quality? A. The quality of the cement—well, I wouldn't hesitate to say that it is not first class.

"Q. In what particulars was it deficient? A. As before stated, there was a lack of cohesion or cementing between the various stones which made up the coarser aggregate.

"Q. And what would cause that lack of cohesion? A. That might be due to a variety of conditions; foreign matter in the mixture is inert material, shortage or excess of water, poor cement. That is all that I have in mind right now."

We also find the following in Mr. Osgood's testimony:

"Now, in the San Marcos building (and I will make this a general statement affecting the other buildings that were damaged) the prime cause of failure was due to a general disregard to the precautions which can reasonably be expected to resist the stresses sent up by an earthquake; and by those precautions I mean this: A tying together of the structural part of the building either by means of structural steel columns, beams, and girders, or by heavily reinforced concrete. Those, I believe, cover my ideas for the causes of failure under earthquake conditions."

It is apparent from the foregoing statement that there was a substantial conflict in the evidence before the commission regarding the manner of the construction of the San Marcos building, and in passing upon the power of the commission to make the award in favor of the applicant we must assume that said award was made by the commission in view of and in reliance upon the evidence before it which tended to show that said building was constructed of either inferior materials or by improper workmanship. If, then, the decedent was compelled to carry on his employment in a defectively constructed building which may not have fallen from the effect of the earthquake shock except for the inferior character of its construction, then the injury received by him was, in part at least, due to the nature of his employment, and, we think, was such an injury which can reasonably be said to have arisen out of his employment. As was said by the Supreme Court of Illinois in the case of Central Ill. Service Co. v. Indus. Com., 291 Ill. 256, 126 N. E. 144, 13 A. L. R. 967:

"We believe the reasonable rule to be that if deceased, by reason of his employment, was exposed to a risk of being injured by a storm which was greater than the risk to which the public in that vicinity was subject, or if his employment necessarily accentuated the natural hazard from the storm, which increased hazard contributed to the injury, it was an injury arising out of the employment although unexpected and unusual."

In State ex rel. People's Coal & I. Co. v. District Court, 129 Minn. 502, 503, 153 N. W. 119, L. R. A. 1916A, 344, the Supreme Court of Minnesota said:

"If the deceased was exposed to injury from lightning by reason of his employment, something more than the normal risk to which all are subject, if his employment necessarily accentuated the natural hazard from lightning, and the accident was natural to the employment, though unexpected or unusual, then a finding is sustained that the accident from lightning was one 'arising out of employment.'"

There can be no question in this case that the deceased by being compelled to perform his work in a building defective in construction was exposed to a risk of being injured by an earthquake which was greater than that to which the public generally in that vicinity was subject. It follows, therefore, that the injury received by him was one arising out of his employment.

While the earthquake, an act of God, may have contributed to the injury, yet it was not the sole cause of such injury, and except for the intervention of some human agency might not have produced any injury whatever. In discussing the meaning of an act of God, the author of Corpus Juris, volume 1, pp. 1173 and 1174, says:

"The phrase has been otherwise defined as * * * an act of nature which implies entire exclusion of all human agency."

In an early case before the Supreme Court of this state, Mr. Justice Sanderson expressed the rule in the following language:

"What acts are to be regarded in the legal sense as 'acts of God' is well settled. * * * The expression excludes the idea of human agency, and if it appears that a given loss has happened in any way through the intervention of man, it cannot be held to have been the act of God, but must be regarded as the act of man."

"Can a different rule be applied to the interpretation of the expression 'the act of the elements'? Is it more comprehensive than the former? Does it include acts which the former does not? The answer is not material to the present purpose; for be that as it may, for the purpose of determining the cause of a particular event, the same test must be resorted to in one case as in the other. If an act to which human agency has in any way contributed, cannot be considered as the act of God, but must be held to be the act of man, how does it become less the act of man if we substitute the elements in the place of God? The elements are the means by which God acts, and we are unable to perceive why 'damages by the elements' and 'damage by the acts of God,' are not convertible expressions in the law of leases." Po-lack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 416, 422, 423 (95 Am. Dec. 115).

Quoting again from the author of Corpus Juris, vol. 1, p. 1174, we find the following:

"The principle embodied in all of the definitions is that the act must be one occasioned exclusively by the violence of nature and all human agency is to be excluded from creating or entering into the cause of the mischief. When the effect, the cause of which is considered, is found to be in part the result of the participation of man, whether it be from active intervention or neglect, or failure to act, the whole occurrence is thereby humanized, as it were, and removed from the operation of the rules applicable to the acts of God."

These words in our opinion aptly portray the condition shown to exist by the facts in the present proceeding. The destruction of the building in part having been contributed to by its defective construction the whole occurrence was thereby humanized and in fixing the liability of the parties hereto, the part attributed to the earthquake must be eliminated as a contributing cause of the building's downfall. Under these conditions the award of the commission should be and is hereby affirmed.

ENTERPRISE DAIRY CO. et al v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 12473.)★

Rehearing Denied Oct. 27, 1927.

1. Master and servant ⇨417(5)—Court will assume Accident Commission allowed compensation only for compensable injuries, where no complaint was made for failure to segregate injuries.

Where no complaint was made of failure of Industrial Accident Commission to segregate compensable injuries from those not compensable, the appellate court will assume that award was made only for compensable injuries.

2. Master and servant ⇨416—Award of Accident Commission will be affirmed if any part of injuries are compensable, in absence of objection to omission to segregate injuries.

In the absence of objection to failure of the Industrial Accident Commission to segregate compensable injuries from those not compensable, award will be affirmed if any part of injuries were compensable.

3. Master and servant ⇨373—Injuries due to increased hazard of employment over that of public in vicinity of earthquake arise "out of employment."

Where the greater risk over that of public in his vicinity, to which an employee is exposed by his employment, contributes to his injuries in an earthquake, the injuries, although unexpected and unusual, arise out of employment.

4. Master and servant ⇨373—Injury to truck driver by glass from bottles broken during earthquake held to arise out of employment within Workmen's Compensation Act.

Where dairy company's driver, while loading milk bottles on truck in employer's garage, was injured by fragments of glass from bottles broken by wall of adjoining building falling in earthquake, held, that injuries arose out of employment within Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279, as amended); they being caused by the broken glass and not by the earthquake.

Certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by William Wilson to recover for personal injuries, opposed by the Enterprise Dairy Company, employer, and another. Compensation was awarded by the Industrial Accident Commission, and the employer and State Compensation Insurance Fund petition for certiorari. Award affirmed.

For opinion of District Court of Appeals, see 254 P. 274.

Frank J. Creede, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. A hearing of this proceeding by this court was granted for the purpose of further considering it in connection with the case of London Guarantee & Accident Company v. Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California (L. A. 9762) 259 P. 1096, in which we have this day filed an opinion affirming the award. We are satisfied with the opinion written by Mr. Presiding Justice Works when this proceeding was before the District Court of Appeal, and we hereby adopt said opinion as the opinion of this court:

"The facts involved in this controversy are shown by a stipulation entered into at a hearing before the Industrial Accident Commission. It was stipulated that one William D. Wilson was in the employ of petitioner Dairy Company as an automobile truck driver, and that, in the course of his employment, 'the employee was injured in the following manner: After having driven his automobile into a garage of the employer to load said automobile with milk, and while he was engaged in loading the said automobile with milk from a refrigerator belonging to the employer in said garage, an earthquake occurred, and the brick wall of an adjoining two-story building fell through the roof of said garage, causing employee to receive severe contusions over the spine and left chest posterior, with multiple lacerated wounds of his hands and arms from broken glass, the said glass coming from milk bottles which he was loading and had loaded.' As a result of the hearing, an award was made allowing compensation to Wilson for the injuries mentioned in the stipulation. Petitioners, after asking for a rehearing before the Commission, and, upon the request for a rehearing being denied, applied to this court for the writ of review, and the writ issued.

[1, 2] "The sole question presented for our determination is whether Wilson's injuries arose out of his employment. The award was for a small lump sum, payable forthwith. If it be granted, for the sake of argument, without deciding, that a part of the injuries were compensable and that the remainder were not, no complaint is made of the failure of respondent Commission to segregate the two parts. Under such circumstances, indeed, we should doubtless be compelled to assume that the Commission allowed compensation only for the compensable injuries. Be that as it may, however, and considering alone the fact that there is no objection to a lack of segregation, if any part of the injuries were compensable the award must stand. Consequently, we shall henceforth disregard that rather uncertain portion of the stipulation relating to 'severe contusions over the spine and left chest posterior.' Even with this exclusion the stipulation may not be regarded as a model of certainty. After the exclusion the concord of the parties may be rendered thus: While the employee, after driving his truck into a garage belonging to his employer, was engaged in loading bottled milk upon the truck, taking the bottles from a refrigerator located in the garage and also belonging to the employer, 'an earthquake occurred, and the brick wall of an adjoining two-story building fell through the roof of said garage, causing the employee to receive * * * multiple lacerated wounds of his hands and arms from broken glass, the said glass coming from milk bottles he was loading and had loaded.' In solving the problem here presented, we shall assume that the milk bottles, both those which the employee 'was loading' and those which he 'had loaded,' were broken by the falling brick wall and not by improper handling by the employee, or by any other means. We shall also assume that the brick wall fell because of the earthquake shock. These assumptions embody our understanding of the import of the stipulation, and they remove its principal uncertainties.

[3, 4] "The rule which is to govern the disposition of this proceeding has been correctly stated, we think, in this language, relating to a claim of compensation because of the death of an employee: 'We believe the reasonable rule to be that, if deceased, by reason of his employment, was exposed to a risk of being injured by a storm which was greater than the risk to which the public in that vicinity was subject, or if his employment necessarily accentuated the natural hazard from the storm, which increased hazard contributed to the injury, it was an injury arising out of the employment although unexpected and unusual' (Central Illinois Co. v. Industrial Commission, 291 Ill. 256, 126 N. E. 144, 13 A. L. R. 967). We think the present proceeding is within the rule stated. Let us ascertain the true situation under the facts before us by the statement of an imagined case. Suppose that Wilson had been in the employ of a merchant engaged in the sale of glassware; his duty having been to make delivery to customers of goods sold by the employer. Suppose that he was engaged in the delivery of a quantity of fragile merchandise of the character mentioned, that he transported it in his truck to the sidewalk curbing in front of the residence of a customer who had bought it, and that then, with a heavily loaded basket on his shoulder, containing the fragile glassware, he started on foot toward the residence of the customer. Suppose further that before he reached his goal an earthquake shock occurred of sufficient intensity to throw him to the ground, thereby causing the glass to break and to cut him severely, he suffering no injury whatever from the fall itself, that is, by his mere contact with the ground. Is there any doubt that under such circumstances Wilson would have been entitled to compensation because of his injuries? The question appears to answer itself. Nor can we see a difference in legal effect between the supposed case and the one actually presented to us. We think, specifically, that no difference arises merely because milk bottles, as commonly known, are not to a great extent fragile. Although they are fabricated for the purpose of withstanding some considerable degree of rough usage, the fact remains that Wilson was cut-lacerated, in the language of the stipulation—by the fragments into which flew those that he handled. This fact, we think, demonstrates that in the course of Wilson's employment he was subject to risks different from and in addition to those to which other persons were exposed who were within the area affected by the earthquake in question. His injuries from the broken bottles, therefore, arose out of the employment. Within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, * * * he was injured by the broken glass and not by the earthquake. As bearing upon the question here presented, it is instructive to note the facts upon which compensation was directed in Central Illinois Co. v. Industrial Commission, supra.

"We see nothing to interfere with the conclusion here reached in the cases cited by petitioner, among which are State v. District Court, 129 Minn. 502, 153 N. W. 119, L. R. A. 1916A, 344; Thier v. Widdifield, 210 Mich. 355, 178 N. W. 16, and Alzina Construction Co. v. Industrial Commission, 309 Ill. 395, 141 N. E. 191."

Award affirmed.

UNITED TAXPAYERS' CO. v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.
(S. F. 11780.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 7, 1927.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨1038—Municipality might move to quash levy of execution issued against it, on real estate which it had conveyed to another.

City and county might move to quash levy of execution issued against it, on real estate which municipality had fully conveyed to another prior to levy, since levy was unlawful and municipality was bound to protect title.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨1038—Property of municipality held not subject to execution, where it had been used for public jail, and had thereafter been leased; property not having lost public character.

Property owned by city and county held not subject to levy of execution in hands of private creditor, where municipality had used property for public jail until building thereon was destroyed by earthquake and fire, and thereafter had leased it from time to time for many years, and at time of levy had determined to sell it and to apply proceeds to another specific public use; the property still retaining its public character.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨1038—Levy of execution issued against municipality, on real estate which it had sold, was properly quashed.

Court properly quashed levy of writ of execution issued against municipality, where levy was made on real property which had been fully conveyed by municipality to another prior to issuance of writ.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the United Taxpayers' Company against City and County of San Francisco. Final judgment was rendered for plaintiff. From an order quashing a levy of execution on real property of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph E. Bien, of San Francisco, and Edwin H. Williams, of San Leandro, for appellant.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., and Dion R. Holm, Deputy City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from an order made after final judgment quashing the levy of execution upon the judgment obtained by the plaintiff against the municipality, and which execution had been attempted to be levied on certain real estate of the municipality, which property had, in other years, been used for the purposes of a public jail, but which, having ceased to be used for that specific purpose, was, at the time of the levy of the execution, either in progress of being sold or had been sold by the city to private persons, such sale having been made for the avowed purpose expressed in the ordinances of the municipality referring to such sale of applying the money received therefrom to another public use.

[1] The appellant's first contention is the purely technical one that the city and county of San Francisco, having sold and conveyed all its interest in the real property concerned, was no longer entitled to move to quash the levy of execution against such property. This contention defeats itself since, if prior to the levy of the execution the municipality had fully conveyed all its interest in the property levied upon, the appellant would have no right to impose an execution upon such property in the hands of third persons; and if such were the case it would seem that the municipality would still be bound to protect the title it had thus conveyed and would, therefore, be entitled to move to quash such levy. On the other hand, if the municipality had not completed the transfer of its title to said property at the time of the attempted levy of said writ, it would for that reason be entitled to appear in the action in which such execution had been issued in order to move to quash the levy thereof which, having been made, was impeding its transfer of the property to the purchaser thereof.

[2, 3] The next contention of the appellant is that the property in question, not being at the time of such attempted levy of said writ of execution actually in use for a public purpose, this judgment creditor was entitled to levy an execution upon the property in order to satisfy its judgment against the municipality. It is conceded by the appellant that the property was many years ago acquired by the municipality for a public use, to wit, for the use and occupation as the site of its public jail, and that the property was devoted to such public use up to the time of the destruction of the building thereon in the earthquake and fire of 1906. Thereafter the property had been leased from time to time by the municipality, apparently awaiting such time as the same might be profitably sold and the funds derived from such sale applied to other public uses. We are of the opinion that the property of a municipality which has been acquired by it for public uses and has been in the past devoted to such uses cannot be made the subject of levy and sale under execution for the satisfaction of a judgment obtained by a private creditor against such municipality, at least until it is shown that its devotion to such use has been entirely abandoned. The earlier cases decided by this court, wherein writs of execution levied upon property of the municipality were upheld, arose out of levies made upon property which had never been impressed with any public use. The more recent case of Marin Water Co. v. Sausalito, 49 Cal. App. 79, 193 P. 294, wherein a petition for hearing was denied by this court, does not uphold the appellant's contention herein; but, on the contrary, as appears from the opinion of this court in denying said petition, opposes it by holding that property of a municipality which has been acquired for and impressed with a public use is not subject to levy and sale at the suit of a private creditor. In the instant case it sufficiently appears from the record that the property of the municipality, which was sought to be subjected to the levy of this writ, had retained its public character, notwithstanding its temporary disuse for a specific public purpose, and that the municipality in disposing of the same recognized this fact in its official determination to apply the proceeds derived from its sale to another specific public use. But, even were it otherwise, it further sufficiently appears from the record herein that the sale by the municipality of this property had been fully consummated before the date of the issuance and levy of said writ of execution, and that for that reason also the order of the trial court in quashing the levy of the writ as against said property should be upheld.

The order is affirmed.

HIETT et al. v. INLAND FINANCE CORPORATION. (Sac. 4045.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 11, 1927.

1. Appeal and error §799—Parties, moving to dismiss appeal because questions have become moot, should support motion by affidavit showing proceedings causing questions to become moot.

Parties, moving to dismiss appeal on ground that same has become moot, should support motion by affidavit or other showing setting forth proceedings in trial court which would have caused questions raised on appeal to have become moot.

2. Appeal and error §659(4)—Motion for diminution of record held not proper procedure to bring before court matters which have caused questions to become moot.

Motion for diminution of record on appeal held not proper procedure to bring before Supreme Court proceedings in action occurring subsequent to taking of appeal which respondents might urge on motion to dismiss appeal on ground that questions have become moot in event of their making such motion.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by H. C. Hiett and another against the Inland Finance Corporation. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Plaintiffs move for diminution of record on appeal. Motion denied.

Louitt & Stewart, of Stockton, for appellant.

Roy A. Bronson, E. D. Bronson, Jr., and Bronson, Bronson & Slaven, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The respondents move the court for an order requiring the clerk of the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Stanislaus, to file herein a supplementary clerk's transcript setting forth certain proceedings in the above-entitled action occurring in said court subsequent to the taking of said appeal and the preparation and filing of the transcript on appeal herein, and which proceedings and papers sought to be included in such supplementary transcript have no relation to the questions presented upon said appeal, and would hence constitute no proper part of the original transcript thereon. The declared purpose of the respondents in making this motion is that of having such matters made a part of the record upon appeal herein in order that they may thereafter move to dismiss such appeal upon the ground that by virtue of such proceedings to be embodied in such supplementary transcript this appeal has become moot.

[1, 2] They have not, however, moved to dismiss this appeal upon the ground that the same has become moot and they may never make such motion. In the event, however, that they should do so, they may and properly should support the same by affidavit or other showing setting forth the proceedings in the trial court which would have caused the questions raised upon this appeal to have become moot. Such would be their proper procedure and it would seem evident that the present is not the proper procedure to be taken in order to bring before this court the matters which the respondents may urge upon a motion to dismiss this appeal in the event of their making such motion. It may well be doubted whether this court has the power to order the clerk of the trial court to prepare and present a supplementary transcript embodying matters which would have been no proper part of the original transcript upon appeal.

The motion is therefore denied.

O'BRIEN et al. v. DICKINSON DRUG CO.
(Civ. 4674.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California. Oct. 3, 1927.

New trial — 71—Under conflicting evidence as to contributory negligence, granting new trial after verdict for damages for personal injuries held not abuse of discretion.

In action for damages for fall down stair steps in store, under conflicting evidence as to whether plaintiff willfully disregarded signs and warnings and was injured through her own carelessness and negligence, granting new trial after verdict for plaintiff was not abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Julia H. O'Brien and another against the Dickinson Drug Company. Verdict for plaintiffs. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Rudolph & Warne and Isaac Pacht, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Fred W. Morrison, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PEAIRS, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from an order of the court granting a new trial after verdict of the jury for damages for personal injuries.

The facts alleged by plaintiffs were that Julia H. O'Brien, one of the plaintiffs, went to the drug store of defendant, and, after making a purchase, attempted to enter the ladies' toilet, but, finding it occupied, was directed by the porter to the "gents' toilet," situated at the head of a cellar stairway, and that, not being warned of danger, she fell down a short flight of steps and was injured. The defendant alleges that, when the plaintiff found the ladies' toilet occupied, she then attempted to enter another door upon which was printed in large letters the words, "Positively No Admittance. Private," and willfully disregarding the said sign and warnings of defendant's employees, was injured because of her own carelessness and negligence.

The testimony of plaintiff Julia H. O'Brien in itself is contradictory as to what was said and done. To some extent her testimony corroborates the testimony of the witnesses Stromwall, Stout, and Harrison, showing that the door to the cellarway and "gents' toilet" was locked and not open to the public, and that it was not opened until after she had tried to enter the ladies' toilet. The testimony of the witnesses Stromwall, Stout, and Harrison are, otherwise, quite flatly contradictory of much of plaintiff's testimony, and apparently consistent—showing the locked door, signs, warnings, conversations had, and what happened. The plaintiff says:

That she "had no conversation with the clerk Stromwall before the accident other than to ask for medicine; * * * that the door was locked at that time after buying the medicine. It is always closed. * * * I didn't notice a door there ever. * * * I saw the door after he opened it."

Both Stromwall and Harrison testify that they said to plaintiff, "Don't go in there;" and Stout testified to hearing each of these witnesses so state.

This much of the evidence is sufficient to show great contradiction, and, after considering all of the evidence in this case, some of which was decidedly conflicting, if the judge believed the testimony of any one of the witnesses Stromwall, Stout, or Harrison, it was not only his right but his duty to grant a new trial. The law in this respect is repeatedly stated in the following cases: In Motz v. Motz, 136 Cal. 558, 560, 69 P. 294, it says that, where there is a material conflict of testimony and the judge believes the verdict was contrary to the weight of the evidence, it is his duty to grant a new trial. In Hitchcock v. Rooney, 171 Cal. 285, 152 P. 913, it states that, if there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the order of the judge granting a motion for a new trial must stand. In the Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 147, 149, 155 P. 631, it is stated to be the duty of the judge to set aside a verdict as often as his conscience is impressed with the injustice of the verdict. In Weringer v. Rutledge, 180 Cal. 569, 182 P. 31, it says, if there be a sharp conflict in the testimony, the court should grant a motion for a new trial when not satisfied with the verdict. In Ham v. County of Los Angeles, 46 Cal. App. 148, 189 P. 462, it is stated that the discretion of the trial court is very broad, and the order of the judge will be upheld unless there is an abuse of discretion. Also in Soto v. Globe Grain & Milling Company, 55 Cal. App. 533, 203 P. 830, it is said to be the duty of the judge, wherever a verdict is not, in his opinion, sustained by the weight of the evidence, to grant a new trial, and, unless it plainly appears that there is an abuse of discretion his order must stand.

Therefore in this case, there being a decided conflict in the evidence and no apparent abuse of discretion, the order granting a new trial is affirmed.

1. Trusts ⇨102(1)—Part owner of option, purchasing it without notice to co-owner, becomes trustee as to co-owner (Civ. Code, § 2224).

Where part owner of option, on obtaining extension, paid option price and took title without notice to co-owner, under Civ. Code, § 2224, he thereby became trustee for co-owner as to one-half of land.

2. Trusts ⇨110—Evidence held to show that relation of partnership and trust existed between defendant and plaintiff's deceased husband (Civ. Code, § 2229, 2410).

In action to establish trust in real estate held by defendant, evidence held to show that defendant and plaintiff's deceased husband were associated as partners, and that their relations were confidential and they were trustees for each other within Civ. Code, §§ 2229, 2410.

3. Trusts ⇨102(1)—Community of duty exists between persons having community of interest.

Where two persons have a community of interest, there is a community of duty between them.

4. Trusts ⇨102(1)—Private benefit obtained by one of two parties interested together by mutual agreement renders him trustee for benefit of both.

On a purchase being made by parties interested together by mutual agreement, neither party can exclude other, and any private benefit touching common right which is secured by either party will turn him into a trustee for benefit of both.

5. Trusts ⇨91—Constructive trust is created when person taking property cannot hold it without violating some principle of equity (Civ. Code, § 2224).

Under Civ. Code, § 2224, where circumstances of a transaction are such that person taking title to property cannot be permitted to hold it without violating some principle of equity, a constructive trust will be raised for benefit of party entitled to its beneficial enjoyment.

6. Trusts ⇨110—Evidence to raise constructive trust need be no more convincing than that required to convert deed into mortgage.

No more clear and convincing evidence is required to raise a constructive trust than is required to convert a deed absolute in form into a mortgage.

7. Appeal and error ⇨101(1)—Trial court's determination on conflicting evidence is not reviewable on appeal.

Trial court's determination in favor of either party on conflicting or contradictory evidence is not open to review on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by Belle B. McMillen, formerly Belle B. Brunton, individually, and as executrix of the last will and testament of John W. Brunton, deceased, against Thomas C. Olmsted, to establish a trust in real property. From a judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Bowker & Sheridan, of Ventura (Robert M. Clarke, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

W. C. Shelton, of Los Angeles, and Wayne L. Clark, of Ventura, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff brought this action against defendant for the purpose of obtaining judgment that the defendant, her brother, holds in trust for her an undivided one-fourth interest in the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 13, township 3 north, range 21 west, San Bernardino base and meridian, containing 40 acres of land, and for an accounting of all sums received by him therefrom and for general equitable relief. The judgment went for plaintiff as prayed for, the court decreeing that defendant was the record owner of an undivided one-half interest in the land, but that he held such record title in trust for the plaintiff as to an undivided one-half thereof, and that an undivided one-half of a certain oil and gas lease thereon to the Union Oil Company of California, as lessee, was held by the defendant in trust for the plaintiff as to an undivided one-half thereof. Judgment also went against defendant on an accounting in the sum of $15,754.14 and $40.50 costs. From the judgment as rendered and from the order of the court denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

Appellant urges that in the consideration of this case the court must commence with the presumption that the title to the real property in question vested as to a one-half interest thereof in appellant herein, Thomas C. Olmsted. For the affirmance of this judgment the testimony must be of that clear, convincing, unequivocal kind and character not only to overcome this presumption, but to establish a trust as to a one-fourth interest therein, and appellant contends that the record fails to disclose any testimony to overcome this presumption of law, much less to establish the trust by the measure and amount of evidence required under the laws of the state of California.

The record title to the 40-acre tract in question is as follows: On October 2, 1913, the 40 acres, together with an adjoining 80 acres, was located as a placer mining claim by Joshua T. Stockton, Myrle T. Rogers, Mollie L. Rogers, his wife, Emmett C. Crane, Thomas C. Olmsted (appellant herein), and J. F. Brunton (whose estate is respondent herein). On October 18, 1913, Stockton, Rogers, and wife leased their interest, which was an undivided one-half interest in the 40-acre tract, to Crane and Olmsted, giving therein an option to purchase their interest for $2,000. The 80-acre tract filed on by said locators was leased to Graham and Maustard, who organized the South Mountain Oil Company, and upon which tract oil was discovered in 1915, and the title to this tract was subsequently vested in Oak Ridge Oil Company. On May 5, 1916, a patent was issued to the 120-acre tract, which included the 40-acre parcel in dispute, to Joshua T. Stockton, Myrle J. Rogers, Mollie L. Rogers, his wife, Emmett C. Crane, Thomas C. Olmsted (appellant), and J. F. Brunton (whose estate is respondent). The option to purchase by Crane and Olmsted from Stockton, Rogers, and wife of October 18, 1913, had, by its terms, expired at the time of the issuance of the patent, but had been orally extended. On June 26, 1916, Crane and wife, Olmsted and wife, and Brunton and wife conveyed their interest in the 40-acre tract to Stockton and Rogers. On August 23, 1915, Rogers and wife and Stockton conveyed to Crane and Olmsted (appellant) the 40-acre tract. On October 11, 1916, Olmsted (appellant) and Crane leased and optioned the 40-acre tract to J. W. Brunton (whose estate is respondent) and J. W. Wallace.

The answer to the complaint does not deny the allegations of what was actually done regarding the initiation of oil rights in and to the 40 acres in dispute. It is undisputed that on June 2, 1910, the Flow No. 3 placer mining claim, containing 120 acres, which included the 40 acres in question, was located on South Mountain by Joshua T. Stockton and his associates, and that in July, 1913, said locations were owned and controlled by Stockton and his attorney, Judge M. T. Rogers; that about the month of July, 1913, an agreement was entered into between appellant and Crane and Stockton and Rogers, which provided that said placer mining claim should be relocated as the South Mountain placer mining claim by Stockton, Rogers, Mrs. Rogers, Crane, Olmsted (appellant), and Brunton (whose estate is respondent); that upon relocating the claim a corporation should be organized and procured to develop the property under lease from all locators, which lease should provide an option to purchase the 80 acres at $50 per acre, payable to Stockton and Rogers. It is also admitted that a lease on the remaining 40 acres was made to Olmsted and Crane by Stockton, Rogers, and Mrs. Rogers, carrying with it an option to purchase for $2,000 any time within 3 months after discovery of oil on either the 40 acres or on the 80 acres, payable one-half within a period of three months and one-half within six months after discovery. The only denial is that there was any agreement with Brunton or that he should have any interest in the locations or the 40-acre lease and option from Stockton and Rogers, even though it is conceded by the answer that he became one of the six original locators. There was no formal written contract between appellant and his brother-in-law, Brunton, as to the interest of each in this lease and option. The answer does not deny that the property was relocated as the South Mountain placer mining claim by Stockton, Rogers, Mrs. Rogers, Olmsted, Crane, and Brunton; that pursuant to agreement the South Mountain Oil Company was organized and received an oil development lease from Stockton, Rogers, Mrs. Rogers, Olmsted, Crane and Brunton for the whole north one-half of the southeast quarter of section 13, which lease contained an option to purchase the land upon discovery of oil at $50 per acre; that about October 18, 1913, Stockton and Rogers executed and delivered to Crane and Olmsted the said lease and option to buy the 40 acres in question, and admits that the locators, including Brunton, finally, on May 24, 1916, received, after a contest, a patent to said South Mountain placer mining claim, which included the 40 acres; that all of said locators, including Brunton, deceased, executed and delivered a deed to the 80-acre tract, to wit, the north half of the southeast quarter of section 13, to South Mountain Oil Company or its successors, and that the grantee paid to Rogers and Stockton $50 per acre therefor, and it is also admitted that about June 26, 1916, at the request of Judge Rogers, Crane, and his wife, the deceased Brunton and his wife and appellant Olmsted and his wife conveyed their title to the 40-tract to Rogers and Stockton. Judge Rogers in his testimony explains the purpose of this deed to be that the option to purchase had expired, but had been orally extended. "The fact of the matter is, Mr. Stockton and myself was getting restive about it, and we talked it over, and we finally decided we would give them another extension of time, but in order for them to have that they must convey the property to us, so that if they fell completely down in taking over the option—exercising it—why, there would be no difficulty in carrying out the arrangement which we had as to the conveyance to us of their interest, if they failed to operate under the lease and to exercise the option for the purchase of the 40, and before the option was in fact exercised, and before that for some little time, why, we of course knew, or thought and believed, that the 40 acres was worth a great deal more money than we was getting under the option. Just because my word was given they could have this opportunity to purchase all because I wanted to be fair." It is also admitted that thereafter, on or about August 23, 1916, Crane and Olmsted paid the option price of $2,000 and received a deed to the property.

The record discloses that plaintiff's decedent, John W. Brunton, was her husband and the defendant's brother-in-law. Brunton and defendant were good friends and defendant had worked for Brunton prior to the transaction involved in this case. Brunton was a practical oil man and had been in the business for more than 12 years, had drilled wells and organized oil companies. While defendant, when called as a witness under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, stated, "I was not associated with Mr. Brunton and had no relations whatever in any way with him prior to July, 1913," he admitted when confronted with a letter that in January, 1912, he wrote and sent a letter to Brunton concerning a joint oil enterprise the two were working on in the Sespe district in Ventura county, and on July 6, 1913, he wrote Brunton asking for the form of a lease and discussing mutual business relationships. Defendant also admitted that on July 6, 1913, he and Brunton were thinking and talking of locating some property upon South Mountain, located near Santa Paula, Ventura county. He said: "We were just simply locating—looking for open government land to locate."

In the affidavit of appellant given the inspector of the Department of the Interior concerning the patent covering the land in question, appellant acknowledges the interest of Brunton. In his testimony the following appears:

"Q. I will ask you again, Mr. Olmsted, if in your affidavit which you gave to the inspector of the Department of the Interior, if you didn't claim to them you were the owner of a half interest in the 40 acres, and one-half of your interest you transferred to your brother-in-law, J. W. Brunton? A. Yes, sir; I think I did."

"Q. You did so state? A. Yes, sir."

And the certified copy of the record of the United States Land Office clearlisting for patent the land in issue bearing date March 23, 1916, signed by Commissioner Tallman, giving the story of the locating and development of this placer mining claim, contains the following:

"He (Crane) states that his interest in the claim is a one-half interest in the 40-acre lease. * * * Brunton states * * * that his interest in the claim is a one-fourth interest in the 40-acre lease, which he still retains. * * * Olmsted states that his interest is a one-half interest in the 40-acre lease, a one-half interest in which he transferred to his brother-in-law, J. W. Brunton."

Up to March 23, 1916, six months prior to the option to purchase being exercised by Crane and appellant, appellant admits that Brunton owned a half of his half interest in the 40 acres. In fact, he so testified:

"Q. He had a quarter on that at the time you made your affidavit to the Land Department? A. Yes, sir."

"Q. That was prior to the time he had his lease, wasn't it? A. That is a different condition."

"Q. You just explain to the court what those conditions were that made it different. A. He was a locator; we had decided on putting Mr. Brunton in and giving him half of my half of the 40 acres, providing he would pay his part in the purchase of that property."

It may here be noted that appellant's testimony quoted is in direct conflict with his verified answer wherein he denies that the lease and option from Stockton and Rogers were executed or delivered with respect to any agreement with Brunton or any understanding that Brunton was to acquire any interest in said lease on said property.

[1] The situation with respect to the 40-acre tract then is that on March 23, 1916, Brunton was an owner in common or partner in the 40-acre lease with appellant as to the one-half interest held by appellant; that, according to appellant, Brunton failed to pay his part of the $1,000 due from appellant and Brunton to take up the option, and appellant paid it himself; that he had no letters or any document in writing to Mr. Brunton requesting him to advance his half, but he told him several times. He further testified:

"The conversation with Mr. Brunton in reference to the $1,000, I think, was at the Hellman building at Los Angeles. I had not written to him about this matter as I recall. I told him that we had to make this payment of $1,000 or the option would be in default, which it did, and Mr. Crane and myself had another option and later purchased the property."

This conversation appellant testified was about the time the option would expire along in September, 1916. The conversation was about the old option; appellant never told Brunton of the claimed new option. According to the testimony of Judge Rogers no new option was given; the original option was extended from time to time until it was finally paid and title conveyed. The evidence therefore shows that appellant told Brunton the option was about to expire and requested that he put up half of appellant's half of the option price; that Brunton failed to do so at that time; and that thereafter appellant and Crane got an extension of the option and later, without any notice or demand upon Brunton, paid the option price and took title, claiming that Brunton was out. This of itself would make appellant a trustee for Brunton as to one-half of appellant's half interest in the 40-acre tract, with, of course, a right to demand $500 contribution from Brunton under section 2224 of the Civil Code providing:

"One who gains a thing by fraud, accident, mistake, undue influence, the violation of a trust, or other wrongful act is, unless he has some other and better right thereto, an involuntary trustee of the thing gained, for the benefit of the person who would otherwise have had it."

It is significant that no such demand was ever made verbally or in writing. It is also significant, according to appellant's statement, that no demand verbally or in writing was ever made on Brunton to pay his part of the $1,000 prior to the exercise of the option after the extension was granted. It would be strange if Brunton, who was interested together with appellant in other development work on South Mountain and knew what was going on, would deliberately let his interest in a valuable piece of patented land slip away in the manner outlined by appellant, particularly in view of the fact, as stated by Judge Rogers, that the 40 acres "was worth a great deal more money than we were getting."

[2] That appellant and Brunton were jointly interested in oil development on South Mountain is shown by appellant's own testimony. He testified that before the original agreement with Stockton and Rogers was entered into he had talked with Brunton regarding the location of another piece of government land containing 160 acres called the Sunset-Ventura, and in fact had discussed getting several locations on South Mountain; that Mr. Brunton, himself, and associates located other land pursuant to that understanding, one claim of 160 acres being the Sunset-Ventura, in locating which they jumped prior locations of Stockton and his associates over Stockton's objections; that in 1916, the time he talked to the inspector, he and Brunton were associated on two locations, one being the Sunset-Ventura and the other the property here in question. About that time they had made a little trail across the 40-acre piece up to the 160 acres. Mr. Brunton sent his money down to pay for it. Appellant further testified that he more than likely superintended the Mexicans he hired to build the trail, though they were building it. From the evidence in the record, which would require too much space to further quote or summarize, the logical conclusion or inference to be drawn is that long prior to the time that appellant exercised the option on the 40 acres he and his brother-in-law, Brunton, were associated as partners in oil enterprises, and that they were financed by Brunton, and that therefore their relations were confidential and they were trustees for each other (Civ. Code, § 2410), and "a trustee may not use or deal with the trust property for his own profit, or for any other purpose unconnected with the trust, in any manner" (Civ. Code, § 2229). "The relation between partners is confidential with respect to the firm property and business; each is trustee of the other." Dennis v. Gordon, 163 Cal. 427, 125 P. 1063.

[3, 4] But if a partnership relation did not exist between the deceased and appellant there certainly existed a community of interest, and where two persons have a community of interest, there is also a community of duty between them. In re Du Paine's Estate, 185 Pa. 332, 39 A. 947, 40 L. R. A. 552, 64 Am. St. Rep. 651; Venable v. Beauchamp, 3 Dana (Ky.) 321, 28 Am. Dec. 84. This principle arises from the privity subsisting between parties having a common interest in the same land and a common interest in the possession of each. If parties are interested together by mutual agreement and a purchase is made agreeable thereto, neither party can exclude the other from what was intended for the common benefit; and any private benefit touching the common right which is secured by either party will turn him into a trustee for the benefit of both. Jenkins v. Frink, 30 Cal. 586, 89 Am. Dec. 134.

Appellant urges that if Brunton had been an owner of one-half of Olmsted's half interest he would not have taken the lease from Crane and Olmsted. In view of the circumstances, Brunton's acceptance of the lease was not incompatible with ownership. Appellant, who with Crane executed the lease to Brunton, had an interest in the lease. According to appellant's own testimony he had an interest in the leasehold to develop the property—took a contract to drill the well for so much equity in the lease and so much in money. Then, again, Crane, Olmsted, and Brunton evidently desired to lease the 40 acres on a royalty basis, which Crane and Olmsted eventually did, and Brunton, being the experienced oil man, was evidently thought to be the one to handle the matter and for that purpose wanted a lease to assign to the purchaser when found, as he told Olmsted at his home in Los Angeles, according to the testimony of Wedell Lodair Brunton, "to develop the land he would have to take a lease on it, but being a locator on the land could not have a lease and to develop the land he must quit deed—a quitclaim deed or some way to develop the land; a man could not develop his own. I do not know how to state that—a man could not—the owner who was a locator could not lease his own land."

Some discussion is indulged in by respective counsel in their briefs concerning certain letters written by Olmsted to Brunton, in which the context of such letters appears to have been altered or retraced. We have not given consideration to these letters, as we do not deem consideration of them necessary to an affirmance of the judgment, and adopt the views of the trial court with respect to them. The trial court in its opinion brought to this court as a part of appellant's brief uses this language:

"I do not give much credence to any of the correspondence which was received in evidence on behalf of the Brunton estate. I am perfectly satisfied that several of those letters had been doctored up by somebody. It required no expert to determine that question. An ordinary reading glass would easily disclose that fact. There is nothing, however, to indicate that the plaintiff took any part in any such fraud or had any knowledge of it. There is nothing in the testimony to indicate who made these changes in those letters, but, leaving entirely out of consideration those letters, I still felt that there was ample testimony upon which to base the claim made by the plaintiff in her complaint."

[5] Appellant has cited us to sections of Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, sections of the Civil Code, and a number of California cases in support of his contention that neither an express nor resulting trust exists in the present case, and contends that a constructive trust does not exist under section 2224 of the Civil Code, and cites us to Burns v. Ross, 190 Cal. 274, 212 P. 17, for a construction of that code section. In that case the court says:

"The equitable principle contained in that section is thus stated in Mandeville v. Solomon, 33 Cal. 38, 44: 'Where the circumstances of a transaction are such that the person who takes the title to property cannot be permitted to hold and enjoy it in whole or in part without necessarily violating some principle of equity, a constructive trust will be raised for the benefit of the party entitled in equity to its beneficial enjoyment. It is because he holds the property, or some interest therein, which it is inequitable for him to enjoy, that the court declares the trust and fastens it upon his conscience, and wrests the property or interest from him and causes it to be transferred to the person equitably entitled to it.'"

[6, 7] This language in Burns v. Ross, as we view the facts contained in the record, is applicable here. While it is true, as claimed by appellant, that the evidence in a case of this kind must be clear and convincing, yet no more clear and convincing evidence is required to raise a constructive trust than is required to convert a deed absolute in form into a mortgage, and it has been held in such cases, as in others, the determination of the trial court in favor of either party upon conflicting or contradictory evidence is not open to review in this court. Couts v. Winston, 153 Cal. 686, 96 P. 357; Hillwig v. Boyer (Cal. App.) 254 P. 662.

Upon a careful examination of the entire record, we are satisfied that the judgment entered was the proper one to enter.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: KNIGHT, Acting P. J.; CASHIN, J.

85 Cal. App. 542

BURCH v. HARTFORD FIRE INS. CO.
(Civ. 3275.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 22, 1927.

1. Reformation of Instruments §45(14)—Evidence held not to establish that crop insurance was induced through misrepresentation or fraud of insurer's agent.

In action on crop insurance policy, evidence held insufficient to establish that defendant's agent misrepresented anything to plaintiff, or that application of plaintiff was made or induced by any fraud or misrepresentation of defendant's agent.

2. Insurance §136(5)—Insured cannot accept indorsement of portion of policy and reject remainder, consistent with application and policy.

Insured cannot accept a portion of policy on which an indorsement had been made and reject the remainder, which is consistent with both application and policy.

3. Insurance §150—Rider or Indorsement on policy before issuance became part of contract as fully as though read by insured before loss.

Rider or indorsement made on policy prior to issuance by insurer, and delivery to insured, becomes a part of the contract as fully to all intents and purposes as though read by insured prior to date of loss.

4. Insurance §130(2)—Application subject to approval or rejection requires action on part of insurer before becoming binding.

Where application for insurance is made subject to approval or rejection by insurer, the application is one of the steps leading up to insurance, and requires action on part of insurer before binding contract can be created.

5. Insurance §665(2)—Evidence held to warrant finding that crop insurance policy, with indorsement thereon, had been accepted by insured.

In action on crop insurance policy, which had been returned pursuant to application with indorsement differing from application therefor, evidence held to warrant finding that policy together with indorsement thereon had been accepted by insured.

6. Appeal and error §1175(7)—Appellate court, where jury was waived, may enter correct judgment on uncontradicted evidence and terminate litigation (Code Civ. Proc. § 956a).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 956a, appellate court, in case where trial by jury was waived, may enter judgment in accordance with evidence which is without conflict on any material point, and terminate cause without further litigation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by W. E. Burch, trustee, against the Hartford Fire Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, for appellant.

M. H. Farrar and J. J. Dunne, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff had judgment in the sum of $8,625 upon a certain policy of insurance covering costs of the production of a crop of barley belonging to the plaintiff and insured by the defendant. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The transcript shows that on or about the 1st day of March, 1921, the plaintiff applied to the defendant for insurance in the sum of $20,700 on 1,725 acres of wheat and 1,724 acres of barley, to wit, $12,075 on the wheat and $8,625 on the barley. Both the wheat and the barley referred to were then and there seeded and growing upon certain premises situate in the county of Fresno, state of California. The application for insurance upon the seeded wheat crop was set forth in the application as item No. 1, upon which the premium, calculated at 10 per cent., amounted to the sum of $1,207.50. The application for insurance upon the seeded barley crop was and is known as item No. 2, upon which the premium, calculated at 8 per cent., amounted to the sum of $690. The application further set forth in item No. 2 that the insurance was to cover a two-thirds interest in the barley crop and not to exceed $5 per acre. In the calculation of the amount of insurance applied for in the application, it appears that the amount of the premium was figured by the applicant as though the barley crop included 1,725 acres instead of only 1,724 acres. The insurance applied for under the application being considered was for the purpose of insuring the applicant against loss on account of the expenses incurred by him in plowing, seeding, irrigating, threshing, etc., of the crop then being upon the 1,724 acres referred to. The schedule of costs filed by the applicant is as follows: Plowing, $2 per acre; harrowing, 40 cents per acre; seed, $1.50 per acre; seeding, 50 cents per acre; irrigating, $1.50 per acre; checking, 60 cents per acre; harvesting $3 per acre; sacks and hauling, 75 cents per acre; total cost, $10.25 per acre.

The application, among other things, included the following:

"The insurance applied for hereunder is not binding until application is approved by the general agent at San Francisco and policy is delivered to applicant. I also agree that this application is made with specific reference to the statements and representations above contained, a duplicate of which application is to be attached to my policy of insurance issued by the Hartford Fire Insurance Company at Hartford, which, in addition to the printed portion of said policy and indorsements attached, if any, constitute my contract with said company."

This application was signed by the plaintiff, W. E. Burch, on March 1, 1921. On the 18th day of March, 1921, the defendant issued and delivered to the plaintiff a policy of insurance covering the cost of the barley crop herein referred to, but declining the application of the plaintiff to insure the cost of the wheat crop referred to in the application. This policy contained the following indorsement:

"Indorsement.

"In consideration of $1,207.50 return premium, the first item of this policy covering $12,- 075 on 1,725 acres of wheat is hereby canceled leaving in force only $8,625 covering two-thirds interest on 1,724 acres of barley being second item of this policy; it being understood and agreed that for the purposes of this insurance each item of schedule of costs on barley item is reduced to 5.00/10.25 of the amounts shown in application. Attached to and made a part of Crop Investment Policy C-2667 issued by the Hartford Fire Insurance Company.

"March 18, 1921.

"Dixwell Hewitt, General Agent.
"RG."

The policy, having this indorsement upon the face thereof, together with a check for the return of $1,207.50 premium on the wheat crop, was sent to the applicant through the mails, and appears to have been received by one Taylor, a son-in-law of the plaintiff, and, upon the return and receipt of the policy, it appears that Taylor stated to the plaintiff that the defendant had refused to insure the cost of the wheat crop and had returned the premium thereon. It does not appear that there was any conversation further in relation to the insurance on the barley crop. The plaintiff testified that he did not read the policy nor the indorsement until after a loss had occurred; that the policy was placed in a safe deposit box belonging to the plaintiff and remained there until the barley crop had become a loss.

By the indorsement upon the policy, the insurance is made to cover only 5.00/10.25 or a fraction less than one-half of the cost of each particular item of loss insured against.

On the part of the plaintiff, it is contended that, as the loss exceeded the sum of $8,625, plaintiff is entitled to recover said sum, irrespective of the fact that the indorsement purports to cover a fraction less than one-half of each item of expenditure incurred by the plaintiff.

On the part of the defendant, it is contended that each item of loss is insured only to the extent of a fraction less than one-half thereof, and that as the plaintiff did not incur a total loss of all of the items insured against, the defendant's liability extends only to the extent of 5.00/10.25 or a fraction less than one-half of each of the items of loss.

The contention of the plaintiff or respondent is further to the effect that the indorsement on the policy, in so far as it limits the liability of the appellant to a fraction less than one-half of the estimated cost of producing the crop, is void, even though the application signed by the appellant limits the insurance applied for to a sum not exceeding $5 per acre, which is a fraction less than one-half the estimated cost of producing the crop. If we accept the indorsement of the policy as a part thereof in the language in which it is written, the insurance, so far as any loss was incurred by the plaintiff, would be covered as follows: Plowing, 98 cents per acre; dising or harrowing, 20 cents per acre; irrigating, 73 cents per acre; seed, 73 cents per acre; seeding, 24 cents per acre; checking, 29 cents per acre. These figures are arrived at by taking 5.00/10.25 of the estimated cost of each item. The record further shows that 1,150 acres of the 1,724 acres were not irrigated. Thus, $839.50 of the cost insured against was not incurred at all. By this calculation plaintiff's net loss covered by insurance, and which he was entitled to recover, amounted to the sum of $4,625.58.

By the complaint filed in this action, the plaintiff took the position in the trial court, and also contends upon this appeal, that the policy of insurance fixes a liability upon the defendant in the sum of $8,625, irrespective of the fact that the insurance is limited to a fraction less than one-half of each item of cost set forth in the schedule filed by the applicant; this, on the theory that the plaintiff's application for an insurance not exceeding $5 per acre applied for in the application following the schedule of estimated cost, entitled the applicant to an insurance of at least $5 per acre, in the event of loss, irrespective of the items set forth in the schedule insured against constituting such loss, as the indorsement made by the defendant, which we have referred to, limiting the amount of recovery to a fraction less than one-half of each item of cost incurred by the plaintiff in the event of loss, was and is invalid as being contrary to the application, and, not having been seen by the plaintiff or read by him until after the loss had occurred, is not binding as against him, and that it constitutes no part of the contract of insurance. Had all of the items of cost insured against been incurred by the plaintiff, then and in that case the liability of the defendant under the application made and signed by the plaintiff for insurance and the insurance policy issued by the plaintiff containing the indorsement which we are considering, would have been $8,625, and upon which the premium would have amounted to the sum of $690, the actual premium paid by the plaintiff and retained by the defendant. This effectually disposes of the contention on the part of the respondent that defendant had failed to return any part of the insurance premium on the barley, and therefore that the cash loss must now be figured at the rate of $5 per acre, irrespective of the rate of insurance upon the items of loss fixed in the indorsement. There is no pretense that the plaintiff sought an insurance covering the entire amount of the estimated expenses of raising a crop of barley that was figured at $10.25 per acre, which would bring the cost of raising the crop of barley to between seventeen and eighteen thousand dollars.

As evidencing the meaning of the policy with the indorsement attached that the insurance was not issued with the intent of covering the loss as a whole, but only as to item by item as costs may have been incurred, reference may be had to paragraph No. 4 of the insurance policy issued by the defendant, to wit:

"This company will not be liable beyond the actual cash value of the interest of said insured in said insured crops at the time of loss or damage, nor exceeding in any event the respective amounts set opposite the items shown in said application."

This language, without the indorsement, is clear and specific that the items of cost were to be covered separately, and, in estimating and determining the liability of the defendant in the event of loss, the items of cost set forth in the schedule were to be considered.

Turning again to the application filed by the plaintiff, we find therein an estimated cost of the several items contained in his application of $10.25 per acre, and a statement that insurance was desired in a sum not exceeding $5 per acre, in pursuance of which the company issued its policy based upon the application, and wrote the insurance covering 5.00/10.25 of each item of cost listed in the schedule, which amounted to exactly $5 per acre. Thus the application and the indorsement on the policy harmonized exactly, and covered the costs incurred and to be incurred by the plaintiff at the time of the insurance of the exact amount contemplated by the language both of the application and the policy. It may be that the plaintiff did not, at the time of filing his application, understand that the items of cost bore a relation to the insurance applied for by him, and that the items of cost would be covered by an insurance of $5 per acre only in that proportion which each item of cost bore to the insurance to be obtained, but we do not well see the relevancy of setting forth each item of cost specifically and the limiting of insurance to a sum not exceeding $5 per acre, unless it be that insurance was being applied for, and it was understood that the company would not issue a policy covering the costs in excess of the rate which each item of cost bore to the total amount of insurance. There is nothing in either the application or the policy indicating that any of the parties contemplated 100 per cent. insurance upon any item of loss. If not 100 per cent. upon any item, then the only consistent construction which can be given to the application and the policy is that each item of loss is covered just in proportion as the item of cost bears to the insurance applied for and issued.

was on the face of the policy at the time of its issuance. It was not issued subsequent to the date of the policy as an attempt to modify the insurance, but the policy was issued with the indorsement as a part and parcel thereof. Many cases have also been cited dealing with the subject of misrepresentation by agents of companies and holding that, where any vice has entered into a policy under such conditions, the policy may be reformed, and that oral testimony may be introduced to establish such facts. In the present case there is no pretense of any fraud having been perpetrated upon the plaintiff. What we have said rather shows that it is a case where the plaintiff did not really understand or take the pains to fully acquaint himself with what he should have understood as to the meaning and extent of his own application for insurance. Nor does the record bear out the contention of misrepresentation on the part of one Mr. Smith, the agent for the defendant. The plaintiff's own testimony in this particular is as follows:

"On this application of mine I said to Mr. Smith: 'I know nothing about this insurance. This is new to me. I do not know one thing in the world about it, and explain to my clientage what you will pay or the company will pay if there is a net loss or a total loss of the grain, and that is what I want you to make clear to these men so that they will know what they are doing because I know nothing about it.' And Mr. Smith took my policy, and he said: 'If you have a total loss we will pay you dollar for dollar on this policy.'"

Again, on cross-examination, the plaintiff further testified:

"Mr. Smith made that application out, and he explained a lot of stuff to my clientage and myself. I cannot tell you about that application no more than what the application is; it is self-evident; and that is all I can tell you about it."

"Q. Well, the application deals with separate costs, etc., plowing, harrowing, irrigating the land, etc.? A. Mr. Smith took my figures."

"Q. Well, that is what I am trying to get at. You furnished that? A. Mr. Smith asked how much money we had to expend, and he showed me a book about what we had to put the expenses at."

"Q. You furnished the figures as to the cost of each one of those steps in the operation of putting in and taking off that barley? A. Mr. Smith took those figures off their schedule."

There was some further testimony as to the different items of cost, all showing that the different items were discussed by the plaintiff and Mr. Smith as they were being placed in the schedule. Had a total loss been incurred by the plaintiff of the items set forth in the schedule, then what Mr. Smith, the agent of the defendant, told the plaintiff, would have measured the exact liability of the defendant, and would have just equaled the judgment rendered by the trial court in this action, but such was not the case. There was not a total loss of the items insured against. As we have stated, some 1,150 acres of the land were not irrigated. No barley was harvested, threshed, sacked, or hauled to market. Hence we think there is nothing in the contention of respondent that the defendant's agent misrepresented anything to the plaintiff, or that the application of the plaintiff was made or induced by any fraud or misrepresentation of any agent of the defendant. While in this case there was a total loss of the crop, there was not a loss of all of the items insured against, as we have herein shown, and, as to the items of loss covered by the insurance to the extent of a fraction less than one-half thereof, it appears from the record that the defendant is willing that the plaintiff may take judgment. The transcript further shows that, if the insurance had been issued for the total estimated cost of producing a crop of barley, the premium would have been twice as much.

[2, 3] Notwithstanding the fact that the indorsement upon the policy or rider, as it is sometimes called in the briefs of counsel, mentioned the fact that the defendant declined to insure the wheat crop about to be raised by the plaintiff, and was returning the premium, and also mentioned the total insurance upon the 1,724 acres of barley which the plaintiff accepted as constituting insurance upon the barley, it is nevertheless contended that the remaining portion of the indorsement or rider is invalid, on the theory that the plaintiff was unaware of the language used therein until after the loss had occurred, and therefore is not bound by the same. We do not very well see how the plaintiff can accept a portion thereof and reject the remainder, as the remainder is consistent with both the application and the policy, as we have heretofore shown. However, the rider or indorsement having been made upon the policy prior to its issuance by the company and forwarded to the plaintiff, we think it became and is a part of the contract, if there is any contract in this case, as fully to all intents and purposes as though read by the plaintiff prior to the date of loss.

In 26 C. J. p. 76, § 72, in considering attached slips or matter on the margin of policies, the text-writer uses the following words:

"Provisions may be incorporated into the policy by slips or riders attached thereto. Such slip or rider will be construed in connection with the printed provisions of the policy, and the entire contract harmonized, if possible, but, if there is an irreconcilable conflict, the slip or rider will control. In order, however, to form a part of the contract, the slip or rider should be referred to in the body of the policy; it is not a part of the policy merely because it is enclosed in the same envelope in which the policy is sent to insured, or because it is pinned on the policy. A rider indorsed on the standard form of policy, containing provisions within the contemplation of the statute permitting such form to be added to or modified, prevails over conflicting provisions in the standard form."

This text is supported by a great number of authorities cited in footnotes 49, 50, 51, and 52 of the same volume, pages 76 and 77.

The indorsement referred to herein contains, among others, the following words: "Attached to and made a part of the crop investment policy C-2667 issued by the Hartford Fire Insurance Company." That a slip or rider attached to a policy modifying or explaining its provisions will be read into the contract, see, also, volume 1, Cooley, Briefs on the Law of Insurance, p. 642; 14 R. C. L. p. 934; Scharles v. N. Hubbard Junior & Co., 74 Misc. Rep. 72, 131 N. Y. S. 848; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Sacramento-Stockton S. S. Co. (C. C. A.) 273 F. 55. In 14 Cal. Jur. p. 432, § 17, the law relative to modification of insurance contracts is thus stated:

"The modification of a contract of insurance is governed by the rules which are applicable to contracts generally. Unless the contract itself otherwise provides, it cannot be changed without the consent of all the parties, since each has a right to have the agreement remain unaltered and to have it performed. A standard fire policy cannot be modified, changed, or added to except by attachment of separate riders before delivery, or afterward, with the consent of the insured."

The record in this case, as we have stated, shows that the indorsement or rider was attached to the policy before delivery, and, as the authorities which we have cited hold, became a part and parcel thereof at the time it was issued by the defendant and received by the plaintiff. The case cited by respondent, holding attempts to modify policies by riders or slips issued after the execution and delivery of the policy, have no bearing upon the case at bar.

[4, 5] The application for insurance in the case at bar was made subject to the approval or rejection by the defendant. Under such circumstances the application is but one of the purposes or steps leading up to a contract of insurance. It requires action on the part of the insurer, to whom the application is made, before a binding contract can be created. In other words, there must be a meeting of minds or a meeting of the mind of the applicant and the insurer. If the insurer, instead of following the application, makes some additions or changes and forwards the policy to the insured, then and in that case a completed contract has not been made until the insured has accepted the same, or by his acts may be held to have accepted the same. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York v. Curtis Brown Co., 105 Okl. 136, 232 P. 99. In the opinion in this case we find the following:

"It is well settled that acceptance of the application in order to be good must be of the very terms offered; otherwise no contract can result" (citing First National Bank v. Hall, 101 U. S. 43, 25 L. Ed. 822; Stephens v. Capital Insurance Co., 87 Iowa, 283, 54 N. W. 139). "An application for insurance, whether or not it is accompanied by payment of a premium, amounts to but a proposal, and does not become a completed contract until it is accepted by the insurer. Until there has been an acceptance of the terms proposed, the meeting of the minds which is necessary to the contract is wanting" (citing authorities).

Was the policy accepted by the plaintiff? Respondent's contention, as we have shown, is to the effect that the policy was accepted, save and except as to that portion of the indorsement relative to the proportion of the items of cost covered by the insurance. Appellant's contention is to the effect that the policy, including the whole of the indorsement thereon, was accepted by the respondent, and that the facts and the law so establish in this case, and likewise that, if such is not the case and the holding to be had herein, then and in that event there is no policy, and no recovery can be had. The transcript shows that at the time of the receipt of the policy from the company, about March 18, 1921, it bore the indorsement as we have set forth; that accompanying the policy there was returned the sum of $1,207.50 on account of premium on the insurance sought to be obtained by the plaintiff on 1,725 acres of growing wheat; that the indorsement set forth the fact that the application for an insurance upon the wheat crop was canceled and the premium thereon was being returned, and then proceeds to set forth the insurance on the barley that was accepted, the interest of the insured therein, and the rate of insurance or amount of insurance on each item of cost set forth in the plaintiff's application covering the 1,724 acres of growing barley. The insurance policy was placed in a safe deposit vault belonging to the plaintiff, and there remained until some time the latter part of May of the same year. The returned check was cashed by the plaintiff, and nothing further appears to have been done by the plaintiff in reference to the policy until the loss had occurred. Under such circumstances we think the evidence warrants only one finding, and that is that the policy, with the whole indorsement, was accepted by the plaintiff. We do not very well perceive how it can be found or held that the plaintiff accepted a part of the indorsement and not the whole thereof. In this particular the case of Blunt v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 145 Cal. 268, 78 P. 729, 67 L. R. A. 793, 104 Am. St. Rep. 34, is in point. There, as in the case at bar, the policy issued differed in some particulars from the application. It was there held that the company was at liberty to insert conditions in the policy differing from what was contained in the application; that under such circumstances the insured, upon receipt of the policy, had the right to reject the same, but that, when he received the policy and accepted it without objection, it became binding. That case goes slightly farther than the one at bar, in that there was a renewal of the policy, the terms of which were disputed. Here, however, the plaintiff knew that the policy issued by the defendant differed in some of its provisions from his application by the very fact that the premium paid in advance on account of the insurance sought upon the wheat, was returned, and yet, in face of this fact and in face of the fact of having cashed the check representing such return premium, his testimony is to the effect that the policy was placed in his safe deposit vault without his having read the same or taken the pains to inform himself as to the contents of the indorsement canceling his application for insurance upon the wheat and setting forth the fact of the return of the premium thereon. In Kahn v. Royal Indemnity Co., 39 Cal. App. 180, 178 P. 331, where a hearing was denied in the Supreme Court, we find the following:

"Nor is there any merit in the further claim that the provisions of the policy cannot be enforced against plaintiff for the reason that the insured did not read it and was unfamiliar with its provisions. By accepting and retaining the policy without objection, the insured was bound by its terms, and the plaintiff claiming thereunder cannot be heard to state that the insured did not read the policy or any of its provisions."

Likewise, it would follow here that the insured, in seeking to enforce the terms of the policy against the defendant, cannot be heard to say, under the circumstances which we have set forth, that he did not read the policy, and therefore is not bound by all of the terms of the indorsement, a portion of which he accepted, and still claim the benefit thereof. In Capps v. National Union Fire Insurance Co., 318 Ill. 350, 149 N. E. 247, the rule is thus stated:

"Unless [the insured] has been misled by some act of the insurer, it is generally held that a person who accepts and retains the possession of an insurance policy is bound to know its contents."

To the same effect is Browne v. Commercial Assurance Co., 30 Cal. App. 547, 158 P. 765; Bank of Fruitvale v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 35 Cal. App. 666, 170 P. 852. These cases cite a number of other decisions to the same effect.

In Madsen v. Maryland Casualty Co., 168 Cal. 204, 142 P. 51, the rule followed in this state is set forth as follows:

"By accepting and retaining the contract without objection plaintiff was bound by its terms and cannot now be heard to say that he did not read it or know its terms. Quinlan v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 133 N. Y. 356 [31 N. E. 31, 28 Am. St. Rep. 645]; *Cleaver v. R. A. 106]."

In view of the authorities cited and the facts set forth herein, it must be found and held that the plaintiff accepted the policy, including the whole of the indorsement thereon, and that the trial court's finding to the contrary is not supported by the evidence, and the conclusions of law drawn by the court from its findings are erroneous.

[6] As the evidence in this case is without conflict upon all the material points involved therein, and proper findings may be drawn therefrom and a correct judgment entered thereon awarding to the plaintiff the amount to which he is entitled, and this cause terminated without further litigation by this court exercising the authority conferred by the recent constitutional amendment empowering an appellate court so to do, and also in accordance with the provisions of section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, where trial by jury is not a matter of right, or where trial by jury has been waived, as in this case, it is hereby ordered that finding No. 9, made by the trial court, is amended to read as follows:

"It is true that, in the event plaintiff's crop of barley became a total loss, then and in that event the plaintiff was entitled to recover the sum of 5.00/10.25 of the amount of each and every item of cost incurred in the production of said crop of barley, not exceeding the sum of $8,625."

It is further ordered that finding No. 10 be amended to read as follows:

"It is true that plaintiff applied for said policy on/or about the 1st day of March, 1921, and that said application thereafter became, and now is a part of said policy; that said application was rejected as to the insurance applied for on the wheat crop mentioned therein, and there was returned to the applicant the sum of $1,207.50, leaving in force in said policy the sum of $8,625 on 1,724 acres of barley in said policy of insurance mentioned, loss, if any, to be calculated at the rate of 5.00/10.25 on each item of expenditure, in the production of said crop of barley, made and incurred by the plaintiff."

It is further ordered that finding No. 11 be stricken out.

It is further ordered that finding No. 12 be amended to read as follows:

"It is true that it was understood and agreed that, for the purposes of said insurance, every item of the schedule of costs mentioned in said application for a policy of insurance on said barley was, by indorsement on the policy prior to its issuance by the defendant and made a part thereof, reduced to the sum of 5.00/10.25 of the amount shown in the application."

It is further ordered that finding No. 13 be amended to read as follows:

"It is true that the indorsement placed on said policy was attached to and made a part of said policy of insurance prior to its issuance by the defendant; that said policy was received by the plaintiff with the indorsement thereon canceling his application, as to the insurance upon the growing crop of wheat, applied for by the plaintiff; that a check was returned to the plaintiff by the defendant for the amount of the premium on the wheat policy applied for, to wit, in the sum of $1,207.50; that the plaintiff cashed said check, was aware that his application had been accepted only in part; that said policy was placed in a safe deposit vault belonging to the plaintiff and kept by him from the time of its receipt on or about March 18, 1921, until the latter part of May, 1921, without any objection being made by him to the defendant on account of anything contained in said indorsement."

It is further ordered that finding No. 14 be amended to read as follows:

"It is true that on or about the 18th day of March, 1921, the sum of $1,207.50, part of the total premium upon said policy, was returned to plaintiff by defendant, which said sum of $1,207.50 was the return premium upon the first item of said policy covering the sum in the amount aforesaid of $12,075 on the aforesaid 1.725 acres of wheat, which said item was canceled, as hereinabove found, and at the same time there was forwarded by the defendant to the plaintiff, and received by the plaintiff, as herein stated, a policy of insurance covering the growing crop of barley in the following words and figures: 'In consideration of $1,207.50 return premium, the first item of said policy covering $12,075.00 on 1.725 acres of wheat is hereby canceled leaving in force only $8,625.00 covering two-thirds interest in 1.724 acres of barley, being second item of this policy, it being understood and agreed that for the purposes of this insurance each item of schedule of costs on barley item is reduced to 5.00/10.25 of the amounts shown in application. Attached to and made a part of crop investment policy C-2667 issued by Hartford Fire Insurance Company.

"March 18, 1921.

"Dixwell Hewitt, General Agent."

It is further ordered that finding No. 15 is amended to read as follows:

"It is also true that the premium of $690, being the second item of said policy covering the aforesaid sum and amount of $8,625 on the aforesaid 1.724 acres of barley in said policy mentioned, was wholly and entirely retained and kept by said defendant, and that no part thereof was ever returned by said defendant to said plaintiff, and that said sum of $690 was the correct amount of the premium to be paid by the plaintiff to the defendant for the insurance issued to him by the defendant on account of said 1.724 acres of barley."

It is further ordered that finding No. 17 be corrected to read as follows:

"It is true that at least 1,150 acres of said barley were not irrigated by the plaintiff."

It is further ordered that finding No. 18 be amended to read as follows:

"It is true that the total amount of insurance recoverable by said plaintiff does not exceed the sum of $3.17 per acre, being 5.00/10.25 of the amount set forth in said schedules."

It is further ordered that finding No. 19 be amended to read as follows:

"It is true that the amount of the insurance due the plaintiff should be reduced by the failure to irrigate 1,150 acres thereof, to the extent of 73 cents per acre."

It is further ordered that finding No. 20 be amended to read as follows:

"It is true that plaintiff's net loss which he is entitled to recover under the policy of insurance issued by the defendant and accepted by him is as follows: 1.724 acres of barley at $3.17 per acre, $5,465.08, from which there should be deducted for failure to irrigate, 1,150 acres thereof, the insured cost of 73 cents per acre not incurred by the plaintiff, amounting to the sum of $839.50, leaving plaintiff's net loss which he is entitled to recover from the defendant in the sum of $4,625.58."

It is further ordered that the conclusions of law drawn by the trial court be amended by striking therefrom the figures representing $8,625 wherever said figures occur, and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$4,625.58."

It is further ordered that, in accordance with the findings in this case as herein amended and the conclusions of law as herein amended, the judgment in favor of the plaintiff be modified by striking therefrom the words "eight thousand six hundred twenty-five dollars" and the figures "\$8,625.00," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "four thousand six hundred twenty-five and $\frac{58}{100}$ dollars," and the figures "\$4,625.58, together with legal interest thereon from the 31st day of May, 1921," and as so amended the judgment of the trial court will stand affirmed. The defendant will have and recover its costs on appeal.

VAN HOOSSEN et ux. v. BRISCOE.*
(Civ. 5606.)

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California. Oct. 3, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 1, 1927.

1. Money received ⇨18(3)—In action to recover money had and received, evidence held to support findings for plaintiffs.

In action to recover money paid to defendant by plaintiffs' debtor, evidence that such money was paid, to be held by defendant until he and plaintiffs entered into contract for sale of land for which they contemplated entering into written contract, that written contract was never entered into, and that land deal did not take place, held to support findings for plaintiffs.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨21—When parties to contract for sale of land understand that it is to be reduced to writing and signed, assent thereto must be shown by written contract.

Where parties to oral contract for sale of land have understanding that its terms are to be reduced to writing and signed, assent to its terms must be evidenced in such manner to become binding.

3. Contracts ⇨15—To be final, material terms of contract must be agreed on, and cannot be left to future settlement.

Preliminary negotiations leading up to contract must be distinguished from contract itself, and, to be final, material terms must be agreed on, and cannot be left to future settlement.

4. Contracts ⇨32—Contract is not binding where, although terms have been agreed on orally, parties have agreed it shall not be binding until evidenced by writing.

There is no binding contract where, although terms have been agreed on orally, parties have also agreed that it shall not be binding until evidenced by writing.

5. Money received ⇨9—In absence of binding contract authorizing defendant to receive and keep money from plaintiffs' debtor, plaintiff may recover it.

In action for money had and received, where there was no binding contract authorizing defendant to retain money paid to him by plaintiffs' debtor, plaintiff was entitled to recover money.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by Eugene Van Hoosen and wife against E. V. Briscoe. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cosgrave & Barstow, of Fresno, for appellant.

Ernest Klette, of Fresno, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Action for money had and received. The complaint alleges that on or about the 15th day of March, 1923, defendant collected of and from W. F. Steffin and

R. B. Steffin, for the use and benefit of said plaintiffs, the sum of $1,490 then owing by the said Steffins to plaintiffs, which sum defendant agreed to repay on request, but that he failed so to do. Defendant denied these allegations, and as a separate defense alleged that on or about December 15, 1922, plaintiffs agreed to purchase of and from defendant a certain tract of land consisting of 20 acres, for the sum of $12,000, which sum plaintiffs agreed to pay in installments from time to time, and that defendant received from plaintiffs the amount sued for in partial performance of this agreement, which sum was voluntarily paid by plaintiff.

[1] The trial court found all the allegations of plaintiffs' complaint to be true. It further found that it was not true as alleged by defendant that plaintiffs agreed to purchase of or from defendant the land described in his answer for the purchase price mentioned, or any other sum. In this connection it found that plaintiff Eugene Van Hoosen and the defendant did, in the year 1921, enter into negotiations for the sale of 20 acres of land near Delano, county of Tulare, from defendant to said plaintiff Eugene Van Hoosen; that said negotiations continued from time to time until about the end of March, 1923, when they were terminated; that during all of the time the negotiations were being carried on between said parties it was their intention that said proposed contract should be reduced to writing, and was so agreed by them; that it was not true that the sum of $1,490, referred to in plaintiffs' complaint, or any part thereof, was transmitted by the Steffins or either of them, to the plaintiff by defendant, or that plaintiff paid the same to defendant as a partial payment on any contract. Additional findings are to the effect that on or about March 15, 1923, defendant was in possession of the sum of $1,490, the property of plaintiffs, and that at said time Eugene Van Hoosen and defendant orally agreed that when the terms and conditions of a contract for the sale of the land should be agreed upon and determined and a contract made and executed, the said money should be applied upon the purchase price of the land, and it was orally agreed that defendant should retain said money for such purpose; that defendant did retain the money, but without the knowledge or consent of Grace Van Hoosen, who was the wife of Eugene Van Hoosen, one of the plaintiffs herein; that the terms of the contract were never agreed upon and determined or ever entered into. As a conclusion of law, the court found that plaintiffs were entitled to recover the sum of $1,490 principal, together with interest.

It is here claimed that these findings are entirely unsupported by the evidence, and that the finding that negotiations only for a sale were had by the parties is in direct con-tradition to the undisputed evidence. We do not think so, but, on the contrary, we are of the opinion that the findings are fully supported by the evidence. There is evidence to show that defendant Briscoe had acquired under a contract of purchase a tract of some 150 acres of land at Delano, Tulare county, on which he was making payments of the purchase price. The plaintiffs Van Hoosen and his wife lived near defendant, who employed Eugene Van Hoosen to take charge of the improvement work upon the tract so purchased. The parties entered into a tentative verbal agreement for the sale and purchase of 20 of the 150 acres, upon the same terms defendant was acquiring the lands. Van Hoosen at that time had a tract of land which he was about to sell to one Steffin, and during the negotiations leading up to this sale, and before a contract had been signed, Van Hoosen proposed to defendant that the payments coming from Steffin might be applied on the purchase price. The sale between Van Hoosen and Steffin was completed. On March 15, 1923, Steffin was desirous of paying an installment of $1,000 principal and $490 interest upon his contract with Van Hoosen, and, being of the opinion that the payments were to go to defendant upon the contract of purchase contemplated between him and Van Hoosen, Steffin delivered to defendant two checks, one for $1,000 and the other for $490. One of the checks was from the Fresno Abstract Company, drawn in favor of Steffin for between $900 and $1,000, and the other was payable to defendant, Briscoe, and it amounted to the difference between that sum and the $1,490 that Steffin was to pay. Briscoe cashed the checks and retained the proceeds. Van Hoosen and defendant, Briscoe, continued their negotiations for the purchase and sale of the 20 acres, but no contract was ever entered into by them for the sale and purchase of any particular portion of the tract. Some time in March, 1923, and shortly after defendant had cashed the two checks mentioned, and proximately a year and a half after their original negotiations were entered into, Van Hoosen became dissatisfied with the arrangement and demanded the amount of money defendant had received from Steffin as above narrated. The evidence shows conclusively that no written contract was ever entered into in relation to the sale of any particular land, and there is evidence to show, not only that no exact portion of the tract that Van Hoosen was to have was ever set apart by metes and bounds, but was only discussed generally and no definite terms of payments were ever agreed upon between them except that indefinite sums were to be paid "from time to time." There is also evidence to show that defendant was never directly authorized by Van Hoosen to retain the sums he received from Steffin in payment of any contract of purchase. The finding that it was the intention of the parties to reduce the terms of any contract that they might determine upon to writing also finds full support in the evidence.

[2-5] We are not, therefore, here concerned with the question of what character of performance of an oral contract for the sale of land will take the case out of the operation of the statute, for, when it is part of an understanding between the parties that the terms of the contract are to be reduced to writing and signed by them, assent to its terms must be evidenced in the manner agreed upon, in order to become binding. Preliminary negotiations leading up to the execution of a contract must be distinguished from the contract itself. 13 Cor. Jur. 289. There is no meeting of the minds of the parties while they are merely negotiating as to the terms of an agreement to be entered into between them. To be final, the material terms must be agreed upon, and cannot be left to future settlement; nor is there a binding contract where, although the terms have been agreed on orally, the parties have also agreed that it shall not be binding until evidenced by writing. Los Palmas, etc., Distillery v. Garrett & Co., 167 Cal. 397, 139 P. 1077. Since no binding contract was ever entered into between the parties, the sums retained by defendant under the circumstances indicated may be recovered by the plaintiffs, and the trial court correctly so concluded.

LEUTHOLTZ v. HOTCHKISS. (Civ. 5933.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 4, 1927.

Public lands ⚡53—Grantee of state's lieu land, after federal government's erroneous cancellation of state's selection, lost rights by laches extending over adverse possession period.

Where the United States Land Office, through an erroneous decision, denied its approval of the state's lieu land selection, and canceled any title the state might have obtained, the state's grantee of such land, who slept on his rights of appeal or further proceedings relative to such decision for a period equivalent to the adverse land possession period in law, thereby lost, through his laches, his equitable rights in the land.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Louise L. Leutholtz against O. E. Hotchkiss. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Hall and Charles S. Wheeler, Jr., both of San Francisco, for appellants.

C. E. Arnold, of Bakersfield, and George B. Bush, Philip C. Farman, and Roland Rich Woolley, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WARNE, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, adjudging plaintiff the owner of the exclusive right to the possession of certain lands in Kern county to prospect for and remove oil and gas therefrom and to the possession of said lands, and decreeing that defendant had not any right, title, or interest in said land, and enjoining defendant from asserting any claim of ownership in, or any right, title, or interest in or to, said land adverse to plaintiff.

Defendant answered, denying the claim of plaintiff, and asked for affirmative and injunctive relief.

The legal title to the land is vested in the United States.

Plaintiff's claim is predicated upon an oil and gas prospecting permit issued by the Secretary of the Interior on May 23, 1921, under the provisions of an Act of Congress, approved February 25, 1920 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4640¼ et seq.).

Defendant claims an equitable title to the land under a lieu land selection made therefor by the state of California on February 17, 1908, a purchase thereof by one Clarrage on March 12, 1921, and a grant deed from Clarrage on January 9, 1923. This deed was recorded in Kern county on June 11, 1924.

On February 17, 1908, when the land in question was selected by the state in lieu of certain school land within the boundaries of a government reservation, it was vacant and unappropriated public land and not known to contain any valuable minerals or pools of oil or gas. This selection was rejected by the local land office because the base lands tendered by the state in exchange were within a temporary forest reserve withdrawal. An appeal was taken to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, resulting in a reversal of the order on April 20, 1909, with the direction that it be allowed, "if no other objection appears than the defect for which you reject the same."

No further action was taken by either the local or General Land Office until November 20, 1909, when the local land office returned the selection to the General Land Office, stating that it was suspended on October 12, 1909, on account of the lands selected being classified as oil lands. The state was allowed to furnish, and did furnish, an ex parte non-mineral affidavit, and an appeal was taken.

On July 17, 1916, the Commissioner of the General Land Office ordered the local land office to notify the state and its transferee that they would be allowed 30 days to accept a patent to the land, reserving to the United States the oil and gas therein, or to apply for a hearing to prove the nonmineral character of the land, and that, in the event of a failure to take action, or appeal from the decision to the Secretary of the Interior, within the specified time the case would be reported for appropriate action. Notice was accordingly served upon the state and its transferee on July 17, 1916. No action was taken in response by either, and the selection was ordered canceled on July 20, 1927. Clarrage made application to the state to purchase this land as land not suitable for cultivation, in January, 1908. This application was subsequently approved, and the state issued a certificate of purchase for the land in 1912. The certificate contained the following as a part thereof:

"The title to the within lands at date hereof is in the United States. State may not receive title, in which event this certificate is void. Also applicant's failure to comply with the rules of the United States Land Office will defeat applicant's right hereunder."

Plaintiff entered upon the lands under her prospecting permit, and has drilled a well to the depth of about 2,600 feet, at an expense of $70,000. Plaintiff was aware of defendant's alleged claim to the land prior to the time of making any part of said expenditure, but it does not appear that she knew of the claim at the time her permit was issued. The mineral character of the land as known at the date of selection has not been established. Neither defendant nor his grantor have ever had possession of the land.

It seems to be that, at the time of the adverse decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the Department of the Interior took the erroneous position that it could deny an applicant approval of his lieu land selection if it became known that the land in question was mineral in character at any time after the original selection was made, although it was not known to be mineral when the applicant selected it. In March, 1921, the Supreme Court of the United States disapproved this rule (Payne v. New Mexico, 255 U. S. 367, 41 S. Ct. 333, 65 L. Ed. 680, and Wyoming v. U. S., 255 U. S. 489, 41 S. Ct. 393, 65 L. Ed. 742), and laid down the rule that the mineral or nonmineral character of the land, as known at the date of the selection, is the only fact with reference to the character of the land open for determination by the Department in passing on the priority or validity of the selection, and further held that a selection made in compliance with law and the regulations of the Land Department took effect and vested an equitable interest in the state at the time it was filed in the Land Office.

The trial court concluded that the state and its transferee had accepted the construction of the law as announced by the Commissioner of the General Land Office by failing to appeal from his decision to the Secretary of the Interior and thereby abandoned his claim; "also that defendant is barred from relief by the court by his long delay, including that of his predecessor in interest, in asserting an interest in the land."

Appellant attacks these conclusions. He claims that an equitable interest having once vested in the state upon making the lieu land selection, it was not defeated by the erroneous ruling of the Land Department on a question of law; that, it being a mistake of law, the Secretary of the Department of the Interior should, and can, correct it at any time on application; that it is his function and duty to correct such mistake, and, until the Secretary has determined the question of whether the land was known to be mineral or nonmineral at the time of selection, the appellant's equitable title cannot be questioned. In support of the authority or duty of the secretary to correct a mistake of law, appellant cites the case of Gage v. Gunther, 136 Cal. 338, 68 P. 710, 89 Am. St. Rep. 141. This might be urged, were it not for the intervening rights of the respondent, and it could be said without question that appellant and his predecessors in interest had not by their acts and delay led one to the conclusion that they had abandoned whatever right they may have had to the land. Appellant did not avail himself of his right of appeal to the Secretary of the Interior from the Commissioner's ruling. The state's selection was canceled, and both the state and Clarrage acquiesced in such cancellation. True, the right once having vested, it could not be lost merely by the subsequent discovery of the land's being mineral in character, but the right could be, and was, we think, lost by permitting the government's cancellation of the selection duly made according to its rules and regulation to stand for the time it did. After the cancellation, the prospecting permit was duly issued to respondent, and at that time it does not appear that respondent was aware of any outstanding claim to the land. The land was open for prospecting for oil so far as the government's records showed. Neither appellant nor his grantor have ever occupied the land. Appellant took no steps to establish any equitable interest he may have had in the land until suit was brought by respondent to quiet title to her prospecting right, and this notwithstanding the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States had decided the Payne Case, supra, and Wyoming Case, supra, some two years before. Such delay as is shown here must, we think, be treated as abandonment of his claim. The appellant slept on his rights. As was said by the court below:

"A party defeated by the decision of the Land Department may not wait many years after an adverse decision there, especially of an intermediate department, and, when the Supreme Court shall have announced a new construction of the law in an entirely different action, successfully reassert his claim under such circumstances as are here disclosed. * * * The government, through its cancellation of the state selection, reasserted its title to the land, and resumed control of it for a much longer period than the statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 315-328) provides, and which may be relied upon in adverse proceedings to quiet title to real property."

For the reasons stated, the judgment is affirmed.

- 3. Appeal and error ⚡763—Offer to print supplemental brief and file portions of record held too late when made at hearing of motion to affirm judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c).

Offer to print supplemental brief and file portions of record the Supreme Court might deem necessary to proper presentation of appeal held too late when first made at hearing of motion to affirm judgment because of failure to set forth parts of record in brief or supplement, as required by Code Civ. Action to cancel deeds of conveyance of real property by Andrew Dahlberg against Emma Dahlberg. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. On motion to affirm. Judgment affirmed.

Wal J. Tuska and Herbert Chamberlin, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Gerald C. Halsey and Frederic T. Leo, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. [1] Motion to affirm judgment on the ground of the failure of appellant to print or set forth in his brief, or any supplement thereto, in accordance with the requirements of section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure, any part of the record herein sufficient to justify a reversal of said judgment. The action was instituted for the purpose of canceling two certain deeds of conveyance of real property whereby plaintiff purported to convey to defendant an undivided one-half of three certain parcels of land, and also for the purpose of canceling a judgment of partition based upon said deeds. By the terms of said judgment one of said tracts of land was awarded to defendant herein, and the two other tracts were awarded to plaintiff herein, subject to a lien thereon of $11,497.05, in favor of the defendant herein. In appellant's brief he claims:

"That by mutual mistakes of fact on the part of the attorneys for the respective parties in the partition suit, by the referees appointed by the court and by the court, an erroneous estimate of values was made and considered and, based thereon, an erroneous judgment was entered in the partition proceedings to the detriment of appellant."

Yet appellant has not in his brief nor in any supplement thereto printed or set forth any of the pleadings in this action nor the findings nor judgment of the court herein, nor any of the evidence offered by plaintiff in support of his claim that said judgment in the partition action was erroneously rendered by reason of said mutual mistakes. The record before us, therefore, fails to show any error on the part of the trial court in rendering judgment against appellant upon the ground just stated.

[2] Again, the appellant in his brief contends that the judgment in the partition suit was procured through the fraud of his attorneys in conspiring and colluding with the attorneys for respondent in said action to have the final decree of partition entered in the form in which it was entered without consultation with appellant, and that his said attorneys conspired and colluded with the attorneys of respondent to have said final decree become a finality by entering into a stipulation with respondent's attorneys without notice to appellant and without his knowledge or consent, whereby appellant's right to move for a new trial and his right to appeal from said judgment were waived. The appellant has not printed in his brief nor in any supplement thereto any evidence whatever in support of his contention that the decree of partition in the form in which it was entered was rendered through the connivance and collusion of his attorneys with those of the respondent. A brief skeleton of the evidence of appellant, as a witness in the case, tending to show that plaintiff's counsel in the partition action acted without appellant's knowledge or consent in waiving his right to move for a new trial and to appeal, appears in the printed brief. This is followed by a statement that an examination of the record discloses that neither of appellant's attorneys in the partition suit was called to the witness stand to contradict the appellant. This "record," however, is not printed in appellant's brief nor in any supplement thereto, and is therefore not before us for our examination. We are unable to say, therefore, that any error was committed by the trial court in the rendition of said judgment. As was said by this court in the case of Scott v. Hollywood Park Co., 176 Cal. 680, 681, 169 P. 379:

"Neither in his brief nor in any supplement thereto is there anything to indicate what relief was sought by the action, nor is there anything printed in the brief indicating the nature of the judgment which appellant says was erroneously rendered. All presumptions indulged in are in favor of the regularity of the judgment and proceedings upon which it is based, hence it devolves upon an appellant to affirmatively show the existence of the error upon which he asks for a reversal."

See, also, Estate of McPhee, 156 Cal. 335, 104 P. 455, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 899; Marcucci v. Vowinkel, 164 Cal. 693, 130 P. 430; McKinnell v. Hansen, 34 Cal. App. 76, 167 P. 887; Miller v. Oliver, 174 Cal. 407, 163 P. 357; Estate of Berry, 195 Cal. 354, 233 P. 330. In the Estate of Berry, supra, at page 359 (233 P. 332) thereof, this court said:

"The result is not only that it was the plain duty of appellants to print in their brief or in the supplement thereto all portions of the record necessary to be considered by this court before arriving at a conclusion that the judgment should be reversed, but also that because of their failure so to do, this court would be fully justified in affirming the judgment appealed from without further consideration of the record. Appellants seem to believe that they have performed their duty fully in this respect when they have printed the portions of the evidence upon which they rely. They overlook the fact that in order to determine whether or not the evidence is sufficient to sustain a given finding, we must have before us not only the evidence but also the finding. If we had the finding before us and should conclude that the evidence was insufficient to support it, we still could not determine whether or not such finding was essential to support the judgment unless we had before us the pleadings or at least an accurate statement of the issues framed thereby."

We are reluctant to dismiss an appeal on any mere technical rule of procedure and thereby deny to appellant the right to have his case decided upon its merits, but the above cited section of the Code has been in full force and effect since the year 1907, excepting during the years 1919 to 1923. This court has repeatedly called the attention of the profession to the mandatory character of its provisions by affirming judgments appealed from when the appealing party has failed to comply with its requirements. It now seems that the rule of procedure thus enunciated has become so firmly established and so often reiterated by this court and the District Courts of Appeal that there is little excuse for any one to fail to comply with its terms. In the very recent case of Jeffords v. Young, 197 Cal. 224, 229, 239 P. 1054, 1056, we had occasion to consider the effect of the failure to comply with this section of the Code, and on that occasion expressed our views as follows:

"Not a word of the pleadings, findings, judgment, order, or testimony is to be found in appellants' brief, as is expressly required by section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure. It has been reiterated approximately one hundred times in the decisions of this court and of the District Courts of Appeal that it is incumbent upon an appellant who relies upon a typewritten transcript to print in his brief or in a printed supplement thereto sufficient of the record to justify a reversal of the judgment or order appealed from. (2 Cal. Jur. 643 et seq.) Furthermore, as we pointed out some months ago (Estate of Berry, 195 Cal. 354, 233 P. 330), since the 1923 amendment to the section last cited, an appellant who fails to do this incurs thereby the risk that the order or judgment appealed from may be affirmed upon motion."

[3] The belated offer of appellant, made at the hearing of this motion, to print in a supplemental brief and file herein certain portions of the record as this court might deem necessary to the proper presentation of his appeal, does not, in our opinion, merit a denial of said motion. Such a procedure would cast upon this court the burden of a laborious examination of the typewritten transcript filed herein in order to enable us to determine the portions thereof necessary to be printed in such supplement. This labor properly belongs to the appellant and should have been performed by him previous to the filing of his brief and the necessary portions of said record set forth therein. We are therefore of the opinion that the motion of the respondent should be granted.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

NULTY v. PRICE. (S. F. 11602.) ★

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 17, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 14, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨994(3)—Court, sitting without jury, is judge of witnesses' credibility.

Trial court, sitting without jury, is judge of credibility of witnesses.

2. Bills and notes ⇨39—Note promising to pay "two thousand dollars of horse hire" held one for payment of $2,000 in money (Civ. Code, § 3082).

Note promising to pay "two thousand dollars of horse hire" held one to pay $2,000 in money, within Civ. Code, § 3082, especially in view of evidence showing maker's indebtedness on running account for horses and horse hire.

3. Bills and notes ⇨116—Uncertain language in note is interpreted most strongly against maker (Civ. Code, § 1654).

When uncertainty exists as to meaning of note, language is to be interpreted most strongly against maker as party who caused such uncertainty to exist, in view of Civ. Code, § 1654.

4. Bills and notes ⇨126—Notes containing words "any attorneys fees paid," "and attorney fees aded," and "attorney fees I promise to pay" justified recovery for attorney's fees.

Notes containing words "any attorneys fees paid," "and attorney fees aded," and "attorney fees I promise to pay" held to justify recovery of attorney's fees; it being clearly indicated that maker intended to pay reasonable attorney's fees in event of suit.

5. Pleading ⚡258(4)—Trial ⚡377(2)—Refusal to vacate submission and allow further proof and amended answer on ground that new evidence was cumulative, and that failure to produce it at trial was lack of diligence, held not abuse of discretion.

In action on notes, denial of motion to vacate submission of case and allow further proof on merits, with permission to file amended answer, held not abuse of discretion, where denial was because of lack of diligence in presenting evidence at trial, and because alleged new evidence was cumulative.

6. Bills and notes ⚡501—Evidence of mental and physical condition shortly after signing of notes is admissible in action on such notes.

In action on notes, evidence tending to show mental and physical condition of maker, resulting from intoxication subsequent to time notes were signed, is admissible, if such condition was shortly after signing of notes.

7. Appeal and error ⚡1056(5)—Error in excluding cumulative evidence is not reversible in trial to court.

In action on notes, tried to court without jury, error in excluding evidence is not prejudicial where it is cumulative, and it cannot be said that a consideration of it would have caused a different result.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by W. T. Nulty against W. E. Price. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. P. Henshall, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Thos. D. Johnston, J. E. Rodgers, and A. F. Bray, all of Martinez, for respondent.

SHENK, J. [1] This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff on three promissory notes dated December 11, 1920. Each note was signed by the defendant as maker. The first one sued on was made in favor of Anna Nulty, wife of the plaintiff, in the sum of $6,225, and was assigned to the plaintiff before the action was commenced. The second and third notes were made in favor of the plaintiff in the sums of $2,000 and $5,072.90, respectively. In his answer the defendant admitted that he had signed said notes, but alleged as to all of them that they were signed when he "was incapacitated and weak from intoxication and unable to act for himself, and done under threats of great bodily harm to defendant made by said Anna Nulty and others then and there present and the plaintiff herein. Said threats were made before and at the time of the signing of said instruments, and the same were signed by said defendant in the belief that he could escape great bodily harm only by signing the same." As to the first and third notes, it was alleged in the answer that they were made without consideration. The court, sitting without a jury, found these allegations of the answer to be untrue and entered judgment for the full amount of the principal sums, interest, attorney's fees, and costs. As to the findings on the alleged incapacity and want of consideration, the defendant contends that they are wanting in sufficient evidentiary support. The evidence on those issues is voluminous and presents a conflict of a very material character. The trial court was the judge of the credibility of the witnesses. Assuming that we have, under present law, the power to make findings, in a case such as the present one, contrary to those made by the trial court, we do not feel warranted in doing so on the evidence presented by the record.

"Two W. T. Nulty I promise to pay for value received 2000 two thousand dollars of horse-hire which I promise to pay," with interest, etc.

It is contended that this is not a promissory note by reason of the inclusion of the phrase "of horse hire." No question of the negotiability of the note is here involved, as the action is between the payee and the maker. The point is that the obligation is not one for the payment of "a sum certain in money." Civ. Code, § 3082. The complaint alleged in the second count that the defendant "made a certain promissory note in writing," further describing it, and then setting forth a copy thereof in full. This allegation was not denied, and the plaintiff insists that the defendant is now in no position to urge the point. Assuming for the purpose of this case that the admission is not binding on the defendant in the presence of a copy of the note in the pleading, it is clear that the words "of horse hire" are but a description of the source of the consideration for the obligation and are not a designation of payment in services to be performed. See Womack v. Walling, 1 Baxt. (60 Tenn.) 425; 8 C. J. 132. We think the obligation was one to pay $2,000 in money. If there be any doubt as to the meaning of the language on the face of the note, because of ambiguity, and if it might be said that the obligation on the face thereof was to pay $2,000 worth "of horse hire," this ambiguity is dispelled in the light of the evidence, which shows that prior to the execution of the instrument the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff on a running account for horses and horse hire, concerning which the note was to constitute a settlement. The parties undoubtedly meant that $2,000 was to be paid in money "for" horse hire.

[3, 4] It is next insisted that in no event should there be a recovery of attorney's fees. The first note contains the words "any attorneys fees paid." In the second note we find the words "and attorney fees aded." The third note provides, "Attorney fees I promise to pay." There is misspelling in each note, and each is inartificially framed. The defendant himself drafted the instruments, and when uncertainty exists therein the language is to be interpreted most strongly against him as the party who caused the uncertainty to exist. Civ. Code, § 1654. The trial court applied this rule of construction and allowed attorney's fees on each note. This conclusion seems reasonable in view of the language employed, which indicates clearly that it was the intention of the defendant to pay reasonable attorney's fees in the event of suit. Taking into consideration the length of the trial and the service performed, the amount fixed by the court does not appear to be excessive. It may also be noted that the complaint in each count alleged that attorney's fees were payable and prayed that a reasonable amount be allowed. These allegations were not denied in the answer.

[5] The defendant charges prejudicial error in the denial by the trial court of a motion to vacate the submission of the case and allow further proof on the merits with permission to file an amended answer. The action was commenced in 1920 and was partially tried before a judge who died prior to decision. On retrial five days were occupied in the taking of evidence, after which the case was submitted on briefs in February, 1924. In the month of September following the defendant filed his notice of motion to vacate the submission and to be allowed to file an amended answer. The showing in support of the motion was by affidavit of the defendant and of his former counsel, now deceased, wherein it was alleged that since the submission of the cause the defendant had discovered that three checks, two in the sum of $4.70, and the third in the sum of $267.70, had been made in his favor by the board of trade on March 25, 1919, and had been indorsed by some one by writing his name on the back thereof without his authority, and that he firmly believed said handwriting to be that of Mrs. Nulty. He averred that if these checks passed through his hands they did so at a time when he was intoxicated. He further alleged that two checks in the sum of $264.08 each appeared on the books of the board of trade to have been issued to him, and that the moneys represented thereby had not been received by him, and that he verily believed that said checks were indorsed and cashed by Mrs. Nulty, and not by himself. It was further alleged that on April 28, 1919, his former attorney delivered to him a check in the sum of $400, and that this check was indorsed by some one other than himself, whom he believed to be Mrs. Nulty, and likewise that if said checks passed through his hands they did so at a time when he was intoxicated. The affidavit of the former attorney for the defendant corroborated the statement made in defendant's affidavit to the effect that the attorney had issued to him the check for $400, and that the canceled check bears an indorsement not in the handwriting of the defendant. The defendant further stated in his affidavit that the reason why he did not produce evidence concerning these checks was because he was not aware of the facts concerning them when he testified at the trial, and that he must have delivered them to Mrs. Nulty, who cashed them. There was evidence that the defendant authorized Mrs. Nulty to indorse checks for him and deposit the amounts thereof in the bank to his credit or cash the same and make payments therefrom on his behalf. In the proposed amended answer the defendant sought to set up a confidential relationship between himself and Mrs. Nulty, and that the latter appropriated money to her own use, the amount being unknown to the defendant. These allegations were in the nature of allegations to conform to the proof. The trial court ruled on the motion by a formal order of denial without stating the reasons for the order, but it is apparent from the record, which includes numerous items of account covering some 85 pages of the transcript and involving large sums of money, that the motion was denied because of lack of diligence in presenting the evidence at the trial, and that the alleged new evidence was cumulative. We find no abuse of discretion in the denial of the motion.

[6, 7] In a supplemental brief the defendant further objects to rulings of the trial court relating to evidence tending to show the mental and physical condition of the defendant resulting from intoxication subsequent to the time the notes were signed. Evidence of mental and physical condition shortly after the event is admissible (Estate of O'Connor, 51 Cal. App. 339, 196 P. 792, and cases cited); but this proffered evidence was, at the most, cumulative, and it cannot be said that if the court had considered the same the result would have been different.

As no prejudicial error is found in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

In re JACOBSEN. (Cr. 3067.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 18, 1927.

Attorney and client $\Rightarrow$ 39—Attorney, convicted of felony involving moral turpitude, but placed on probation, should be suspended pending further action in criminal case (Pen. Code, § 1203).

Where attorney at law was convicted of a felony involving moral turpitude, but the trial court placed him on probation, suspending the imposition and execution of sentence, and might thereunder set aside the verdict of guilty, dismiss the accusation, and release him from all penalties and disabilities, under Pen. Code, § 1203, held that Supreme Court should suspend him from practice until further action should be taken in the criminal case.

In Bank.

In the matter of the suspension of Victor L. Jacobsen, an attorney at law. Attorney suspended.

WASTE, C. J. Victor L. Jacobsen, an attorney at law, admitted to practice in this state, was duly convicted of a felony involving moral turpitude, and the clerk of the superior court for the county of Los Angeles, the court in which such conviction was had, has transmitted to this court a certified copy of the record of conviction. The defendant did not appeal, and in that regard the judgment of conviction has become final; but the trial court has placed Jacobsen on probation, and the imposing and execution of the sentence have been suspended. The terms of the order of probation are not before us, but, if the defendant fulfills the conditions of his probation for the entire period thereof, or shall be discharged from probation prior to the maximum period of punishment for the offense of which he has been convicted, the trial court may set aside the verdict of guilty and dismiss the accusation against the defendant, who shall thereafter be released from all penalties and disabilities resulting from the offense or crime of which he has been convicted. Pen. Code, § 1203.

We are informed that Jacobsen has made application to the appropriate District Court of Appeal for permission to resign as an attorney and counselor at law, but that the application has not yet been acted upon. Whether he should be permitted to resign under the circumstances in which he has been placed by his conviction (see Ex parte Thompson, 32 Or. 499, 52 P. 570, 40 L. R. A. 194), or what may be the final result of his probation, are matters which do not now concern this court. An attorney convicted of a felony involving moral turpitude, the nature of which is calculated to injure his reputation for the performance of the important duties which the law enjoins, should not be permitted to escape punishment. If the court permits it, such act tends to lessen the respect which the public should have for the members of the legal profession. Ex parte Thompson, supra. Pending any further action in the case of the attorney, an order of suspension should be made.

Let an order be entered that Victor L. Jacobsen be suspended as an attorney and counselor at law until the further order of this court, and that, until such further order, he be precluded from practicing as an attorney at law, or as an attorney or agent of another, in and before all the courts, commissions, and tribunals of this state, and from holding himself out to the public as an attorney and counselor at law.

TUBBY v. TUBBY. (S. F. 11260.) ★

Rehearing Denied Nov. 10, 1927.

1. Divorce $\Rightarrow$ 303(3), 309—Service of notice of hearing and order to show cause on former husband gave court jurisdiction to modify divorce decree as to child's custody and support.

Service on former husband of notice of hearing and order to show cause why decree granting him divorce should not be modified as to custody and support of child was sufficient to give court jurisdiction over him and subject-matter of motion to modify decree.

2. Divorce $\Rightarrow$ 303(3), 309—Former husband, present with counsel when motion to modify divorce decree came on for hearing, waived objections, not then made, to service.

Former husband, present in court and represented by counsel when motion to modify divorce decree as to custody and support of child came regularly on for hearing after service of notice and order to show cause on him, waived objections that no affidavit or copy thereof was served on him, nor any copy of notice of motion, hearing of order or affidavit on his attorney, by making no objection at such time.

3. Divorce $\Rightarrow$ 303(3)—Court could modify divorce decree as to child's custody, though such intended modification was stated very generally in order to show cause and notice of hearing (Civ. Code, § 138).

Under Civ. Code, § 138, trial court, having jurisdiction of divorce action and parties thereto, had full authority to modify final decree as to custody of minor child, though intended modification was stated in very general terms, except as to amount demanded for support of child, in order to show cause and notice of hearing.

4. Courts $\Rightarrow$ 52—Transfer of cause to another department of superior court does not transfer jurisdiction; court being single entity.

Jurisdiction being vested by Constitution in superior court of city and county of San Francisco, not in particular judges or departments into which it is divided for convenient dispatch of business, transfer from one department to another is not a transfer of jurisdiction of cause, which remains throughout in court as single entity.

5. Courts ⇐50—Five days' notice of reassignment or transfer of cause to another department of superior court is not required (Code Civ. Proc. § 594).

Code Civ. Proc. § 594, as to "notice of trial," does not require service of notice of reassignment or transfer of cause from one department of superior court to another.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Benjamin K. Knight, Judge.

Suit by Oliver G. Tubby against Leah Rodman Tubby. Decree for plaintiff. From an order modifying the decree, he appeals. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion, 256 P. 586.

John L. McNab, of San Francisco (R. H. Countryman, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Clara Shortridge Foltz, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J. An interlocutory decree was rendered in the court below by which the plaintiff was granted a divorce from the defendant on the ground of her willful desertion. The custody of the minor child of the parties, a son, of the age of about 3 years, was, by consent, awarded to the defendant, but no provision was made in the decree for the support of the child. In due course a final decree was entered. It contained the same provision as to the custody of the minor child that was embodied in the interlocutory decree, and, it appearing to the court that the property rights of the parties had been settled out of court, nothing was awarded the defendant by way of alimony, and no provision was made for the financial support of the child.

Some 2½ years after the entry of the final decree the defendant obtained an order of court, based upon an affidavit of herself, directing the plaintiff to appear and show cause why an order theretofore "made and entered in the above-entitled action should not be modified; and further to show cause * * * why [he] should not pay to defendant * * * for the support and maintenance of said minor child * * * the sum of $50 per month." This order, accompanied by a notice of hearing, but without the affidavit, was served by the sheriff on the plaintiff personally. The motion to modify came on regularly for hearing in department 9 of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, the parties being personally present in court, and each represented by counsel. The record recites that:

"After certain proceedings were had therein, the matter of said motion was by the court continued until Friday, June 8, 1923, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m."

On the day to which the proceeding was continued, the defendant and her counsel were in court, but the plaintiff was not present and was not represented. The presiding judge of the court reassigned the proceeding to department 8, and the clerk of that department placed the proceeding upon the calendar for hearing at 10 o'clock. The matter was reached about noon of that day. It was taken up and considered by the court, which made an order modifying the final decree. It found that the child, then of the age of 7 years, was physically frail, at all times exceedingly nervous and easily excited, and was then, and for some time had been, under the care of a physician. After reciting other matters relating to the comfort and welfare of the child, and finding that the plaintiff was then voluntarily contributing toward its maintenance the sum of $35 per month, the court ordered that the final decree of divorce be modified in substance to conform to the final decree as to the custody of the child and the right of the plaintiff in the premises, and further, that the plaintiff be ordered to pay to defendant, for the maintenance and support of the child, the sum of $50 per month, to continue regularly thereafter until the further order of the court. It is from this order modifying the final decree that the plaintiff has appealed.

[1, 2] Appellant complains, first, that no affidavit, or copy of any affidavit, of the defendant, on which the motion to modify was based, was ever served on plaintiff, and that no copy of notice of motion or hearing of the order to show cause or of the affidavit was served on the attorney for plaintiff. Plaintiff is not in position to make this objection to the order. Two and a half years had elapsed after the entry of the final decree, and there was nothing of record to show that the attorney who formerly represented plaintiff in the divorce action was still his attorney. The service of the notice of hearing and order to show cause on the plaintiff was sufficient service to give the court jurisdiction over him and of the subject-matter of the motion. The plaintiff was present in court and was represented by counsel at the time the motion to modify the decree came regularly on for hearing in department 9. No objection was then made, and from the record it does not appear that any objection was ever made to the service had on the plaintiff. He must therefore be held to have waived any objections which he might have offered at that time.

tained any statement or gave notice to the effect that it was the desire of the defendant to have the final decree of divorce modified in relation to the custody of the minor child. It is true that any intended modification therein, except as to the amount to be contributed to the support of the child, is stated in very general terms; but the trial court having jurisdiction of the divorce action and the parties thereto was vested with full authority to make any order it might deem necessary for the custody, care, education, maintenance, and support of the minor child, during its minority. Civ. Code, § 138. The modification made by it in regard to the custody of the child is, in effect, but a restatement in different form of the provisions contained in the interlocutory and the final decrees, and the rights of the plaintiff are safeguarded by the language of the decree as modified.

[4, 5] Appellant's real contention appears to be that the trial court had no jurisdiction to make the order modifying the decree for the reason that the plaintiff did not have notice of the reassignment and transfer of the cause from one department of the superior court to another. He contends that he should have had "notice of trial," under the provisions of section 594 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There is only one superior court in the city and county of San Francisco. Brown v. Campbell, 110 Cal. 644, 43 P. 12. Jurisdiction is vested by the Constitution in the court, not in a particular judge or department. It further provides that there may be as many sessions of the court as there are judges. Whether sitting separately or together, the judges hold but one and the same court. The division into departments is for the convenient dispatch of business. Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Wood, 40 Cal. App. 355, 180 P. 951. A transfer from one department to another is not a transfer of the jurisdiction of the cause, which remains at all times in the court as a single entity. Graziani v. Denny, 174 Cal. 176, 162 P. 397. In those counties in which there are more than one department of the superior court, it is the recognized practice, when a cause assigned to one department cannot, for some reason, be heard at a designated time, to transfer it to another department where the court is not engaged at the time, for hearing forthwith. It would bring about an absurd situation in the courts of the counties having more than one department of the superior court to require service of the 5 days' notice provided in section 594, supra, in situations like that we are now considering. The record shows that the judge presiding in department No. 8 did not proceed with the hearing until satisfied that counsel for the plaintiff had assured counsel for the defendant that he was engaged elsewhere and would not appear at the hearing. The order modifying the decree also recites that the "motion came on regularly for hearing in department 8 * * * of the court * * * after due and legal notice thereof to the plaintiff." The cases relied on by appellant do not apply to the present situation. They relate to setting causes for trial, failure to give the required notice, and inadvertence and excusable neglect on the part of counsel to properly note the date fixed. Hagenkamp v. Equitable Life Assurance Society, 29 Cal. App. 713, 156 P. 520; Cahill v. Verdier, 54 Cal. App. 465, 202 P. 154. Any general expression of the court in either case which may seem to make the decision applicable to the proceeding now before us must be disregarded.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

In re DALY'S ESTATE.

DALY v. GEORGE et al.

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 17, 1927.

1. Wills ☞754—Bequest to widow of one-half of stock owned by testator held specific legacy (Civ. Code, § 1357).

Bequest to widow of one-half of stock owned by testator was a specific legacy, under Civ. Code, § 1357, as legacy of particular thing specified and distinguished from all others of same kind.

2. Wills ☞728—Specific legacies carry all accretions by way of dividends or interest accruing after testator's death.

Specific legacies carry with them all accretions by way of dividends or interest that may accrue after death of testator.

3. Wills ☞812—Specific bequest to widow in codicil held not chargeable with portion of estate to be paid daughter to equalize distribution required by will (Civ. Code, § 1320; Code Civ. Proc. § 1563).

Will distributing estate to daughters, and providing for payment of deficiency to one daughter to equalize distribution, and that trust property not including specific legacy to widow should be subject to equalization provision, considered as a whole, under Civ. Code, § 1320, held not to manifest intention that specific bequest to widow in codicil should be charged with adjustment of estate to pay deficiency of one daughter, and, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1563, where there was other sufficient estate to pay debt, specific bequest was exempt.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Petition for partial distribution by Florence Adele Daly against William George and another, as executors of the last will and testament of John D. Daly, deceased. From an order denying petition in part, petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Jos. T. O'Connor, Alexander McCulloch, and Cross & Brandt, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Karl C. Partridge and Cullinan & Hickey, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from an order denying in part a petition for partial distribution.

The decedent, John D. Daly, died testate on the 1st day of January, 1923, at the age of 80 years. His will, of date September 8, 1912, and codicils thereto dated June 2, 1922, and November 17, 1922, were duly admitted to probate. On January 25, 1923, the son and a son-in-law of the decedent qualified as executors. The testator was survived by the son, four daughters, Sarah F. Tilton, Lillie I. George, Ida E. Levensaler, and Minnie E. Carson, and the widow, Florence Adele Daly, the appellant herein. During his lifetime the testator made deeds of gift and advancements to his five children. The second paragraph of the will devised and bequeathed to the daughters, other than Minnie E. Carson all of the estate, "subject, however, to the charges against my estate and provisions for equalizing benefits received or to be received from me or my estate and provisions for * * * my daughter, Minnie E. Carson, hereinafter contained."

The daughter Minnie E. Carson received by means of deeds and advancements less property than the other daughters. With the expressed purpose and desire to have his four daughters participate equally, it was provided in the will as follows:

"And, I further will and direct that before distribution of my said estate is made and at the time thereof, so nearly as may be, there shall be ascertained the value of my said estate otherwise subject to distribution to my said daughters other than Minnie E. Carson, plus the then value of all the properties conveyed to my daughters as herein recited. * * * That said value of all said properties be divided by four and that said Minnie E. Carson be paid from my estate the difference (if there be any to her detriment). * * * And I hereby give, devise and bequeath unto her a sum so to be paid to her equal to said difference."

Until this division was accomplished Mrs. Carson was to receive $100 per month from the estate. At the time the original will was executed the testator was a widower. He subsequently remarried. By the codicil of June 2, 1922, he republished the original will subject to the provisions of the codicil. The second paragraph of this codicil provided for a $500 bequest to each of seven grandchildren and other relatives. In the third paragraph the testator bequeathed one-half of 15,377½ shares of the Dairy Delivery

Company, a corporation, then owned by him, to the appellant, and the other one-half to his executors in trust for his residuary legatees and devisees (which class included the daughters, but did not include the widow), subject to equalization according to said will. The executors, as trustees, were required to account to the "ultimate beneficiaries of the trust after all equalizations provided for in said will." If the said stock was disposed of prior to the death of the testator, the widow was to receive the sum of $125 per month during her lifetime. The codicil of November 17, 1922, made additional specific bequests not material to this controversy. During the course of administration the executors received as dividends on all of the stock of the Dairy Delivery Company the sum of $66,931.14. The widow filed her petition for partial distribution, wherein she prayed that the court distribute to her the stock and the dividends accrued thereon. The court made its order distributing to her one-half of said stock, but denied the petition for the distribution to her of one-half of the income therefrom. It is from that portion of the order denying the distribution of the income from one-half of the stock that this appeal is taken.

[1, 2] The bequest to the widow of one-half of the stock of the Dairy Delivery Company, being a "legacy of a particular thing, specified and distinguished from all others of the same kind," was, of course, a specific bequest (Civ. Code, § 1357; Estate of De Bernal, 165 Cal. 223, 131 P. 375, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 26), and "specific legacies carry with them all accessions by way of dividends or interest that may accrue after the death of the testator" (2 Schouler on Wills, § 1138, p. 1300; Estate of De Bernal, supra; Matter of Estate of Woodworth, 31 Cal. 595, 605; Larned v. Adams, 14 Fed. Cas. 1155, 1158, No. 8,002; Nash v. Ober, 2 App. D. C. 304, 308; Walton v. Walton, 7 Johns. Ch. [N. Y.] 258, 11 Am. Dec. 456). See 11 Cal. Jur. 484, 486.

[3] Notwithstanding the foregoing well-recognized propositions of law, it is contended by the respondents that the several testamentary instruments—the will and the two codicils—must be read together (Civ. Code, § 1320), and that, when so read, it must be concluded that it was the intention of the testator to make the deficiency in favor of Minnie E. Carson a charge against the entire estate, because in one clause in the original will it was provided that the said difference "be paid from my estate." But that clause must be read in connection with the other provisions of the will that the trust property, which, of course, does not include the legacy to the widow later provided for, is left to the residuary devisees and legatees, subject to equalization as provided in the will, and that the income from the trust property shall be paid to the residuary legatees and devises "after all equalizations, as provided for in said will." The clause last quoted plainly refers to the equalization of the shares of the four daughters. Considering the three documents as one, we are unable to conclude that the specific bequest to the widow was intended by the testator to be charged in any way, either as against the corpus of the specific bequest or the income therefrom, with the adjustment of the portion of the estate to be received by Minnie E. Carson. If the difference in favor of the daughter could be properly considered a debt or an expense against the estate, the specific legacy to the widow would be charged therewith, if there were no other sufficient estate to satisfy the same; but a specific legacy is exempt from liability for debts and expenses, if there be other sufficient estate to satisfy them, and it was the intention of the testator that the specific legacy be not so charged. Code Civ. Proc. § 1563. No such intention appears and no question of the insufficiency of the estate otherwise to satisfy all claims or to respond to the equalization provided for by the testator is here involved. If it had been the intention of the testator to make the specific bequest to the widow subject to such equalization, it would have been an easy matter to have so provided in the codicil. The fact that he did not do so is persuasive that such was not his intention. It is pointed out that the executors, prior to the filing of the petition for partial distribution, paid in full the specific bequests to the grandchildren and others without abatement on account of the equalization of the share to be received by Mrs. Carson. This payment is not objected to by the appellant, but it is referred to as an indication that the executors believed that the specific legacies were not charged in any way with the adjustment of Mrs. Carson's share. There is nothing in the record to indicate that they were incorrect in so believing.

The portion of the order appealed from is reversed.

M. V. B. MacADAM CO., Inc., v. BRYANT.
(Civ. 5745.)

District Court of Appeal. First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 14, 1927.

1. Brokers §49(1)—Broker was not entitled to commission where there was no unconditional acceptance of owner's offer to exchange property.

Under terms of owner's offer to exchange his ranch for apartment house wherein owner agreed to pay certain commission, broker was not entitled to receive commission where apartment house owner accepted offer, subject to condition regarding loan to be obtained on ranch, and thus there was no unconditional acceptance of particular offer made by owner.

2. Exchange of property §3(1)—Where apartment house owner accepted defendant's offer to exchange ranch, subject to condition regarding loan, condition destroyed mutuality of consideration and offer could be revoked.

Where defendant wrote broker agreeing to exchange his ranch, subject to certain incumbrances, or for certain apartment house, subject to incumbrances stated, and apartment house owner wrote on back of proposal acceptance, subject to conditions that furniture in house should be included in bill of sale and that broker should procure second loan for $1,500 on defendant's ranch, premium to be not more than $150, and interest at 8 per cent., but later eliminated clause regarding furniture, imposition of condition destroyed mutuality of consideration, and defendant could revoke his offer at any time before acceptance.

3. Exchange of property §3(1)—Conditional acceptance of offer to exchange ranch operated as rejection of offer.

Where ranch owner offered to exchange his ranch for certain apartment house, insertion in proposed acceptance of condition as to obtaining second loan on ranch constituted counter-offer and operated as rejection of ranch owner's proposal and ended transaction.

4. Brokers §40—Instrument offering to pay plaintiff commission if exchange of properties could be effected was mere proposal to exchange properties, not contract of employment.

Communication addressed to plaintiff in which defendant agreed to exchange his ranch for certain apartment house and stated that, if plaintiff succeeded in securing an acceptance of agreement on or before certain date, defendant would pay $1,500 commission was mere proposal to exchange properties, and was not contract of employment.

5. Brokers §44—Contract of agency to exchange lands, if not coupled with interest, may ordinarily be revoked by principal before performance.

Contract of agency to sell or exchange lands, if not coupled with an interest in subject of agency or given for valuable consideration, and which contains no provision that authority of agent shall remain irrevocable for any particular period, may be revoked by principal at any time before performance by agent.

6. Brokers §44—Agreement to pay commission for exchange of property if effected before certain date, if contract of employment, was revocable any time before performance.

Agreement by ranch owner to pay broker certain commission if he could secure an acceptance of his offer to exchange ranch for apartment house on or before May 15, 1927, if contract of employment, was revocable by owner at any time prior to performance by broker.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Action by the M. V. B. MacAdam Company, Inc., for services as real estate broker against B. S. Bryant. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Goldman, Nye & Spicer, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Walter Christie, and Frederic C. Benner, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Plaintiff appeals from an adverse judgment in an action to recover $1,500 alleged to be due for services rendered as real estate broker in connection with a proposal made by respondent to exchange his ranch in Sonoma county for an apartment house in San Francisco.

It appears from the evidence that in May, 1924, after having had certain preliminary negotiations with a real estate salesman named Cohen, who was connected with the appellant company, respondent addressed a communication to appellant, dated May 6, 1924, wherein he agreed to exchange his ranch, subject to a bank incumbrance of $12,500 bearing interest at 7 per cent., for an apartment house situate on Hyde street, in the city and county of San Francisco, subject to two incumbrances, one for $20,000 bearing interest at 6 per cent., the other for $6,500 bearing interest at 8 per cent. Continuing, the communication provided:

"Should you succeed in securing an acceptance of this agreement on or before May 15, 1924, I agree to pay you as commission $1,500 for your services rendered, and you may also receive a commission from second party."

On May 8, 1924, Cohen, accompanied by Arthur M. Clement and wife, with whom the exchange was to be made, inspected the ranch in Sonoma county, and upon their return to San Francisco the same day Cohen drew a purported acceptance of respondent's offer on the reverse side thereof, which Clement and his wife signed. It reads as follows:

"May 8, 1924. We hereby accept the proposal upon the opposite side, subject to the following conditions, to wit: All furniture in the house to be included in bill of sale. The full commission to be $1,000, of which $500 is payable in cash, and $500 in note, 180 days, with interest at 6 per cent. The MacAdam Company is to procure a second loan in the sum of $1,500 for the period of 1 year at seller's option, the premium on said second mortgage to be not more than $150 and interest at 8 per cent. That the matter of interest on first mortgage on Hyde street property to be corrected to 7 per cent. It is understood that the MacAdam Company is also receiving a commission from the first party. [Signed] Arthur M. Clement. Frieda L. Clement. Witness: A. E. Cohen."

After the foregoing had been signed, Cohen concluded that it did not constitute a legal acceptance of respondent's offer because of the insertion therein of the conditions that respondent include his furniture in the exchange, and that the interest on first mortgage on Hyde street property be corrected to read 7 per cent. After discussing the matter with the Clements, Cohen struck out the two clauses embodying the conditions mentioned by drawing a line through them, and on the margin of the paper opposite each clause had Clement write the word "Eliminated" and sign his name. On the following morning Cohen phoned respondent, and without informing him of the purported acceptance by the Clements, asked him about including his furniture in the transfer of his property, which respondent refused to accede to. The next day, which was May 10, after obtaining certain information relating to the value of the apartment house, respondent informed Cohen personally that his offer was withdrawn, at which time Cohen told respondent of the existence of the Clements' acceptance. Later, on the same day, respondent mailed appellant a written cancellation of his offer, which reached appellant on Monday, May 12, 1924.

[1, 2] It is apparent from the terms of respondent's proposal that appellant was not entitled to receive the commission specified therein unless it procured an unconditional acceptance of the particular offer made by respondent; that is, an acceptance which would have been legally enforceable at his option in case of default on the part of those seeking to be bound thereby. The trial court found that no such acceptance had been obtained, and we believe that this finding is fully supported by the facts and the law. The purported acceptance in its modified form was based, as will be observed, upon the express condition that the MacAdam Company obtain for the Clements "a second loan (on respondent's ranch) in the sum of $1,500, for the period of 1 year at seller's option, the premium on said second mortgage to be not more than $150 and interest at 8 per cent." In other words, the Clements agreed to exchange the apartment house for the ranch as proposed in respondent's offer only in case a second loan on the ranch was obtained for them on the terms specified. The imposition of such condition clearly destroyed the mutuality of consideration, because as the transaction then stood, although respondent's proposal was enforceable against him, the acceptance thereof was unenforceable against the Clements until the condition as to the second loan was complied with by appellant. Construed, therefore, as a proposal for exchange of properties, the instrument signed by respondent was revocable by him at any time before its acceptance. Hamlin v. Barnhart, 26 Cal. App. 632, 147 P. 1188.

The case just cited, in its essential facts and on principle, is analogous to the one before us, and the court there held:

"The right of respondent to withdraw from the agreement seems clear. There was no mutuality of consideration provided for. On the one hand, it was proposed to bind respondent in absolute terms to perform on her part, while appellant's performance was made conditional. He was to perform only in case he could borrow $4,500 on respondent's property, and impliedly the agreement was that this loan should be upon whatever conditions he might choose to impose as to duration of loan term, rate of interest, etc. In the event of his default, respondent had no remedy as against his caprice. The agreement of the parties imported no obligation on appellant's part which respondent could enforce. 'If a promise does not offer any enforceable legal right or forbearance it is not a consideration. This principle is sometimes expressed in the rule that promises, in order to be a valid consideration each for the other, must be mutual. * * * Where the parties assume to make a contract in which a promise is the consideration for a promise, and analysis shows that one of the promises does not impose any legal duty upon the party making it, such promise is not a consideration for the other promise.' 1 Page on Contracts, §§ 302, 303, 304. It will be of no service to multiply citations to this fundamental rule governing the making of contracts. Having construed the contract as imposing no definite obligation on appellant to perform (a construction which his own words expressly declare to have been the one intended) there is no room left for further argument to the point that the alleged contract lacked mutuality of obligation or of consideration, which means the same thing. Treated as a mere offer to exchange, the proposal was revocable by respondent at any time before acceptance by appellant."

[3] Furthermore, it is held that an offer which is met by a counteroffer is thereby rejected (McRae v. Ross, 170 Cal. 74, 148 P. 215); also, that one who submits a counterproposal instead of accepting the offer cannot abandon the substitute and accept the original offer (Niles v. Hancock, 140 Cal. 157, 73 P. 840). In the present case the insertion in the proposed acceptance of the condition as to obtaining a second loan on respondent's ranch doubtless constituted a counteroffer, and therefore operated as a rejection of respondent's proposal, and ended the transaction.

[4] Appellant contends, however, that respondent's proposal to exchange properties was, in legal effect, a contract of employment, and that since respondent revoked the same prior to May 15, 1924, which was the limitation of time granted appellant to obtain an acceptance of respondent's proposal, appellant was entitled to receive the full commission provided for therein. We find no merit in the contention, because there appears to be no language used in the instrument indicating that it was intended to be anything more than a mere proposal to exchange properties.

[5] Even assuming it to be a contract of employment, appellant is in no better position to claim the commission provided for therein, because it is well settled that a contract of agency to sell or exchange lands, if not coupled with an interest in the subject of the agency or given for a valuable consideration, and which contains no provision that the authority of the agent shall remain irrevocable for any particular period, may be revoked by the principal at any time before performance by the agents. Brown v. Pforr, 38 Cal. 550; Roth v. Moeller, 185 Cal. 415, 197 P. 62. A different rule prevails where the contract does contain a stipulation that the agency shall remain irrevocable for a specified time, the distinction between the two classes of cases being clearly pointed out in Blumenthal v. Goodall, 89 Cal. 251, 26 P. 906, Ropes v. Rosenfeld's Sons, 145 Cal. 671, 79 P. 354, and Roth v. Moeller, supra.

The clause of the contract reviewed in Brown v. Pforr, supra, is substantially the same as the one involved here, the principal there having agreed to pay the agents a commission if they "would undertake to seek, and should, within a month from that date, succeed in finding a person who should be willing and able, and who would agree to purchase" the principal's property for the price stated. The court held that the limitation of time mentioned therein was a restriction limiting the time allowed for performance by the agent, and not a restriction upon the principal's right of revocation, the court saying:

"It seems obvious to us that the restriction was intended for the benefit of the defendant, and not the plaintiffs. The force of the limitation is, that the defendant will pay them the stipulated price for the service if they completely perform it within one month; otherwise he will pay them nothing. There is nothing directly or impliedly affecting the question of revocation; and, indeed, we are unable to perceive how, under any circumstances, a mere limit as to the time allowed for the performance of a contract of agency to sell land, can be construed into an agreement on the part of the principal not to revoke the power."

[6] In the present case appellant makes no claim of interest in the subject-matter of the proposed exchange; the contract was in its nature purely unilateral, no contractual duty being imposed upon appellant; the consideration for the promise to pay the commission was wanting until appellant performed its part of the contract, which, as already shown, it did not do; and the contract contained no provision that appellant's authority thereunder should remain irrevocable for any period. Under such circumstances and in view of the decisions above cited, the contract in question, if it be one of employment, was revocable by respondent at any time prior to performance by appellant.

The conclusion we have reached that the trial court's decision on the controlling issues should be sustained makes it unnecessary to discuss the other points presented by the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DEYOT. (Cr. 1533.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 13, 1927.

Embezzlement $\Rightarrow$ 44(1)—Evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction of embezzlement, but rather to show loan (Pen. Code, § 503).

Evidence, on appeal from conviction of embezzlement under Pen. Code, § 503, held to show money alleged to have been embezzled had been loaned to defendant, rather than intrusted to him, and hence conviction was erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Samuel H. Deyot was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Reversed.

Paul C. Hill and Marcus Clarke, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards and John L. Flynn, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of embezzlement and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The only point on which appellant relies for a reversal of the judgment is that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict.

From the record it appears that defendant had a contract or an option with certain stockholders of a corporation to sell their stock therein for a price of approximately $200,000, for which service defendant was to receive a fixed amount in cash and stock in the corporation; that in preparing to make such sale defendant apparently required some assistance in the way of ready cash, and in order to acquire same, or a portion thereof, he entered into a contract with one Marie Taylor by which, among other things, defendant agreed:

"That in consideration of Marie Taylor's syndicating with him and investing the sum of $3,000 to assist in financing and acquiring a valuable interest with said company, he will return the investment of $3,000 within twelve months from date, with interest at seven per cent. per annum, and will cause to be issued, as the office of the corporation commissioner of California may direct, to said Marie Taylor by the Columbia Cement Company, not less than $12,000 common stock at par. * * *

Although the prosecuting witness testified in substance that she gave the $3,000 to defendant for the purpose of making an "investment," or for the purchase of "a valuable interest," and that the $3,000 was to be returned to her at the end of one year, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, together with not less than $12,000 in stock of the corporation, nevertheless the evidence shows that a part only of the $3,000 was repaid to the prosecuting witness, and that she received none of the stock of the corporation. Her testimony as to whether such "valuable interest" was to be acquired in her behalf, or for defendant personally, included the following:

"Q. Mrs. Taylor, did he say he was going to give you the interest, the valuable interest in the company, that he was to purchase? A. No. * * *

"Q. Was anything said by Mr. Deyot that you were to have that interest? A. No. He was to give me $12,000 worth of stock. * * *

"Q. Now, I will refer you to a conversation of March 14, 1924, at the time this agreement was entered into; did you have any conversation at that time with Mr. Deyot regarding the formation of a partnership with Mr. Deyot? A. Why, no. He said that he wanted to purchase a valuable interest in the company, and that is why he needed my money. * * *

"Q. Did Mr. Deyot tell you at that time what valuable interest he intended to purchase in that company? A. No. He just said it was a valuable interest in the company. * * *

"Q. I will show you this agreement under date of March 14, 1924, which has been offered in evidence as People's Exhibit No. 1, and calling your attention to the portion of the agreement which reads as follows: 'and Deyot hereby agrees that in consideration of Marie Taylor's syndicating with him and investing the sum of $3,000 to assist in financing and acquiring a valuable interest with said company,' did you have any conversation with Mr. Deyot as to what was meant by 'assisting in financing'? A. No. He told me that he wanted to purchase this valuable interest in the company."

Further testimony of the prosecuting witness disclosed what her understanding was with reference to the money which she advanced to defendant. In regard thereto, she testified as follows:

"Q. Mr. Deyot promised to return the $3,000 at the expiration of the year? A. On or before one year.

"Q. And, in addition to the $3,000, you were to receive 7 per cent. interest? A. Yes.

"Q. What was that interest to be? A. That was interest on the $3,000 that I let him have for a year.

"Q. He was paying that interest to you for the use of that money for the year? A. Yes."

As to whether the money advanced by the prosecuting witness was to be expended or "invested" by defendant in accordance with instructions given to him by the prosecuting witness, the following testimony is significant:

"Q. Did you, at the time you gave this $3,000 to Mr. Deyot, instruct him as to how he was to expend that money? A. Why, he wanted my $3,000 to buy this valuable interest in the Columbia Cement Company.

"Q. You never instructed him as to how he should expend the money? A. Why, that is what he told me he was going to do with it. That is why I gave it to him.

"Q. For the purpose of acquiring a valuable interest in the Columbia Cement Company? A. Yes—and giving me $12,000 worth of stock.

"Q. But as to how he was to expend it, you gave him no instructions, and had no conversation as to how he was to acquire that valuable interest? A. Why, no. He told me that he was going to do it. * * *

"Q. Did you discuss with Mr. Deyot what the value of this interest that he was to acquire was—what the market value of this interest he was to acquire was to be? A. No, I did not."

As showing the interpretation which the parties to the agreement placed upon its terms, a further and later agreement between them witnesses the following stipulation:

"That, whereas, certain agreements have been entered into by and between the parties hereto, and by a mutual settlement of said agreements it has been agreed that the party of the second part owes to the party of the first part the sum of three thousand dollars ($3,000), with interest at seven per cent. (7%) from March 14, 1924. * * *

At the time of entering into such agreement, the evidence shows that each of the parties was represented by an attorney.

It thus appears that by agreement of the parties the prosecuting witness advanced to defendant the sum of $3,000 for the purpose of assisting him "in financing and acquiring a valuable interest" in the corporation, which "he (defendant) wanted to purchase," for which the prosecuting witness was to receive "not less than $12,000 common stock at par," and within one year to have her "investment" of $3,000, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, returned to her; that defendant did not state that the "valuable interest" or any part thereof which he expected to acquire was to be the property of the prosecuting witness; and that the prosecuting witness gave to defendant no instructions as to how he was to expend the money which was advanced by the prosecuting witness to defendant; nor was there any intimation that the "valuable interest" in question consisted wholly or in part of the "$12,000 common stock at par." By some undisclosed means, but by way of "financing," which included the use of the $3,000 belonging to the prosecuting witness, it is more or less apparent that defendant expected to become the owner of a large block of stock in the corporation; but that neither at the time the $3,000 was delivered to defendant, nor at any time during the negotiations of the parties, was any mention made of any specific stock which was to be purchased by defendant for the use of the prosecuting witness.

By section 503 of the Penal Code the crime of "embezzlement" is defined as the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted; in the case of People v. Shearer, 143 Cal. 66, 67, 76 P. 813, it is said that it is essential to the commission of the crime of embezzlement that there should be a fraudulent appropriation of property to some use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust by one into whose possession it has come by reason of some relation of trust or confidence.

On consideration of the evidence, including the several agreements between the prosecuting witness and defendant, and especially the testimony of the former, it is impossible to arrive at the conclusion that a trust relationship existed between the prosecuting witness and defendant with reference to the $3,000 which was advanced by the prosecuting witness to defendant. To the contrary, the evidence tends to establish the fact that the money involved in the transaction was a loan only, on which the prosecuting witness was to receive a stipulated rate of interest, together with "not less than $12,000 common stock at par." In such circumstances it is clear that the evidence fails to show any "fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has (had) been entrusted" (section 503, Pen. Code), and therefore that it was insufficient to support the verdict.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are reversed.

PEOPLE v. PILBRO et al. (Cr. 977.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 8, 1927.

1. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 119(1)—When record shows motion only for severance, appellate court cannot say whether trial court properly exercised discretion (Pen. Code, § 1098, as amended by St. 1921, p. 90).

While under Pen. Code, § 1098, as amended by St. 1921, p. 90, trial court may in discretion order separate trials of defendants jointly charged, where the record shows motion only for severance by one defendant, appellate court cannot say whether trial court, in denying motion for separate trial by one defendant, properly exercised its discretion.

2. Jury $\Rightarrow$ 136(7)—In joint trial, challenges of jurors by state under statute are not dependent on number of challenges exercised by defendants (Pen. Code, § 1070, and § 1098, as amended by St. 1921, p. 90).

Where under Pen. Code, § 1098, as amended by St. 1921, p. 90, each defendant in joint trial is entitled to five additional challenges from number prescribed by section 1070, and state is entitled to additional challenges equal to number of additional separate challenges allowed defendant, the challenges are allowed by law to the state, and the number to be exercised by it is not made dependent on number of challenges exercised by defendants.

3. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 1166½(6)—Permitting prosecution to exercise more challenges than defendant could have exercised held not prejudicial unless objectionable juror sat (Pen. Code, §§ 1070, 1404, and § 1098 as amended by St. 1921, p. 90).

Where defendant was jointly prosecuted with another for unlawfully manufacturing intoxicating liquor, permitting the state under Pen. Code, § 1070, and section 1098, as amended by St. 1921, p. 90, to exercise more peremptory challenges than one defendant could have exercised because additional challenge allowed to defendants jointly tried must be exercised jointly, held, under section 1404, not prejudicial where it was not shown that objectionable juror sat at trial.

4. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 1130(1)—Mere assignment of error on admission of testimony and argument of district attorney will not be considered.

Mere assignment of error on admission of testimony and error in argument of the district attorney will not be considered, in absence of citation of authorities or specification of particulars showing error.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

Charles Pilbro and Frank X. Walsh were convicted of manufacturing intoxicating liquor, and defendant Walsh appeals. Affirmed.

E. Fitzgerald, of Placerville, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. On the 8th day of March, 1927, an information was filed in the superior court of the county of El Dorado accusing the defendants, Charles Pilbro and Frank X. Walsh, of the crime of willfully and unlawfully manufacturing intoxicating liquor, etc., in said county. Both of the defendants, upon trial, were convicted. The defendant Walsh interposed a motion for new trial, which motion was denied, and thereupon said defendant appealed to this court from the order denying his motion for a new trial and from the judgment entered against him in said cause.

No contention is made that the evidence is insufficient to warrant the verdict of the jury, and an examination of the record shows that no such contention could be reasonably urged. We are presented upon this appeal with certain alleged errors relative to the order of the court denying the appellant's motion for a separate trial, errors in the impanelment of the jury, and errors in the admission of testimony and in the argument of counsel for the people made to the jury.

[1] The record on appellant's motion for a new trial shows the following: That on the 8th day of March, 1927, the appellant served a notice in these words (omitting the title):

"Take notice that on Friday, the 11th day of March, 1927, at the courtroom at the courthouse in Placerville, El Dorado county, Cal., at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m., of said day, the above-named defendant, Frank X. Walsh, will move the court, and said defendant hereby moves the court, for a separate trial in the above-entitled action. That said motion will be made and based upon the record and files in this cause. [Signed] E. Fitzgerald, Attorney for Frank X. Walsh."

In People v. Anderson, 59 Cal. App. 408, 211 P. 431, this court had before it for consideration an almost identical motion, where the record, just as in this case, shows absolutely nothing further. It was there held that while, under section 1098 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1921 (St. 1921, p. 90), the court may, in its discretion, order separate trials of two or more defendants jointly charged, but it is not bound or required to do so upon the mere request of any one of the defendants. On page 431 of the opinion in that case (211 P. 431) will be found cited numerous authorities to the effect that where the record shows nothing further than a mere motion, there is nothing upon which an appellate court can say that the trial court did not properly exercise its discretion.

In People v. Erno, 195 Cal. 272, 232 P. 710, a case where two defendants were charged with the crime of murder, the Supreme Court in that case said:

"When two or more defendants are jointly charged with a public offense, they must be tried jointly, unless the court order separate trials, and it is not bound to order separate trials upon the mere request of a defendant."

[2] Upon and during the course of the impanelment of the jury, the defendant Pilbro declined to join with his codefendant, Walsh, in the exercise of certain peremptory challenges. The record in this particular, so far as it is necessary to illustrate the point, is as follows:

"Mr. Fitzgerald: I will say to the court that I have talked with the defendant Pilbro, and he refuses to co-operate with the defendant Walsh in excusing persons on the jury that we desire to excuse.

"The Court: You understand what you are doing, Mr. Pilbro?

"Defendant Pilbro: Yes, sir; I am satisfied with the jury as they are.

"The Court: You deem it to your interest not to join in the challenge, is that it?

"Defendant Pilbro: Yes, sir.

"The Court: You deem it contrary to your interest at the present time to exercise this joint challenge, is that right?

"Defendant Pilbro: Yes, sir.

"Mr. Fitzgerald: Then I have no challenge.

"Mr. Lyon: Excuse Mr. Martin.

"Mr. Fitzgerald: We take an exception to the excusing of the last juror upon the ground that the state is exercising more challenges than the defendant can exercise—the defendant Walsh.

"The Court: Mr. Martin will be excused."

Substantially the same proceedings were had in relation to some other jurors, the record showing that the prosecution excused eight jurors challenged peremptorily, and the appellant Walsh five. It does not appear from the record that the defendant Walsh at any time asked leave to exercise more challenges than the five exercised by him; but, nevertheless, we will set forth the cases which seem to determine the law, irrespective of whether the appellant has or has not placed himself in a position to take advantage of any ruling of the court made during the impanelment of the jury. Section 1070 of the Penal Code, as it existed at the time of the trial of this cause, gave to a defendant ten and to the state five peremptory challenges, and section 1098 of the Penal Code, applying to cases where defendants are tried jointly, read then as it does now:

"If the defendants are tried jointly, the state and the defendants shall be entitled to the number of challenges prescribed by section 1070 of this Code, which challenges on the part of the defendants must be exercised jointly. Each defendant shall also be entitled to five additional challenges which may be exercised separately; the State shall also be entitled to additional challenges equal to one-half the number of all the additional separate challenges allowed the defendants."

Under this provision of the Code the defendants in this case were allowed ten challenges to be exercised jointly and five challenges to be exercised separately, which gave to the state the right to exercise ten challenges. The challenges are allowed by law to the state, and the number to be exercised is not made dependent upon the number of challenges exercised by the defendants.

[3] In the case of People v. Rambaud, 248 P. 954, this court had before it similar questions involving the impanelment of a jury. In that case no showing was made that any biased or unfit jurors were sworn to try the case, as it is not made to appear here that any other than an acceptable juror was sworn to try the case. In the Rambaud Case this court in its opinion said:

"As was said in many of the cases, the important thing to be considered is whether the objectionable juror was forced upon the defendant and whether he had had that to which he was entitled—a fair and impartial jury and not a jury composed of any particular individuals"—citing People v. Johnson, 57 Cal. App. 391, 207 P. 281; People v. Krompholt, 172 Cal. 512, 157 P. 599; People v. Schafer, 161 Cal. 573, 119 P. 920; People v. Troutman, 187 Cal. 313, 201 P. 928.

In the Rambaud Case it further appeared that after the defendant had exercised all his peremptory challenges, the court permitted the prosecution to exercise peremptory challenges upon two veniremen who had theretofore been passed for cause, and after the prosecution had declined to exercise, in turn, its peremptory challenges, as set forth in section 1088 of the Penal Code; but there, as here, no showing was made that any objectionable juror was forced upon the defendant, and the language there used in considering this question is pertinent here, to wit:

"Not the slightest intimation appears in the record of any dissatisfaction whatever relative to the jurors who were sworn to try the cause in the places of the persons just referred to."

We there held, as we may hold here, that under such circumstances section 1404 of the Penal Code applies relative to errors not affecting the substantial rights of the parties. See, also, 15 Cal. Jur. p. 323, § 3, and authorities there cited, all of which hold that while a defendant is entitled to a fair and impartial jury, he is not entitled to the service of any particular juror. The record shows that the appellant in this case was allowed and exercised all the challenges to which he was entitled.

Section 1098 of the Penal Code, in relation to peremptory challenges, requires, as we have said, that ten of them must be exercised jointly when two or more defendants are being jointly tried. As said in 15 California Jurisprudence, 407, § 79:

"In criminal cases when several defendants are tried together, they cannot sever their challenges but must join therein. And in civil actions where there are several parties on either side, they must join in the challenge before it can be made. In construing these provisions, it has been held in criminal cases that defendants must join in peremptory challenges as well as in those for cause. The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure does not deny persons the equal protection of the laws, and thus violate the Fourteenth Amendment, for the same rule applies to all the parties to an action where they are united with others either as plaintiffs or defendants."

In People v. McCalla, 8 Cal. 301, the defendants were on trial for murder. We quote from the opinion of the court:

"The only error assigned, is the refusal of the court to exclude from the panel a juror, who was challenged peremptorily by one of the defendants, the other expressly refusing to join in the challenge."

It was there held that the challenge could only be exercised jointly. See, also, State v. Mitchell, 36 Idaho, 724, 214 P. 217. The same ruling was had in the County of San Luis Obispo v. Simas, 1 Cal. App. 175, 81 P. 972. To the same effect is the case of Muller v. Hale, 138 Cal. 163, 71 P. 81, where it is also held that the requirements that defendants or parties must join in the exercise of peremptory challenges is not violative of any constitutional provision.

The foregoing cases show clearly that the appellant's contention relative to the impanelment of the jury in the cause under consideration is wholly untenable. To support his contention the appellant relies upon the case of People v. O'Connor, 254 P. 630, where this court had under consideration the subject of peremptory challenges. An examination of the O'Connor Case, however, and of the facts set forth in the opinion, shows that that case does not uphold any of the appellant's contentions made herein.

[4] Appellant, as we have stated, assigned as error the admission of certain testimony, and also error in the argument of the district attorney. We are not given any reason why any of the rulings of the court in the admission of testimony or exclusion of testimony should be held erroneous. Appellant, in his argument, sets forth only the following:

"We have also numerous errors noted in allowing the district attorney and defendant Pilbro to get before the jury inadmissible evidence involving Walsh, and last, we have the court's error in permitting the district attorney to argue before the jury concerning certain alleged offenses of Walsh for which he was not being tried."

It has been frequently held that assignments of errors of law committed in rulings, made during the progress of the trial, which are not discussed in appellant's brief, will not be examined or considered upon appeal, but it will be presumed that no errors existed in such rulings. Bell v. Southern Pac. Co., 144 Cal. 560, 77 P. 1124, and People v. Clark, 183 Cal. 677, 192 P. 521; where it is held that a mere assignment of error will not be considered in the absence of citation of authorities or specification of particulars showing the error.

In Dolley v. Ragon, 66 Cal. App. 707, 228 P. 52, a similar presentation of alleged errors was made by the appellant. It was there said:

"Other points suggested by appellant are neither argued nor seriously presented in any way. In such circumstances, under the rule frequently announced by the Supreme Court of this state, such alleged errors are entitled to no consideration."

See the last page of the opinion in that case for a long list of authorities announcing the same rule.

We think the record shows that the appellant was fairly tried and that no cause for reversal has been presented.

The order and judgment of the trial court are affirmed.

VALENTINE v. G. S. DONALDSON INV. CO.
et al. (Civ. 4920.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 17, 1927.

1. Licenses ⇐37—New dealer's license is unnecessary after change of members of partnership doing business under fictitious name (Motor Vehicle Act, § 9).

Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 403) § 9, does not require application for new dealer's license after change in membership of partnership doing business under a fictitious name.

2. Replevin ⇐72—Evidence held to support finding that employer was owner, entitled to possession of automobile mortgaged by employee.

In claim and delivery for automobile, evidence held sufficient to support trial court's finding that plaintiff was owner and entitled to possession of automobile, and that plaintiff's employee had no right to transfer it to himself, nor to execute and deliver chattel mortgage thereon to defendant.

3. Estoppel ⇐75—Dealer, whose employee fraudulently secured registration certificate, held not estopped to assert ownership and right to possession of automobile.

Automobile dealer whose employee fraudulently secured issuance of registration certificate to himself by signing fictitious corporate name, in which dealer's license was held, to application, without authority of dealer doing business under such name, held not estopped to assert ownership and right of possession.

4. Estoppel ☞97—That automobile registration certificate was not signed by registrant as legal owner put purchasers on inquiry precluding them from urging his employer's estoppel to assert ownership and right of possession.

That certificate of registration of automobile had not been signed by registrant as legal owner when presented to purchasers was sufficient to put them on inquiry as to registrant's authority to transfer automobile to himself from his employer, so as to preclude purchasers from equitable estoppel of employer to assert ownership and right of possession.

5. Judgment ☞18(2)—Answer admitting that defendants took and retained possession of automobile supported finding against individual defendant as officer and director of corporate defendant.

Admission in answer that defendants took and retained possession of automobile, sued for in claim and delivery, was sufficient to support finding and judgment against individual defendant as officer and director of corporate defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by F. E. Valentine, doing business under the name and style of the Golden State Motor Company, against the G. S. Donaldson Investment Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Leonard Evans, of Anaheim, for respondent.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. This is an action in claim and delivery for the recovery of a certain automobile, resulting in a judgment for damages in the sum of $1,250. By reason of the fact that at the time of the trial the automobile had been sold, possession thereof could not be delivered to the plaintiff. Defendants appeal from the judgment.

At a time prior to April 3, 1922, one Walter Hodges was connected with George M. Ross and Walter J. Ross, doing business under the name of Golden State Motor Company. While so engaged in said business said Walter Hodges, as manager, made an application on behalf of the copartnership, namely, Golden State Motor Company, to the motor vehicle department of the state of California, for a dealer's license to buy and sell automobiles, under which dealer's license the copartnership named conducted and carried on business. On April 3, 1922, respondent, together with one E. N. Moore, entered into a written contract with said Walter Hodges, which recited that respondent and E. N. Moore had purchased and taken over one-half of the assets and liabilities of the said Golden State Motor Company, the copartnership, and under the terms of which they agreed that they employed said Walter Hodges at a certain salary, with a future or contingent interest in the business. Respondent carried on his business under the original dealer's license applied for and issued to his predecessors, Golden State Motor Company, a copartnership, and was doing business under said dealer's license and under said fictitious name at the time of the transfer of the title of the automobile by Hodges to himself, to wit, on or about May 4, 1922. On April 13, 1922, respondent handed to Hodges a check for the sum of $1,215, payable by the Golden State Motor Company to Greer-Robins Company, for the car in dispute, which was subsequently returned to respondent and then used by him as a car for demonstrating purposes. On May 3, 1922, Walter Hodges, purporting to be a co-owner of said automobile by reason of his alleged interest in the Golden State Motor Company, caused the title of said car to be transferred from the Golden State Motor Company to himself as an individual, and obtained a loan upon the car in dispute from the G. S. Donaldson Investment Company. A mortgage upon the car was taken by said corporation to secure the repayment of the loan. Hodges failed to make the payments upon the loan; whereupon the appellant G. S. Donaldson Investment Company took possession of said automobile under the terms of said mortgage. Thereupon respondent instituted a cause of action in claim and delivery to recover the automobile, or its alleged value of $1,525.

The trial court's findings were:

That plaintiff at all times mentioned in the complaint was, and now is, the owner and entitled to the possession of said automobile. That on or about the 24th day of July, 1922, the defendants took the said automobile from plaintiff's possession without plaintiff's consent. "That, at the time of such taking of said automobile by the defendants from the plaintiff, the defendant the G. S. Donaldson Investment Company held an instrument in the form of a chattel mortgage, dated May 4, 1922, upon and covering said automobile, and executed by one Walter Hodges, then in the employment of the plaintiff as a salesman, which instrument was executed in favor of the defendant the G. S. Donaldson Investment Company as security for the payment of a promissory note of even date therewith, executed by the said Walter Hodges, for the principal sum of $457, payable as follows: $225 payable on July 5, 1922, and $232 on September 5, 1922, with interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month. That on said date, to wit, May 4, 1922, the said automobile was registered in the name of said Walter Hodges at the office of the motor vehicle department of the state of California, at Sacramento, Cal., which registration was obtained and procured by the said Walter Hodges upon an application filed in said motor vehicle department, dated May 3, 1922, purporting to show a sale of said automobile by the Golden State Motor Company to said Walter Hodges, but which said purported sale and transfer was made by the said Walter Hodges purporting to be the manager of the said Golden State Motor Company. That, at the time of the said transfer of said automobile to the said Walter Hodges and of the execution and delivery of said chattel mortgage, the said automobile was the property of the plaintiff and not of the said Walter Hodges, and the said Walter Hodges had no right or authority whatsoever to make said transfer to himself or to execute and deliver said chattel mortgage upon said automobile to the defendant the G. S. Donaldson Investment Company. (6) That, at the time of the taking of said automobile by the defendants from the plaintiff, to wit, July 24, 1922, the said automobile was of the value of $1,250. That the taking of said automobile by the defendants from the plaintiff, and the retention thereof by the defendants from the plaintiff, was wrongful, without the consent of the plaintiff, and without any right in the defendants, or either of them, in said automobile, and by taking said automobile and withholding the same from the plaintiff, the defendants became liable to the plaintiff for the value of said automobile, to wit, $1,250, as damages suffered by the plaintiff."

Appellants contend that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, and in support of this contention urge a noncompliance with the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act with respect to the name under which respondent conducted and carried on his business. The original application for a dealer's license stated the name of the concern to be Golden State Motor Company, a copartnership, and was signed, "Golden State Motor Company by Walter Hodges, Manager." After purchasing the business, respondent continued to do business under the name of Golden State Motor Company, and did not apply for a new dealer's license. Hodges, while in the employment of the respondent as a salesman, on May 3, 1922, reported to the division of motor vehicles the sale of the automobile in question to himself, the report being signed, "Golden State Motor Company, by Walter Hodges." On the same day, Walter Hodges applied for a new registration of the automobile in his own name and received a certificate of registration showing Walter Hodges to be the registered owner, which certificate was never signed by said Walter Hodges as legal owner. On the next day, May 4th, Hodges applied to the defendants for a loan and mortgaged the automobile as security for a loan of $457. G. S. Donaldson testified that Hodges informed him he was part owner and manager of the Golden State Motor Company, and that he had bought the automobile from the Golden State Motor Company, thereby securing a registration certificate, which he showed to Donaldson.

Under the terms of Hodges' employment as a salesman by the respondent, Hodges acquired no interest in respondent's business and had no interest therein at the time he dealt with said automobile and made and delivered said chattel mortgage. At the best, he had only a contingent interest, dependent upon his conduct and the quantity of business produced. The contract was dated April 3, 1922, and provided that at the expiration of twelve months Hodges should receive a one-third interest in the assets of the Golden State Motor Company, provided that the parties thereto had withdrawn an equal amount of money with Hodges during said twelve months, and providing that Hodges should not drink any malt, spirituous, or vinous liquors. The contract further provided that Hodges should forfeit all his rights in case of violation of the last-mentioned portion of the agreement. Twelve months had not expired when Hodges mortgaged the automobile. It was necessary for Hodges to comply with the provisions precedent specified in the contract before he could acquire any ownership or interest in said business. Hodges, while an employee of respondent, fraudulently secured the registration of said automobile in his own name and fraudulently represented to appellants that he was the owner of said automobile, that he was part owner and manager of Golden State Motor Company, and that he had bought the automobile from said company. Appellants, relying upon these fraudulent representations, made the loan to Hodges.

[1, 2] Appellants urge that respondent failed to comply with the provisions of section 9 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 403) by not making an application for a new dealer's license. The original application did not disclose the names of the partners, nor is it so required. A new application likewise would not have disclosed the names of the new owners. Our attention has not been called to any provision of the Motor Vehicle Act requiring a new license to be taken out where the members of a partnership doing business under a fictitious name are changed; neither do we know of such provision therein. In our opinion, the evidence was sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that respondent was the owner and entitled to the possession of the automobile in question, and that said Walter Hodges had no right or authority to transfer said automobile to himself, or to execute and deliver said chattel mortgage upon said automobile to the defendant G. S. Donaldson Investment Company.

[3, 4] In view of the foregoing, we see no merit in appellants' contention that respondent is estopped to assert his ownership and right to possession of said automobile. This is not a case where the evidence shows, as in Parke v. Francisus, 194 Cal. 284, 228 P. 435, a case relied upon by appellants, that respondent was guilty of any culpable negligence in allowing Hodges to keep the certificate of registration so that he might transfer title to an innocent purchaser. In the present case the evidence shows that Hodges never had a certificate of registration until he fraudulently secured the issuance of such certificate to himself by signing the name of Golden State Motor Company, the holder of the dealer's license, to an application for such registration and without any authority so to do. This certificate of registration, when presented to appellants, had not been signed by Walter Hodges as legal owner, which fact alone was sufficient to put appellants upon inquiry as to the authority of Hodges to transfer said automobile to himself. Appellants are thereby precluded from urging the doctrine of equitable estoppel.

Appellants' objection that excessive damages were awarded to respondent for the value of the automobile is met by the evidence submitted on the part of the respondent, which is sufficient to support the finding of the court that the value of said automobile was the sum of $1,250.

[5] The answer admits that the defendants took and retained possession of said automobile, which admission is sufficient to support the finding and judgment against Lloyd Donaldson as an officer and director of said corporation.

The judgment is ordered affirmed.

GUALCO v. CITY OF BAKERSFIELD et al.
(Civ. 5923-5931.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 18, 1927.

1. Municipal corporations ⚡266—Effect of charter provision held to be that street improvements shall be done according to general law.

Where city charter made no direct reference to street improvement proceedings, effect of provision therein that, in absence of provision in charter, law of state shall be applicable, is to say that street improvements shall be done according to general law.

2. Municipal corporations ⚡327—As between general and specific charter provision for advertisement for bids, principle that specific provisions shall prevail over general ones held applicable (Street Improvement Act 1911; Code Civ. Proc. § 1859).

In construing conflict between general provision in city charter requiring advertising for five days, and specific provisions of Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), which by charter is to govern, requiring advertising for bids for two days for street improvements, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1859, the principle of statutory interpretation that specific provisions shall prevail over general ones is applicable.

3. Municipal corporations ⚡327—Charter provision for advertisement for bids held not to prescribe rules for street improvement proceedings initiated under general laws.

General provision in city charter requiring five days' advertising for public improvements held not, in view of specific provision of Street Improvement Act 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), adopted by charter, requiring two days' advertising, to prescribe rules for any part of street improvement assessment proceedings initiated under provisions of general laws enacted for that purpose.

4. Municipal corporations ⚡330(4)—Requirement that certain pavement material be used held not to destroy competitive bidding, whether material was patented or not.

Requirement in specifications for bids for street improvements that certain type of pavement material should be used held not to destroy competitive bidding within meaning of statutes, irrespective of whether pavement material was patented or not.

5. Municipal corporations ⚡330(3)—Requirement as to pavement material in specifications for bids must be unjust to invalidate assessment.

It is only when requirement as to pavement material in specifications for bids for street improvements imposes an unjust or unreasonable burden on property owners that courts will declare assessment invalid therefor.

Appeals from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Separate actions by Peter Gualco, by Albert M. Jones and others, by L. J. Benzino and others, by E. B. Knight, by Eliza J. Baker, by Mrs. F. C. Jump and others, by Harriet F. Sanforn, by Frank L. Vega, and by J. H. Collins against the City of Bakersfield and others to quiet title against certain street assessment liens. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs take consolidated appeal. Judgments affirmed.

T. F. Allen, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Brittan & Brittan, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

KOFORD, P. J. These actions, consolidated into one appeal, are all for the purpose of quieting title against certain street assessment liens arising from public proceedings taken for the paving of certain portions of Twentieth and Twenty-First streets in the city of Bakersfield. Judgment was for defendants upon demurrers to the complaints.

[1-3] Appellants advance two main reasons for the invalidity of the assessment liens: First. That in addition to following the procedure of the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), which requires notice for bids to be published for two days only, the public authorities of the city should have gone further and published this notice for five days because of the provisions of section 136 of the charter of the city of Bakersfield (Stats. 1915, p. 1552).

Section 136 of the charter provides:

"In the erection, improvement and repair of all public buildings and works, and in furnishing any supplies and materials for the same, or for any other use by the city, when the expenditure required for the same exceeds the sum of five hundred dollars, the same shall be done by contract, and shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder, after advertising for sealed proposals for the work contemplated for five consecutive days in the official newspaper.
* * *

The charter does not contain any clause expressly providing for public proceedings for street improvement, but such are provided for by section 161 in an indirect way. This section reads as follows:

"Sec. 161. Whenever any municipal function or affair arises, for which no provision is made by this charter or ordinances, the law of the state applicable thereto shall govern. Any law of the state applicable may be made the law of the city by ordinance."

Street improvement by assessment proceedings is a well-known and recognized function of municipalities, and it is likewise known to require a complete scheme of procedure by which its cost may be legally assessed against the property benefited by it. Inasmuch as the charter makes no direct reference to street improvement proceedings and does not prescribe a method for taking such proceeding, the effect of section 161, above quoted, is to say that such improvements shall be done according to the general law governing that subject-matter. If, therefore, it be conceded any conflict exists between section 136 and the Street Improvement Act of 1911, it would not be a conflict which should be resolved in favor of section 136 on account of the matter being a municipal affair. It would be a conflict between two sections of the charter—one section of the charter saying advertise five days and the other saying do it according to general law, viz., advertise two days.

In construing these two sections of the charter, the principle of statutory interpretation applicable is that specific provisions shall prevail over general ones. Code Civ. Proc. § 1859; 23 Cal. Jur. p. 732, and cases cited. With this principle in mind, it follows that it is not the purpose nor intention of section 136 to prescribe rules for any part of street improvement assessment proceedings initiated under the provisions of any of the several general laws enacted for that purpose.

[4, 5] The second point raised by appellants is that the complaints show that competitive bidding was destroyed by the requirement in the specifications that all bids must be made with the understanding that Warrenite bitulithic wearing surface purchased from Warren Bros. Company at $9 per ton be used in the street work. The complaints were drawn up on the theory that the requirement of this particular pavement from Warren Bros. Company was a fraud. This theory, apparently untenable under the allegations of the complaints, has been abandoned by appellants, and it is now claimed that the complaints contain enough allegations to show that the proceedings prohibited competitive bidding by street contractors, and were therefore void regardless of fraud.

A written agreement or offer of Warren Bros. Company was incorporated in the complaints and was alleged to be referred to in the advertisement for bids. This agreement or offer was in the customary form. Woodworth v. Sebastopol, 72 Cal. App. 187, 236 P. 981; Warren Bros. Co. v. Boyle, 42 Cal. App. 246, 183 P. 706. It recited that the specifications called for the use of certain patented pavement material, that such patents were owned by Warren Bros. Company, and in order to provide for competitive bidding, and at the same time secure the adoption of Warrenite bitulithic for the improvement, the company offered and agreed to furnish the material with considerable detail as to time, place, and condition at $9 per ton to any bidder or to the owners in case they elected to do the work themselves. That such procedure and requirement of patented material does not destroy competitive bidding within the meaning of the statutes is well established by the decisions. Woodworth v. Sebastopol, supra, and cases cited.

In the closing brief appellants point out where the complaints allege that in truth and in fact said Warren Bros. Company had no existing or valid patents covering the mixture called for by the specifications, and that the same mixture could be obtained and used without let or hindrance of said company and at a cheaper price. Counsel has cited no authority to the effect that an unpatented material may not be required from a particular source. We see no distinction in principle between a patented material and a material which may be otherwise monopolized as by most favorable location or known special skill in preparation of the same. Some discretion is necessarily left to the city authorities as to how streets shall be paved and as to what materials and workmanship shall be used. Undoubtedly opinions differ as to what pavement and what material is best and cheapest. It is only where such requirements impose an unjust or unreasonable burden upon the property owners that courts will interfere and declare the assessment invalid for that reason. Stanwood v. Carson, 169 Cal. 640, 649, 147 P. 562. In view of the numerous cases which appear in our reports in which Warrenite bitulithic is recognized as a patented material, and in view of the rule that an uncertain allegation may be construed against the pleader, we are justified in construing the alternative allegation in the complaints, viz., "had no existing or valid patents," as only an allegation of invalidity of existing patents. In administering this business of the city, the city authorities may decide that it is better, more competitive, more expeditious and cheaper to put all bidders upon the same footing rather than invite them to buy a lawsuit with even a pretended patentee, by requiring the use of the mixture without recognizing the patent. This court cannot substitute its discretion for that of the city authorities. We are unable to see from the complaint how their action has imposed an unjust burden upon the property owners. It is equally probable that they have protected them from such burden by the specifications.

The judgments are affirmed.

NEWBERRY v. EVANS et al. (Civ. 3223.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 14, 1927.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 607(1)—Reporter must prepare transcript on filing of notice of appeal requesting transcript, regardless whether court orders him to do so (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953a).

It is duty of phonographic reporter of trial court to prepare transcript of record within 20 days after party files notice of appeal with request that reporter make up such transcript, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953a, regardless of whether the trial court makes any order requiring the reporter to make the transcript.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 607(1)—Transcript made by reporter pursuant to notice of appeal, without order of court, constitutes "record on appeal," when settled, as completely as if made under order of court (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953a).

Where party files notice of appeal with request that phonographic reporter make up transcript of record, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953a, but trial court fails to direct phonographic reporter to make such transcript, the transcript, when settled, is nevertheless the "record on appeal" as fully and completely to all intents and purposes as though the trial court had directed the reporter to make the transcript.

3. Costs $\S$ 254(4)—Reporter's fees for making transcript for appeal held taxable, though transcript was made without order of court (Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 274, 953a, 1027).

Where appellant had transcript of record prepared, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953a, which requires phonographic reporter to make up transcript on filing notice of appeal requesting transcript, regardless of whether court makes order directing him to do so, and appellant was awarded costs, he was entitled to recover the reporter's fees for making the transcript, under section 1027, notwithstanding that the reporter made it without order of court; section 274 being inapplicable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by H. O. Newberry against W. E. Evans and others. Judgment for plaintiff was reversed, with directions by the District Court of Appeal (76 Cal. App. 492, 245 P. 227). From an order disallowing an item of costs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. F. Cowan and A. W. Hollingsworth, both of Santa Rosa, for appellants.

Barrett & McConnell, R. M. Barrett and C. W. Anderson, all of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Upon a former action between the above-entitled parties the judgment in favor of the plaintiff therein was reversed by this court. Upon the going down of the remittitur the appellants in the action just referred to and the appellants in this matter filed their cost bill, which included an item of $289.90 charged as reporter's fees in making up the record to be used on appeal in said cause, as provided for by section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. Thereupon the plaintiff in said action and the respondent upon this appeal filed his motion to retax the cost bill filed by the appellants, moving to strike out said item of $289.90. The motion was made upon the following grounds, to wit: That such item is improper, not legal, unreasonable, excessive, and further, that an order of the court was never secured or made directing the preparation of said transcript for use on appeal in said case, or otherwise, and that such transcript on appeal was prepared and made up at the request of the said parties without any order of court or legal authority therefor. Upon the hearing of said motion the trial court struck out the item of $289.90, and it was from this order that the defendants appealed.

The record presented on this appeal shows that on the 17th day of November, 1924, the appellants herein filed a notice with the clerk of the superior court of Sonoma county, stating the fact of their appeal from the judgment entered against them in said cause, as referred to herein, and requesting that a transcript of the testimony offered or taken, evidence offered or received, and all rulings, instructions, etc., constituting all matters to which the same related, be made up and prepared; that thereafter, and on December 1, 1924, the phonographic reporter filed with the clerk of said court a typewritten transcript of the record to be used on the appeal from said judgment, including therein copies of all writings offered or received in evidence and all other matters and things required by said notice to be contained therein; that on the 3d day of December, 1924, the trial judge who presided at said cause certified that he had examined said transcript and that it was a full, fair, and true transcript, etc., of said cause, and the same was thereupon settled and allowed by said trial judge; that on the 4th day of December, 1924, said transcript was filed by the clerk of said superior court and forwarded to the clerk of the court of the third appellate district, and used upon said appeal; that said transcript was prepared according to the terms and provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. On the 10th day of February, 1926, the judgment of the trial court in said cause was reversed by said Court of Appeal and the appellants in said action were allowed to recover their costs. That, upon the going down of the remittitur, the appellants herein served and filed their memorandum of costs, which included, among other items, the amount paid the phonographic reporter for making up the typewritten copy of the proceedings in the trial court and constituting the record on appeal. The original case referred to herein is entitled Newberry v. Evans et al., reported in 76 Cal. App. 492, 245 P. 227.

[1] The record before us does not show that the trial court ever made any order in the original action, as is made its duty by the first sentence of the second paragraph of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. It is apparently upon the lack of this order that the trial court disallowed the item of costs incurred by the appellants in making up the record on appeal in the manner and form provided for by section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. The record discloses that the appellants took all the steps that they were legally required to take in order to secure a typewritten copy of the proceedings in the trial court to make up a transcript which would constitute the record to be used upon appeal and which was actually settled and allowed by the trial court. The first paragraph of said section of the Code of Civil Procedure directs what an appellant should do, to wit: File his notice with the clerk, stating the fact of his appeal from the judgment, and setting forth all that the appellant desires to have included in the transcript, and requesting that the phonographic reporter make up such a record. This must be done within a certain length of time, all of which appears to have been done in this case. Thereupon the second paragraph of said section applies, which reads as follows:

"Upon receiving said notice, it shall be the duty of the court to require the stenographic reporter thereof to transcribe fully and completely the phonographic report of the trial. The stenographic reporter shall, within twenty days after said notice has been filed with the clerk, prepare a transcript of the phonographic report of the trial," etc.

[2] After this is done, and the phonographic reporter has filed his transcript with the clerk, notice is given by the clerk to the respective parties, when it will be presented to the trial judge for settlement, and settlement had. The section does not specify that any one shall serve the notice on the trial judge. It simply reads, "Upon receiving said notice," not that any one shall serve the same upon the trial judge. The section then further provides that the stenographic reporter shall, within twenty days after said notice has been filed with the clerk, prepare the record, not that the stenographic reporter shall, within so many days after being directed so to do by the trial court, prepare a stenographic report. It is the legal duty of a stenographic reporter to prepare the record within 20 days after the notice has been filed with the clerk. This duty is none the less incumbent upon the phonographic reporter whether the trial court does or does not make any order in the matter. The Code section specifically places this obligation upon the phonographic reporter, and the typewritten copy of the proceedings had in the trial court made in pursuance of the notice given as provided for in the first paragraph, when settled by the court, constitutes the record on appeal just as fully and completely, to all intents and purposes, as though the trial court had added to the legal duty, already incumbent upon the phonographic reporter, its order to follow the statute.

[3] Having complied with all the requirements of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure relative to making up the transcript on appeal required by said section to be done and performed by an appellant, are the appellants entitled to recover the costs of the phonographic reporter's fees, even though the record does not show any order of the court directing the reporter to transcribe the testimony? Basing its decision upon the Estate of Gallo, 71 Cal. App. 352, 235 P. 66, the trial court disallowed such item of expenditure. The facts and circumstances in the Gallo Case are, however, distinguishable from the facts and circumstances which we are here considering. In the Gallo Case the record was made up under the old procedure and not in accordance with section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. In the transcript in the Gallo Case the following appears:

"It was conceded, and taken as true at said hearing, that the court had made no order for the transcript; that said transcript was ordered by plaintiff's attorney, and was made after entry of judgment herein, and was actually used only for the sole purpose of enabling plaintiff's attorney to prepare plaintiff's bill of exceptions, to be, and actually used as a part of their record on appeal."

In other words, the Gallo Case involved the allowance of costs for an attorney's private copy of the testimony which was not made the record on appeal, but which private copy was used by the appellant's attorney in making up the bill of exceptions. Thus it appears.

that the facts in the Gallo Case and the facts in this case are readily distinguishable. In the Gallo Case, what was there said, as applying to a private copy ordered by counsel we think a correct statement of the law, but inapplicable here. In the Gallo Case the court says:

"Section 1027 of the Code of Civil Procedure is the latest expression of the Legislature, but does not repeal the provisions of section 274 of the Code of Civil Procedure requiring the party ordering a transcript without the order of court to pay for the same. Construing these two sections together, we must conclude that the statute allows all costs actually incurred by the prevailing party in preparation of the record on appeal, except in the absence of an order of court, where the party himself orders the transcript, he must pay for the same. The only way to properly charge the expense of a transcript as costs on appeal is to obtain an order of court pursuant to section 274 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

A number of cases are then cited which refer to bills of exceptions on appeals prepared and taken under the old method. It will be observed that the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, are not construed in the Gallo Case; in fact, that section was not involved in that action, as the proceeding was entirely outside of and separate and apart from the method of preparing records on appeal set forth in section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. Section 1027, Code of Civil Procedure, referred to in the Gallo Case, among other things, states:

"The party entitled to costs, or to whom costs are awarded, may recover all amounts actually paid out by him in connection with said appeal, and the preparation of the record for the appeal."

In the Gallo Case the record on appeal consisted of the printed transcript, the cost of which was allowed by the trial court. In the case at bar the record on appeal consists of the phonographic reporter's typewritten copy of the testimony. Section 274, Code of Civil Procedure, is not a section dealing with appeals. It is a section having to do with reporter's fees and providing for payment thereof when the court orders a copy made, whether for its own use, or otherwise, and also for payment by parties when copies of the testimony are ordered for individual use. There is nothing in section 274, Code of Civil Procedure, which makes the copy of the testimony ordered by the court a record on appeal. The record on appeal made up under the old method of procedure from the copy of the testimony made by the reporter, whether ordered by the court or by the respective parties, consists of the printed transcript, and of the printed transcript only. Section 274, Code of Civil Procedure, allows the prevailing party to charge as costs in the trial court the reporter's fees of making a transcript of the testimony when the transcript is ordered by the trial court, and does not depend upon whether an appeal is taken therefrom or not. This is simply followed out on appeal, and the prevailing party on an appeal under the old system is allowed to recover the costs of making a transcript of the testimony when ordered by the court, just as the prevailing party in the trial court is allowed to include such item in his memorandum of costs in the trial court.

In the case of Turner v. Eastside Canal & Irrigation Co., 177 Cal. 570, 171 P. 299, the court had before it an attempt, on the part of the prevailing party, to recover, as an item of cost, the expense of a private copy of the transcript, ordered in the cause, and not prepared according to section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, and, while not necessary to the decision of that case, the opinion, however, does state what we believe to be the law. When referring to the requirements of said section, in order that costs may be recovered, the court said:

"To procure such a record which will be available for use on an appeal, it is essential that the party preparing to appeal shall, within a specified time after judgment, file a demand for the preparation of the same, in pursuance of which the reporter transcribes his notes and certifies the same, being paid by such party the charge allowed by law therefor. Such a payment, of course, can be recovered as a cost of appeal, being an amount actually paid out in the preparation of the record on appeal."

The opinion then goes on to state that the plaintiffs had substituted a copy of the testimony which they had obtained and paid for during the trial, the costs of which could not, of course, be allowed. The opinion then further says:

"The record for the appeal under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, 'in so far as the reporter's transcript is concerned, is the transcript furnished by him in response to the legal demand therefor made after judgment and within the time, and in the manner specified in the section. When the record is prepared under this section, it is the money that the appellant is actually compelled to pay out to obtain this record that he is entitled to recover.'"

In Stafford v. Hill, 63 Cal. App. 15, 217 P. 766, the Second district had before it the same question which we are here considering. And it was there held that under the terms of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides for the alternative method of appeal, the reporter's transcript filed by the appellant is a part of the record on appeal and the expense of such transcript is a proper item of costs under section 1027 of that Code. The opinion in the case of Stafford v. Hill, supra, distinguishes the case from that of Sime v. Hunter, 55 Cal. App. 157, 202 P. 967, in that in the latter case the item of costs was for a copy, which necessarily leads to the conclusion that the court in the case of Stafford v. Hill was not dealing with the copy, but was dealing with the original transcript, prepared by the reporter under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, and therefore the expense of the transcript became a proper charge under section 1927, Code of Civil Procedure.

The case of Kohn v. Kempner, 66 Cal. 64, 225 P. 24, had to do, just as in the case of Sime v. Hunter, supra, with the expense of a private copy made for one of the parties, and not with anything that constituted the record on appeal, and like the other cases having to do with private copies, has no bearing upon the question of whether costs incurred in following the alternative method of appeal set forth in section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, may be allowed.

Other cases have been cited by the respective parties, but the foregoing is sufficient to show that the order of the trial court disallowing the item of costs referred to must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. CASSIDY et al. (Cr. 1488.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 13, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 3, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 12, 1927.

1. Lewdness $\Rightarrow$ 10—Evidence held to show defendants were living together in state of cohabitation and adultery (Pen. Code, § 269b).

Evidence held to show that defendants were living together in a state of cohabitation and adultery, within meaning of Pen. Code, § 269b, warranting conviction for adultery.

2. Lewdness $\Rightarrow$ 9—Evidence tending to establish commission of adulterous acts by defendant outside county in which defendants were charged with offense held proper.

In adultery prosecution, admission of evidence, consisting of circumstances tending to establish commission of adulterous acts by defendants outside county within which defendants were charged with offense on which they were tried, held not error.

3. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 1037(1), 1171(1)—Statement of district attorney relative to which no testimony was offered nor objection made held not prejudicial.

In adultery prosecution, statement of district attorney that female defendant went with a male friend on trip to certain place held not prejudicial, where no evidence relative thereto was offered and no objection to statement was made.

4. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 409—Statements by defendants held mere admissions and not confession, and hence properly admitted without laying foundation.

Statement by defendants, in adultery prosecution, that at time and place other than specified in indictment defendants had lived together and sustained sexual relations, was merely an admission and not a confession, and hence was properly admitted without foundation being first laid that it was voluntarily made, without hope of reward or immunity from punishment.

5. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 730(10), 1186(4)—Insinuation by district attorney as to defendants' failure to testify, though error, held not to have resulted in miscarriage of justice, in view of prompt instruction to disregard and overwhelming evidence of guilt (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Insinuation by district attorney that defendants had not testified, though error, held not to have resulted in miscarriage of justice under Const. art. 6, § 4½, in view of prompt instruction by judge to disregard it and overwhelming evidence of defendants' guilt.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Helen M. Cassidy and another were convicted of adultery, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Chandos E. Bush and Franklin M. Sturgis, both of Los Angeles, and E. W. Bartlett, of Colton, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment of conviction of the crime of adultery and from an order of the trial court denying their motion for a new trial.

[1] It is first urged by appellants that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. Without attempting to set forth more than the substance of the material evidence introduced by the prosecution, it appears therefrom that the defendants were not married one to the other, but that at the time the offense was committed each of them was married to some other person; that defendant Cassidy, with one of her infant children, left her husband in Colorado and came to California; that prior thereto she had left her husband temporarily and during her absence had "met" her codefendant; that while living with her husband she received letters and Christmas presents from her codefendant, also sufficient money from him to enable her to leave her husband in Colorado and pay her railroad fare to California; that for a period of about two months thereafter defendant Cassidy occupied apartments in a court, defendant McLean paying the rent therefor, and often being seen leaving the apartments at between 6 and 6:30 o'clock in the morning; that thereafter defendant McLean occupied a room in a hotel where defendant Cassidy later took up her residence and for a short time occupied a room therein on a floor different from that on which her codefendant had his room, following which defendant Cassidy took a room adjoining and opening into that of her codefendant and for which two rooms there was but "one bath and toilet"; that defendant McLean made the necessary arrangements for renting the said rooms, paid the rent therefor, bought the meal tickets on which Mrs. Cassidy received her meals at the hotel, and agreed to pay for dresses purchased by defendant Cassidy; that the general outward conduct of the two defendants one toward the other was such as ordinarily exists between a husband and a wife; that the door between the two rooms occupied by the two defendants, if not always open, was only closed; that each of the defendants passed freely from one room to the other, defendant McLean on one occasion having been seen clad in his pajamas only in the room occupied by defendant Cassidy; that defendant Cassidy kept some of her clothing in the room occupied by her codefendant; that sometimes she drove the automobile owned by defendant McLean, and that the two defendants were frequently seen riding together in defendant's automobile; that in the presence of third persons defendant McLean addressed his codefendant as "honey," referred to her as his wife, and that defendant Cassidy had been seen sitting in the lap of her codefendant; that the infant child of defendant Cassidy was lodged and cared for elsewhere than in the hotel where the two defendants roomed, and that defendant McLean arranged and paid for the room, board, and care of the child at such place; that defendant Cassidy stated that she had objected to going to live with her codefendant at the hotel "because it was too open"; that she and her codefendant had been married in Mexico, admitted that they sustained meretricious relations one toward the other, and that by reason thereof she had become afflicted with "female trouble"; that each of the defendants made a statement to the effect that they had made various trips together and had registered at different hotels as "man and wife."

Section 269b of the Penal Code provides, in part, as follows:

"If two persons, each being married to another, live together in a state of cohabitation and adultery, each is guilty of a felony. * * *

It is the contention of appellants that the facts hereinbefore stated do not sufficiently show that the defendants lived together in a state of cohabitation and adultery within the meaning of the statute.

In People v. Breeding, 19 Cal. App. 359, 362, 126 P. 179, 181, it is said:

"As used in the statute, the words 'living in a state of cohabitation and adultery' mean the living or dwelling together as husband and wife and exercising the sexual rights and duties implied by such relation when legally created—in other words, a counterfeit of the marriage relation. Hence, to justify the conviction of defendants it should appear from the evidence that there existed between them an adulterous cohabitation. * * *

In the case of People v. Scarpa, 32 Cal. App. 453, 163 P. 882, the rule is announced in effect that where two persons, each of whom is married to another, live together in a state of cohabitation and adultery, each of them is guilty of a felony, and that the commission of the crime may be established by a showing that they were occupying such a position one toward the other "as would constitute a counterfeit of the marriage relation." See, also, People v. King, 26 Cal. App. 94, 146 P. 51; People v. Bealey (Cal. App.) 254 P. 628.

Judged by the facts as hereinbefore stated and the law as laid down in the cases to which reference has been had, it is clear that the jury was justified in determining that the defendants were living together in a state of cohabitation and adultery, and therefore that the contention of appellants to the effect that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict cannot be sustained.

[2] Appellants further contend that on the hearing of the action prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in the admission of certain evidence over the objection of defendants. Such evidence consisted of circumstances which tended to establish the commission of adulterous acts by the defendants outside the county within which the defendants were charged with the offense on which they were tried.

In the case of People v. Koller, 142 Cal. 621, 76 P. 500, where it appears that the defendant was prosecuted on a charge of incest, in ruling on a point similar to that here under consideration the court said, in part:

"* * * It is now the settled rule in this state that evidence of prior acts of incestuous intercourse are admissible. People v. Stratton, 141 Cal. 604 [75 P. 166]. And while we recognize that there is a conflict in the authorities as to the admissibility of evidence of subsequent acts, we are of the opinion that the better rule, and the one sanctioned by the weight of authority, is, that acts of improper familiarity, or illicit intimacy, or relations between the parties, subsequent as well as prior to the act charged in the information relied on by the prosecution for a conviction, are admissible as corroborative evidence, where they tend to show a continuous, illicit relationship. * * *

To the same effect, see People v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 545, 140 P. 256; People v. Christian, 48 Cal. App. 646, 192 P. 182; People v. Branch (Cal. App.) 246 P. 811; People v. Jones, 76 Cal. App. 144, 244 P. 101.

It must therefore be concluded that in the admission of the evidence to which appellants refer no error was committed by the trial court.

[3] In the same connection, appellants complain that on the trial of the action evidence was admitted of the fact that on the trip made by defendant Cassidy from Colorado to California, "she met a friend, or took up with a man as a friend, and went with him on a trip to the Grand Canyon of Colorado." It appears that after the jury had been impaneled the district attorney, in outlining what he expected to prove, made a statement which included the remark which is now the subject of appellants' specification of error. But nowhere in the record does it appear that any evidence was offered of the fact to which reference was thus made; nor was any objection made at any time to the statement made by the district attorney. It would follow that appellants are in no position to complain.

[4] Appellants make further criticism of the admission in evidence by the trial court of what is termed a confession of guilt by the defendants, without a sufficient or proper foundation having been first laid for the introduction of evidence of such alleged confession. But as to such specification of error on the part of appellants the record discloses the fact that the alleged confession amounted to nothing more than an admission by the defendants in substance that at a time antedating that specified in the accusation of the defendants, and at a place outside the county where it was alleged that the offense of defendants was committed, the defendants had lived together in the same house and had sustained sexual relations one with the other.

In the case of People v. Ferdinand, 194 Cal. 555, 568, 229 P. 341, 346, it is said:

"An admission as applied to criminal law is something less than a confession, and is but an acknowledgment of some fact or circumstance which in itself is insufficient to authorize a conviction, and which tends only toward the proof of the ultimate fact of guilt. On the other hand, a confession by a defendant leaves nothing to be determined, in that it is a declaration of his intentional participation in a criminal act, and must be a statement of such a nature that no other inference than the guilt of the defendant may be drawn therefrom. People v. Strong, 30 Cal. 151; People v. Parton, 49 Cal. 632; People v. Velarde, 59 Cal. 457; People v. Miller, 122 Cal. 84, 54 P. 523. As stated in Michaels v. People, 208 Ill. 603, 70 N. E. 747, citing 8 Cyc. 562; 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 170; Johnson v. People, 197 Ill. 48, 64 N. E. 286: 'A confession is a voluntary acknowledgment of a person charged with the commission of a crime that he is guilty of the offense. It is a voluntary declaration by a person charged with a crime of his agency or participation in the crime. It is not equivalent to statements, declarations, or admissions of facts criminating in their nature or tending to prove guilt. It is limited in its meaning to the criminal act, and is an acknowledgment or admission of participation in it.' And see, also, Riley v. State, 1 Ga. App. 651, 57 S. E. 1031; Burnett v. State, 86 Neb. 11, 124 N. W. 927; Ransom v. State, 2 Ga. App. 826, 59 S. E. 101; Shelton v. State, 144 Ala. 106, 42 So. 30; State v. Campbell, 73 Kan. 688, 85 P. 734, 9 L. E. A. (N. S.) 533, 9 Ann. Cas. 1203; State v. Royce, 38 Wash. 111, 80 P. 268 [3 Ann. Cas. 351]."

It is therefore clear that the evidence relating to the statements made by the defendants did not amount to a confession, but that such statements were but admissions of circumstances which constituted some evidence which tended to establish their guilt of the crime of which they were charged. With reference to an admission, as distinguished from a confession, the rule is well settled that no foundation to the effect that such admission was freely and voluntarily made, without hope of reward or immunity from punishment, is required for the introduction in evidence of such admission.

[5] Appellants also predicate error upon the alleged misconduct of the district attorney in commenting upon the fact that neither of the defendants testified on the trial of the action. The remarks of the district attorney to which appellants now object were as follows:

"All the evidence that has been presented here, everything placed before you, everything that we could gather, as counsel on the other side told you, everything that we could present has been presented, and some of it doubtful in my estimation, and doubtless in yours, but everything we could get, and everything that the law entitles us to present here under oath, we have presented to you for what it is worth; and all that you have, good or bad, all that you have, comes from the prosecution, not one single iota or statement of it denied, not one witness against it. In whose power, I ask you, within whose mind and heart lies the power and the control of the situation to tell you whether it is true or not true? But they stand on their constitutional rights of the presentation of evidence, and the doctrine of reasonable doubt, and no evidence whatsoever has been presented on the other side. * * * He sits here, and he has never by any witness for the defense told you anything to the contrary, and how can you believe anything else."

No immediate objection was interposed by the defendants to the comments made by the district attorney, but within a short time after such statement was made, defendants did object "to the remark insinuating an opinion in regard to the defendants not taking the stand," and requested the court to instruct the jury that such remarks should be disregarded by it—to which request the court acceded by instructing the jury that "if there have been any remarks along that line, or anything from which you might infer there was any comment in that direction, you will kindly disregard it." No instruction other than that to which reference has been had was requested by the defendants; from which fact it must be assumed that, so far as the purported instruction was concerned, defendants were satisfied.

There can be no question but that a comment by the district attorney on the fact that a defendant has not testified in the action in which he is being tried constitutes error. An examination of the remarks made by the district attorney in the instant case shows that while no direct reference was made by him to the fact that neither of the defendants had been called as a witness for the defense, at least an insinuation of such fact was present. The substance of the statement was that all the evidence in the case had been produced by the prosecution; that it was within the power of the defendants either to affirm or to deny the truth of such evidence; but that they had stood on their constitutional rights and had failed to present any evidence in their own behalf. The statement closed with a query to the jury as to "how can you believe anything else" (that is, anything other than the evidence produced by the prosecution). It would thus appear that the reference to the fact that the defendants personally had not testified in the case was not stressed; to the contrary, the district attorney was directing particular attention to the fact that the evidence presented by the prosecution was uncontradicted from any source, and therefore that the probability was that such evidence was true. However, though slight the comment, the conduct of the district attorney in the premises is not to be commended, but rather condemned. It constituted error; although, considering the circumstances of its commission, together with the prompt instruction to the jury by the judge of the trial court, the effect of such comment was necessarily negligible. In view of what appears to be the overwhelming evidence of the guilt of the defendants, it is clear that the error did not result in a miscarriage of justice. Section 4½, art. VI, Const.; People v. Nakis, 184 Cal. 105, 116, 193 P. 92; People v. Kizer, 22 Cal. App. 10, 20, 133 P. 516, 521; 134 P. 346.

The judgment and the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial are affirmed.

STARK et al. v. HOEFT. (Civ. 3307.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 8, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 5, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨277—Order denying motion to strike out supplemental complaint and portions thereof held not deemed excepted to (Code Civ. Proc. § 647).

Where order denying defendant's motion to strike out supplemental complaint and also portions thereof was not excepted to at the time, it might not be reviewed by the appellate court, under Code Civ. Proc. § 647.

2. Appeal and error ⇨679(2)—Petition for leave to file supplemental complaint and order granting leave might not be considered, where not set forth in transcript.

Appellate court might not consider petition for leave to file supplemental complaint or order of trial court granting leave to do so, where they were not set forth in the transcript.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1073(1)—Assignments of errors of law committed in rulings during trial will be presumed not well taken, where not discussed in appellant's brief.

Assignments asserting that there were errors of law committed in rulings made during progress of trial will not be examined or considered on appeal, where they are not discussed in appellant's brief, but it will be presumed that no error was made.

4. Pleading ⇨22—Complaint to quiet title, setting forth deraignment of title and also alleging ownership, held not redundant.

Complaint to quiet title to mining property, which set forth location of mining claim, posting of notices, recording of notices that plaintiffs were citizens of United States, and also alleged that plaintiffs owned property, held not redundant because setting forth deraignment of title in addition to alleging ownership.

5. Quieting title ⇨35(2)—Allegations in complaint to quiet title, setting forth deraignment of title held not to limit or control allegation of ownership.

In action to quiet title to mining property, allegations showing deraignment of title by setting forth location of mining claim, posting of notices, and recording of notices that plaintiffs were citizens of United States, held not to limit or control further allegation that plaintiffs owned property.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1041(5)—Permitting filing of supplemental complaint, if error, held harmless, where matters set forth could have been properly set up by amendment to complaint (Code Civ. Proc. § 464; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Permitting filing of supplemental complaint setting up judgment rendered before action commenced, if error under Code Civ. Proc. § 464, held harmless, where matters set forth therein could have properly been pleaded by amendment to complaint; there being no miscarriage of justice within the meaning of Const. art. 6, § 4½.

7. Judgment ⇨948(1)—Plaintiffs seeking to quiet title to mining property did not waive rights under previous judgment quieting title in them, by failing to set up judgment by original complaint.

That plaintiffs in action to quiet title to mining property did not set up previous judgment quieting title in them by original complaint, but set it up only by their supplemental complaint, held not to show waiver of rights secured by this judgment, notwithstanding Rev. St. U. S. § 2326 (30 USCA § 30), since such judgment could be introduced in evidence even if not pleaded at all.

8. Pleading ⇨280—Allegations in answer to original complaint that defendant owned land were to be disregarded, where answer to supplemental complaint admitted plaintiffs' ownership.

Where answer to original complaint in action to quiet title alleged that defendant was owner of land, but answer to supplemental complaint admitted that plaintiffs were owners thereof, allegations of ownership in first answer could not be considered.

9. Pleading $\S$ 349—Where answer in action to quiet title admitted conclusiveness of previous judgment quieting title in plaintiffs, court was bound to grant judgment on the pleadings.

Where supplemental complaint in action to quiet title to mining property set forth previous judgment quieting title in plaintiffs as conclusive, and answer thereto admitted conclusiveness of judgment, plaintiffs were entitled to judgment on the pleadings.

10. Pleading $\S$ 238(2)—Denying leave to file amended answer held not error, where defendant failed to comply with statute requiring that notice be given adverse party (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 473).

Trial court did not abuse discretion in denying motion for leave to file amended answer to supplemental complaint where defendant failed to comply with Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 473, requiring notice of such motion to be given to adverse party.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Action to quiet title to mining property by J. H. Stark and others against Eleonore E. Hoeft, who alleged ownership. From a judgment on the pleadings in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John T. Hennessy and Lynne Kelly, both of Grass Valley, for appellant.

Dozier, Kimball & Dozier, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Appellant filed an application for a United States patent to certain mining ground situate in Washington mining district, Nevada county, state of California, located and known as Lucky Strike and Lucky Strike Extension mining claims. To this application the respondents filed a protest within the time as provided by law. In pursuance of said protest and in compliance with the law relating thereto, the plaintiffs began this action to quiet title to certain mining property claimed by the respondents and included within the exterior boundaries of the mining premises claimed by the appellant under her application for patent as the Lucky Strike and Lucky Strike Extension mining claims. The mining premises or claims alleged to be owned by the respondents bear the following names: Quartz and Asbestos, January Quartz, The Cotton King Asbestos Quartz, Asbestos Quartz, and Lent Asbestos and Gold mining claims. The right of possession to this mining ground appears to have been determined adversely to the appellant on January 2, 1920, by a judgment then entered in the superior court of Nevada county in an action where the respondents and their predecessors in interest were defendants, and where the appellant in this action was plaintiff. After the filing of the complaint in this action and the answer of the defendant thereto, the plaintiffs, by leave of the court, in a pleading called a supplemental complaint, set forth the fact of the entry of the judgment herein referred to, and that all proceedings relating to the settlement of a bill of exceptions to be used on appeal from said judgment, had been dismissed. To this supplemental complaint the appellant filed a motion to strike out the whole thereof, and also certain paragraphs thereof, and also demurred thereto. Appellant's motion was denied, and her demurrer overruled. Thereupon an answer was filed by the appellant to the supplemental complaint. After appellant's answer to respondents' supplemental complaint had been filed in this action, the respondents moved the court, upon notice for judgment on pleadings. The trial court granted judgment upon the pleadings in favor of the respondents herein. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The supplemental complaint sets forth the fact: That a complaint in this action was filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Nevada county, on the 19th day of January, 1924. That at the time of the filing of said complaint there was pending in the above-entitled court the action to which we have herein referred, where the defendant in this action was plaintiff and the plaintiffs in this action were defendants. That said action was numbered 4726. That on the 19th day of January, 1924, there was pending and undetermined a proceeding instituted by the plaintiff therein to obtain a bill of exceptions on her appeal from the judgment theretofore duly rendered and entered in said action No. 4726. That since the filing of the complaint in the above-entitled action, and on the 26th day of February, 1924, an order was duly made and entered in said action No. 4726 that the said proceedings of the said plaintiff to obtain a bill of exceptions on appeal from said judgment in said action No. 4726, be dismissed. That no appeal has been taken from said last-mentioned order dismissing said proceeding for bill of exceptions, and the said order has become, since the filing of the complaint herein, final, and is now a final order. The supplemental complaint then proceeds to allege the entry of judgment in action No. 4726, wherein it is adjudged and decreed that the defendant in this action possessed no title or interest in and to the mining premises described therein which are alleged to be the same premises set forth and described in the defendant's answer in this action, and also set forth the fact that the defendant in this action was not entitled to have her claim or title to said premises quieted as against the plaintiffs in this action, and that the rights of the plaintiffs in this action to said premises are and were superior to the claim of the defendant herein, and that by reason of said judgment the defendant in this action is estopped from claiming or asserting any right, title or interest in or to said mining property.

[1] As stated herein, the defendant interposed a motion to strike out said supplemental complaint, and also certain portions thereof. This motion was denied. The defendant also demurred to said complaint, which demurrer was overruled. Thereupon the appellant herein filed her answer to said supplemental complaint. Upon this appeal it is first argued that the court erred in denying the appellant's motion to strike out the supplemental complaint filed by the respondents, as herein stated. An examination of the record, however, shows that no exception was taken by the defendant to the order of the court denying the defendant's motion to strike, and for this reason, if for no other, the alleged error of the court is not before us for determination.

[2] Section 647 of the Code of Civil Procedure specifies what action on the part of the trial court is excepted to. It may be further stated that the petition for leave to file a supplemental complaint and the order of the court granting leave to file a supplemental complaint, are not set forth in the transcript, and therefore cannot be considered herein. By a reference to section 647 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which it is not necessary to set forth herein, it will be seen that, in order to avail herself of any error upon the part of the court in relation to the order refusing to strike out the supplemental complaint, an exception should have been taken thereto. This matter was before the court in the case of Davies v. Ramsdell, 40 Cal. App. 424, 181 P. 94. It was there held, quoting from the syllabus:

"An order refusing to strike out a pleading, or a portion thereof, is not an order deemed excepted to under section 647 of the Code of Civil Procedure, therefore, in order that the objection may be urged on appeal, an exception must be taken at the time the decision is made."

[3] Appellant, in relation to the demurrers interposed by her, sets forth the following: Neither the demurrer to the original complaint nor the demurrer to the so-called supplemental complaint, was waived by appellant's filing answers thereto, and the sufficiency of respondents' said pleading is now before this court for determination—citing Reynolds v. Lincoln, 71 Cal. 183, 9 P. 176, 12 P. 449, to the effect that a demurrer is not waived by filing an answer. Appellant then continues:

"This applies to the special grounds of demurrer as well as to the general demurrer to the supplemental complaint, which cannot, of course, be waived."

[4, 5] It has been frequently held that assignments of errors of law committed in rulings made during the progress of the trial, which are not discussed in appellant's brief, will not be examined or considered upon appeal, but it must be presumed that no error exists under such rulings. Bell v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 144 Cal. 560, 77 P. 1124; Pigeon v. Fuller, 156 Cal. 691, 105 P. 976; Born v. Castle, 175 Cal. 680, 167 P. 138; Frazier v. David, 187 Cal. 724, 204 P. 17. Notwithstanding that there has been no discussion of the alleged errors and no reasons pointed out showing merit in appellants' demurrer, we have examined this complaint in this action and also the supplemental complaint, or the paper called the supplemental complaint. It satisfactorily appears from the plaintiffs' complaint that the complaint in this action substantially follows and sets forth all the facts necessary to constitute a cause of action entitling the plaintiffs to maintain the same in an action to determine their title thereto and any adverse claims of the defendant. The complaint sets forth the location of the mining claim, posting notices, recording notices that the plaintiffs are citizens of the United States, and also alleges ownership of the property. None of these matters are subject to a motion to strike out for redundancy, nor does their presence in the complaint limit or control the allegation of ownership. The objection is made that the plaintiffs have in their pleading set forth their derangement of title, and that the derangement of title so set forth is contrary to the allegation of ownership. Some of the cases cited by appellant, such as Altoona Q. M. Co. v. Integral Q. M. Co., 114 Cal. 105, 45 P. 1047, do state that in an action to quiet title plaintiff is not bound to show the source of his title in the complaint, but, as respondents herein say, such a holding is far from deciding that such special facts should be stricken out from the complaint or that such facts limit or controvert an allegation of ownership. It would serve no useful purpose to set forth extensively the allegations of the complaint herein, and we will content ourselves with saying that the complaint complies with the text found in Lindley on Mines (3d Ed.) § 754, p. 833, and the cases there cited.

[6] It is next urged that under section 464, Code of Civil Procedure, a supplemental complaint is improper herein and must be disregarded; that the facts set forth in the supplemental complaint should have been pleaded in the original complaint. We are inclined to the opinion that the paper styled a supplemental complaint should have been filed as and named an amendment to the original complaint. It is not quite certain from the pleadings as to whether there was or was not any appeal pending in action No. 4726 referred to in the pleadings; the supplemental complaint simply shows that the proceedings to dismiss the application for a bill of exceptions culminated after the filing of the original complaint. But whether the court erred or did not err in permitting the plaintiff to file the pleading called a supplemental complaint, we think that there has been no miscarriage of justice by reason of the ruling of the court granting permission to the respondents to file the pleading called the supplemental complaint, rather than filing the pleading as and named an amendment to the complaint on file in the action. There is no question in our minds that the matters set forth in the pleading called the supplemental complaint would constitute a proper amendment to the complaint in this action. It therefore follows that under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution the error of the court, if any, has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice. The plaintiffs in this action had a final judgment against the defendant determining the rights of the parties to the premises involved, and therefore, no matter what name might be given to the pleading as filed, it did not result in a miscarriage of justice.

[7] It is next argued that, by reason of the failure of the respondents to include in their original complaint herein allegations in relation to the judgment obtained by them in action No. 4726, whatever rights they had thereunder were waived. To support this, our attention is called particularly to section 2326 of the United States Revised Statutes (30 USCA § 30) which, in relation to this subject, reads as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the adverse claimant, within thirty days after filing his claim, to commence proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction, to determine the question of the right of possession, and prosecute the same, with reasonable diligence, to final judgment; and a failure so to do shall be a waiver of his adverse claim."

There is no mention in this section which bears upon or has any relevancy to what constitutes, or the different facts or right or title to be set forth as an adverse claim. Had no reference been made to the judgment mentioned in the respondents' supplemental complaint in any of the pleadings, the former judgment obtained by the plaintiffs would nevertheless have been admissible in evidence. In Kipp v. Reed, 183 Cal. 49, 190 P. 363, which was an action to quiet title, it was held, quoting from the syllabus:

"A person who brings an action to quiet title to certain lands, the title to which has been adjudicated to be in him in a former action against the same defendant, is not estopped from offering in evidence the judgment roll in the former action as a muniment in his chain of title, because he did not plead or rely upon such judgment."

Other citations supporting this statement of the law seem unnecessary. Was it error on the part of the trial court to enter judgment for the plaintiffs upon the pleadings?

[8] As we have stated, paragraph III of the supplemental complaint set forth the judgment favorable to the plaintiffs in this action entered in the same court in which this action was pending, in an action numbered 4726; that in that action it was determined that the mining premises described therein did not belong to the defendant in this action, but that the plaintiffs in this action and their predecessors in interest had a superior right thereto; that the premises described in the defendant's answer in this action as being mining property belonging to her were the same premises involved in action No. 4726, wherein it was determined that appellant had no interest therein. We need not follow further the particular statements contained in paragraph III of the supplemental complaint, further than to state that it shows the entry of such judgment and the finality thereof. The only question to be determined is to ascertain whether the allegations of paragraph III and the other allegations of the plaintiffs' complaint have been denied. The denial of the defendant, as set forth in the transcript, is as follows:

"Denies that the property referred to in the said judgment in said action No. 4726 is the same property described in paragraph I of the answer of defendant, Eleonore E. Hoeft, now on file in the above-entitled action; and in this behalf this defendant alleges that a portion only of the property described in paragraph I of the answer of this defendant now on file in the above-entitled action is a portion only of the property described and referred to in said judgment in said action No. 4726; that the other property described in paragraph I of said answer of this defendant is not described or referred to in nor affected in any way in said judgment in said action No. 4726; and that the other property described in said action No. 4726 and not described in paragraph I of said answer of this defendant is not claimed by defendant."

The answer then contains the further allegation:

"Denies that the property referred to in the said judgment in said action No. 4726 is the same property described in paragraph I of the answer of defendant Eleonore E. Hoeft, now on file in the above-entitled action; and in this behalf this defendant alleges that a portion only of the property described in paragraph I of the answer of this defendant now on file in the above-entitled action, is a portion only of the property described and referred to in said judgment in said action No. 4726; that the other property described in paragraph I of said answer of this defendant is not described or referred to in, nor affected in any way by, said judgment in said action No. 4726, and not described in paragraph I of said answer of this defendant is not claimed by this defendant. Except as hereinbefore expressly admitted, denied, and alleged by this defendant, this defendant admits all the other allegations in paragraph III of said supplemental complaint."

[9, 10] A reading of the answer as we have set forth herein shows clearly that no denial is made of the respondents' title to the disputed premises, as determined by the judgment entered in action No. 4726. The affirmative matter contained in the answer to the original complaint alleging that the appellant is the owner thereof must be wholly disregarded, in view of the appellant's admissions of the right and title of the respondents set forth in the supplemental complaint founded upon the judgment just referred to. The force, effect, and conclusiveness of the judgment not being denied, wherein it was determined that the respondents in this action possessed the superior right to the premises involved, the trial court could not do otherwise than grant the motion for judgment on the pleadings. After this judgment had been entered, the appellant made a motion to set aside the judgment, and asked leave to file an amended answer to the plaintiffs' supplemental complaint. This was denied. The record does not show compliance with section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Under such circumstances we cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion. And especially is this true when the granting of appellant's motion to set aside the judgment theretofore entered herein and permitting the filing of an amended answer, would only serve to prolong litigation after a judgment had already been entered in a previous action determining the rights of the parties to the premises involved.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

Ex parte GREGORY. (Cr. 1427.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 11, 1927.

1. Constitutional law ⇨55—Legislature may regulate procedure in criminal cases.

Legislature has power to regulate procedure in criminal cases.

2. Criminal law ⇨206—Statute, permitting accused to waive right to preliminary examination before magistrate, does not violate constitutional provision relating to preliminary examination (Pen. Code, § 860; Const. art. 1, § 8).

Pen. Code, § 860, providing that accused, when represented by counsel, may waive right to preliminary examination before magistrate, and, when so waived, permitting magistrate to hold him to answer, held not to violate Const.

art. 1, § 8, relating to preliminary examination by magistrate.

3. Criminal law ⇨225—Constitutional provision relating to preliminary examination by magistrate is one for benefit of accused, and he may waive right to examination under statutory authorization (Const. art. 1, § 8; Pen. Code, § 860).

Guaranty extended by Const. art. 1, § 8, to right to preliminary examination before magistrate, is not imperative; it being one for benefit of an accused to insure him his security, and, though he has clear right to insist on compliance with provision, he may also waive right, under Pen. Code, § 860.

4. Criminal law ⇨225—By regularly waiving preliminary examination, accused is estopped to claim discharge because none was held (Pen. Code, § 860).

Where accused regularly waives preliminary examination before magistrate, under Pen. Code, § 860, he is estopped to claim a discharge because none was held.

Application of Ernest Spagnoli for writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco to secure release of Fred Gregory, in custody on commitment for trial for forgery. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Joseph A. Garry, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

Walter F. Lynch, of San Francisco, amicus curiae.

R. M. J. Armstrong, of Los Angeles, for Sheriff, City and County of San Francisco.

TYLER, P. J. Petition for habeas corpus. It appears therefrom that petitioner was charged with the crime of forgery. The complaint was filed in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco. The matter came on regularly for hearing; petitioner being represented by counsel. He waived a preliminary examination and the judge of said court, sitting as a committing magistrate, held him to answer. It is claimed that the commitment is void for the reason that a preliminary examination is made mandatory by constitutional provision, and the privilege cannot be waived by an accused. The constitutional provision invoked reads as follows:

"Offenses heretofore required to be prosecuted by indictment shall be prosecuted by information, after examination and commitment by a magistrate, or by indictment, with or without such examination and commitment, as may be prescribed by law." Cal. Const. art. 1, § 8.

As originally enacted the provisions of the Penal Code regulating proceedings in criminal cases contained no provision that such an examination could be waived. In construing these provisions it has been held that, as they contemplated an examination by the committing magistrate, a waiver thereof was not warranted. See Ex parte Walsh, 39 Cal. 705; Kalloch v. Superior Court, 56 Cal. 229; People v. McCurdy, 68 Cal. 579, 10 P. 207.

[1-4] In 1923, however, the Legislature amended these provisions so as to allow an accused, when represented by counsel, to waive his right to a preliminary examination before a magistrate, and, when so waived, to permit the magistrate to hold him to answer. Pen. Code, § 860. Petitioner claims that this section contravenes the provisions of the state Constitution above referred to, and is therefore unconstitutional. There is no merit in the contention. The Legislature has power to regulate procedure in criminal cases, and a provision for waiver of a preliminary examination by an accused is not an infringement of the constitutional right invoked. The guaranty extended by the organic law is not therefore imperative, it being one for the benefit of an accused to insure him his security, and, while he has a clear right to insist upon a compliance with the provision, he just as clearly has the right to waive it under statutory authorization. By regularly waiving such examination he is estopped to claim a discharge because none was held. 16 C. J. p. 318. We are cited to the case of People v. Bomar, 73 Cal. App. 372, 238 P. 758, as opposing this conclusion. In that case a preliminary examination was had, and the accused was held for trial for the crime of which he was charged. Thereafter the committing magistrate amended his commitment by holding the defendant for an entirely different offense, and it was held that the accused was entitled to a preliminary examination upon the charge for which he was held. There is nothing in the decision that in any manner indicates that an accused may not waive the requirement in question.

Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

PEOPLE v. OLDS. (Cr. 1522.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1. California. Oct. 15, 1927.

1. Criminal law — 1159(4)—Credibility of witnesses corroborating accomplice is for jury.

Credibility of testimony of witnesses corroborating accomplice lies exclusively within province of jury, and question whether such witnesses were truthful may not be decided by appellate court.

2. Criminal law — 1174(1)—Failure of record to show that court admonished jury at each recess held not ground for complaint, where jury was admonished and no injury to defendant was shown (Pen. Code, § 1122).

Defendant held not entitled to complain of failure of record to show that at each recess court admonished jury, in accordance with Pen. Code, § 1122, in view of record showing that jury was admonished, though silent as to form of such admonition, and fact that no injury was shown to have resulted from admonition given by court.

3. Criminal law — 1038(3)—Failure to instruct as to necessity of corroborating accomplice and to define accomplice held not reversible error, in absence of request therefor by defendant (Pen. Code, §§ 1093, 1111, 1127).

Defendant held not entitled to complain of court's failure to instruct jury pursuant to Pen. Code, §§ 1093, 1111, 1127, as to definition of accomplice and corroboratory evidence necessary to support conviction, where no request for such instructions was made by defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Ray Olds was convicted of a violation of the Penal Code, § 288a, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. S. Maloney, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of sex perversion as defined and denounced in section 288a of the Penal Code.

[1] The first point presented by appellant for a reversal of the judgment is that, because the principal witness for the prosecution was an accomplice of defendant, a conviction could not have been had on testimony of such accomplice, unless it was corroborated by such other evidence as tended to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. Section 1111, Pen. Code. But, assuming, without deciding, that in the circumstances of this case, as shown by the evidence, the principal witness was an accomplice of defendant, it clearly appears that the testimony given by such witness was fully corroborated by three eyewitnesses to the commission of the offense. If, as claimed by appellant, the testimony given by such corroborating witnesses is unbelievable, it is well established that the credibility to be attached to such evidence was a matter which lay exclusively within the province of the jury; and hence the question as to whether such witnesses were truthful in their several statements is one which may not be decided by this court.

[2] Appellant also contends that the record fails to show that at each of the several recesses or adjournments of the court the jury was admonished in accordance with the provisions of section 1122 of the Penal Code. With reference thereto, it is admitted that the record does show that the jury was "admonished"; but the specific complaint of appellant is that the record is silent as to the form of such admonition.

In the case of People v. Ye Foo, 4 Cal. App. 730, 738, 89 P. 450, 452, a question along similar lines was suggested by the appellant. The court said:

"The record fails to show that the court admonished the jury at each adjournment, as required by section 1122 of the Penal Code, not to converse among themselves, nor with any one else, on any subject connected with the trial, or to form or express any opinion thereon until the cause is finally submitted. In the absence of a showing to the contrary we will presume that the court did its duty, and gave the proper admonition at each adjournment."

In People v. McKeehan, 11 Cal. App. 443, 447, 105 P. 273, 274, the following language of the court appears:

"The failure of the court to admonish the jury under section 1122 of the Penal Code is not necessarily reversible error. While the section should have been, and always ought to be strictly complied with, yet, if no injury appears to have resulted from an omission to do so, prejudice will not be presumed. [Citing cases.] In the case at bar, the error complained of was the failure to give the language of the section in full at two adjournments. It does not appear that it was not given at other adjournments, or that there were no other adjournments at which it may be presumed it was given."

See, also, People v. Witt, 170 Cal. 104, 108, 148 P. 928; People v. Coyne, 116 Cal. 295, 297, 48 P. 218; People v. Thompson, 84 Cal. 598, 606, 24 P. 384.

In view of the rulings in the several cases to which reference has just been had, and the fact that no injury was shown to have resulted from the "admonition" admittedly given by the court in the instant case, it must be concluded that the point urged by appellant is not well taken.

[3] Finally, appellant specifies error in that no instruction was given by the court to the jury pertaining to the definition of one who is an accomplice, and especially the necessity of corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice. While, under the provisions of sections 1093 and 1127 of the Penal Code, "if requested by either party," it became and was the duty of the court to charge the jury on the points of law pertinent to the issues and which were necessary for the information of the jury, nevertheless in the instant case it should be noted that defendant made no request of the court that it instruct the jury in accordance with the law generally, or as particularly provided in section 1111 of the Penal Code, which relates to the definition of an accomplice and the corroboratory evidence necessary to support a conviction. In such circumstances appellant is in no position to complain. People v. Hettick, 126 Cal. 425, 429, 58 P. 918; People v. Baker, 64 Cal. App. 336, 343, 221 P. 654; People v. Vukojevich, 25 Cal. App. 459, 464, 143 P. 1058.

It is ordered that the judgment be, and it is, affirmed.

OUSDAL v. SANSUM. (Civ. 5935.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 15, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 12, 1927.

1. Libel and slander ☞86(2)—When writing is not libelous per se, plaintiff must plead by innuendo facts showing injurious meaning of writing.

When language of alleged libelous writing is susceptible of two meanings, one harmless and the other injurious, and particularly when words in question are not libelous per se, plaintiff must plead by innuendo facts on which he relies to point out injurious meaning of writing.

2. Libel and slander ☞86(2)—Letter, stating that name of plaintiff licensed physician and drugless practitioner does not appear in directory, held not libelous per se requiring innuendo by plaintiff.

In action by licensed physician and drugless practitioner for libel, based on letter stating that plaintiff's name does not appear in directory of licensed physicians and drugless practitioners, held, that letter not being libelous per se in view of State Medical Act (St. 1917, p. 114) § 11, it was incumbent on plaintiff to plead by innuendo facts showing injurious meaning of letter.

3. Libel and slander ☞123(2)—Whether matters alleged in innuendo are warranted by alleged libelous writing is question of law for court.

Where innuendo is necessary in complaint for libel, question whether matters therein alleged are fairly warranted by writing is one of law for court, and, if court should determine at close of plaintiff's case that innuendo is insufficient, cause should not go to jury.

4. Libel and slander ☞86(3)—Demurrer to complaint in libel action by licensed physician and drugless healer, based on letter stating that his name was not in directory, held properly sustained.

In action for libel by licensed physician and drugless practitioner, based on letter stating that plaintiff's name was not in directory of physicians and drugless healers, held, that court properly sustained demurrer to complaint in view of insufficiency of complaint in pleading innuendo.

5. Libel and slander —97—Sustaining demurrer to second amended complaint held proper, in view of ample opportunity to plaintiff to properly state cause of action.

Court held not to have abused its discretion in sustaining demurrer to second amended complaint in libel action, in view of ample notice to plaintiff of objections to his pleadings and ample time to request leave to amend.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action for damages for libel by Ashbjorn P. Ousdal against W. D. Sansum. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

S. J. Bingham, of Santa Barbara, and W. J. Ford and Pierce Works, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Heaney, Price & Postel, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued for damages for an alleged libel on the part of the defendant. An amended demurrer to plaintiff's second amended complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and thereafter judgment was entered in favor of the defendant for his costs. From this judgment plaintiff has appealed upon a typewritten judgment roll.

The second amended complaint (which will hereafter be referred to as the complaint) alleges that the plaintiff had for a number of years prior thereto been a duly and regularly licensed physician under regulations of the state board of medical examiners, and that he was also licensed by that board to practice as a drugless practitioner in this state; that both licenses were duly recorded in the office of the county clerk of Santa Barbara county; that he had for some years past been engaged in the practice of his profession as a physician and surgeon and also as a drugless practitioner in said county. It was then alleged that during the month of July, 1924, one Alice V. Bradley was employed as a teacher in the Teachers' College at Santa Barbara, and that within one year prior to said date the plaintiff at the request of said Alice V. Bradley had given a series of lectures to the students of said Teachers' College, and that it was planned that the plaintiff would be again requested to give another series of lectures to said students; that about the 15th day of July, 1924, defendant "addressed to said Alice V. Bradley" a letter containing the following statement:

"Relative to our conversation concerning A. P. Ousdal, I have again carefully gone through the directory of physicians and surgeons, naturopaths, drugless practitioners, chiroprodists, midwives, holding certificates issued under the medical practice acts of the state of California including licentiates in the government service published by the board of examiners of the state of California. Ousdal's name does not appear in the physicians and surgeons of Santa Barbara county or in the list of drugless healers. For your information there is only one licensed drugless practitioner in the county of Santa Barbara, Cal., that individual being Malcolm J. Pearring."

By way of inducement, complainant then alleges that the defendant intended to charge and mean, and intended to be understood and was understood by the reader thereof to charge and mean, that plaintiff by his practice as a drugless practitioner in the county of Santa Barbara was unlawfully, corruptly, and fraudulently engaged in practice without a valid license so to do and in violation of the laws of the state of California. A second and separate cause of action is pleaded which is identical with the first cause of action, except that the letter which it is charged the defendant addressed to Alice V. Bradley reads:

"Relative to our conversation concerning A. P. Ousdal, for your information there is only one licensed drugless practitioner in the county of Santa Barbara, Cal., that individual being Malcolm J. Pearring."

It will be noted that this letter consists of disconnected excerpts from the letter which is pleaded in the first cause of action.

[1, 2] On this appeal two points are advanced: (1) That the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the second amended complaint, and (2) that the trial court had abused its discretion in sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend. A reading of the complaint forces the conclusion that it has been drawn with extreme care to avoid pleading all the facts and circumstances which, if pleaded, would have shown without a doubt that no cause of action existed. It is alleged that the letter was addressed to Alice V. Bradley, but it is not alleged that it was either sent or delivered to her; it is alleged that the defendant intended the letter to charge that plaintiff was practicing without a license and that it was so understood by the reader of the letter, but it was not alleged who it was who read the letter or what, if anything, was done by the defendant in the nature of a publication of the letter quoted. When the language of the writing is susceptible of two meanings, one of them harmless and the other injurious, it is necessary for the plaintiff to plead by innuendo the facts upon which he relies to point out the injurious meaning of the writing. This is particularly true when the words in question are not libelous per se, and this rule is applicable here because the inhibitions of the State Medical Act (Stats. 1917, p. 114) covering the practicing of a system of treating the sick without having an unrevoked certificate do not cover the case of one practicing his profession without having his name inserted in the official directory.

[4] A fair construction of the letter is that the defendant had carefully examined the directory of physicians and surgeons published by the state board of medical examiners and that he failed to find plaintiff's name in that directory as a licensed physician or as a licensed drugless practitioner, but that he did find in said directory the name of Dr. Pearring as the only one listed as entitled to practice as a drugless practitioner in Santa Barbara county. The defendant did not draw conclusions from these facts that the plaintiff was practicing without a license, but merely conveyed the information which he had obtained from this official publication on to the party to whom his letter was addressed. This being the fair interpretation of the writing, the trial court was not bound by the plaintiff's allegations of what he believed the defendant intended to charge or mean as there is nothing in the writing from which an ordinary person could draw any other conclusion than that the defendant was merely conveying to the addressee of the letter the result of his examination of the official directory. Thus if the cause had gone to trial and the plaintiff had proved nothing more than the matters alleged in his complaint, it would have been incumbent upon the trial court to determine whether the letter, as explained by the averments, was libelous, and if it should have determined that it was not libelous as a matter of law, then the case should have been taken from the jury. Though under a liberal view of the complaint it might be said that it pleads facts sufficient to permit plaintiff to put in his evidence, under our course of procedure, where it is incumbent upon an appellant to show prejudice arising from the claimed error, we are unable to perceive how the plaintiff has suffered by the ruling on the demurrer rather than at a later stage of the proceedings.

[5] The argument is made that the trial court abused its discretion when it sustained the demurrer without leave to amend. It should be noted that the demurrer to the second amended complaint was both general and special. In the special demurrer particular attention was directed to the failure of the plaintiff to plead the essential facts of publication. This demurrer was filed on February 24, 1925, and was sustained on May 4th of the same year. The plaintiff had made three attempts to plead his cause of action and he is not in a position to say that his attention was not directed to the failure of his pleading in ample time to have permitted an amendment or at least a request for leave to amend long before the trial court sustained the demurrer and entered the judgment. The plaintiff has cited a number of cases to the point that when a demurrer is sustained because of defects in the pleading which could be readily cured by amendment the trial court should grant leave to amend, but the cases are not applicable here. As the order was made upon the second amended complaint after the plaintiff had been given ample notice of the objections which were to be raised to his pleading and had failed to request leave to amend from the trial court, we are satisfied that the court's discretion was properly exercised.

Judgment affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 13, 1927.

1. Brokers ⇨82(1)—Complaint for recovery of commissions against owners agreeing to exchange lands under contract providing that particular owner should not pay commissions did not state cause of action against that owner.

Complaint by broker for recovery of commissions on sale of real estate against both parties to exchange agreement, setting forth exchange agreement which recited that owner of one parcel has no commission to pay on his property, did not state cause of action against such owner.

2. Brokers ⇨82(1)—Complaint to recover commission on sale of realty and for damages must allege that plaintiff was licensed broker or salesman (Real Estate Brokers' Act, §§ 18-20).

Complaint by broker to recover commission on sale of real estate and damages, failing to allege that plaintiff was licensed real estate broker or salesman when cause of action arose, did not state cause of action, in view of Real Estate Brokers' Act (St. 1919, p. 1252) §§ 18-20.

3. Pleading ⇨225(1)—Demurrers held not sustained without leave to amend, where no order to that effect was made, in view of court rule.

Under rule of superior court of Santa Barbara county, providing that, when demurrer to pleading is sustained, adverse party has 10 days in which to amend pleading unless otherwise ordered, demurrers were not sustained without leave to amend, where no order to that effect was made.

4. Brokers $\S$ 82(1)—Allegations that plaintiff, suing for commissions for sale of realty, was employed by licensed brokers and was legally licensed, were sufficient against demurrer (Real Estate Brokers' Act, $\S$ 18-20).

Allegations in amended complaint that for more than one year plaintiff was constantly engaged as salesman, employed on commission by licensed real estate brokers, and was legally licensed to act as such salesman, were sufficient as against general demurrer to show compliance with Real Estate Brokers' Act (St. 1919, p. 1252) $\S$ 18-20.

5. Brokers $\S$ 81—Plaintiff, though agent for broker, could sue in own name for commissions under contract to pay commissions to him.

Where owners of property expressly contracted to pay commissions for sale of real estate to plaintiff, plaintiff could maintain action in own name, though acting only as agent for real estate brokers.

6. Brokers $\S$ 82(1)—Complaint, alleging exchange agreement, accepted by defendant agreeing to pay commissions to plaintiff, and fraudulent termination of agreement, alleged cause of action for commissions.

Complaint to recover commissions on sale of real property and for damages, setting forth contract between holders of land for exchange of properties and acceptance by defendant, who agreed to pay commissions to plaintiff, and alleging that defendant terminated exchange agreement with intent to defraud plaintiff out of commissions, set forth cause of action.

7. Appeal and error $\S$ 959(1)—Pleading $\S$ 225(2)—Trial court may allow filing of amended complaint or enter judgment, and will be sustained in absence of abuse of discretion.

Trial court, on sustaining demurrer, may in its discretion allow amended complaint to be filed or enter judgment forthwith for defendant, and action either way will be sustained on appeal, unless there has been an abuse of discretion.

8. Pleading $\S$ 225(1)—Right to file amended complaint held not affected by offer for filing in open court, and refusal was denial of permission to amend.

Under rule of superior court of Santa Barbara county, right to amend on sustaining of demurrer was not affected because pleading was offered for filing in open court, and refusal to allow filing was in effect denial of permission to amend.

9. Pleading $\S$ 229—Amendment to pleading allowed in furtherance of justice should be permitted where rights of others are not prejudiced.

Amendments to pleading are allowed in furtherance of justice, and, though proposed amendment is properly refused where it would prejudice rights of others, amendment should be allowed where no prejudice would result.

10. Brokers $\S$ 82(3)—Filing amended complaint in action for real estate commissions and damages held erroneously refused (Real Estate Brokers' Act, $\S$ 18-20).

In action to recover commission on sale of real estate and for damages, filing of amended complaint to allege plaintiff was licensed real estate broker or salesman, as required by Real Estate Brokers' Act (St. 1919, p. 1252) $\S$ 18-20, held erroneously refused.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by D. T. Blodgett against Louis A. Rowlet and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

D. T. Blodgett, in pro. per.

Heaney, Price & Postel, of Santa Barbara, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. An appeal from a judgment in an action to recover a commission upon the sale of real estate and for damages.

The defendants filed separate demurrers to the complaint, which were sustained, following which a motion for leave to amend the complaint was denied and judgment entered for the defendants.

Appellant contends that the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrers and in denying his motion for leave to file an amended complaint.

The original complaint alleged:

That defendant Rowlet was the owner of 4.14 acres of land situated in the Rancho Atascadero in San Luis Obispo county, and that defendants Jeal owned two lots on the corner of Salinas and Carpinteria streets in the city of Santa Barbara, both parcels being particularly described in the complaint. That Rowlet, on or about February 16, 1924, subscribed and delivered to appellant a writing, which was as follows:

"For the three bungalows on corner of Salinas and Carpinteria I will offer $14,000.00 in the following way: Assuming the $6,000.00 mortgage, put in as payment my 4.14 acres in Atascadero and $8,000.00 in cash on delivery of a clear title excepting the six thousand incumbrance stated above; providing I have no commission whatever to pay on the Atascadero property."

That defendants Jeal on February 24, 1924, accepted the above offer; their acceptance being evidenced by a writing signed by them, in which the offer was set forth in terms and the properties described. The acceptance recited that the offer from Rowlet had been "obtained by our agent D. T. Blodgett, salesman with Weinberg and Quick," and concluded with the following: "And we agree to pay our agent D. T. Blodgett a commission of $800." It was further alleged that defendants, with the intent to defraud appellant of the commission, by mutual agreement terminated the exchange agreement, and that each released the other from obligation thereunder. Upon the latter transaction, in addition to his demand for the commission, appellant sought to recover against all of the defendants the sum of $2,000 by way of exemplary damages.

[1, 2] The original complaint failed to allege that appellant was at any time a licensed real estate broker or salesman; and it was clear that no cause of action was stated therein against defendant Rowlet. In the absence of an allegation that appellant was a licensed real estate broker or salesman when the cause of action arose, the complaint was insufficient as to all of the defendants, and the demurrers thereto were properly sustained. Real Estate Brokers' Act, §§ 18-20 (Stats. 1919 p. 1252); Haas v. Greenwald, 196 Cal. 236, 237 P. 38; Firpo v. Murphy, 72 Cal. App. 249, 236 P. 968; Wise v. Radis, 74 Cal. App. 765, 242 P. 90.

[3] The demurrers, however, were not sustained without leave to amend, no order to that effect having been made; and it was provided by rule of the superior court of Santa Barbara county:

"* * * When a demurrer to a pleading is sustained, unless otherwise ordered the adverse party shall have ten days after notice in which to amend the pleading demurred to, but the court reserves the right to refuse leave to amend an answer."

So far as shown, no notice of the order sustaining the demurrers was given, but appellant, who appeared in propria persona, subsequently served and filed a notice of motion for leave to file an amended complaint; the proposed complaint as amended being attached thereto. The motion was presented to the court and leave to file denied, following which, on December 15, 1924, the judgment appealed from was entered.

[4, 5] No change in the material allegations of the original complaint with respect to defendant Rowlet appeared in the proposed amendment; and as to him no cause of action was stated. With respect to the other defendants, however, the amended pleading, in addition to the material allegations contained in the original complaint, alleged:

"That more than one year prior to the 1st day of March, 1924, plaintiff was constantly engaged as a salesman employed on commission by licensed real estate brokers and was legally licensed to act as such salesman."

These allegations were sufficient as against a general demurrer to show a compliance with the Real Estate Brokers' Act; and, defendants Jeal having expressly contracted to pay the commission to appellant, the latter, though an agent, could maintain the action in his own name. Tustin Fruit Co. v. Earl Fruit

Co., 6 Cal. Unrep. Cases, 37, 53 P. 693; Phillips v. Henshaw, 5 Cal. 509; Allen v. Chatfield, 34 Cal. App. 785, 168 P. 1149; Kelley-Clarke Co. v. Leslie, 61 Cal. App. 559, 215 P. 699; 2 Corp. Jur. Agency, 896, § 595; Pomeroy, Code Remedies, §§ 141, 177.

[6] The appellant was not represented by counsel, and as a consequence his proposed pleading contained much that was redundant and immaterial; and, while it was insufficient as against defendant Rowlet, as to defendants Jeal, the facts alleged were sufficient, if proven, to support a judgment for the amount of the commission. Jauman v. McCusick, 166 Cal. 517, 137 P. 254; Rucker v. Hubler, 56 Cal. App. 771, 206 P. 472; Goodrich v. Turney, 44 Cal. App. 516, 186 P. 806.

[7] The trial court, upon sustaining a demurrer, may in its discretion allow an amended complaint to be filed or enter judgment forthwith for the defendant, and its action either way will be sustained on appeal unless there has been an abuse of discretion. Billesbach v. Larkey, 161 Cal. 649, 120 P. 31. It has been held, however, that such discretion should be liberally exercised in favor of an application to amend (Galusha v. Fraser, 178 Cal. 653, 174 P. 311), and, unless it is clear that the defective complaint cannot be amended so as to obviate the objections made thereto, an amendment should be allowed (Payne v. Baehr, 153 Cal. 441, 95 P. 895).

It is urged by respondents that under the rule of court appellant might have filed the proposed pleading with the clerk without applying to the court for leave, and that the opportunity was still available after the denial of the motion.

[8-10] If it be conceded that the rule gave the appellant the right to file an amended complaint, such right was not affected by the fact that such pleading was offered for filing in open court; and the refusal to allow the same to be filed was in effect a denial of permission to amend. In Duff v. Duff, 101 Cal. 1, 35 P. 437, a refusal of leave to file an amended answer was sustained where the proposed filing presented no new issue or any defense not embraced in the original answer; but, as held in the following cases, the right to amend does not depend upon whether the amended pleading is wholly invulnerable to objection by demurrer or motion to its form or substance, and it is subject to such tests thereafter the same as the original pleading. Pacific Mill Co. v. Inman, 50 Or. 22, 90 P. 1099; Pratt v. Rhodes, 78 Conn. 310, 61 A. 1009. Amendments are allowed in furtherance of justice; and, while it is the rule that, when a proposed amendment would prejudice the rights of others, leave to amend is properly refused, here it is conceded that the right was given by the court rule; and although no cause of action was stated as to defendant Rowlet, as to the others the proposed pleading was sufficient, and its filing would have prejudiced no substantial right of the former, whose objections thereto could have been presented by demurrer.

In view of the facts, we are of the opinion that the denial of the motion was erroneous; that in furtherance of justice appellant should be permitted to amend as against defendants Jeal; but, it being apparent that the complaint with respect to defendant Rowlet was incapable of amendment, the judgment as to him should be affirmed.

The judgment as to defendants J. W. Jeal and Jessie Jeal is reversed, and as to defendant Louis A. Rowlet it is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

PEOPLE v. SINGH. (Cr. 997.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 14, 1927.

1. Assault and battery ☞88—Threats of defendant against prosecuting witness held properly admitted in prosecution for assault with deadly weapon.

In prosecution for assault with deadly weapon, testimony as to threat by defendant, about two years before assault, to kill prosecuting witness, held properly admitted; question of remoteness being for jury.

2. Criminal law ☞384—Testimony of threats by defendant against another will not be excluded because of remoteness alone.

Mere length of time elapsing between time of threats by defendant to injure another and time at which injuries were committed does not itself render testimony of such threats incompetent or inadmissible.

3. Assault and battery ☞88—Inability of witness, testifying to threats by defendant, to definitely fix month, held not to render testimony inadmissible; such fact only going to its weight.

In prosecution for assault with deadly weapon, fact that witness, testifying to threats by defendant against prosecuting witness, could not definitely fix particular month, did not render testimony of such threats inadmissible; such fact affecting only weight of testimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Wariama Singh was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals. Affirmed.

George E. Gardner, of Oroville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, Acting P. J. The defendant was charged by information filed in the superior court of Butte county with the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit the crime of murder. The jury before and by whom the cause was tried found the accused guilty of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon. He made a motion for a new trial, which motion was denied, and he brings the case to this court on appeal from the judgment and the order denying said motion.

The defendant for a reversal submits and insists upon the validity of but one point, to wit: That the court erred, to the prejudice of his rights, in overruling his objection to the testimony of the prosecution's witness Sixt that in or near the month of June, 1925, the defendant, speaking to said witness of the assaulted party, one Banta Singh, declared that he (defendant) did not like Banta Singh, and that he (defendant) "would kill said Banta if he (said Banta) took any more wood." The grounds of the objection to said testimony were that it was "irrelevant, immaterial, incompetent, and too remote."

The defendant interposed as in resistance to the crime charged against him the plea of self-defense. The people claimed that the assault was wholly unprovoked and without excuse. Testimony was introduced in support of the respective antithetical theories. Thus the importance to the people's case of testimony disclosing that the defendant had, prior to the time of the commission of the assault, nursed a feeling of bitter antipathy towards Banta Singh, the assaulted party, and had, prior to said time, threatened to kill or inflict bodily injury upon the person of Banta Singh, is plainly apparent, and will be the more conspicuously exposed by a brief reference herein to the evidence disclosing the immediate circumstances leading to and culminating in the assault as detailed by a number of persons that witnessed the near tragedy and testified on behalf of the people. First, it may be noted that, as is to be implied from the fact that the point above indicated involves the single and only ground upon which the conclusion reached below is attacked, no question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict is here raised.

A recital of the facts in a general way will be based upon the testimony given for the people by certain parties who witnessed the assault, there being no substantial divergence in the stories of the assault as told by them.

Both the defendant and the party upon whom the assault charged is alleged to have been made are Hindus. At the time the assault was committed, and for some time prior thereto, the assaulted party, Banta Singh, to whom, for brevity and convenience, we will hereinafter refer as "Banta," was and had been foreman on an orchard situated near East Biggs, in Butte county. The defendant was in the employ of one C. S. Hickson, an orchardist, whose orchard was situated east and about three-quarters of a mile from the ranch or orchard on which Banta was employed. The assault occurred early in the afternoon of February 15, 1927. Rain was falling on that day, and for that reason work on the ranch was suspended pending cessation of the rain. Banta and five other Hindus were gathered in the house and alternately engaged in talking, reading, and playing at cards. One Thada Singh had gone to Banta's house to procure some milk. None was to be had, and he thereupon started to leave the premises, and, as he stepped outside the house, he observed the defendant leading two cows along the road running in near proximity to and parallel with the ranch on which Banta was employed and residing. About the head of each cow was a halter, to which was attached a long chain for the purpose, presumably of tethering the animals. Thada, recognizing the cows as being the property of Banta, or the party by whom the latter was employed, exclaimed, in a voice loud enough to be heard by the parties then in Banta's house, that defendant (calling him by name) was leading away Banta's cows. The parties in the house immediately stepped into the yard, Banta leading and proceeding in the direction of where the defendant stood holding the chains attached to the animals until he had reached a point 12 or 15 feet from the defendant. Banta asked defendant what he was doing or intended to do with the cows. Defendant replied, saying that the cows had been on the premises of his employer eating his hay and feed and otherwise damaging the property. Banta answered by saying that if defendant's employer had been damaged by his cows he (Banta) would pay therefor. Thereupon the defendant drew a revolver from his pocket, and, as Banta turned his back and started to return to the house, the defendant fired at him; the bullet striking Banta in the back. Banta fell to the ground, and defendant fired a second shot at the former while he was lying prostrate upon the ground; the bullet striking and entering Banta's right arm. Some of the friends of Banta (those who had been in the house with him) then grabbed the assailant and tried to wrench, and finally, after much scuffling and one of the parties had struck defendant on the head with a milk pail, succeeded in wrenching the weapon from the latter's possession. While the scuffling was in progress, the defendant fired the pistol three times, shooting "at random," as two of the witnesses described it. In the meantime, others of the parties present engaged in assisting Banta, who was unable to walk, to the house. The defendant was held by the parties witnessing the assault until the arrival of the constable of the township, for whom a messenger had been dispatched. The constable, on his arrival, placed defendant under arrest and took him to the county jail. Banta was conveyed to the county hospital at Oroville. It is not necessary to describe in detail the nature of the wounds received by Banta, as the doctor attending him described them on the witness stand. It is sufficient to say generally that the doctor found that the lower extremities of the wounded man were paralyzed to an extent which made it impossible for him to move them, and, further, that the bowels and urinary organs were paralyzed so that they refused to function without the aid of artificial appliances. The doctor performed an operation on the spine. After the operation Banta was able to move his feet slightly. The doctor expressed the opinion, however, that the injured man would never again be able to walk. At the time of the trial in the latter part of June, 1927, over four months after he was wounded, Banta was brought to the courthouse on a cot or stretcher to testify, and was then unable to use his lower limbs. Banta Singh testified that at the time he was assaulted he had no weapon of any kind or character upon his person and that he made no demonstration of a hostile character toward the defendant. This testimony was corroborated by all the Hindus who were present at the time of the trouble, they having testified that they examined the coat and clothing of Banta immediately after he was carried into the house and found no weapon in any of the pockets thereof.

Other than some testimony of incriminatory admissions of defendant after the assault was committed and the testimony regarding threats asserted to have been made by defendant to commit violence upon Banta Singh previous to the time of the trouble, the above statement embraces a general recital of the facts brought out by the people.

The story of the defendant, corroborated in some particulars by several white witnesses who were not far distant from the scene of the trouble when it occurred, was that he found the cows referred to grazing in the barley field of his (defendant's) employer; that he caught the cows and, by means of the chain attached to one of them, he led the cows out of the field to the road spoken of above; that, when near Banta's house, he tied the cows to a tree, and that about this time Banta Singh, closely followed by Nata Singh (one of the Hindus in Banta's house at the time), approached the point where the defendant stood; that the other Hindus in the house soon made their appearance; that Banta ordered his friends to get hold of defendant, and thereupon several of the parties surrounded defendant, got hold of him, and while several began beating and kicking him about the body, another struck him over the head a number of times with a large milk can or pail; that he attempted to defend himself, but was unable to resist or overcome the combined attack of the Hindus, and, realizing this, he took his revolver from his pocket and fired several times, with the result as indicated. That the defendant was violently beaten and struck on and about his head and body was declared to be true by the doctor who attended and treated him immediately following his incarceration in jail.

[1, 2] It will be observed from the facts adduced before the jury by the people and the defense set up by the accused and the testimony presented by him in support thereof that, as above stated, testimony tending to show that the accused had for a long time entertained and cherished a feeling of ill will toward Banta Singh, and at times had threatened to do him bodily injury, was of singular importance, in that it would strongly tend to support the theory of the people that the assault was committed as described by the witnesses for the people and was entirely without any justification whatever. If, therefore, the objection by the defendant that the testimony tending to show such ill feeling and threats was for any reason incompetent is legally sound, it could not then well or justly be said that prejudice against the accused had not resulted from the ruling of the court allowing such testimony. But the testimony to which objection was made at the trial and is urged here was neither immaterial nor irrelevant nor incompetent. The only possible question is whether the time at which such alleged threats were made was too remote to the time at which the assault was committed to render it a proper matter to go before the jury. It is, though, very clear that the court was right in allowing the testimony. The objection addresses itself to the weight of the testimony rather than to its competency or relevancy. There was no testimony introduced by the defense tending to show that the ill feeling, if any there was, existing in the accused against Banta Singh, or between the two, had ever been composed or so settled as to render their relations uniformly friendly and amicable down to the time of the assault. The jury, believing the testimony as to such ill feeling and threats, as we may assume that they did, could justly infer that the hostility expressed by the defendant against Banta Singh some year or two prior to the date of the assault was still nourished in the breast of the defendant. At any rate, the testimony was, as stated, proper for the jury to consider and give to it whatever weight they might in their judgment believe it to be entitled to. We have not found any divergence in the cases upon the proposition that the length of time elapsing between the time that threats by the defendant to do bodily injury to a party and the time at which the injuries were committed by the former upon the latter itself rendered the testimony of such threats incompetent or inadmissible in the trial of the assaulting party upon the charge of committing such assault. In other words, the cases, so far as our investigation has gone, have uniformly held that testimony of threats because of remoteness will not be excluded. See Hardy v. Commonwealth, 110 Va. 910, 67 S. E. 526; State v. Quinn, 56 Wash. 295, 105 P. 818, 821; State v. Gates, 28 Wash. 689, 69 P. 385; 10 Cal. Jur. p. 1140, § 360.

It may be added that another witness testified of threats similar to those above spoken of made by the defendant against Banta Singh as late as December, 1926, which was two months only prior to the commission of the assault.

[3] The fact that the witness Sixt could not definitely fix the particular month in the year 1925 that he claimed to have heard defendant make threats against Banta Singh did not render testimony of such threats inadmissible. That fact went only to the weight of the testimony and involved the question, which could have been made an issue by cross-examination, to be determined by the jury, whether the witness' memory as to the particular threats made was sufficiently accurate to constitute the testimony dependable. The cases cited by counsel for the defendant regarding the admissibility of testimony of threats by an accused against the party upon whom the crime charged against the former was committed are not at variance with the conclusion herein arrived at upon the proposition in hand.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WILSON et al. (Cr. 1381.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 18, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 11, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 15, 1927.

- 1. Criminal law $\S$ 112(1)—Where property is obtained by burglary, robbery, etc., in one county and carried into another, jurisdiction of offense is in either county (Pen. Code, $\S$ 786).

Generally, in view of Pen. Code, $\S$ 777, one who commits a crime is answerable therefor in jurisdiction where crime is committed, but in view of section 786, where property is obtained by burglary, robbery, larceny, or embezzlement in one county and carried into another, in legal contemplation such crimes are committed in both, and jurisdiction may be punished in either.

- 2. Indictment and Information $\S$ 86(5)—Indictment for robbery, charging that offense was committed at place unknown, and that defendants thereafter carried property into county of prosecution, held sufficient (Pen. Code, $\S$ 786).

Indictment for robbery, charging that offense was committed in state and at place to grand jury unknown, and that thereafter defendants brought property into county of prosecution, held sufficient, under Pen. Code, $\S$ 786, and in view of section 27, subd. 1, and sections 959 and 960.

- 3. Criminal law $\S$ 706—References to presence of another at arrest of defendant held not prejudicial, in absence of request for instruction to disregard it.

District attorney's statement that a fugitive from justice was present at time of defendant's arrest and was killed and references thereto throughout the trial held not to have prejudiced defendant; there being no request for instruction that jury disregard it, and it being proper to show under what circumstances defendant's arrest was made.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Theodore Wilson and another were convicted of robbery in the second degree, and they appeal. Affirmed.

William J. Gloria and Alfred J. Hennessy, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel B. Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. Appellants, together with Charles Carlisle and Ernest Apac, were jointly indicted by the grand jury of the city and county of San Francisco of the crime of robbery. Carlisle and Apac were not apprehended and now are fugitives from justice. Defendants Wilson and De Bardeleben, appellants herein, were jointly tried in said city and county upon the charge and were convicted of robbery in the second degree. The indictment is in two counts. The first charges the four defendants with the commission of the crime of robbery committed on the 11th day of November, 1926, at an unknown place in the state of California. It alleges that defendants feloniously took from the person of one Harold Turney certain personal property by putting him in fear, and that thereafter they brought said property into the city and county of San Francisco. The second count is identical with the first, except that it accuses the same persons of committing the same crime against the person of Margaret Turney, wife of Harold Turney. Defendants were found guilty upon both counts. In brief, the evidence shows that defendants, both ex-convicts, had planned with Turney and his wife for an automobile trip. On November 11, 1926, at about 7 o'clock in the evening, they met by arrangement and proceeded along the Skyline boulevard to the vicinity of Colma in San Mateo county. At this time one of the defendants suggested that they procure some wine, and Mrs. Turney, who was driving the machine, was instructed to turn off the light, she being informed that the bootleggers objected to a lighted machine. They then proceeded along a dirt road in the neighborhood, and when they had traveled a short distance all of the defendants set upon and beat and robbed Turney. They procured from him certain sums of money and other personal property. Thereafter two rings were taken from Mrs. Turney. The evidence further shows that the robbery took place somewhere near the county line dividing San Francisco and San Mateo counties. Turney reported the robbery to the San Francisco police authorities. The officers obtained information that defendants resided at a certain rooming house on McAllister street, San Francisco, and they proceeded there to make an arrest. They demanded entrance into the premises. Defendant De Bardeleben was in bed, and he requested that the officers wait until he put on his clothes, whereupon they attempted to gain entrance to the premises through a window. Shooting immediately commenced, resulting in the wounding of two of the officers and the killing of one Joe Tanko, a fugitive from justice. Upon search being made of the premises, certain of the personal property taken from the Turneys was found. Upon conviction defendants moved, upon various grounds, for a new trial and in arrest of judgment. These motions were denied and separate appeals were taken from the final judgment of conviction, and from the order denying the motions for a new trial. Appellant Wilson in support of his appeal contends that the judgment and order respecting him should be reversed for several reasons. It is first claimed that the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco had no jurisdiction of the case for the reason that the indictment does not designate the county in which the crime charged was committed. It appears from the evidence taken before the grand jury, which is a part of the record, that the offense took place on a road bordering the two counties, but it is indefinite as to the exact location where the crime was actually committed, and it was for this reason, no doubt, that the indictment was made to recite that the place was unknown in order to avoid a variance. The indictment recites that the offense was committed in the state of California and at a place to the grand jury unknown, and that thereafter defendants did unlawfully and feloniously bring the property so taken into the city and county of San Francisco.

[1, 2] Generally speaking, it is a fundamental rule of criminal procedure that one who commits a crime is answerable therefor only in the jurisdiction where the crime is committed, and in all criminal prosecutions, in the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary, the venue must be laid in such jurisdiction. In conformity with this rule our Penal Code provides that, except as otherwise provided, the jurisdiction of every public offense is in the county where it is committed. Section 777. At common law, the crime of robbery was considered altogether local, and was cognizable and punishable exclusively in the jurisdiction where committed. In this state, however, it is provided by statute that when property, taken in one county by burglary, robbery, larceny, or embezzlement, has been brought into another county, the jurisdiction of the offense is in either county. Pen. Code, § 786. As in larceny at common law, this section makes the asportation of the fruits of a robbery the commission of the crime of robbery in the county where the goods are brought. Where, therefore, property is obtained in the commission of any of the crimes enumerated in the section in one county and carried into another, in legal contemplation such crimes are committed in both jurisdictions and may be punished in either, and where, as here, the indictment alleges that the stolen property was brought into the county of San Francisco, it in effect charges a robbery in San Francisco, and the exact location within the state where the original crime was committed is a matter of evidence. People v. Staples, 91 Cal. 23, 27 P. 523; People v. Sing, 42 Cal. App. 385-394, 183 P. 865; 7 Cal. Jur. 912. The only conclusion that can possibly follow from the charges contained in the indictment is that a crime was committed in a county within the state and the stolen goods brought into the county of San Francisco, for before property could be brought into the city and county of San Francisco it had to be, in the first instance, taken from a point outside such city and county, and this is all that is required under the statute. All persons who commit in whole or in part any crime within the state are punishable under its laws. Pen. Code, § 27, subd. 1. An indictment charging an offense is sufficient if it can be understood therefrom that the offense was committed within the jurisdiction of the court, except where the act, though done without the local jurisdiction of the county, is triable therein, and the acts and omissions are clearly and distinctly set forth in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended. Pen. Code, § 959. Strict technical rules formerly governing proof of such matters have been greatly relaxed by statutory enactment and by modern courts of criminal jurisdiction. No indictment or information is insufficient, nor can the trial, judgment, or other proceedings thereon be affected by reason of any defect of imperfection in matter of form which does not prejudice a substantial right of the defendants upon its merits. Pen. Code, § 960. Here the gist of the charge is that defendants committed the crime of robbery some place within the state, and that they brought the fruits thereof into the county of San Francisco. This being so, the venue is laid within the jurisdiction of the court. The indictment fully and correctly informs the defendants of the criminal act charged, and they could not possibly have been misled in making their defense.

[3] The omission of the name of the county where the actual robbery was committed in no manner affected the jurisdiction of the court, as under the statute the offense could be tried in either county, and it certainly did not affect their substantial rights. Equally without merit is the claim that the evidence is insufficient to convict either of the defendants. The evidence shows that the robberies were both committed at the time, and that all the parties charged participated in the act. What we have said with reference to the points urged on behalf of appellant Wilson disposes of the contentions of appellant De Bardeleben except his exception to the reference made by the district attorney in his opening statement of the jury that Joe Tanko was present at the time of De Bardeleben's arrest. Reference was made throughout the trial to the presence of Tanko in the premises where the arrest was made, and, while objected to, no error was assigned in consequence thereof. It was proper to show under what circumstances the arrest was made, and the fact that Tanko was killed was one of the circumstances. Moreover, no instruction was offered that the jury disregard any reference to this fact.

The judgment and orders as to both of the defendants are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by R. L. Cannon against E. E. Selms. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Shreve, Dorn, Shreve & Tyler, of San Diego, for appellant.

Edward T. Lannon, of San Diego, for respondent.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment rendered for defendant in a suit brought for the recovery of a real estate commission.

Plaintiff and defendant entered into a written agreement on February 6, 1923, which recited that the plaintiff had made a sale to Frank G. Miller of a property known as the Cannon ranch, for a consideration of $32,500, and for the first payment on which Miller deeded his $6,000 equity in a 5-acre lemon orchard at Lemon Grove, leaving a balance due on the Cannon ranch of $26,500, which Miller agreed to pay, with six per cent. interest payable semiannually, in payments of $2,000 each year for 10 years, when the unpaid portion of the entire amount was to be paid. The agreement contained the following language:

"It is agreed that R. L. Cannon is to receive an accrued balance of commission of one thousand and seventy-seven dollars and 50/100 ($1,077.50), which is to be paid to the said R. L. Cannon when the said Frank G. Miller makes his first payment of $2,000, together with accrued interest on the $26,500. It is also agreed that in case R. L. Cannon should sell the above-described lemon orchard at Lemon Grove for a consideration of $8,500, or other price acceptable to the sellers, subject to the $2,000 mortgage, and a sufficient payment is made on this orchard to satisfy the sellers, R. L. Cannon is then to receive the above-mentioned balance of one thousand seventy-seven and 50/100 dollars ($1,077.50), instead of waiting for the first payment of $2,000 and interest from Frank G. Miller."

Miller did not make the first payment of $2,000, or the interest due on the $26,500, on February 6, 1924, according to the terms of the foregoing contract. The defendant took a trust deed on the Cannon ranch from Miller as security for the payment of said sum of $26,500, and, upon the failure of Miller to make the said payment of $2,000 and interest on February 6, 1924, the defendant foreclosed the trust deed and recovered title to the Cannon ranch.

[1-5] It is the appellant's contention that the payment of the $1,077.50 was not contingent, but was due on February 6, 1924; that by the foreclosure of said trust deed and sale of said property the said Miller was precluded from making payment of said $2,000, and in equity said $1,077.50 became due and payable immediately upon the sale under said trust deed, if not already due; and that the court erred in rejecting the evidence of when the parties understood the $1,077.50 was to be paid. We cannot agree with these contentions. The contract was definite and certain as to when the $1,077.50 was to be paid, namely, "when the said Frank G. Miller makes his first payment of $2,000, together with accrued interest, on the $26,500," unless the Lemon Grove orchard should be sold according to the terms provided. Under the contract of the parties the commission was not earned until the foregoing contingency occurred. Foreclosure cannot be held the equivalent of payment of the first $2,000 installment, with accrued interest, which was the particular contingency upon which the parties contracted the commission should be earned. After foreclosure the respondent found himself in possession of the property originally owned and sold by him—the Cannon ranch—after being out of possession for more than one year, without payment of any accrued interest, and after being put to the expense of obtaining possession. True the respondent also held the equity in the Lemon Grove orchard, the estimated value of which was $6,000. But this was not the contingency upon which the respondent agreed to pay the commission. Parties are bound by their written contract. If appellant desired the payment of commission on February 6, 1924, without any contingency, he should have demanded such provision in the contract. Courts have no power to make contracts between the parties, or to say what the parties intended by the contract, where its provisions are definite and certain. It is quite conceivable that, had the appellant demanded an absolute agreement to pay the commission, respondent would not have made the contract at all. In the following cases it was held that conditions precedent were valid where it was provided that the commission should be paid out of the purchase price only; therefore that the commission was not earned until the purchase price was paid: Hargrave v. Moody 56 Cal. App. 498, 205 P. 890; Irwin v. Klimper, 56 Cal. App. 434, 205 P. 714; Dunne v. Colomb, 192 Cal. 740, 221 P. 912. In the latter case it is said (page 745 [221 P. 913]):

“Where the vendee is in default there is no longer any legal obligation on the vendor to proceed with the performance of the contract. The law gives him the right to regard the contract as at an end. The law prescribes no penalty for the exercise of this right. The default of the vendee, with the consequent destruction of the right of the broker to his commission, was a contingency inherent in the contract, the risk of the occurrence of which was assumed by the broker.”

Judgment affirmed.

OLIVER v. SANTA MARIA GAS CO.*
(Civ. 5936.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 27, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 27, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 23, 1927.

1. Sales ⇨199—Contract for sale of pipe line held to show intention that title was not to pass until pipe was removed from ground.

Contract for sale of pipe line in ground, providing that pipe should be taken and paid for before certain date, with exception of a reasonable additional time for removal of specified pipe, held to show that parties intended that title should not pass until such time as pipe was removed from land.

2. Sales ⇨199—As between buyer and seller, question as to passing of title depends on intention of parties.

As between buyer and seller, question whether or not and when title passes to property sold is dependent on intention of parties.

3. Contracts ⇨147(2)—Intention of parties is to be determined primarily by reference to provisions of contract.

Where contract is evidenced by instrument in writing, intention of parties is to be determined primarily by reference to provisions thereof.

4. Sales ⇨199—Use of words of present sale is not controlling unless contract show such intent.

That parties in contract for sale of pipe line are designated as seller and buyer, and that words of present sale are used, is not absolutely controlling, unless contract show such intent.

5. Sales ⇨391(9)—Amount deposited by buyers of pipe line, to be applied on account of last pipe removed, held not recoverable by buyers on their default.

Under contract of sale for pipe line, title not passing until pipe was removed from ground, sum paid by buyer, which was to apply on account of last pipe removed, was not recoverable by latter on their default, even though there is no forfeiture clause in contract, and hence sellers are not accountable for such amount.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by A. J. Oliver, trustee in bankruptcy for the partnership consisting of H. L. Emerson and another, against the Santa Maria Gas Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, and Griffith & Thornburgh, of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

Keyes & Erskine, of San Francisco, and Heaney, Price & Postel, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

WARNE, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in a suit for the conversion of 51,426.3 feet of 8-inch pipe and 500 thread protectors, brought by A. J. Oliver, as trustee in bankruptcy for the partnership consisting of H. L. Emerson and R. K. Howk. The trial of the action took place before the court sitting without a jury, and resulted in findings of fact that the defendant had converted 46,333 feet of this pipe and the 500 thread protectors, that the value of the pipe was found to be $33,598.96, and that the value of the thread protectors $60. Judgment was entered accordingly.

For some time prior to February 11, 1920, the Midland Counties Public Service Corporation had been the owner of a certain pipe line extending from the oil fields in Santa Barbara county to the plant of the Union Oil Company at Avila in San Luis Obispo county. This pipe line was known as the Graciosa pipe line. It in turn connected with a 4-inch pipe line leading to the plant of the Midland Counties Public Service Corporation in the city of San Luis Obispo.

The Graciosa pipe line had been laid in 1906 over rights of way granted to one Adolph Phillips, and was originally used to transport oil from the Graciosa oil lease in Santa Barbara county to an oil refinery located at Oilport in San Luis Obispo county. By mesne conveyance the Midland Counties Public Service Corporation had become the successor in interest to Adolph Phillips and had used the line for the conveying of gas from the oil fields to its properties in the city of San Luis Obispo and in serving consumers in proximity to the line.

Prior to February 11, 1920, the Midland Counties Public Service Corporation had contracted to sell certain of its properties, including the Graciosa pipe line, to the Santa Maria Gas & Power Company. On February 11, 1920, and at a time before the Railroad Commission had approved the transfer of these properties, the Santa Maria Gas & Power Company, the predecessor in interest of the appellant, entered into a contract with H. L. Emerson, who was acting for the partnership of H. L. Emerson and R. K. Howk. The portion of the contract under consideration provides as follows:

"(1) The seller agrees, upon the acquisition of said pipe line by itself or its said successor and subject to the approval of the Railroad Commission of the state of California of the abandonment of said line, to sell the same to the buyer, and the buyer agrees to purchase the same from the seller or its said successor for the sum of one hundred eight thousand (108,000) dollars, payment of said sum to be made as follows, to wit: Within fifteen (15) days after the approval of the Railroad Commission of the state of California of the abandonment of said line, the buyer shall pay to the seller the sum of twenty-five hundred (2,500) dollars and within thirty (30) days thereafter, and in any event before commencing the work of removing said line, the additional sum of five thousand (5,000) dollars; said deposit of seventy-five hundred (7,500) dollars shall apply on the last shipment of pipe as removed. The balance of the purchase price shall be paid by the buyer to the seller at the rate of ninety (90) cents per foot as pipe is loaded on cars at the depot at such railroad shipping point as may be selected for shipment and shall be paid before shipment is made.

"(2) The seller also agrees to sell, subject to its acquisition under said contract of December 15, 1919, and to the approval of the Railroad Commission of the state of California of said contract and of the abandonment of the same, 44,000 to 46,000 feet of four-inch pipe line extending from the eight-inch pipe line above described at a point near the old Graciosa Oil Company's refinery, sometimes known as Oilport, to the city limits of San Luis Obispo, which said four-inch pipe line the buyer agrees to buy, the purchase price thereof to be the sum of thirty-five (35) cents per foot, payable as and when the same is loaded on cars at the railroad depot from which the same is to be shipped and before the same shall have been shipped; provided that there shall be excluded herefrom such portion of said four-inch line as seller may decide to use in the conduct of its gas business.

"(3) All of said pipe shall be taken and paid for in any event on or before July 1, 1920, except that seller agrees to allow buyer such reasonable additional time to take and remove not exceeding ten thousand (10,000) feet of said eight-inch line, about forty-six hundred (4,600) feet of which is in the bed of the Santa Maria river.

"(4) The seller agrees to seek the approval of the Railroad Commission of the state of California with all reasonable speed and to use its best efforts to obtain the same.

"(5) The seller agrees to obtain for the buyer the right to go on the lands through which said pipe lines pass for the purpose of removing the same and to assume responsibility for damage to crops and land reasonably occasioned by the seller in removing said pipe lines, but in this connection the buyer agrees to use every endeavor to cause as little damage as possible to crops and fences on the lands through which said pipe line runs and to put said lands as nearly as possible in the same state as they were prior to starting removal after said pipe has been removed.

"(6) Recognizing that it is contemplated by buyer that he may sell said pipe lines in place, the purchase price thereof from buyer to seller is hereby made payable, in case said pipe lines be sold by buyer to some third party in place as soon as buyer had arranged such sale to such third party or third parties, and in any event such payment shall be made not later than July 1, 1920.

"(7) It is expressly understood between the parties that the approval of the Railroad Commission of the state of California must be obtained not only to the carrying out by seller of said contract of December 15, 1919, and the issuance of securities to enable the same to be carried out, but also to the abandonment of the pipe lines covered hereby, and it is expressly agreed that seller shall not be responsible for inability to sell and deliver the same should said Railroad Commission fail to approve any act necessary by seller to carry out the terms of this agreement.

"(8) Time is hereby made of the essence of this agreement."

Thereafter the Santa Maria Gas Company was organized and became the successor of the Santa Maria Gas & Power Company. The Railroad Commission approved the transfer of the properties of the Midland Counties Public Service Corporation, and the appellant herein took title to the properties, including the Graciosa pipe line on June 26, 1926.

Emerson paid the initial payment of $2,500 on July 3, 1920, and on the same day appellant gave Emerson a letter extending his time under the contract, and provided:

"The time within which you may remove the 8-inch line, in accordance with the terms of the contract, is extended as follows: One-half of said line shall be removed, taken, and paid for not later than September 15, 1920; three-fourths of said line shall be removed, taken, and paid for not later than October 1, 1920; and the balance of the line shall be removed, taken, and paid for not later than November 1, 1920."

On July 17, 1920, Emerson paid the $5,000 required to be paid before commencing the work of removing the pipe line. On July 20, 1920, Emerson was given a second extension of time by letter. Under this extension Emerson's time to remove the 8-inch pipe line was extended to December 1, 1920, and Emerson was required to pay interest at the rate of 6 per cent. on the purchase price of the line as follows: If one-half of the purchase price is not paid by September 15, 1920, interest on any balance thereof from date; if three-fourths of the purchase price is not paid by October 1, 1920, interest on any balance thereof from that date; and if the entire purchase price is not paid by November 1, 1920, interest on any balance thereof from that date.

On October 11, 1920, Emerson and the appellant entered into an agreement which provided, in substance, that title to the Graciosa pipe line shall pass to Emerson when he pays 90 cents a foot therefor, that the sum of $7,600, paid under the agreement of February 11, 1920, shall apply on the payment of the last pipe removed, and that in any event title to all the pipe shall pass to Emerson when he pays in full the sum of $108,000, the entire purchase price.

Thereafter, on October 13, 1920, a further extension of time was obtained by Emerson in which to pay for the pipe.

Emerson removed and paid for several thousand feet of pipe, but on February 21, 1921, all of the pipe involved in this suit was still in the ground and on said date appellant served upon Emerson and Howk, who were then in default, a notice that, if the entire purchase price was not made by March 1, 1921, they would no longer consider themselves bound in any way by said agreement and modifications thereof. After service of this notice, no further payments were made by respondent.

Shortly after March 1, 1921, appellant on its own account commenced and thereafter continued the removal and sale of the remaining pipe in ground.

Emerson and Howk were adjudicated bankrupts on May 11, 1921.

The $7,500 which Emerson and Howk paid to be applied on the last pipe removed was not refunded. The trial court found that no consideration passed whatever for the execution of the agreement of October 11, 1920, and that therefore title to the pipe in question was not retained or reverted thereto by said agreement in appellant.

The principal question to be determined, and the crucial one in this case, is the nature of the contract of February 11, 1920, as to whether it was a conditional sale after the approval by the Railroad Commission. Appellant contends that, although not expressed, the contract plainly shows upon its face that the parties intended that title should remain in the Santa Maria Power & Gas Company, or its successors, the appellants herein, until the pipe had been removed from the ground or the purchase price had been paid.

[1] It is to be noted that paragraph 3 of the contract provides that—

"All of the pipe shall be taken and paid for in any event before July 1, 1920, except that seller agrees to allow buyer such reasonable additional time to take and remove not exceeding ten thousand feet of said eight inch pipe line, about forty-six hundred (4,600) of which is in the bed of the Santa Maria river."

We think this paragraph contains not only a limitation as to the time allowed Emerson to pay for the pipe, but also an express time limit to "take" and "remove" the pipe. It is also to be noted that by paragraph 8 of the agreement time is expressly made of the essence of the contract.

To us it seems clear that under this agreement it was the intention of the parties, and so contemplated by them, that title should not pass until such time as the pipe was removed from the land. If not, what was the purpose of inserting these provisions in the contract? They were inserted for some purpose. The most reasonable conclusion to us is that they were inserted to limit the passing of title to so much only of the pipe as was taken and removed within the time mentioned. Further, under the time extensions executed prior to the agreement of October 11, 1920, a time limit is also mentioned within which the pipe might be removed.

The extensions given Emerson after October 11, 1920, contain no such provision, but this may be readily accounted for because by that agreement the parties expressly stated that title should not pass until the purchase price of the pipe had been paid.

We must conclude that the parties did not intend to pass title, since, had they so intended, the provisions found in the contract and in the time extensions would have been meaningless.

Nor do we find anything in paragraph 6 of the contract which is opposed to our conclusion. The object of that paragraph was to specify the time when the purchase price should be paid in the event the pipe lines were sold in place.

The appellant contends that, even if it might be construed that title to the whole pipe line passed to Emerson under the contract, notwithstanding title was reverted by the agreement of October 11th. As heretofore stated, the trial court found the latter agreement to be without consideration, and we are not disposed to disturb its finding. However the fact may be, we do not think it necessary to a determination of this case because of our conclusion that title did not pass under the original contract.

[4] True, the parties are designated as "seller" and "buyer," but this phraseology is not in itself conclusive upon the subject, and, as was said in Turner, Kuhn & Fraser, Inc., v. Jones, 61 Cal. App. 732, 215 P. 1033:

"There is no question, but that such language has a certain persuasive force in determining the intention of the parties, as it imports a present sale. [Citing cases.] But the mere use of the words of present sale is not absolutely controlling unless the contract shows such intent. Potts Drug Co. v. Benedict, 156 Cal. 322, 329 (104 P. 432, 25 L. R. A. [N. S.] 609)."

And the same may be said of the fact that $7,500 was paid to apply upon the last pipe removed. Glanelli v. Globe G. & M. Co., 48 Cal. App. 103, 191 P. 720.

[5] Nor is appellant guilty of a conversion of so much of the pipe as was to be paid for with the $7,500 which Emerson deposited. This sum was only to apply on account of the last pipe removed. As Emerson and Hawk were in default under the contract, they would not be entitled to recover this sum even though there is no forfeiture clause in the contract. Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 P. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17. This being so, we fail to see how appellant can be held accountable for said $7,500.

The thread protectors involved in this suit at no time became the property of the appellant, and, as the court below found there was a conversion of same, that part of the judgment should stand.

We do not deem it necessary to discuss the many other points argued on this appeal.

A mistake evidently occurred in entering the judgment upon the findings of fact and conclusions of law, in that the total principal sum of the judgment is equal only to the amount found due on account of the conversion of the pipe. This may give rise to some doubt as to whether any judgment was given for the pipe thread protectors. It is therefore ordered that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and that the trial court enter judgment for the plaintiff for the amount allowed in the findings of fact and conclusions of law for pipe thread protectors and interest. Appellant will recover its costs on appeal.

DULLANTY v. SMITH. (Civ. 5818.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Sept. 23, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Nov. 21, 1927.

1. Municipal corporations ☞706(7)—Contributory negligence of pedestrian struck by automobile held for jury.

In pedestrian's action for injuries when struck by automobile, where only evidence of contributory negligence was of nature of indirect evidence, consisting of inferences and presumptions, solution of such matters was for jury.

2. Depositions ☞95—Plaintiff held entitled to offer defendant's deposition only as whole.

In personal injury action, plaintiff's attorney held entitled to offer defendant's deposition, taken by stipulation, as a whole, but not merely a part of it.

3. Depositions ☞109—Defendant, if he had any objection to any part of deposition offered by plaintiff, should mark objectionable parts and submit objection for ruling.

Where, in personal injury action, plaintiff offered defendant's deposition in evidence, defendant, if he had any objection to any part of it relating to insurance carried by him, should mark such part and submit objections for ruling.

4. Trial ☞127—Plaintiff in personal injury action may examine defendant regarding conversation relative to accident, notwithstanding reference to fact that defendant carried insurance (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 2).

In action for personal injuries sustained in automobile accident, plaintiff was entitled to examine defendant regarding conversation relative to accident, though it contains some reference to fact that defendant carried insurance; correct ruling being that, if conversation was admissible for any purpose, it should be received, notwithstanding it contained some material which under other circumstances would be objectionable, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 2.

5. Damages ☞158(4)—Evidence that plaintiff's teeth were knocked out, shoulders, neck, head, and throat were black, and that she suffered lapses of memory, held admissible under allegations of concussion of brain, contusions of chest, cheek, arms, and legs, pain, and nervous shock.

In personal injury action, evidence that plaintiff had two teeth knocked out, that her shoulders, neck, head, and throat were black, and that she suffered lapses of memory, held admissible under allegation that she suffered severe concussion of the brain, severe contusions of chest, left cheek, arms, and legs, great physical pain and anguish, and severe shock to nervous system.

6. Municipal corporations ☞706(8)—Instruction that pedestrian may assume motor vehicle drivers will obey traffic laws held not erroneous.

In action for injuries received when plaintiff was struck by automobile, instruction that person lawfully and carefully using street may assume that all others using it will also use ordinary care, and that pedestrians may assume that motor vehicle drivers will obey traffic laws, held not erroneous.

7. Negligence ☞141(3)—Instruction that by pleading contributory negligence defendant confesses own negligence, though not erroneous, should not be given.

Instruction that defendant, in pleading contributory negligence, confesses his own negligence and pleads by way of avoidance thereof, though not error, in view of divided opinion of Supreme Court approving it, should not be given, since decisions by divided court do not have binding weight of other decisions.

8. Courts ☞90(2)—Supreme Court decisions rendered by divided court, though binding, do not have weight of other decisions.

Though courts are bound by Supreme Court decisions rendered by divided court, such decisions do not have binding weight of other decisions.

9. Municipal corporations ☞705(4)—Automobile driver's failure to sound horn is not violation of statute, but circumstance to be considered by jury in determining negligence (Motor Vehicle Act, §§ 95, 125[b], 139).

In pedestrian's action for injuries against automobile driver, failure to sound horn is not failure to comply with Motor Vehicle Act, § 95 (St. 1923, p. 545), in view of sections 125-b and 139, but such fact is circumstance for consideration of jury in determining whether defendant was negligent.

10. Appeal and error ☞1064(1)—In personal injury action, expression, "while plaintiff was in the exercise of ordinary care," in instruction, held not reversible error, in view of time covered by complaint.

In pedestrian's action for injuries against automobile driver, expression, "while plaintiff was in the exercise of ordinary care," used in instructions, held not prejudicial error, as unduly limiting consideration of plaintiff's conduct, in view of period of time covered by complaint.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been suffered in an automobile accident. The defendant answered and a trial was had in the trial court before the court and a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, and his motion was denied. He has appealed from the judgment, under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

In drawing her complaint, the plaintiff followed the form used by the plaintiff in Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 113 P. 663. In his answer the defendant denied many of the plaintiff's allegations, and also pleaded affirmatively the contributory negligence of the plaintiff.

The accident occurred in Alameda on the 25th day of March, 1924. On that day it had been raining, and there were some puddles of water on the street. The plaintiff was proceeding along the south side of Grand avenue in an easterly direction. About the time that she approached the intersection of Grand avenue and Webster street, automobiles were parked parallel to the sidewalk on both angles of the four corners of the crossing. Each street is 66 feet wide. Automobiles are 5 feet wide. The traveling space was therefore about 56 feet wide. The evidence discloses that, about the time the plaintiff reached Webster street, the defendant was traveling south on Webster street, approaching the plaintiff from her left. At the same time Mr. Rinderneck was traveling north on Webster street, and approaching the plaintiff from her right. All of the evidence as to how the accident occurred was given by Mr. Rinderneck, Mr. Ashley Smith, the defendant, and Mr. Earl Smith, the defendant's brother, who was riding in the automobile with the defendant.

As defendant approached Grand avenue, an automobile crossed Webster street in front of him, traveling west on Grand avenue, and another 100 feet back was traveling in the same path. No other vehicles or other pedestrians appear to have been using the street at the time of the accident. The defendant saw the plaintiff start to walk from the westerly curb of Webster street easterly. At that time both were about equidistant from the point where the collision occurred. The plaintiff was walking at an ordinary speed or faster, and had her head up looking straight ahead. She had hold of her skirts, apparently holding them up to keep them dry. When she had passed the center line of Webster street, she paused, turned her head in a northerly direction, and about that time the impact occurred. The defendant was attempting to pass in front of the plaintiff. There is no evidence that the automobile of the defendant was traveling more than 15 or 18 miles per hour as it approached Grand avenue. The evidence discloses that its speed was reduced as it entered the intersection, and was as low as 7 or 8 miles as it passed over the intersection, and that the defendant put on his brakes several times, and finally put them on more severely immediately before the impact. The last time that the brakes were applied the defendant's car skidded about 3 feet and then came to a standstill. In the meantime the impact occurred. When the defendant's car had come to a complete standstill, the plaintiff's body was about 5 feet to the rear and slightly to the right of the defendant's machine; her feet pointed toward the machine and her head away from it. At the same time the left front fender of the defendant's car was in immediate contact, if not entangled, with the left rear fender of Mr. Rinderneck's car. At this same time the defendant's car was standing diagonally with its left front wheel on the easterly side of Webster street; that is, on the defendant's left-hand side of the road. No witness testified that he saw the plaintiff look to the right or the left before she entered Webster street. No witness testified that she did not do so.

The plaintiff, testifying in her own behalf, gave testimony to the effect that before the accident she came to the crossing looking for a certain vine-covered house; that she crossed over Webster street and stood on the southeast corner. While standing there, her memory became a blank, and she recalled no facts whatever until several days later in an Oakland hospital.

The defendant complains that the evidence was insufficient to prove negligence on his part. The record is such that it is clear an argument to that effect could be made to the jury. It is equally clear that the reverse contention could be made to the jury. Furthermore, it is equally clear that the case is by no means so clear that any court could properly say that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant. In making this point the defendant speaks of the willful act as defined in one of the court's instructions. That element will be discussed when we reach that instruction.

[1] The next point made by the defendant is that the negligence of the plaintiff proximately contributed to the happening of the accident. That point is hardly involved. As will be seen from what is written above, no witness observed the plaintiff until after she had left the curb. She testified to a set of facts purporting to explain why she did not remember what she had done, but did not claim to testify as to what she actually did do. The only evidence touching the subject of the care exercised by the plaintiff was therefore of the nature of indirect evidence consisting of inferences and presumptions. The solution of those matters was for the jury.

[2, 3] Before the case was called for trial the plaintiff took the deposition of the defendant. At the time of the trial the plaintiff's attorney stated that he offered the deposition in evidence and that he expected to read it to the jury. The document is not before us, as it has not been certified up, and neither is it included in the transcript. It appears that the deposition was taken pursuant to a stipulation. The terms of the stipulation are not set forth in the record. Before Mr. Carey, the plaintiff's attorney, commenced to read, Mr. Gallagher, the attorney for the defendant, interposed no objection to the deposition as a whole, or any part thereof. Mr. Carey was entitled to offer the deposition as a whole; he was not entitled to offer merely a part. Bank of Orland v. Finnell, 133 Cal. 475, 65 P. 976. If the defendant had any objection to any part, upon request, no doubt, he would have been allowed to mark the objectionable portions and submit his objections for a ruling. This he did not do. As the reading proceeded, Mr. Gallagher interrupted the reading by addressing the trial court and asking the judge thereof to "read the next 10 or 15 questions and answers of the deposition. We will object to the reading of them to the jury as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial." The transcript contains a colloquy between court and counsel, but the statements are so worded that we cannot ascertain what was objected to. Mr. Carey read further. Another colloquy. Same condition of the record. Then Mr. Carey read further, and there was another colloquy. The condition of the record is the same. On this last occasion Mr. Gallagher made a motion to strike out. There was another colloquy. The motion was granted, and the jury was thereafter twice admonished in the clearest language possible that the matter which had been stricken out should not be considered.

The defendant now presents the incident as prejudicial error. If we gather the correct understanding of the condition of the record, the error was committed by the defendant. If he had marked the deposition as he should have done, and had called to the attention of the court the passages so marked, nothing regarding the defendant's insurance would have come into the record, nor would it have come into the record if the defendant had made a timely objection. Both of the statements are made on the assumption that there was a legal objection to the matter that was stricken out. Dameron v. Ansbro, 39 Cal. App. 289, 298, 178 P. 874, and cases there cited. However, those authorities are applicable to a set of facts quite different from the facts in the instant case.

[4] Immediately after the accident this defendant made a report to his insurance carrier. He also made a report to the police department. Thereafter the plaintiff's daughter invited him to call at her home. He called and found several persons in attendance. Thereupon those present proceeded to propound to the defendant various questions as to how the accident had occurred. He declined to answer some of the questions, saying that he had made a report to his insurance carrier and that the questions should be propounded to the insurance company.

The plaintiff was clearly entitled to examine the defendant regarding that conversation. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 2. The defendant assumed that because the conversation contained some reference to the fact that he carried insurance rendered the conversation inadmissible. The correct rule is that, if the conversation was admissible for any purpose, it should have been received, notwithstanding that it contained some material which under other circumstances would be objectionable. I. Upham Co. v. United States, etc., Co., 59 Cal. App. 606, 610, 211 P. 809. Moreover the evidence stricken out included all reference to the report made to the police department. The defendant does not even claim that there was any legal objection to that report, in so far as it might have contained any evidence against the defendant or inconsistent with the evidence given by him in the trial court.

[5] Over the objection of the defendant evidence was received which disclosed that at the time of the accident the plaintiff was injured by having two teeth knocked out; that her shoulders, neck, head, and throat were black; that for three days she suffered lapses of memory, and thereafter that she had a loss of memory which she did not have before the accident. In her complaint she alleged that she suffered "severe concussion of the brain, * * * severe contusions of chest, left cheek, arms, and legs; * * " that she suffered " * * great physical pain and anguish and a severe shock to her nervous system, and she will be permanently injured and disfigured as a result of her said physical injuries." The evidence received was within the allegations pleaded. Lauder v. Currier, 3 Cal. App. 28, 84 P. 217; Fogg v. Kansas City, 187 Mo. App. 252, 173 S. W. 712, 713; Colorado Springs & I. Ry. Co. v. Allen, 48 Colo. 4, 108 P. 990; Fitzgerald v. City of Chicago, 144 Ill. App. 462.

"I instruct you that a person lawfully and carefully using a street has the right to assume that all other persons using the street will also use ordinary care and caution. This rule allows pedestrians to assume that motor vehicle drivers will obey and abide by the traffic laws and regulations."

The defendant asserts that the giving of that instruction was error and cites McPherson v. Walling, 58 Cal. App. 563, 209 P. 209. The citation is a case involving facts altogether different from the facts in the instant case. We think the trial court committed no error in giving the instruction.

[7, 8] On the request of the plaintiff the trial court gave the following instruction:

"One of the defenses imposed by defendant in this case is the plea of contributory negligence. Contributory negligence is an affirmative defense by way of confession and avoidance. By pleading it the defendant in effect confesses his own negligence, and pleads by way of avoidance thereof that plaintiff's own negligence helped to produce his injuries."

The defendant claims that the instruction is erroneous. The Supreme Court, in a divided opinion on an application to transfer, held otherwise. Mulholland v. Western Gas Constr. Co., 21 Cal. App. 44, 52, 131 P. 110, 113. The court is bound by that decision. However, it is patent that the instruction should not be given when it has been approved only by a divided court. Such decisions do not have the binding weight of other decisions. 15 C. J. 938, § 326.

The trial court gave the jury, on the request of the plaintiff, an instruction defining reckless driving. See Stats. 1923, p. 517, § 121. The defendant cites Tognazzini v. Freeman, 18 Cal. App. 468, 123 P. 540, and claims that the instruction was error. It will be noted that the instruction was not to the effect that the defendant was liable if he willfully and knowingly ran his automobile against the plaintiff. The instruction contains other factors and is on a different subject. The authority cited is not in point.

The trial court gave a long instruction, which covers more than page 276 of the transcript. The defendant assigns the giving of that instruction as error. It will do no good to quote it. Reading it most carefully, and assigning to it a meaning no broader than is actually written therein, the instruction is not subject to the objections which the defendant makes.

[9, 10] The trial court also gave, at the request of the plaintiff, an instruction worded as follows:

"The Motor Vehicle Law also provides as follows: 'Every motor vehicle when operated upon the public highways shall be equipped with a bell, gong or horn in good working order capable of emitting sound audible under normal conditions for a distance of not less than two hundred feet.' It is the duty of the driver of an automobile to give notice of the approach of said automobile towards pedestrians or other vehicles using the same highway by seasonable warning signal, such as sounding a horn in sufficient time to give timely warning to other persons using said street of the approach of said automobile, and a failure to comply with this requirement of law constitutes negligence in itself. If you find from the evidence in this case that the defendant failed to comply with this requirement of law, and that such failure was the proximate cause of the injury herein complained of, while plaintiff was in the exercise of ordinary care, then your verdict must be against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff, Mrs. Eleonore Dullanty."

The first sentence of the instruction is the first paragraph of section 95 of the Motor Vehicle Act. Statutes 1923, pp. 517, 545. The second sentence is not supported by any statutory provision. See Stats. 1923, p. 517, §§

95, 125(b), and 139. The ordinary meaning of the language used was to the effect that the failure to sound a horn was a failure to comply with the statute. It was not. If the defendant failed to sound a horn, that fact was a circumstance, together with other circumstances, for the consideration of the jury in determining whether the defendant was negligent; but it was not a subject of law to be given as an instruction.

The defendant also complains of the expression "while plaintiff was in" being inserted near the end of the foregoing instruction. He also makes a similar complaint of the same expression as inserted in some other instructions. The plaintiff contends that the point was ruled in plaintiff's favor in the case entitled Gergen v. Tulare County Power Co., 173 Cal. 709, 720, 161 P. 269. We do not think so. The point was neither discussed nor decided in that case. Nevertheless in the case before us we think the expression complained of was not a prejudicial error. The plaintiff, in the instruction quoted, was complaining because the defendant did not sound a horn. The complaint covered a period of time commencing with the instant that the defendant saw her until the accident occurred. According to some of the testimony, that period of time was to be estimated on the period that it took the defendant to drive over one-half of a block. It is clear that the expression, "while plaintiff was in the exercise of ordinary care," when used in connection with the foregoing facts, did not limit unduly the jury's consideration of the plaintiff's conduct.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

WORDEN v. COAST TIRE & RUBBER CO.
et al. (Civ. 5819.)

1. Fraud — 58(2)—Evidence held insufficient to show fraudulent misrepresentations in sale of corporation units.

Where the purchaser of certain corporation units sought to recover damages from one inducing her to purchase and alleged fraudulent misrepresentations in the letters sent to her by the defendant relative to such units, evidence held not sufficient to show that the representations made in such letters were false and fraudulent.

2. Fraud — 27—That corporation was not authorized to do business in state did not make false representation that it was incorporated, going concern.

Where, in letters promoting the sale of corporation units the statement was made that the corporation was an incorporated, solvent, and successful going concern, the fact that the corporation was not authorized to do business in the state where the letters were circulated did not make the indicated statement a false representation.

3. Fraud ⚡58(1)—Strong suspicion of fraud in sale of corporate units is not proof sufficient to replace legal evidence.

Strong suspicion of fraud in a sale of corporation units will not suffice as proof thereof in action for damages for fraudulent representations, but such fraud must be proved by legal evidence.

4. Fraud ⚡50—Fraud is never presumed.

Fraud is never presumed, but must be proved.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Action by Lucinda Worden against the Coast Tire & Rubber Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Albert H. Elliot and Guy C. Calden, both of San Francisco (P. L. Benjamin, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

Louis Oneal, of San Jose, and Clarence M. Booth, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, based upon fraudulent misrepresentations. The ground of the appeal is insufficiency of the evidence to prove that the representations made were false or fraudulent.

The evidence showed that the president of the appellant company, over the signature of the company, sent circular letters to its stockholders, including plaintiff, and these letters contained the representations alleged to be false and fraudulent. The circular letters stated that the appellant company had formed a plan of operation with the Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company, by which the latter would discount the appellant company's trade acceptances, warehouse receipts, and the like, and strongly urged the stockholders to buy unit shares of the Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company so that they could share in the large profits to be realized from that source. The letters also stated that representatives would call. The letters were fulsome in their praise of the prosperity and strength of the company, of the wisdom and efficiency of its officers, and of the large profits which were soon to fall into the lap of the stockholders. They contained direct and indirect statements concerning the arrangements made and to be made with the Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company to effectuate the discount scheme.

Relying upon these letters, plaintiff gave an order for the purchase of 15 units of the said Discount Company to two men, unidentified by the evidence as connected with either company, who called at her door. She gave them $1,500 cash and her 150 shares of capital stock of the appellant company, with a signed order upon their printed form addressed to the Bankers' Securities Company, for the purchase of the 15 units of the Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company. A receipt for the money and stock was signed by these men, with the name of Bankers' Securities Company, and it stated that her shares were to be converted at not less than $10 per share and the proceeds applied on the purchase of the unit shares.

Time passed, but plaintiff received nothing for her property and heard nothing further about the transaction. She then gave notice of rescission to all the companies named and brought this action. At the conclusion of her case in chief she voluntarily dismissed as to the Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company and as to the Bankers' Securities Company. As respondent here, she does not claim in support of her judgment that she has traced her money and property to the appellant or its agents, and does not attempt to defend the judgment as one for the recovery of her property from those who received it as the fruits of rescission on account of failure of consideration or as upon cancellation of her purchase order for the units never delivered to her. She claims that no matter who received her property and money, the false and fraudulent misrepresentations contained in the appellant company's circular letters were the direct and only cause of her loss, and hence defends the judgment upon that ground alone.

[1] Substantially all of the representations as alleged in the complaint are found in the circular letters. Whether these representations were true or false, however, is not proved by the evidence. Respondent defends the finding that the unit shares of the Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company were worthless by stating that if the Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company was all that the appellant company represented it to be, some evidence of that fact would be that she had received the unit shares ordered. This may be grounds for strong suspicion, but it does not amount to legal evidence.

[2-4] Respondent defends one other finding of false representation. The representation that the Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company was an incorporated, solvent, and successful going concern is said to be proved false by a stipulation of fact made at the trial. This stipulation was that the Bankers' Securities Company was never at any time a corporation nor authorized to do business in the state of California, and that the Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company was a corporation under the state of Delaware, which had never been domesticated in California nor filed its articles in California. But both the representation and the stipulation could be true. First, the representations neither as contained in the letters, nor as pleaded in the complaint, state that that company was authorized to do business in the state of California. The circular letter stated:

"This eminently desirable result (i. e., large profits from discounting trade acceptances) may be obtained * * * by a close relation with a subsidiary of a finance corporation formed to perform this financial service. * * *"

Again:

"The Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company was incorporated, and through its California subsidiary is permitted to loan money," etc.

Second, the fact that the company had not been authorized to do business in California does not prove untrue the representation that it was an incorporated, solvent, and successful going concern. It is argued that the letters create the impression that the Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company was a California corporation, especially where they set forth that the officers of the appellant company were also the executives of the Discount Company. It is true that the letters are skillfully persuasive, and that they are more eloquent in this respect in what they do not say than in what is expressed. They give rise to strong suspicion of fraud. However, fraud must be proved by legal evidence, and strong suspicion will not suffice. Fraud is never presumed.

We conclude that the evidence produced was insufficient to prove the representations fraudulent and untrue. The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered.

BRANDT et al. v. BRANDT et al. ★
(Civ. 3302.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 30, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 28, 1927.

1. Appeal and error §882(10)—Plaintiffs, having had testimony stricken out, cannot complain on appeal.

Plaintiffs cannot complain of striking of testimony which was done pursuant to their motion.

2. Witnesses §205—Testimony as to statements by grantor on delivering deeds to attorney to be held until grantor's death held admissible (Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 2).

Testimony of conversation between grantor and attorney to whom grantor delivered deeds to be held until grantor's death is admissible; Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 2, not being applicable.

3. Deeds §200—Testimony of subsequent acts of grantor, though admissible, is not conclusive on intent with which deeds were executed and delivered.

Testimony of subsequent acts of grantor, though admissible as bearing on intent with which deeds were executed and delivered, is not conclusive.

4. Deeds §61—On grantor delivering deed to third person intending it to operate as present transfer of title, title passes, though deed is not delivered until after grantor's death.

Where grantor delivers deed to third person without condition and with intent that it shall operate as present transfer of title, title passes as of date of delivery, though deed is not actually delivered to grantee until after grantor's death, irrespective of grantee's knowledge of the existence of the deed until after grantor's death.

5. Wills §93—That grantor when delivering deed used word "leave" held not conclusive evidence that he intended only testamentary disposition.

That grantor on delivering deed to third person to be delivered at his death spoke of intending to "leave" his property is not conclusive evidence that he intended only a testamentary disposition, since, though word "leave" is often used with reference to property left by will, it is so often loosely used that it should not be given controlling importance.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Leave—Leaving.]

6. Evidence §265(18)—Testimony as to conversation occurring 20 years before should be viewed with caution (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 4).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 4, testimony of witness as to conversation which took place 20 years before should be viewed with caution.

7. Deeds §208(5)—Evidence held to support finding that grantor delivering deeds to third party without condition intended to immediately pass title.

Evidence that grantor delivered deeds to third person without any conditions except that delivery was not to take place until after grantor's death held to support finding that grantor intended to immediately pass title.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Action by Rose Brandt, executrix of the last will and testament of Charles H. W. Brandt, deceased, and another, against Louis Brandt and others to quiet the title to real property. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Gerald C. Halsey and Frederick T. Leo, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

A. R. Bogue, R. C. Minor, and Scott Rex, all of Stockton, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Charles H. W. Brandt, by his first wife, Theresa Brandt, had five sons and three daughters. Theresa was the sole heir of her father, C. A. Bachmann, and inherited from him all the lands referred to herein. After the descent was cast from Bachmann, Theresa granted by deed of conveyance all of her interest in and to said property to Mr. Brandt. Theresa Brandt died on or about July 28, 1904. Shortly before that date she requested her husband, Mr. Brandt, to leave all of their property to their children. This Brandt promised her he would do. On August 2, 1904, after the death of his wife, Theresa, Mr. Brandt went to the office of Mr. Charles L. Neumiller, an attorney at law, in the city of Stockton, and had Neumiller draft a will disposing of all his personal property, and also then and there had Mr. Neumiller prepare certain deeds conveying to his children certain lands and premises in the county of San Joaquin. The validity of one of these deeds is involved in this action. These deeds, after being drafted, were left in the custody of Mr. Neumiller. Mr. Brandt's instructions to Mr. Neumiller were to prepare these deeds and deliver them to the respective grantees on his death. Mr. Neumiller's testimony in this particular is as follows:

"He gave me instructions to prepare these deeds running to his children, and I prepared the deeds, and he signed them and acknowledged them and gave them to me, with instructions to deliver to the children upon his death."

The deeds were separately inclosed in envelopes by Mr. Neumiller, and Mr. Brandt's instructions, in substance, indorsed thereon, the indorsement reading as follows:

"Deed of C. H. W. Brandt to [here appeared the name of the grantee, as the case might be] to be delivered upon the death of C. H. W. Brandt."

The indorsement on the envelopes containing the respective deeds was substantially in the same form as to all of them. The deeds referred to were all left in the custody of Mr. Neumiller and remained continuously in his possession until after the death of Mr. Brandt, save and except as to one of the deeds which was borrowed from Mr. Neumiller by Mr. Brandt for a few minutes to show to some party for some purpose not disclosed by the testimony, and then returned to Mr. Neumiller. The deed here just referred to was out of the possession of Mr. Neumiller from 1 to 2 hours only, and upon the receiving of this deed from Mr. Neumiller, Mr. Brandt signed and handed to Mr. Neumiller a receipt therefor. After the death of Mr. Brandt, which occurred on December 8, 1924, Mr. Neumiller delivered all the deeds herein referred to to the respective grantees named therein. The deed in controversy in this action was delivered by Mr. Neumiller to the respondents August, Louis, and Frederick Brandt. This deed was subsequently recorded on December 27, 1924. On April 22, 1916, Mr. Brandt made a new will, and on December 2, 1922, he executed a codicil thereto. Under this will 370 acres of the land described in the deed to the defendants herein named was devised to the five sons of the said Brandt, namely, Fred, Charles, Louis, Gus, and Emil. The will differs from the deed in that under the will each would take one-fifth, whereas under the deed the grantees therein would take one-fourth each. As to the remaining 33 acres contained in said deed in controversy, the will purported to devise and give the same to Rose Brandt, the surviving wife of the deceased, Mr. Brandt, after the death of his first wife, having married Rose Brandt on October 20, 1906.

The transcript shows that after the execution of the deed by Mr. Brandt in 1904, at various times, he executed different instruments in relation thereto, to wit, a mortgage dated November 20, 1905, for $10,000; a mortgage dated November 7, 1910, for $10,722.40; a mortgage dated October 1, 1913, for $16,900; a mortgage dated September 13, 1918, for $16,900; a mortgage dated August 6, 1923, for $16,900. Also, that on March 18, 1911, he made a deed to his son, Charles H. Brandt, of property described in a prior deed to him, and delivered the same to him immediately in consideration of the sum of $15,000. At the time of executing the first deed herein referred to Mr. Brandt was of the age of about 65 years.

In addition to the foregoing, the plaintiff testified as follows: That in 1904 she was and for some time previously had been the housekeeper for Mr. and Mrs. Brandt; that on or about the 2d day of August, 1904, at the residence of Mr. Brandt on his ranch on the San Joaquin river, Mr. Brandt made some statements to her in relation to his disposition of the property that he had received from his wife. This testimony is as follows:

"Q. Calling your attention to the conversation you had with Mr. Brandt in the dining room you have told us of, on the morning of the 2d of August, 1904, what did he say? A. He told me he was going to town to Mr. Neumiller's office to leave, by will and deeds, the Brandt ranch for the three girls, the home ranch for the four boys, and the Island ranch for Charlie, so in case anything happened to him it would save probate expenses."

The appellant also called to the stand another witness named Miss Catherine Tully, a resident of Stockton, who, after testifying that she had attended to certain insurance business for Mr. Brandt, and that Mr. Brandt had made some statements to her relative to leaving his property after the death of his wife in 1904, testified as follows:

"Q. Tell us what he said to you, as near as you can recall. A. Within a year after Mrs. Brandt's death, I think it was the first time he came to the office after Mrs. Brandt had passed, he said he was going to make deeds in escrow at the request of his wife. He had promised his wife to leave the property so as to save probate, the Island ranch to Charles, the C. A. Bachmann ranch, which was inherited by his wife from her father, to the girls, share and share alike—that was his three daughters—and the balance of his property, which was the home ranch, to the sons, share and share alike."

The trial court gave judgment to the effect that the deeds executed by Mr. Brandt in 1904 were effectual to convey the lands and premises therein named to the respondents in this action, and from this judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

The contention made here is that the deeds were testamentary in character; that they never passed out of the control of the grantor; and that the grantor had no intent that the title to the property mentioned in the deeds should immediately pass to the grantees therein named.

That there was a manual tradition of the deed involved in this action is beyond question. It was handed to Mr. Neumiller with the request to keep the same and deliver to the grantees upon the death of the grantor. The intent with which the deed involved in this action was placed in the custody and control of Mr. Neumiller must be gathered from the circumstances surrounding the transaction. We find nothing in the testimony which tends to sustain the contention of the appellants that Mr. Neumiller was simply the agent of Mr. Brandt and held the deeds in his custody as such agent. The fact that Mr. Neumiller had acted as the attorney for Mr. Brandt, or rather for Mrs. Brandt, in the settlement of her father's estate in 1904, and also, as attorney for Mr. Brandt in the execution of the will referred to herein as executed in 1904, does not impel the conclusion that Mr. Neumiller was the agent of Mr. Brandt, rather than the trustee of the grantees named in the deeds of which he was, for the time being, custodian.

[1] As bearing directly upon the intent with which the deeds were executed and delivered to Mr. Neumiller, to be held by him and delivered to the grantees therein named, Mr. Neumiller's testimony is substantially as follows:

"Mr. Brandt gave me instructions to prepare these deeds running to his children, and I prepared the deeds, and he signed them and acknowledged them and gave them to me with instructions to deliver to the children upon his death.

"Q. Do you recall anything further that took place or that was said between you and him at that time, Mr. Neumiller? A. Of course, there was a discussion of the properties to be included in the deeds, and the purpose of the deeds, and the usual—I would not say usual—but the transaction, of course, was discussed with Mr. Brandt by me, and by him to me.

"Q. In the course of that discussion was anything said as to what the legal effect of what he was doing would be upon his rights in the land covered by the deeds? A. I explained to Mr. Brandt the transaction.

"Q. We will have to ask you, Mr. Neumiller, to state to us the statement that you made to him as you are now able to recall it? A. Well, in the making of these deeds, and in the signing of them, and the delivering of them to me, I explained to Mr. Brandt what the legal effect of that was, in my opinion.

"Q. Well, if you will go ahead, Mr. Neumiller, and tell us what the discussion was, particularly relative to the effect of these deeds, and more particularly this deed, if there was any separate discussion with reference to it? A. I advised him at that time or discussed with him, that the delivery of the deed to me, or the deposit of the deed with me, and then for me to deliver at the time of his death, reserved in him, in my opinion, a life estate. In other words, I explained the transaction to Mr. Brandt as best I could, with what ability I possessed."

The witness further testified that after the discussion the deeds were left with him; that after that time there was no modification or change in the condition of the trust under which those deeds were left with the witness; that witness placed the deeds in envelopes and indorsed thereon the words, "To be delivered upon the death of C. H. W. Brandt," etc. The advice given by Mr. Neumiller to Mr. Brandt as to the effect of the deeds was objected to, and thereafter, upon motion of counsel for the appellant, this portion of the witness' testimony was stricken out, to wit:

"I advised him at that time, or discussed with him that the delivery of the deed to me or the deposit of the deed with me, and then for me to deliver at the time of his death, reserved in him a life estate," etc.

The motion of appellant to strike from the testimony of the witness Neumiller was limited expressly to what we have here quoted. As this motion was granted by the trial court, the appellants' argument that it was properly granted is immaterial to a decision herein, and as judgment went for the respondents, from which no appeal is prosecuted by them, their contention that such testimony is admissible is not before us for determination. The appellants, having had the witness Neumiller's testimony stricken out, cannot be heard to complain, and the respondents, having had judgment, are not injured. There remains in the testimony of Mr. Neumiller only that portion which relates to the circumstances under which the deeds were executed, the fact that the purposes were talked over, and then the instructions given by Mr. Brandt to Mr. Neumiller as to Neumiller's keeping the deeds, and the final handing of the same to the grantees therein named upon the death of Mr. Brandt, which, we think, placed before the trial court sufficient facts to justify the conclusion that Mr. Brandt knew exactly what he was doing and fully understood the transaction, even though the testimony of Mr. Neumiller as to what he, Neumiller, thought of the legal effect of the transaction, was stricken from the record. Under the circumstances which we have detailed, although argued, we do not find that there is anything really for us to decide as to whether the advice given by Mr. Neumiller, or the opinion expressed by Mr. Neumiller to Mr. Brandt, was or was not admissible. The facts set forth in Mr. Neumiller's testimony as to the acts of Mr. Brandt and the instructions given by Mr. Brandt enabled the trial court to draw its own conclusions, and the presumption may be indulged that the trial court was qualified to do so, irrespective of the opinion of Mr. Neumiller.

[2] That all the testimony of Mr. Neumiller, outside of that stricken from the record by the trial court, was admissible is so firmly established in this state that we need only to cite the memorandum opinion of the Supreme Court in denying a petition for hearing in the case of Messersmith v. Smith, 62 Cal. App. 446, 217 P. 105, where it is stated that subdivision 2 of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure has no reference to the instructions given by a grantor to the holder of a deed to whom the deed has been delivered with instructions to pass the same to the grantees therein named upon the happening of some future event. It is there further said:

"Where the communication between the client and attorney is one authorizing the attorney to perform some act on behalf of the client, the communication giving such authority is not a confidential communication by the client, and the attorney may testify to the instructions given to him." (Following this statement, numerous authorities are cited.)

[3] While testimony of subsequent acts of a grantor is admissible as bearing upon the intent with which deeds have been executed and delivered, and whether or not the same are delivered with intent to pass title, or are only testamentary in character, such testimony is not conclusive, but simply goes into the record as testimony for the trial court to weigh and determine in making its findings and drawing its conclusions as to the character of the act performed by the grantor and the intent entertained by him at the time of its performance. Many cases may be cited from the reports where subsequent attempts have been made to regain possession of the deeds so executed and delivered, and also of subsequent acts in relation to the property, such as executing mortgages and subsequent deeds. These cases all uphold the principle of law which we have just stated. Such acts are admissible as testimony, but are not conclusive. Without analyzing the cases involving subsequent acts, we will simply cite a few where the subsequent acts were as definitive in their character as in the case at bar, and were not held to preclude a finding that the deed, delivered with instructions, such as we have here, constituted a valid and binding transfer of title. Boicelli v. Giannini, 65 Cal. App. 601, 224 P. 777; Decou v. Howell, 190 Cal. 741, 214 P. 444; Wilcox v. Hardisty, 60 Cal. App. 206, 212 P. 633; Pitney v. Pitney, 55 Cal. App. 22, 202 P. 940; Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 P. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186; In re Estate of Cornelius, 151 Cal. 550, 91 P. 329; Smith v. Smith, 173 Cal. 725, 161 P. 495.

[4] We do not deem it necessary to discuss at length the objection of vested rights urged by the appellant further than to say that the principle considered in the case of Green v. Skinner, 185 Cal. 435, 197 P. 60, and other cases where the same questions were involved, have no bearing upon the issues presented to us for consideration. Nor is there anything in the objection that the grantees had no knowledge of the execution and delivery of the deeds referred to by Mr. Brandt to Mr. Neumiller. See Neely v. Buster, 50 Cal. App. 695, 195 P. 736. A large number of cases are there cited, and they all hold in effect that where a grantor intends that the deed executed by him shall operate as a present transfer of title, and delivers it to a third person without condition, the title passes, as of the date of the delivery, to such person, although the deed is not actually delivered to the grantee until after the grantor's death. And this, irrespective of whether the grantee has or has no knowledge of the existence of the deed until after the grantor's death.

[5] Relying upon the case of Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 151 P. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703, wherein the court, speaking through Justice Lorigan, in considering certain words of the grantor, used the following language:

"It was a fair inference to be made by the court that Williams, when he commenced the preparation of these deeds, had in contemplation the testamentary disposition of all of his property, and that the making of the four deeds, including the one in controversy, was a part thereof. That he so intended would appear from the language he used in the several talks held between himself and Kidd before they actually commenced the preparation of the various deeds which the scheme contemplated. He spoke of 'leaving his property that way—by deed,' which is not reasonably open to any other construction."

The appellant urges that the language said to have been used by Mr. Brandt in the presence of the plaintiff and of the witness, Miss Tully, is conclusive evidence that Brandt intended only a testamentary disposition, and much stress is laid upon the word "leave." We do not think that use of the word "leave," if used by Brandt, has any such binding force or effect or can reasonably be given any more force or effect than any other portion of the language used by him when speaking of the disposition of his property and giving instructions to Mr. Neumiller. There are a number of authorities which hold that the word "leave" is susceptible of, and may be reasonably given, a different interpretation from that indicated in the excerpt which we have quoted from the case of Williams v. Kidd. In 36 Cal. Jur. 974, we find the following:

"The word 'leave' is often used with reference to property left by will, meaning to give or dispose of by will; but it is so often loosely used, that its use should not be given controlling importance in determining whether a document showed a gift or was testamentary in character," (citing authorities).

This definition we think much more consonant with good reasoning than any holding that such language must be given any absolute or controlling effect. It is simply a bit of testimony for consideration by the trial court.

In the case of Innes v. Potter, 130 Minn. 320, 153 N. W. 604, 3 A. L. R. 896, the Supreme Court of Minnesota had before it for consideration the meaning of the word "leave," used by a donor when executing and delivering a deed to a trustee, just as we find in this case, and there the court said:

"Nor do we attach great importance to the statement of Casey that Potter said that he wanted to 'leave' a certain amount of property to his daughter Marcia. The word 'leave' is often used in reference to property left by will, but the word is often loosely used and its use should not be given controlling importance."

[6] There is another fact to be borne in mind. The testimony of the plaintiff and Miss Tully purports to relate a conversation which took place at a period 20 years antedating the date when the testimony was taken in court. What Mr. Neumiller testified to as to the directions given him by the grantor in 1904 had reference to what was written down by him at the time the deeds were executed, and was not a mere matter of recollection. Where a witness purports to relate a conversation or statements of one which took place 20 years preceding the time of giving the testimony, we think that the last clause of subdivision 4 of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure may very well be considered by the trial court, where the rule is set forth that evidence of the oral admissions of a party should be viewed with caution. It is not a question of whether the witnesses under such circumstances are merely honest or dishonest, but language filtered through human recollection and coming into the record 20 years after the occurrence is necessarily of so weak a character that, even though the word "leave" were actually used by Mr. Brandt in talking with the witnesses, its force and effect is such that we think the trial court would be justified in giving it but little weight. The testimony of Miss Tully, however viewed, is about as favorable to the respondents as to the plaintiffs. This witness testified:

"I think it was the first time he came to the office after Mrs. Brandt had passed—he said he was going to make deeds in escrow at the request of his wife. He had promised his wife to leave the property so as to save probate."

This language certainly does not impel the conclusion that Mr. Brandt had only a testamentary intent.

[7] Is there sufficient testimony in the record to support the finding of the trial court that the grantor intended to immediately pass title? We have heretofore set forth the testimony of Mr. Neumiller as to the instructions given to him by Mr. Brandt, the grantor. This court had before it the effect and weight of such testimony in the case of Wilcox v. Hardisty, 60 Cal. App. 206, 212 P. 633. In that case this court said:

"Evidence that a grantor delivered his deed to a third person, with instructions to deliver it to the grantee after the grantor's death, without any other evidence of intention, is sufficient to justify the inference that the grantor thereby intended to part with all right thereafter to control the deed. Whether such inference is overcome by other proof involves the question of weighing the evidence, a matter within the exclusive province of the trial court."

The record in this case is absolutely silent with reference to any intent on the part of the grantor to exercise any dominion or control over the deeds executed and delivered by him to the witness Neumiller. The deeds were handed to Mr. Neumiller without any conditions whatever, save and except the limitation that they were not to be handed to the grantees until after the grantor's death. There is no evidence that the grantor retained any control or dominion over the deeds whatever.

Appellants argue that the quotation which we have taken from the case of Wilcox v. Hardisty is mere obiter. An examination of the facts involved in that case show, however, that in this contention the appellants are in error. The court was there speaking of an essential portion of the testimony in the case, and to be considered by the trial court and the effect to be given thereto. That there was other evidence in the case bearing upon the same subject does not render this language mere dictum. The rule set forth in Williams v. Southern Pacific Co., 54 Cal. App. 571, quoting from page 579, 202 P. 356, 359, as to what is obiter and what is not, is pertinent:

"Appellant urges that this latter statement by the court is mere dictum, but 'where there are two grounds, upon either of which the judgment of the trial court can be rested, and the appellate court sustains both, the ruling on neither is obiter, but each is the judgment of the court, and is equally valid with the other'" (citing, Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. Mason City & Fort Dodge R. R. Co., 199 U. S. 160, 26 S. Ct. 19, 50 L. Ed. 134; also Rose's U. S. Notes).

The rule which we have just stated, set forth in Wilcox v. Hardisty, as to the weight which may be given by a trial court to instructions given by a grantor when delivering deeds to be handed to grantees at a later date, is supported by the following authorities: Wilson v. Bridgforth, 108 Miss. 199, 66 So. 524; Saltzsieder v. Saltzsieder, 219 N. Y. 523, 114 N. E. 856; Stonehill v. Hastings, 202 N. Y. 115, 94 N. E. 1068; Patrick v. Parrott, 92 Ohio St. 184, 110 N. E. 725.

There being sufficient testimony in the record to support the finding of the trial court that the deeds executed and delivered by Brandt to Mr. Neumiller in 1904 were executed and delivered with the present intent of the grantor to then and there pass title, limited only as to future enjoyment by the grantees, it follows that the judgment of the trial court must be and the same is hereby affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

SMITH v. ARMSTRONG et al. (Civ. 5514.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 27, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 23, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨731(5)—Where bill of exceptions did not specify particulars in which certain findings were unsupported by evidence, question could not be reviewed (Code Civ. Proc. § 648).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 648, where record was presented in form of bill of exceptions, and bill did not specify particulars in which evidence was insufficient to support certain findings, question of sufficiency of evidence to support those findings could not be reviewed.

2. Trial ⇨404(2)—Conclusion that party is not innocent purchaser of note is one of law, and must be so regarded, although found among findings of fact.

Conclusion that party is or is not a bona fide or innocent purchaser or holder of note is one of law and not of fact, and such conclusions must be regarded according to their character, notwithstanding they may be found among findings of fact.

3. Trial ⇨404(2)—Conclusion of law that party was not innocent purchaser, inadvertently made part of findings of fact, should be disregarded.

Where court concluded as matter of law that party was not an innocent purchaser of note, and same conclusion was inadvertently made part of findings of fact, it should be disregarded in connection with findings of fact.

4. Bills and notes ⇨337—One having mere suspicion of infirmity of title is holder in due course of note, unless circumstances justify conclusion that failure to make inquiry arose from suspicion that inquiry would disclose defect (Civ. Code, §§ 3133, 3137, 3140).

Purchaser of negotiable instrument before maturity is not bound to make inquiry of maker as to consideration or circumstances, and mere knowledge of facts sufficient to put prudent man on inquiry without actual knowledge, or mere suspicion of infirmity or defect of title, does not preclude transferee from occupying position of holder in due course under Civ. Code, §§ 3133, 3137, and 3140, unless circumstances justify conclusion that failure to make inquiry arose from suspicion that inquiry would disclose defect in instrument.

5. Bills and notes ⇨354—To constitute purchaser "holder in due course," price need not equal face value of note.

That transferee of negotiable paper purchases it for sum less than face value may be considered as other facts in case upon question of good faith; yet, in order to constitute him "holder in due course," it is not necessary that price should equal face value of note.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Holder in Due Course.]

6. Bills and notes ⇨337—That purchaser bought note as matter of speculation did not impugn her title as bona fide director.

That purchaser of note before maturity bought note as matter of speculation was not sufficient to impugn her title as bona fide holder.

7. Appeal and error ⇨931(3)—If from facts found other facts may be inferred which will support judgment, it will be assumed that trial court made such inferences.

While findings of fact are to receive such construction as will uphold rather than defeat judgment, and, if from facts found other facts may be inferred which will support judgment, it will be assumed that trial court made such inferences.

8. Bills and notes ⇨539—Facts found held insufficient to support conclusion of law that purchaser of note was not innocent purchaser.

In suit by assignee of purchaser on promissory note, given for corporation stock defendant claimed was valueless, facts found held not to support an inference of bad faith or conclusion as matter of law that purchaser, who purchased for less than face value, was not an innocent purchaser or bona fide holder.

9. Appeal and error ⇨1050(1)—In suit on note, admitting incompetent evidence regarding falsity of representations inducing execution, held not prejudicial.

In suit by assignee of purchaser of note, admission of evidence of conversation of witness with president of corporation, for whose stock note was given, regarding falsity of representations as to value of corporation's property, which was incompetent, held not shown to be prejudicial, where bill of exceptions did not specify particulars in which finding that representations were false was not supported by evidence.

10. Appeal and error ⇨882(8)—Exclusion of evidence, if error, held invited by plaintiff's attorney, who stated, in response to objection, that, as to certain defendant, testimony would be hearsay.

In action on note, exclusion of evidence regarding details of conversation between certain parties before transfer of note, if error, held invited by plaintiff's attorney, who stated, in response to objection, that, as to certain defendant, testimony would be hearsay.

11. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 882(1)—One who, by conduct, induces commission of error, is estopped from asserting that action of court was erroneous.

A party who, by his conduct, induces commission of error, is estopped from asserting that action of court was erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action upon a promissory note by D. F. Smith against J. P. Armstrong and others. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Newlin & Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Donald Armstrong, of Los Angeles, for respondent Armstrong.

CASHIN, J. An appeal from a portion of a judgment entered in an action on a promissory note. The note was executed on August 12, 1920, by defendant Armstrong to Nathan & Co., a corporation, for the sum of $3,000; the principal with interest thereon being payable one year after date. The instrument was negotiable in form and was indorsed by the payee to defendant Proctor, who, in December, 1920, indorsed the same to Blanche G. Lark, by whom it was assigned to the plaintiff for collection. Judgment was entered against the indorsers and in favor of defendant Armstrong, and from the latter portion of the judgment the plaintiff appeals.

It is contended that certain findings are unsupported, that the court erred in its rulings and its conclusion from the facts found that Blanche G. Lark was not an innocent purchaser or a bona fide holder of the note and not entitled to judgment against defendant Armstrong.

Nathan & Co. was the selling agent for the stock of the Blue Jacket Mining Company, a corporation, which owned certain mining claims in Arizona, and the consideration for the note was the issuance by the latter corporation of 2,000 shares of its stock to the wife of defendant Armstrong.

Armstrong denied the allegation in the complaint that the indorsement to Blanche G. Lark was for a valuable consideration, and alleged as a separate defense that the stock was valueless, that its purchase and the execution of the note were induced by the fraudulent representations of the president of the mining company as to the condition and value of the claims and by like misrepresentations made by Nathan & Co., contained in a letter sent to defendant and in an advertisement inserted by the latter corporation in a newspaper, all of which the defendant believed and relied upon in making the purchase.

The court found the allegations of the special defense to be true, and with respect to the purchase of the note by Blanche G. Lark its findings were as follows:

"That, at the time of the assignment of said note from defendants Nathan & Co. and George H. Proctor to the said Blanche G. Lark, she was the wife of Charles T. Lark, who was then, and for about 20 years had been, a practicing attorney in the city of New York, and for a long time had been and then was attorney for the defendant George H. Proctor and the Granite Springs Estates, an Arizona corporation, of which the said defendant George H. Proctor was the president; and at all times herein the said Blanche G. Lark was acting solely and only through her said husband, as her agent, in all transactions connected with the purchase of the said note and incident thereto, and the said Blanche G. Lark knew nothing of the said transaction except as aforesaid related to her by her said husband.

"That at the time of the said assignment from said defendant Nathan & Co. and George H. Proctor, the said defendant J. P. Armstrong was wholly solvent and financially responsible and able to pay the said note at its maturity. That at the time the face value of the said note was more than $3,070. That up to December 18, 1920, the date when the said defendants Nathan & Co. and George H. Proctor assigned the said note, the said Charles T. Lark had never heard of the defendant Nathan & Co., and made no inquiry from any one regarding said corporation except from defendant Proctor. That at the time defendant Proctor had his headquarters with defendant Nathan & Co. and introduced the said Charles T. Lark to Mr. G. Nathan, the president of said corporation. That at all the said times the said Charles T. Lark had never heard of defendant Armstrong except that on December 17, 1920, the defendant Proctor told him that the defendant Nathan & Co. would allow him to borrow money on the said note. That neither the said Charles T. Lark nor his wife, Blanche G. Lark, had ever purchased any commercial paper in California, and had not operated in commercial paper anywhere. That the said Charles T. Lark made no inquiry before the purchase of said note regarding the circumstances of the consideration for which it was given, and made no inquiry from anyone or effort to learn of defendant Armstrong's financial ability, or whether the said note was valid or given for a valuable consideration except that the said G. Nathan told him that Armstrong was a wealthy man and that the Merchants National Bank of Los Angeles had looked defendant Armstrong up and found he was perfectly good and that they would take his note. That at that time the said Charles T. Lark was informed by defendant Nathan that defendant Armstrong resided at Venice, California, seventeen miles from Los Angeles. That said Blanche G. Lark through her said husband purchased said note for the sum of $2,500.00, believing that the said Nathan was responsible, and that, if defendant Armstrong did not pay the note, Mr. Nathan would, and expecting to bring suit if the note was not paid. That the said Charles T. Lark made no inquiry as to what authority Mr. Nathan had to transfer the note, never saw the said G. Nathan except on that one occasion, and made no inquiry to ascertain whether Nathan's statements were true, but bought the note as a matter of speculation.

"That the said Charles T. Lark knew at the time of said transfer that the defendant George H. Proctor was financially embarrassed and unable to pay the said note. That the said Blanche G. Lark was not an innocent purchaser for value of said note sued on."

The conclusions of law from the findings were:

"That said promissory note was procured by fraud and is void as against the defendant J. B. Armstrong for want of consideration; that Blanche G. Lark was not nor was the plaintiff an innocent purchaser or a bona fide holder of said note as against said defendant Armstrong; that plaintiff is not entitled to take anything by this action against said defendant Armstrong; that as to said defendant Armstrong said note be canceled by the clerk of this court. * * *

The appeal is presented on a bill of exceptions in which are specified the particulars in which it is claimed that the evidence fails to support certain of the findings; but, with respect to the findings that the representations alleged were made and were untrue, that these representations were relied upon by Armstrong, and that the stock was valueless, the particulars in which the same were unsupported are not specified; and the same is true of the trial court's conclusion "that said Blanche G. Lark was not an innocent purchaser for value of said note sued on." The respondents contend therefore that the question whether these findings are supported is not open to review.

[1] It is the rule of the Code (section 648, Code Civ. Proc.), enforced by numerous decisions, that, where the record is presented in the form of a bill of exceptions, and it is sought to review the sufficiency of the evidence, the bill must specify the particulars in which the same is insufficient. Mills v. Brady, 185 Cal. 317, 196 P. 776; Bird v. Am. Surety Co., 175 Cal. 625, 631, 166 P. 1009; Meads, Seaman & Co. v. Lasar, 92 Cal. 221, 227, 28 P. 935. In view of the rule, respondents' contention must be sustained as to those findings which are properly conclusions of fact in so far as the particulars in which it is claimed that they are unsupported are not specified.

But it is contended by appellant that the conclusion that Mrs. Lark was not an innocent purchaser was but a legal conclusion, which, being also found among the conclusions of law in the decision, is assigned by him as an error of law.

[2] It has been held in numerous cases that the conclusion that a party is or is not a bona fide or innocent purchaser or holder is one of law and not of fact (Wing v. Hayden, 10 Bush [Ky.] 276; Downer v. Read, 17 Minn. 493 [Gil. 470]; White v. Brown, 14 How. Prac. [N. Y.] 282, 286; Roger v. Morton, 46 Misc. Rep. 494, 95 N. Y. S. 49; Ludlow v. Woodward, 117 App. Div. 525, 102 N. Y. S. 647; Davidson v. Buchanan, 164 App. Div. 352, 149 N. Y. S. 640; Aurrecoechea v. Sinclair Co., 60 Cal. 532; State v. Hackley, 124 La. 854, 50 So. 772; Voorhees v. Fisher, 9 Utah, 303, 34 P. 64; Bunting v. Mick, 5 Ind. App. 289, 31 N. E. 378, 1055); and such conclusions must be regarded according to their character, notwithstanding they may be found among the findings of fact (Towle v. Sweeney, 2 Cal. App. 29, 83 P. 74; Lynip v. Alturas School District, 24 Cal. App. 426, 438, 141 P. 835; Faure v. Drollinger, 60 Cal. App. 594, 601, 213 P. 724).

[3] It is clear from the foregoing cases that the conclusion must be treated as one of law; and, the trial court having concluded as a matter of law that Mrs. Lark was not an innocent purchaser, it is apparent that the same conclusion was inadvertently made a part of the findings of fact, in which connection it should be disregarded.

A holder in due course is one who has taken the instrument under certain conditions, among which are that he took in good faith and for value, and that at the time it was negotiated to him he had no notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating it (Civ. Code, § 3133).

Every holder is deemed prima facie to be a holder in due course; but, when it is shown that the title of any person who has negotiated the instrument was defective, the burden is on the holder to prove that he or some person under whom he claims acquired the title as a holder in due course (Civ. Code, § 3140).

It is provided by section 3137 of the Civil Code that:

"To constitute notice of an infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating the same, the person to whom it is negotiated must have had actual knowledge of the infirmity or defect, or knowledge of such facts that his action in taking the instrument amounted to bad faith."

In the present case the note was complete and regular on its face, and it was found that Mrs. Lark became a holder for value before the note was overdue. It was not found that she or her agent had actual knowledge of any infirmity in the note or defect in the title of the person negotiating it; but it is contended by respondent that the findings from which the conclusion of law was drawn that she was not an innocent purchaser or a bona fide holder show that her agent had knowledge of such facts that his action in taking the instrument amounted to bad faith.

before maturity is not bound to make inquiry of the maker as to the consideration or circumstances leading to its execution (Kopperud v. Cookson, 50 Cal. App. 180, 194 P. 748); and mere knowledge of facts sufficient to put a prudent man on inquiry without actual knowledge, or a mere suspicion of an infirmity or defect of title, does not preclude the transferee from occupying the position of a holder in due course, unless the circumstances are such as to justify the conclusion that failure to make inquiry arose from a suspicion that inquiry would disclose a vice or defect in the instrument (Popp v. Exchange Bank, 189 Cal. 296, 208 P. 113; Goodale v. Thorn, 199 Cal. 307, 249 P. 11).

[5, 6] It has also been held that a purchaser is not charged with the duty to make inquiry by the fact alone that he had knowledge of the indorser's want of honesty in business matters (Setzer v. Deal, 135 N. C. 428, 47 S. E. 466; Vaughan v. Brandt, 21 Idaho, 628, 123 P. 591); and, while the fact that a transferee of negotiable paper purchases it for a sum less than its face value may be considered as other facts in the case upon the question of good faith, yet, in order to constitute him a holder in due course, it is not necessary that the price should equal the face value of the note (Schoen v. Houghton, 50 Cal. 528; Kopperud v. Cookson, supra; Kent v. Barnes, 72 Ill. App. 617; Farber v. Nat. F. & I. Co., 140 Ind. 54, 39 N. E. 249; Wright Investment Co. v. Frisco Realty Co., 178 Mo. 72, 77 S. W. 296; Citizens' Bank v. Rymon, 12 Neb. 541, 11 N. W. 850; Oppenheimer v. Farmers', etc., Bank, 97 Tenn. 19, 36 S. W. 705, 33 L. R. A. 767, 56 Am. St. Rep. 778; Lay v. Wissman, 36 Iowa, 305; McNamara v. Jose, 28 Wash. 461, 68 P. 903; Phelan v. Meyers, 67 Pa. 59, 5 Am. Rep. 402. Nor, according to Schoen v. Houghton, supra, was the fact found by the court that Mrs. Lark "bought the note as a matter of speculation" sufficient to impugn her title as a bona fide holder.

[7] While findings of fact are to receive such a construction as will uphold rather than defeat the judgment, and, if from the facts found other facts may be inferred which will support the judgment, it will be assumed that the trial court made such inferences. Paine v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 143 Cal. 654, 77 P. 659; Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 77, 31 P. 742, 22 L. R. A. 257; Gould v. Eaton, 111 Cal. 644, 44 P. 319, 52 Am. St. Rep. 201; People's, etc., Bank v. Rickard, 139 Cal. 285, 73 P. 858.

Exchange Bank, supra, were insufficient to support an inference of bad faith or the conclusion as a matter of law that Mrs. Lark was not an innocent purchaser or a bona fide holder.

[9] The court admitted, over objection, testimony of a witness to a conversation had with Nathan, the president of defendant Nathan & Co., some months after the transfer of the note to Mrs. Lark, in which Nathan admitted the falsity of the representations as to the value and condition of the mining claims. This testimony as to plaintiff was incompetent (First Nat. Bank v. Wolff, 79 Cal. 69, 21 P. 551, 748), but, as the particulars in which the finding that the representations were false were not specified in the bill of exceptions, and from all that appears the finding may have been supported by other evidence, we cannot say that the testimony was prejudicial or that its admission affected the result.

[10, 11] An objection by Armstrong to a question as to the details of a conversation between Charles T. Lark and defendant Proctor shortly before the transfer of the note was sustained; and it is claimed by appellant that this testimony was relevant on the question as to the good faith of Lark and his wife. This ruling, if erroneous, was invited by the attorney for appellant, who stated in response to the objection that, as to Armstrong, the testimony would be hearsay. A party who by his conduct induces the commission of error is estopped from asserting that the action of the court was erroneous.

Without reviewing the evidence in detail, it will suffice to say that those findings as to which appellant has specified the particulars in which he contends they were not justified by the evidence were sufficiently supported.

It follows from the insufficiency of the findings to support the conclusion of the trial court that Mrs. Lark was not an innocent purchaser or bona fide holder that the portion of the judgment appealed from cannot be sustained, and it is therefore ordered that the portion of the judgment which reads as follows: "It is further ordered and adjudged that plaintiff take nothing by his said action against defendant J. P. Armstrong, and that defendant J. P. Armstrong do have and recover from the plaintiff his costs and disbursements in this action amounting to the sum of ——— dollars, and that as to said defendant J. P. Armstrong the promissory note sued on be canceled by the clerk of this court"—be, and the same is, reversed.

In re SHAW'S ESTATE.★McREAVY v. SHAW.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 21, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 17, 1927.

1. Executors and administrators ⇨495(2)—There is distinction between executor and trustee, though offices are held by same person.

There is a distinction between a trustee and an executor, even though offices are held by one and the same person.

2. Executors and administrators ⇨495(2)—Executrix had right to renounce compensation under will and obtain statutory fees and fees for special services (Code Civ. Proc. § 1616; § 1618, as amended by St. 1925, p. 624).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1616, and section 1618, as amended by St. 1925, p. 624, executrix had authority to renounce compensation under the will and obtain statutory fees and fees allowed for special services rendered as executrix; Civ. Code, § 2274 not being pertinent.

3. Executors and administrators ⇨109(1)—Executrix can recover broker's fees only on finding by probate court that expenditure was in good faith and proper (Code Civ. Proc. § 1559, as amended by St. 1921, p. 210, § 5).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1559, as amended by St. 1921, p. 210, § 5, executrix held entitled to recover for broker's commissions expended by her only after determination by probate court that expenditure was made in good faith and was proper.

4. Appeal and error ⇨909(4)—Probate court will be presumed to have determined broker's fees disallowed executrix were not proper, in absence of evidence thereon.

Where probate court disallowed expenditure by executrix for broker's commissions on sale of real estate, it will be presumed that court decided expenditure was not proper, in absence of evidence thereon in the record, since all presumptions not contradicted or inconsistent with record must be indulged in favor of orders and judgments of lower court.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Final accounting of Marie Shaw McReavy, executrix of the estate of William Shaw, deceased, wherein Marion Shaw filed objections. From an order disallowing certain amounts, the executrix appeals. Reversed, with directions, in part, and in part affirmed.

F. L. Richardson, of San Diego, for appellant.

Crouch & Sanders, of San Diego, for respondent.

COLLIER, Justice pro tem. On February 8, 1923, William Shaw duly executed his last will and testament, in which, among other things, it was provided:

"Twelfth: I hereby affix the compensation of my executor and trustee at the sum of $10.00 per month, for the first twelve months after qualifying as such, and $5.00 per month for each month thereafter."

On February 16, 1925, he duly executed a codicil to his will changing the above provision to read as follows:

"Second: It is my further will and desire that the compensation of my executor and trustee fixed in the twelfth paragraph of my said will be thirty dollars ($30.00) per month instead of ten dollars ($10) and five dollars ($5) per month respectively, as therein provided, and that said paragraph twelfth of my said will is hereby revoked and changed accordingly."

Shaw died March 17, 1925. On April 3, 1925, his will and testament was admitted to probate. Marie Shaw McReavy, the appellant here, was appointed executrix thereunder and qualified as such. On May 19, 1925, appellant filed a "Renunciation of Compensation Given Executrix by Will," worded as follows:

"Comes now Marie Shaw McReavy, the duly appointed, qualified, and acting executrix of the above-named estate and hereby renounces all compensation given her under the last will and testament of William Shaw, deceased, and hereby elects to take the compensation allowed her by law, under the provisions of section 1618 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California."

At the time of his death, Shaw was engaged in the business of building and selling houses, and at his decease he was the owner of a large number of houses and a large number of contracts for houses previously built. Some of these buildings were in process of construction and were completed by the executrix. Under the orders of the probate court, she sold nine separate pieces of the real estate. She also adjusted and paid many outstanding claims for labor and material. In this and other matters she performed a great number of extraordinary and unusual services, for which she applied to and was allowed by the court the sum of $500. In her final account the appellant took credit for said $500 and also for $1,458.16, the statutory fees based upon the appraisal of the estate. Appellant also credited herself with $35, expended by her as commissions and paid to an agent for the sale of the household furniture and one automobile belonging to the estate. Upon the hearing of the final account, respondent objected to said items of $500, $1,458.16, and $35. The objections were sustained, and such amounts disallowed. From the order disallowing said amounts, the executrix appeals.

Respondent takes the position that, "where an instrument by which a trust is created fixes the compensation of the trustees, they cannot claim a larger sum. They are entitled to the amount specified, and no more." Civ. Code, § 2274.

[1] That there is a great distinction between a "trustee" and an "executor," even though these offices are held by one and the same person, there can be no question. "The performance of the trust created by the fifth article of the will is a duty devolving upon the persons named as executors and trustees in their capacity as trustees. [Italics ours.] It forms no part of their duty in their capacity as executors in the administration of the estate proper. * * * 'The appointment to a trust under the will, not essential to the office of an executor, does not constitute the trustee an executor according to the tenor, for the offices of an executor and of a trustee are distinct, and may be vested in different persons, and, when they are vested in the same person, the functions of each are nevertheless to be performed by him in the respective capacity, the probate court having jurisdiction over him in the one, but not in the other capacity. * * *' 1 Woerner on Administration, p. 504. The authorities cited by the author fully support the text." Estate of Phelps, 179 Cal. 703, 709, 178 P. 846, 848.

"The rule that the executors were succeeded by trustees whose duties were entirely different is well stated in Wheatley v. Badger, 7 Pa. 462, where it is said: 'It would be as absurd for a trustee to attempt the duties of an executor as for an executor to attempt the duties of a trustee, and it is therefore the business of the court to separate the two offices, in a question like the present, reddendo singula singulis. As executor he was to pay the legacies; as trustee he was the devisee and depository of the legal title for the accomplishment of confidential purposes, with which the office of an executor has no necessary connection. Had not the creation of the two offices in the same person been coupled also in the same clause, there would not have been a doubt of their severance in the contemplation of the testator; the will would have presented the union of distinct rights in the same person which are always treated as if they existed in different persons.'" Mackay v. San Francisco, 128 Cal. 678, 684-685, 61 P. 382, 384.

"Although the persons named in the will as its executors are the same as those to whom the testator directed the property to be distributed in trust for his children, yet the power of sale conferred upon the executors was not given by him to them as trustees, but terminated with their discharge as executors. The fact that the two offices are held successively by the same individuals does not give to them in the exercise of one office the power that had been conferred for the exercise of the other. Their rights and duties as executors were quite distinct from the duties imposed upon them as trustees, and their powers and duties as trustees did not begin until as executors they had ceased to have any control over the property. * * *"

Goad v. Montgomery, 119 Cal. 552, 561, 51 P. 681, 684 (63 Am. St. Rep. 145).

And ordinarily the trustee's duties begin when those of the executor end. Goad v. Montgomery, supra.

"In the absence of any direction in the will, or any evidence in relation thereto, the duties of a trustee named in the will, even though he be the person named therein as executor, would not begin until after the duties of the executor have terminated (see Goad v. Montgomery, 119 Cal. 552 [51 P. 681, 63 Am. St. Rep. 145]); and until he commences to exercise his duties as trustee he is not entitled to compensation therefor." (Italics ours.) Bemmerly v. Woodard, 136 Cal. 326, 331, 68 P. 1017, 1019.

Respondent relies on Estate of Whitney (Cal. App.) 248 P. 754, but the point here involved was not the issue in that case, for on page 758 the court says:

"The next objection relates to the order concerning the compensation of respondent trustees under the will."

And on page 758 we read:

"At the close of the administration of the estate * * * executors, filed their final account and petition for distribution. They filed a waiver of the compensation fixed by the will, and asked for and were given the statutory commissions as executors in lieu thereof. * * * In the order settling the final account it was provided that the sum allowed was for executor's commissions only, and was exclusive of such compensation as might thereafter be allowed by the court for such services as might be rendered by the executors as trustees under the terms of the will. No appeal was taken from this order, and it became final. When the first account of the trustees as such was heard, they petitioned the court for a reasonable allowance to them as trustees for services rendered in relation to the trust subsequent to the decree of distribution. Appellants herein filed their objection to any order being made for any allowance whatsoever, for the reason that their compensation had been specifically fixed and determined by the will of the deceased, and, under the express provisions of section 2274 of the Civil Code, they were entitled to the sum specified therein, and no more. The court disregarded the objection." (Italics ours.)

[2] In the instant case we are confronted solely with the question whether or not the executrix can renounce her compensation under the will and obtain statutory fees, in spite of the provision of the will as hereinbefore set forth.

Certainly, sections 1616 and 1618 (as amended by St. 1925, p. 624) of the Code of Civil Procedure are not meaningless when they provide:

1616. " * * * when the decedent, by his will, makes some other provision for the compensation of his executor, that shall be a full compensation for his services, unless by a written instrument, filed in the court, he renounces all claim for compensation provided for in the will."

1618. "The administrator, or executor, when no compensation is provided by the will or he renounces all claim thereto, must be allowed commissions upon the amount of estate accounted for by him, as follows. * * *

Attention is called to the mandatory character of this section. Perhaps, as stated in the Whitney Case, supra, and paraphrased by us, "the payment to her as executrix should be taken into account when she ultimately receives the fees provided for [as trustee]," but with that we have nothing to do and are not deciding here.

Estate of Runyon, 125 Cal. 195, 57 P. 783, does not decide otherwise. There the will provided for a fixed compensation for the executors. Neither of the latter filed a renunciation of his claim for compensation under the will, and the court, at page 197 (57 P. 784) said:

"The amount provided by the will must be taken as the measure of compensation which the testator deemed ample for all services to be rendered in the execution of the trust, and if the executors, either upon assuming their office, or by reason of unexpected circumstances occurring during the course of their administration of the trust, are called upon to perform extraordinary services, they must first renounce the compensation provided by the will before they can be entitled to any allowance for such additional services. The compensation of an executor, whether according to the rates fixed by the statute, or as determined by the testator, is not a gratuity, but is in consideration of the services he may render, and the amount fixed by the statute is deemed ample compensation for the services ordinarily required. If the executor would claim that his services entitle him to a greater compensation than that allowed by the statute, he must first renounce that provided by the will, and the court can then make him such allowance as will fully compensate him. Unless such renunciation is made, the provision in the will will be held under section 1616 to be 'full compensation' for his services." (Italics ours.)

Hence we decide that the court erred in disallowing the items of statutory compensation, $1,458.16, and for special services, $500. The special services plainly were rendered by appellant as executrix and not as trustee.

[3, 4] Now with reference to the item of $35. Prior to the amendment of section 1559 of the Code of Civil Procedure in 1921 (St.

1921, p. 210, § 5), the executor or administrator could not bind the estate by a contract for broker's commission for the sale of real estate. The rule is correctly stated in Hickman-Coleman Co. v. Leggett, 10 Cal. App. 29, at pages 31 and 35, 100 P. 1072, 1073, 1074, as follows:

"It is well settled that an executor or administrator cannot create any liability against the estate in his charge by his employment of attorneys, brokers, or others to assist him in the performance of his duties. The attorney, broker, or other person employed has no action or claim against the estate. Whatever claim he has, whether it be absolute or conditional, is against the executor or administrator in his individual capacity, who in turn may, if the expenditure was made in good faith and was proper, be credited therewith in the settlement of his accounts with the estate. (Citing cases.) * * * The amount that might be allowed him in his settlement with the estate did rest with the court. But before the court can fix such amount it is necessary that he as executor ask for such allowance. Whatever allowance is made must be made to the executor, and not to the broker. This is so well established as the law of this state that it is quite unnecessary to cite authorities."

See, also, Estate of Willard, 139 Cal. 501, 506, 73 P. 240, 64 L. R. A. 554; Golden Gate, etc., Co. v. Taylor, 168 Cal. 97, 141 P. 922, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1152, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 742; Eastwood v. Stewart, 64 Cal. App. 617, 222 P. 369, and McKee v. Hunt, 142 Cal. 526, 527, 77 P. 1103. It was therefore incumbent upon the probate court to determine "if the expenditure was made in good faith and was proper." As none of the evidence taken before the trial court appears in the record, we must presume that fact to have been decided adversely to the appellant. "Every intendment and presumption not contradicted by or inconsistent with the record on appeal must be indulged in favor of the orders and judgments of the superior court." 2 Cal. Jur. 852, § 499.

That portion of the order disallowing the items of statutory compensation, $1,458.16, and special services, $500, is reversed, with instructions to the lower court to allow said items and settle said final account accordingly. That portion of the order disallowing the item of $35 is affirmed.

LONDON GUARANTEE & ACCIDENT CO., Limited, v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 5721.)★

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Nov. 29, 1927.

1. Master and servant ~~§~~405(1)—That evidence was hearsay and unsatisfactory did not make it insufficient, if believed, as basis for award of compensation (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, § 60[a]).

Where, in a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), by a father to recover compensation for injuries resulting from the death of his son, the evidence introduced was hearsay and appeared to be somewhat unsatisfactory and perhaps lacking both in quantity and quality, held, that it was sufficient as an award basis, in view of section 60(a) of said act, if believed.

2. Master and servant ~~§~~388—Father, having estate of $5,500, held not dependent of son, so as to be entitled to award for son's death (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, § 14[b]).

Where, in a father's proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), to recover compensation for injuries resulting in the death of his son, the evidence showed that, though the father had been incapacitated for work for several years, he had an estate of approximately $5,500, consisting of interest-bearing notes and securities, but that he had an obsession of poverty, and his son contributed $25 per month for his support, held, that in view of § 14(b) of said act, the father was not a dependent of the son, so as to be entitled to an award.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act by John Murray, claimant, by his guardian ad litem and trustee, Frank X. Murray, for the death of the claimant's son, opposed by the London Guarantee & Accident Company, Limited, insurer. The Industrial Accident Commission of California granted an award, and claimant brings certiorari. Award annulled.

Haas & Dunnigan, H. E. Forster, and H. C. Johnston, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. In this proceeding petitioner seeks to have reviewed by this court an order of award of compensation made by the respondent Industrial Accident Commission to one John Murray, on account of an injury received by Ralph E. Murray in the course of his employment, which injury resulted in the death of the employee. The petitioner here was the insurer of the employer and John Murray, the beneficiary under the award made by the respondent commission, is the father of the employee.

The only questions suggested by petitioner relate to whether the evidence adduced before the respondent commission was sufficient to establish, first, that the father was a dependent of the son; secondly, that the son devoted any part of his earnings to the use of the father; and, thirdly, that the money, if any, furnished by the son to the father, was actually used by the father for his maintenance and support.

[1] Without attempting to set forth herein the evidence received at the hearing before the respondent commission, it may be stated that from the evidence it substantially appeared either directly or inferentially that for several years preceding the death of the employee his father had been totally incapacitated so far as performing any work was concerned; that, although he had an estate of approximately $5,500, consisting of interest-bearing notes and securities, there was no cash on hand; that the father led a miserly life, was obsessed of the idea that he had no money or property; and as a matter of fact (arising from such obsession), that he actually required financial assistance for his support; that commencing at about the time when the father became incapacitated for work, and continuously thereafter until the date of the death of the employee, the son sent to his father the sum of $25 per month.

Although the greater part of the evidence, especially that relating to the contributions made by the son to the father, depended to a large extent upon hearsay evidence, in view of the provisions of section 60(a) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (Stats. 1917, p. 831), and the construction placed thereon by the Supreme Court of this state in the case of State Compensation Insurance Fund v. Industrial Accident Commission, 195 Cal. 174, 181, 182, 231 P. 996, and cases therein cited, to the effect that, in a proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission for adjustment of compensation, hearsay evidence may be sufficient to establish any fact at issue, in the instant case it follows that although ordinarily speaking the evidence upon which the respondent commission acted in the premises appeared to be somewhat unsatisfactory and perhaps lacking both in quantity and quality, nevertheless, it was legally sufficient, if believed by the respondent commission, to support a conclusion that the son contributed the sum of $25 per month to the use of his father, and that such money was actually used by the father toward his maintenance and support. Such conclusion, however, does not reach the vital fact as to whether the father was actually a dependent of the son at the time of the son's death. The finding by the respondent commission was to the effect that the father was "partially dependent"; and the question to be determined is whether there was any substantial evidence by which such finding may be justified. It will be noted that the evidence showed that, although the father led a miserly life, he had an estate of $5,500, which consisted of interest-bearing securities; that because of the fact that he was incapacitated for work, and that he did not realize that he had such property, he believed himself to be dependent for support upon the son, who sent him $25 per month, and which sum was used by the father for his maintenance. But let it be supposed that while the father was incapacitated for work and that, so far as he was personally concerned, he believed himself dependent, nevertheless, as a matter of fact, he was worth $1,000,000: Could it be said that, considering the fact that the son sent the father $25 per month which was used by the father for his support, a finding of partial dependency of the father would be justified? If not, why in the existing circumstances of this matter should such a finding be held valid? Even assuming that the interest only on the $5,500 estate of the father were to be used for his support, at the ordinary interest rate of 7 per cent. per annum it would amount to more per month than the father was receiving from the son. But no reason is apparent why the principal of the sum should be held intact, or why, if necessary, a part of it should not be used for the support of the father. True, by successive demands upon the principal, it would eventually become exhausted; but we are not concerned with what might happen in the future. Section 14 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (Stats. 1917, p. 831), after providing for certain cases, contains the following provision:

"(b) In all other cases, questions of entire or partial dependency and questions as to who constitute dependents and the extent of their dependency shall be determined in accordance with the fact, as the fact may be at the time of the injury of the employee."

[2] It thus appears that our only interest with reference to the dependency of the father is what the conditions were at the time of the death of the employee. If the father was not then a dependent of the son, the fact that within a year, or within any other given time, the father might become such dependent, is neither of controlling force nor material to the inquiry; nor may a correct conclusion of the question of dependency be affected by the belief of the father in the premises, or by the possibility of the fact that the son was unintentionally deceived in the matter. The determination of the question must necessarily rest upon the facts; and those facts are that at the time of the death of the son the father at least did not require financial assistance for his support.

No evidence having been introduced before the respondent commission in support of the finding to the effect that the father was "partially dependent" upon the son, but the evidence appearing to the contrary, it follows that the award should be annulled. It is so ordered.

PAN-PACIFIC CONST. CO. v. MEADOWS,
Superintendent of Streets. (Civ. 5720.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 6, 1927.

1. Municipal corporations $\S$ 269(1)—Pier extending from street held "street," within statute authorizing improvements and repairs (Improvement Act 1911, $\S\S$ 1, 2, as amended by St. 1925, p. 244, and St. 1923, p. 104; $\S$ 79[a], as added by St. 1913, p. 57).

Pier which abutted upon street and which was continuation or extension thereof held a "street" within the meaning of Improvement Act (St. 1911, p. 732) $\S\S$ 1, 2, as amended by St. 1925, p. 244, and St. 1923, p. 104, and section 79(a), as added by St. 1913, p. 57, authorizing the doing of any work deemed necessary to improve the whole or any portion of any street owned by cities of certain class.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Street.]

2. Municipal corporations $\S$ 293(2)—Contract held valid, though resolution of intention stated work was driving piles for pier and reconstructing landing, whereas specifications required also laying of asphalt surface.

Proceedings leading to award of contract by municipality for repair and improvement of pier held not invalid because resolution of intention provided that work to be done was driving of piles and reconstruction of boat landing, and that all of the work was to be done under a certain specification, whereas the specification set forth additional work of laying an asphaltic surface; the resolution of intention being controlling and the additional work being superfluous.

Application by the Pan-Pacific Construction Company for writ of mandate to be directed to W. F. Meadows, as Superintendent of Streets of the City of Hermosa Beach, to require him to pass upon the sufficiency of certain bonds and to execute a contract for the improvement and repair of a certain pier and boat landing. Writ granted.

Paul S. Honberger and Collamer A. Bridge, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Arthur M. Ellis, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. [1] This is a petition for a writ of mandate to be directed to respondent, requiring him in his official capacity as Superintendent of streets of the city of Hermosa Beach to pass upon the sufficiency and form of certain bonds tendered to him by the petitioner herein, and also requiring said respondent to execute a certain contract for the improvement and repair of portions of a designated pier and boat landing located within the said city of Hermosa Beach.

In ordinary circumstances, it is unquestioned that the official duty of the respondent would require the performance by him of each of the things included within the demands of the petitioner herein. But, in the particular circumstances surrounding the transaction which is the basis of this controversy, it is the contention of respondent that the city of Hermosa Beach was without authority or jurisdiction to order the contemplated work or to execute the contract for its performance, and for that reason it became and is no part of the duty of respondent as such official to comply with said demands of petitioner.

By the record herein, it stands as admitted facts that the city of Hermosa Beach is the owner of the Hermosa Beach pier, boat landing, and the lands which they cover; that the pier abuts upon and is a continuation or extension of a street within said city; that an ordinance of intention adopted by the legislative body of said city of Hermosa Beach provided:

That the "ocean end of * * * the pier be repaired and reinforced by the driving of certain piles; that the present boat landing be cut loose from the pier, changed, and reconstructed—all as shown in the plans and specifications hereinafter referred to. * * * That all the foregoing work is fully set forth and delineated in plan No. 2453a, on file in the office of the city engineer, to be done under specification No. 78, on file in the office of the city clerk, to which reference is hereby made for a full and detailed description of said proposed work."

Sections 1, 2, and 79a, of the Improvement Act (Stats. 1911, p. 730, as respectively amended by Stats. 1925, p. 244, Stats. 1923, p. 104, and Stats. 1913, p. 57) authorize the doing of any work which may be deemed necessary to improve the whole or any portion of any street owned by a city of the class of the city of Hermosa Beach.

The solution of the question presented to this court depends primarily upon whether the pier in contemplation of law was a continuation or extension of the street upon which the pier abutted.

It often happens that a street crosses a stream or marshy or overflowed land, and in such case a causeway or bridge (which in no material respect would differ from a pier or a wharf) over such stream or land would constitute a part of the street or highway with which such causeway or bridge connected. The authorities are so numerous to that effect that citation thereof is deemed unnecessary. It is apparent that the test of whether a structure in the nature of a pier is a street depends primarily upon its location with reference to existing and recognized highways, as well as upon the use to which it is put or is adaptable by the general public.

In Gould on Waters (3d Ed.) § 119, it is said:

" * * * The question whether a wharf is public or private depends upon the purpose for which it was built, the uses to which it has been applied, the place where located, and the nature and character of the structure. When a public highway is laid out to navigable waters, its termination is presumed to be a public landing as incident to the highway * * *"—citing authorities.

In the case of Hafner Manufacturing Co. v. City of St. Louis, 262 Mo. 621, 172 S. W. 28, it is held that a public wharf may be a "public highway." In ruling upon the question the court said in part:

"It may be taken as acceptable doctrine that a public wharf on a navigable stream, connected, as here, with public streets and in a sense an extension of such streets, is, in the eye of the law, a public highway. Its character is similar. The right to the common use of it in the public is similar, and in a very just sense the rights of the city in, and its duty toward, it are akin to its rights and duties toward its public streets. * * *"

Although in State v. Cowan, 29 N. C. 239, 247, it was held that (syllabus) "a wharf, simply as such and not being part of a street, is not a public highway," nevertheless, in the course of the opinion, the following language may be found:

"It is possible the wharf may form part of the street, at its termination; for example, as some are made for ferry landings."

In the case of City of Buffalo v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 190 N. Y. 84, 82 N. E. 513, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 506, where many authorities are cited, it is held that, where a private dock is built on a public street on the shore of navigable waters, the dock becomes a part of the street, and the public has a right to travel over it.

In the case of Frater v. Baylen Street Wharf Co., 57 Fla. 63, 49 So. 188, 131 Am. St. Rep. 1084, it appeared that a street as originally platted abutted on the waters of a bay, that thereafter such street was extended into the bay by means of a wharf or pier constructed of wooden piling and planks, and that, as time went by, the wharf extension of the street was filled in with earth and stone and thus converted into solid ground. Touching the main point at issue in the case, in part the court said:

"The contention of the plaintiff below is that the whole extension of said Baylen street, from its original terminus at Main street clear out to the end of its present terminus at deep water is still the wharf of plaintiff, and that it is entitled to wharfage upon all goods landed upon said extension from the water at any point south of Main street.

"This contention we cannot sustain. The rule of law is well settled that a public street leading to navigable waters will keep even pace with the extension of the land, whether the change in the land be due to natural causes or to the voluntary act of the owner of the land.—Mark v. Village of West Troy, 151 N. Y. 453, 45 N. E. 842; Dana v. Graddock, 66 N. H. 593, 32 A. 757; Hoboken Land & Improvement Co. v. Mayor, 36 N. J. Law, 540; People v. Lambier, 5 Denio (N. Y.) 9 [47 Am. Dec. 273]; Mayor of Jersey City v. Morris Canal & Banking Co., 12 N. J. Eq. 547; Newark Lime & Cement Co. v. Mayor of Newark, 15 N. J. Eq. 64; Gould on Waters (3d Ed.) § 157."

The case of Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 85 App. Div. 530, 83 N. Y. S. 469, was similar in its facts to the case just cited, in that a street which abutted on navigable waters was extended into such waters by means of earthen approaches and a pier. In part the court said:

"* * * When the grantee constructed his pier and the approaches thereto, such approaches were made by the continuation of Forty-Second and Forty-Third streets, as laid down upon the map, to the bulkhead line, and further continuation of the same was made by the construction of the pier. It follows, as a necessary result from this state of facts, that this construction was of public streets, as such, and the right of the public therein to use them for all the purposes of a public street attached thereto the moment such construction was made. This right of the public not only attached to the streets so far as they were filled in with earth and extended to the bulkhead line, but the pier likewise, which was projected from such line, became a public highway as a street, subject to the passage and the rights of the public therein, and subject to the right of use by the public as a wharf and highway"—citing authorities.

And so in the case of Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Forty-Second St., etc., Ferry R. Co., 176 N. Y. 408, 68 N. E. 864, the following language of the court appears:

"* * * The general public has a right of passage over the places where land highways and navigable waters meet; and, when a wharf or bulkhead is built at the end of a land highway and into the adjacent water, the highway is by operation of law extended by the length of the added structure"—citing cases.

See, also, Gluck v. Ridgewood Ice Co., 56 Hun, 642, 9 N. Y. 254.

The ruling in the only California authority to which attention has been directed is in keeping with that indicated in those cases to which reference has been had. Where a street as originally laid out or dedicated extended only to the waters of a bay, and thereafter the land within the extended lines of such street into the bay was filled, or such space enlarged by accretion, it was held, in the case of Wood v. City of San Francisco, 4 Cal. 190, that, after such filling, the street continued to the high water. In the course of the opinion, the court said:

"It is contended that there was no dedication of the space between Front street and the water line of the city, to public uses; and this whole argument is based upon the fact, that, on the official map of the city, by which the legislative grant of beach and water lots was made, said street was not carried out to the front line of the city, while California and other parallel streets were. To my mind this raised no such presumption. Where a city is laid out with streets running to the water, such streets should be held to continue on to the high water, if the city front is afterwards filled in, or the space enlarged by accretion or otherwise. Any other doctrine would be destructive of the interests of commercial communities."

Considering the facts in the instant case, the principle of law as announced in the foregoing cases would seem applicable. It should make no difference that, instead of a fill or a mole being constructed, the street was extended by way of a pier. Hence, if, in line with such authorities the pier in question became a part of the street as thus extended, it would follow that the proposed work came within the provisions of the Improvement Act of 1911 and the amendments thereto which authorized the city of Hermosa Beach to make the improvements and repairs to which reference has been had herein.

[2] However, respondent contends that the proceedings leading up to the awarding of the contract for such improvements were fatally defective in that by the resolution of intention adopted by the legislative body of the city of Hermosa Beach the proposed work was described as the repairing and reinforcing of the pier by the driving of certain piles, and that the boat landing be cut loose from the pier, changed and reconstructed, all as shown in plan No. 2453a, on file in the office of the city engineer, and that such work be done as indicated in specification No. 78, on file in the office of the city clerk, to which reference heretofore has been had herein.

By the resolution of intention it will be noted that it is provided that all the foregoing work is "fully set forth and delineated in plan No. 2453a," and that said work is to be done under specification No. 78. Nothing contained in the resolution of intention indicates that the extent or description of the work is to be shown in any place other than as is "fully set forth" in plan No. 2453a. By referring particularly to the provisions contained in specification No. 78, it may be found that, among other things, the manner generally of laying asphaltic surfaces is indicated, but that neither the resolution of intention nor plan No. 2453a contains either specification, profile, or cross-section for the doing of the work of the laying of any sheet asphalt on the deck of the pier or elsewhere. It therefore appears that specification No. 78 includes a description of the manner in which certain work, to wit, the laying of an asphaltic surface, not mentioned in either the resolution of intention or in the plan No. 2453a, may be done. The description in specification No. 78 of the specifications for laying an asphaltic surface bore no relation whatsoever to the work expressly mentioned in the resolution of intention, or as referred to in plan No. 2453a. So far as asphaltic surfaces were concerned, they were entirely foreign to the work proposed to be done, either by the resolution of intention or as "fully set forth and described in plan No. 2453a." Had specification No. 78 contained, among other things, a detailed description of the manner of constructing a ten-story building, with the same propriety could it be claimed that, because specification No. 78 provided for the construction of such a building, necessarily the erection of that building became a part of the resolution of intention, as in the instant circumstances to contend that, because the manner of the laying of an asphaltic surface is set forth in specification No. 78, the laying of an asphaltic surface became a part of the resolution of intention. While the specification for the laying of sheet asphalt would have been appropriate had it been called for by the precedent resolution of intention, which included the reference to the plan number, in the circumstances present the description of the manner of laying an asphalt surface was superfluous and unnecessary.

It is clear that in case of any conflict it is the resolution of intention which governs in the premises, rather than any work described in the specifications, which is not included in the resolution of intention. The principle is applied in the case of Bay Rock Co. v. Bell, 123 Cal. 150, 65 P. 299, where, among other things, it is held that a resolution of intention, although it sufficiently described the proposed grading and macadamizing of a street and contained a reference to specifications as to proposed culverts, macadamizing, and crosswalks, yet which neither intelligently described nor referred to the specifications for any description of the materials for proposed curbs and gutters, could not be rendered valid by any details of construction contained within the specifications; and that the resolution of intention, which provided specifically only that the macadamizing, culverts, and crosswalks should be constructed in accordance with "the special specifications adopted for said work," must be presumed to have intentionally omitted any such direction as to curbs and gutters.

It is therefore concluded that, so far as is disclosed by the record herein, the proceedings leading up to the awarding of the contract in question were in all respects valid, and that it became and was the duty of respondent, as street superintendent of the city of Hermosa Beach, to execute said contract and to pass upon the sufficiency and form of the bonds tendered to him by the petitioner herein in connection with the execution of said contract.

Let the writ issue as prayed.

MILLER et ux. v. REIDY. (Civ. 5580; La. 9667).★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 4, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 2, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 1, 1927.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨103(1)—Lessor claiming forfeiture must have closed every avenue of escape to lessee.

Where a lessor claims a forfeiture under a lease, he must have closed every avenue of escape to lessee, since courts do not favor forfeitures.

2. Contracts ⇨318—Courts avoid enforcing forfeitures wherever possible.

Courts do not favor covenants for forfeiture and will avoid enforcing them wherever possible.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨103(1)—In construing provisions for forfeiture in lease, parties are presumed to have intended to limit application as narrowly as language will permit.

In construing the provisions of a lease providing for forfeiture in case of breach, court will give full weight to the presumption that it was the intent of the parties to limit the application of the forfeiture provisions as narrowly as the language used will permit.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨104—Covenant in lease against assignment without lessor's written consent held personal where lease provided for forfeiture for breach.

Where a lease provided that, in case of a breach of a covenant against assignment without the lessor's written consent, the lessor might at his option claim a forfeiture of the lease, covenant held personal, binding on the lessee only, and not running with the land so as to be enforceable against the assignee of lessee's assignee.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨76(3)—Assignee of lessee's assignee held not "successor or assign" of lessee, within lease provisions prohibiting lessee's successors or assigns assigning lease without lessor's written consent and providing for forfeiture.

Assignee of lessee's assignee held not "successor or assign" of the lessee, within the provisions of a lease that terms of lease should be binding upon the successor or assigns of the lessee, which would include provisions prohibiting the assignment of the lease without the lessor's written consent, and providing for forfeiture in case of breach.

6. Landlord and tenant ⚡76(3)—Inhibition against assigning lease without lessor's consent binds subsequent assignees only when lease specifically so provides, or when consent to each assignment is so qualified.

Provision in a lease against assigning the lease without lessor's written consent does not bind subsequent assignees unless the lease itself specifically so provides, or unless the lessor gives a qualified consent to each assignment making such inhibition binding upon each subsequent assignee.

7. Landlord and tenant ⚡112(2)—Lessor waived right to forfeiture for assignment of lease without his consent by accepting rent, notwithstanding qualified receipts.

Where lessor continued to accept rent after the assignee of lessee's assignee had assigned the lease without lessor's consent, which was alleged to be breach of lease, held, that he waived any right to forfeiture which the alleged breach might have given, notwithstanding that in accepting rent he executed receipts reciting that the acceptance was without prejudice to his rights.

8. Landlord and tenant ⚡112(1)—Waiver of breach of lease is question of intention.

Whether the lessor waives a breach of a lease is a question of intention.

9. Landlord and tenant ⚡291(9)—In action for unlawful detainer, pleading in answer facts constituting waiver by lessor of rights to forfeiture held sufficient pleading of waiver.

In lessor's action for unlawful detainer against the assignee of the original lessee's assignee, defendant's pleading in answer facts which would constitute a waiver by the lessor of any rights he might have to forfeiture held sufficient pleading of waiver.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action in unlawful detainer by J. T. Miller and wife against P. M. Reidy. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed. See, also, 260 P. 361.

E. J. Miller and Leland S. Bower, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

I. Henry Harris, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. At all the times herein mentioned Dr. J. T. Miller and his wife, Hulda S. Miller, have been the owners of real property situated at 1140 to 1142 South Figueroa street, Los Angeles, and the business building thereon. They leased the premises to one Rutledge, doing business under the name of Rutledge Motor Company. By the provisions of the lease the latter's tenancy began on the 1st day of February, 1920, and continued for a term of 5 years. It was stipulated in the lease:

"That the lessee shall not assign the lease nor sublet any or all of the demised premises without the written consent of the lessor first had and obtained, and any attempt so to do shall be void and confirm no rights on any third party; * * * that should the lessee default in any of the covenants or violate any of the provisions thereof, the lessor at his option may re-enter and take possession of the premises and remove all persons and property therefrom. Before lessor retakes possession of said premises, he shall give lessee 3 days' written notice within which time lessee may cure such default. Upon taking possession as above stated, lessor may either terminate the lease and recover from the lessee all damages resulting from lessee's breach of the lease, or the lessor may relet the whole or any part of the premises on such terms and conditions as he may with reasonable diligence obtain, and the lessee shall be liable for any deficiency in rent," etc.

Also:

"Provided the lessee shall have faithfully performed all of said obligations in the manner herein provided, upon the delivery of said premises to the lessor, said lessor shall return said sum to the lessee; or said lessor may at his option apply said sum or any part thereof remaining in his hands to the credit of the lessee on account of any rent coming due hereunder."

Rutledge made the deposit of $2,000 required by the lease. Later, with the written consent of the lessors, he assigned his interest in that conveyance to one Buxton, who, on February 10, 1922, also with written consent of the lessors, assigned the same to P. M. Reidy. In October, 1922, Reidy, without the consent, written or otherwise, of the lessors, assigned his interest to the Los Angeles Haynes Company. Immediately thereafter the lessors notified Reidy that he had violated the terms of the lease by subletting without their written consent. The notice also demanded that Reidy cause the Los Angeles Haynes Company to remove from the premises or return possession to the lessors. Reidy did neither. However, he continued to pay rent in advance, which the lessors accepted, but upon each occasion J. T. Miller gave a receipt which included a statement that in receiving the money such receipt should be "without prejudice to any of my rights under the lease of said premises." The next action taken which requires mention was on October 24th, when the lessors served a second notice on the respondent herein, similar in import to the first. Again the latter made no move to comply with the requirements of the notice. Then the lessors instituted an action in unlawful detainer, and, in addition to asking for possession, prayed judgment for recovery of the reasonable rental value of the premises, which was alleged to be $250 per month since October 1, 1922. After a trial judgment was rendered for the defendant, Reidy. This was, presumably, conformable to the defenses contained in the answer and to the findings of the court, in effect as follows: That although the plaintiffs did not file their consent in writing to the assignment of the lease by Reidy to the Los Angeles Haynes Company, nevertheless they had given such written consent to two prior assignments, and "did not in any wise or at all reserve or impose any condition, covenant, or obligation against the further assignment thereof"; that the lessors accepted rent from Reidy with full knowledge that he had assigned the lease. In other words, the trial court found that by accepting the rent with knowledge of the breaches of covenants of the lease by Reidy, the lessors had waived the provision requiring their written consent to validate an assignment, and also that by giving consent to the two prior assignments without further reservation in that regard, they had exhausted their right to require written consent to any subsequent assignment thereof. It was further found that Reidy had not unlawfully retained possession of the leased premises, that the value of the rents and profits of the property was not in excess of $300 per month, and that it was unnecessary for plaintiffs to employ attorneys to prosecute the action.

[1-4] Appellants argue that the trial court was wrong in holding that the stipulations of the lease that it should not be assigned without written consent of the lessors was exhausted by such consent being given to the assignments from Rutledge to Buxton and from Buxton to Reidy. He who claims a forfeiture must have closed every avenue of escape to his opponent. Mindful that the law provides other remedies more consonant with justice, courts avoid enforcing covenants for forfeiture wherever possible. Such agreements are rarely tolerated. Spangler v. Spangler, 11 Cal. App. 321, 104 P. 995. Therefore, in construing provisions of the lease relied upon by appellants, we give full weight to the presumption that it was the intent of the parties to limit its application as narrowly as the language used would permit. The covenant that "the lessee shall not assign or hypothecate this lease or the leasehold estate nor sublet any or all of the demised premises, without the written consent of the lessor first obtained," is personal, binding upon the lessee only, and not one running with the land.

"Each and all of the provisions hereof shall be binding upon * * * the successor or assigns of the lessee if any assignment be made with the consent in writing of the lessor."

This provision does not extend the covenant against assignment so as to include Reidy's assignment to the Haynes Company. The contract forbade the "successor or assigns of the lessee" assigning without license. The Los Angeles Haynes Company is neither a "successor" nor one of the "assigns" of Buxton. Not only a strict but a fair construction of this language leaves the lease in the hands of Reidy, free from the forfeiture clause as affecting the right of assignment. German-American Sav. Bank v. Gollmer, 155 Cal. 683, 102 P. 932, 24 L. R. A.

(N. S.) 1066; Randol v. Tatum, 98 Cal. 390, 33 P. 433; Chipman v. Emeric, 5 Cal. 49, 63 Am. Dec. 80, and for a case almost on all fours with the instant one, see Easley Coal Co. v. Brush Creek Coal Co., 91 W. Va. 291, 112 S. E. 512.

[6] The only manner in which the inhibition may be made binding upon subsequent assignees is by appropriate language in the lease itself or by a qualified consent to each assignment. Rothrock v. Sanborn, 178 Cal. 693, 174 P. 314.

[7, 8] On the other branch of the appeal we have no difficulty in upholding the judgment of the trial court. If the assignment were to be regarded as a breach of the lease, the evidence is sufficient to support the finding that the right to take advantage of such breach was waived by the lessors. It is true that in accepting each month's rent from Reidy, Dr. Miller executed a receipt in the following language:

"Received from P. M. Reidy $300 for rent of premises at 1140 So. Figueroa St., for the month of [inserting date] without prejudice to any of my rights under the lease of said premises."

This was a clear attempt to eat the cake and still keep it. His actions belie his words. Waiver is a question of intention. Alden v. Mayfield, 164 Cal. 6, 127 P. 45; Jones v. Della Maria, 48 Cal. App. 171, 191 P. 943; Myers v. Herskowitz, 33 Cal. App. 581, 165 P. 1031. For the lessors month after month to accept rents specified in the lease, and at the same time declare that there was a forfeiture, results in an irreconcilable inconsistency. Dr. Miller knew that Reidy assigned or sublet to the Haynes Company as early as October 17, 1922, when appellants served the first notice above mentioned. This was two years before suit was filed, and he accepted rent from Reidy even after that time. The very words of the receipt given by Dr. Miller compel the conclusion that when each one was signed he regarded the lease as still in force. Each of these instruments declares that the lessors yet maintain all "rights under the lease of said premises." If an unauthorized assignment had been made, the lessors had the right to declare the term at an end, or they could have waived the breach and let the lease continue. Nowhere within that agreement, nor in the law, is there a stipulation or provision that they might do both. The trial court found against appellants on the issue of waiver, and we are satisfied that their conduct was such as to justify that finding.

[9] But appellants assert that one relying upon a waiver must plead it, and that "a recovery cannot be had on evidence of waiver of conditions where the complaint states performance of the conditions." There is no merit in this claim, for, assuming the legal premise to be correct as a rule of pleading, the answer pleads facts which the trial court found to be true, and which it is clear were held by that court to constitute a waiver of the provisions of the lease involved in this suit. In that behalf it is alleged in the respondent's answer that at the time of the transfer of Reidy's interest to the Los Angeles Haynes Company the lessors knew of that transfer, and saw said company enter possession of the premises, and remain there; also that "every month commencing in October, 1922, to October, 1924, prior to the commencement of the action, the plaintiffs have accepted the sum of $300 monthly as rental for said premises under said lease."

In view of the foregoing, other points discussed by appellants do not require consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: THOMPSON, J.; COLLIER, Justice pro tem.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a hearing in this court is denied. The judgment appears to have been properly affirmed for the reasons set forth in the discussion of the second branch of the appeal. We are not to be understood as approving or disapproving what is said elsewhere in the opinion concerning the covenant against assignment contained in the lease.

REIDY v. MILLER et ux. (Civ. 5581.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct 4, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 2, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 1, 1927.

1. Pleading ⇨129(2)—In action for deposit made by lessee, lessor's failure to deny plaintiff's allegation of assignment to him held to admit allegation.

In action to recover deposit made by lessee as security for performance of lease, lessor's failure to deny plaintiff's allegation that lessee's assignee had assigned rights to the deposit to him held to constitute admission of such assignment, and hence trial court properly accepted the allegation as true.

2. Appeal and error ⇨837(2)—Findings in companion case, not consolidated for trial, cannot be considered findings as to both cases on appeal.

Findings in case which, by stipulation, was made companion case on appeal, but had not been consolidated for purposes of trial, cannot be considered findings as to both cases.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨184(2)—Substantial compliance with terms of lease held sufficient to entitle assignee to recover lessee's deposit with lessor securing performance of lease.

Substantial compliance with the terms of a lease, there having been only very minor damages amounting to $173.20, held sufficient to entitle assignee to recover lessee's deposit, amounting with interest to $2,420, which was deposited with the lessor as security for the faithful performance of the lease.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨184(2)—Equity does not favor forfeiture of money deposited as security for performance of lease.

Courts of equity do not favor forfeiture of money deposited by lessee with lessor as security for the faithful performance of the terms of the lease.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨184(2)—Assignee of lease and lessee's deposit securing performance of lease held not to lose right to recover deposit by assigning lease.

Assignee of lease and also of lessee's deposit made with lessor to secure performance of terms of lease held not to lose his right to recover the deposit by assigning the lease to another party; there being nothing in the assignment containing any reference to lessee's deposit with the lessor.

6. Landlord and tenant ⇨184(2)—Assignor's agreement with his assignee for deposit securing performance of lease held no evidence of assignment of assignor's rights to original lessee's deposit with lessor.

Where the assignee of a lease, and also of rights to a deposit made by the lessee to the lessor to secure performance of the lease, assigned the lease, an agreement with his assignee for a deposit securing performance of the lease and to be applied in payment of rent held no evidence of an assignment of rights to the lessee's deposit with the lessor.

7. Trial ⇨396(5)—Conclusion of witness that lessee took possession when lease was written and that lease went into effect on certain date held no basis for finding as to date of lessee's possession.

In action to recover deposit from lessor deposited as security for performance of lease, statement of witness that the lessee took possession when the lease was written and that the lease went into effect on a certain date held a mere conclusion which could not be made the basis for a finding as to the date on which the lessee took possession.

8. Interest ⇨36(1)—Court's allowance of 7 per cent. interest on deposit securing performance of lease held error where contract stipulated for 4 per cent. only (Civ. Code, § 3289).

Under Civ. Code, § 3289, in action to recover deposit with lessor to secure performance of lease, where plaintiff had judgment, court's allowance of 7 per cent. interest held error where the lease agreement stipulated that the money on deposit should bear interest at 4 per cent. only.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action for money by P. M. Reidy against J. T. Miller and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Leland S. Bower and E. J. Miller, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

I. Henry Harris, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. This is a suit concerning the same transaction as Miller v. Reidy (No. 5580), reported in (Cal. App.) 260 P. 358. Only a few facts need be here mentioned in addition to those stated in the opinion in that case. In this action Reidy filed a complaint in which he sought to recover $2,000, with interest, deposited with the lessors by the original lessee, Rutledge, as security for the faithful performance of the lease. After trial by the court without a jury judgment as prayed was entered for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal therefrom. A number of grounds are advanced as reasons for reversal.

[1] The assignment of his interest in the lease by Reidy to the Los Angeles Haynes Company did not constitute a breach of the covenant against assignment. Miller v. Reidy, supra. Appellants are not in a position to question the assignment to Reidy of the deposit money in dispute, since the amended complaint alleges such assignment to have been made, and the answer thereto makes no denial of that allegation; hence the trial court properly accepted it as true.

[2] Appellants devote much of their briefs to argument that since the complaint alleges performance by the lessee, recovery must be had if at all upon proof of such performance and that findings in favor of the plaintiff and respondent to the effect that the latter had broken a covenant of the lease, but that such breach had been waived by the lessors was unauthorized by law and erroneous. The simple answer to this contention is that the court made no such findings. In Miller v. Reidy, supra, findings of this nature were made, but, as appellants point out, in another part of their brief, these cases were not consolidated for the purposes of trial, but, by stipulation, are merely companion cases upon appeal.

[3, 4] What the court did find in the instant case was that all the terms and conditions of the lease had been performed by the lessees and their assigns except that they did not pay rent after the 1st day of January, 1925, but remained in possession until and including the 3d day of January, 1925, and that the respondent should reimburse appellants for damages suffered to the premises in the sum of $173.20. This was a finding of substantial performance of the terms of the contract by the lessees and their assignees. The purpose of the deposit of $2,000 made by Rutledge was that it should be "security for the payment of rent and the faithful performance by the lessee of each and all of the obligations herein undertaken by him." Such a stipulation does not warrant the stand of the lessors herein that the slightest default upon the part of the lessees will preclude them from receiving the balance of the money on deposit after deduction of a sum sufficient to fully compensate the lessors for all damage resulting from the default. In contemplation of the fact that the trial court found that the full damage resulting to the lessors amounted to but $173.20, appellants insist that they may retain the entire fund of $2,420, principal and interest, unless respondent is able to show complete compliance with every term and condition of the lease and that such necessity is a condition precedent which has not been met by respondent. Under the circumstances above stated, the findings of the trial court are sustained by evidence and its adjustment of the matter is justified by principles both of equity and of law. It is in accord both with the fair interpretation of the contract as written and with the equitable aversion to the decreeing of a forfeiture, which would result if the lessors' exaction in this behalf were upheld.

[5] Appellants insist that Reidy has no standing in this action because he either never received an assignment of the right to recover the deposit in question, or, if he did, that he has assigned it to the Los Angeles Haynes Company. As we have pointed out, by failure to make denial it was admitted that Reidy received an assignment of the $2,000 fund from Buxton. In supporting the alternative position appellants cite a number of cases to the effect that "plaintiff, having parted with his interest in the lease, is not damaged," none of which pertain in any way to the point under discussion. For instance, McAllister v. Clement, 75 Cal. 182, 16 P. 775, involved a suit for damages for alleged failure of a notary public to attach his certificate to a document acknowledged before him. Bowman v. Wohlke, 166 Cal. 121, 135 P. 37, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1011, was an action for damages based upon an asserted conspiracy. In neither of these cases was any kind of assignment mentioned, nor are the other decisions referred to on this phase of the appeal at all in point. It appears to be a fact that the assignment by Reidy to the Los Angeles Haynes Company contained no reference to the deposit with the Millers. It purported to be merely an assignment of the lease. Under these circumstances, Reidy retained the right to recover the money. Pike v. Psihogios, 68 Cal. App. 145, 228 P. 722. In so concluding and adjudging we think the trial court committed no error.

[6] Appellants claim that other evidence offered by respondent shows that he had assigned his interest to the Los Angeles Haynes Company. The evidence to which reference is made is the agreement between Reidy and the company by which the latter was to pay the former $5,000 in cash, $2,000 of which was to be held as security for carrying out the terms of the lease, and finally to be applied in payment of the rent for the last 4 months of the lease, at the stipulated rate of $500 per month. There is nothing to connect this agreement with the contract of the Millers. It is mere conjecture to say that the parties had that deposit in mind, and to so hold would require that we read into the contract between Reidy and the company an entire provision not contained therein.

[7] Appellants insist that the term of the lease did not begin until February 1, 1920, and that, therefore rent, should have been paid for the entire month of January, 1925. The lease provides that the term shall be for 5 years from January 1, 1920, or as soon thereafter as possession might be had. The trial court found that possession was surrendered to the lessors January 3, 1925. We are referred to a statement by the witness Miller, who was asked when the lessee took possession. However, he did not answer the question, but instead said:

"When this was written, and it went into effect when the building was completed, February 1, 1922."

Later he corrected the statement to make the year indicated 1920. The answer just quoted was a conclusion of the witness and was flatly contradictory. It surely cannot be used as a basis for a finding, and we are referred to no other testimony as to the exact date on which possession was taken by the lessee.

[8] In one contention appellants are correct. The trial court allowed interest at the rate of 7 per cent. from the 3d day of January, 1925, until August 16, 1926, the date of the entry of judgment. The lease agreement stipulated that the money on deposit should bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum. This rate of interest should have been continued until judgment. Civ. Code, § 3289.

It is ordered that the judgment be modified as indicated in this regard, and as so modified it is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LEIN. (Cr. 1548.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 1, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Nov. 28, 1927.

1. Criminal law ⇨507(1)—Possession of intoxicating liquor by purchaser held not to make him accomplice of seller prosecuted for possession.

In prosecution for possession of intoxicating liquor, possession of alleged purchaser in changing whisky from large containers into smaller ones and loading them into his automobile did not make him accomplice of alleged seller, requiring his testimony to be corroborated.

2. Fines ⇨12—Judgment of imprisonment on failure to pay fine for possession of liquor for not more than six months held void only as to imprisonment beyond 90 days (Pen. Code, § 1205; National Prohibition Act [27 USCA § 46]).

Under Pen. Code, § 1205, providing that imprisonment on failure to pay fine imposed by superior court shall not be beyond term for which defendant might be sentenced to imprisonment for offense of which he was convicted, on conviction for possession of intoxicating liquor judgment fining defendant $1,000, and, on failure to pay, imprisoning him one day for each $2 of fine, not to exceed six months, under National Prohibition Act, tit. 2, § 29 (27 USCA § 46), making imprisonment for such offense 90 days, was void, only as to imprisonment in excess of 90 days.

3. Criminal law ⇨1036(8)—Appellate court should determine sufficiency of evidence to support conviction, even if it is not challenged.

On conviction, though appellant only attacks sufficiency of evidence to corroborate alleged accomplice, court should determine whether verdict was contrary to evidence, regardless of failure to challenge it in such respect.

4. Criminal law ⇨419, 420(10)—Statements by witnesses to deputy sheriff that they thought some one had hi-jacked defendant out of some whisky or money held hearsay.

In prosecution for possession of intoxicating liquor, where defendant had been shot, statement of parties to deputy sheriff that they thought defendant had been hi-jacked out of some whisky or money, based on fact that they heard somebody say something about hi-jacking some whisky, was hearsay and valueless as evidence.

5. Criminal law ⇨555—Testimony of prosecuting witness, perjurer and bootlegger, held insufficient to support conviction in liquor prosecution.

In prosecution for possession of intoxicating liquor, uncorroborated testimony of prosecuting witness, a self-confessed bootlegger and perjurer, held insufficient to sustain verdict of guilty.

6. Criminal law ⇨1159(2)—Though appellate court will not interfere with verdict supported by substantial evidence, verdict supported by no substantial evidence should not be allowed to stand.

Though, if any substantial testimony supports verdict, appellate tribunal will not interfere therewith, verdict supported by no substantial evidence should not be allowed to stand.

7. Criminal law ⇨553—Ordinarily, credence given testimony is largely determined by witness' appearance, manner of testifying, inflection of voice, readiness of response, and other things indicating sincerity or insincerity.

Ordinarily, credence to be given witness' testimony is largely determined by witness' appearance, manner of testifying, inflection of voice, readiness of response, and manifold actions indicating sincerity or insincerity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Wm. H. Ellis, Judge.

H. N. Lein was convicted of the possession of intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Reversed.

Fred L. Hamblin, of Riverside, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Dep. Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

THOMPSON, J. The defendant was charged by information with the offense of having possession of intoxicating liquor containing alcohol in excess of one-half of 1 per cent. for beverage purposes, and was also charged with a prior conviction of the same offense, to which prior conviction he pleaded guilty. By verdict of the jury he was found guilty of possession, and the court, by judgment upon the verdict, imposed a fine of $1,000, and, upon failure to pay the fine ordered the defendant to be confined in the Riverside county jail, receiving a credit of $2 per day for each day's confinement, and that he be not confined under any circumstances for more than a period of six months. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

The testimony in the case is so unusual that it seems expedient and necessary to set it forth with considerable detail. The prosecuting witness, who, by his own sworn statement, had been engaged in the illicit and forbidden business colloquially termed "bootlegging," and who also admitted that at the preliminary hearing he had testified falsely concerning material matters, testified that he met the defendant on the streets of Blythe in the afternoon of January 23, 1927, and asked him if he had some whisky for sale; that defendant said he had, whereupon the witness said he "would come out to the house and talk it over"; that shortly after 8 o'clock in the evening, he and a Mr. Babcock went out to the defendant's house about two miles west of Blythe, where in the presence of the defendant, his wife, two sons, and a Mr. Haynes, he entered into a bargain to purchase from the defendant 50 gallons of whisky and to return for it about 1 o'clock the next morning on January 24, 1927; that near that time he returned with a Mr. Rye, went out into a cotton patch near the house, and got 25 gallons of whisky, which was then contained in two kegs, and took it into the house, where there were already 5 gallons; that by test with an alcohol hydrometer the liquor appeared to be 102½ (presumably 102½ proof); that after taking these two kegs into the house there were 30 gallons there, the 25 which they had taken in and 5 gallons already there; that he knew it was whisky in the house, because they drank some of the liquor while they were there; that the defendant transferred one container of 12 gallons into 10-gallon containers; that they then loaded into the witness' car two 10-gallon kegs, three 5-gallon kegs and one 15, which he transported to Mr. Rye's ranch near El Centro and hid in a tin container. On cross-examination the witness testified that the two containers in the cotton patch were 25 and 15 gallons in capacity; that the three 5-gallon kegs "came from outside some place"; that the time he drank the whisky at the defendant's house was on the occasion of the first visit; that he had had nothing to drink between that time until after he came back, and that he was perfectly sober; that he had been down there the week before and had been held up; that he was pretty sore about being held up; that when he saw a shotgun which had been brought to the defendant by one of his sons in response to a demand therefor, at the time they were loading up the whisky, he knocked the defendant down, and as he ran he shot, jumped on the car driven by Mr. Rye, and rode away.

The defense witnesses, consisting of John W. Haynes, the defendant, Mrs. Lein, and the two sons of defendant of the age of 17 and 19 years, told in many material respects the same story concerning the happening at about the hour of 1:30 on the morning of the 24th. They all testified that there was no liquor around the place to their knowledge and they heard no bargaining for liquor; that the house referred to was a temporary affair about 14x16; that they were all sleeping inside, and that about 1:30 somebody knocked on the door and asked for water for their automobile, and was told by the defendant that there was a pump near the front of the house; that a few minutes later some one again asked for a tire pump, whereupon the defendant dressed himself and went out; that shortly thereafter he yelled for the shotgun; some shots were fired within three or four minutes after the defendant went out, and defendant was shot in the leg; that as soon as the wound was dressed Mr. Haynes and the younger son, Raymond, went after a doctor and also the police. The defendant, Mrs. Lein, and Mr. Haynes all testified that on the occasion of the first visit of the prosecuting witness Trivet and a Mr. Babcock nothing was said concerning the purchase of liquor; that the two sons were attending a picture show; that no liquor was drunk nor in sight, but that, on account of their acquaintance with Mr. Babcock, Mr. Trivet and Babcock had dinner with them. Raymond Lein also testified that when he heard his father call for the shotgun he jumped out of bed and took the gun toward his father; that he saw that Trivet had a gun pointed at his father; that as he ran out Trivet turned the gun on him, and with a vulgar epithet, not necessary to repeat here, said "Get away from here," that he dropped the gun; that as Trivet turned the gun from his father the latter grabbed Trivet and as he did so Trivet shot his father and turned and ran toward the automobile; that his father told him that "they [Trivet and Rye] told me they had hi-jacked some whisky and wanted some money." The defendant corroborated the son in all of this testimony and added that, when in response to Trivet's request for $50 he stated that he did not have that sum, Trivet said, drawing his gun, "You s— of a b—, you have got it, and you want to dig it up;" that it was then he yelled for the shotgun. Mr. Haynes and Raymond Lein also agreed in their testimony that, when they started after the officers and the doctor, the keys had been taken out of two automobiles belonging to them, and that they had to turn the ignition switch with a jackknife to start one of the cars; that they went directly to the residence of Ben F. White, constable and deputy sheriff, and told him that the defendant had been shot; that Mr. Haynes told White what had happened; and that he thought "they had hi-jacked" the defendant "out of some whisky or money." Haynes explained this latter statement by saying that, while he had not seen any whisky, he had heard somebody say something about hi-jacking some whisky, and that he thought it was Mr. Lein's until he heard the defendant tell Mr. White that he had no whisky there. The testimony of Raymond Lein and his father concerning the fight is further corroborated in important details by Mrs. Lein and the son William Lein. The officers testified that they found a 15-gallon and a 10-gallon keg of whisky in a tin container on Rye's ranch about five miles south of Holtville on the morning of January 24th, and Mr. White, the deputy sheriff, testified that, when Raymond and Mr. Haynes came out to get his assistance, Raymond said, "They stole my daddy's whisky and shot him," and that Haynes was very anxious to catch the offenders, saying "I don't care if we have to pay a little fine;" that he and Mr. Munger went to the defendant's home, and that there the defendant gave him the same explanation concerning the fight as was testified to by him; that he investigated the place and found evidences of a scuffle and a part of Mr. Lein's glasses on the ground.

[1] The appellant maintains that, assuming that defendant had possession of intoxicating liquors and that Trivet and he changed the whisky from the larger containers into the smaller ones and loaded them into the automobile belonging to Trivet, Trivet was an accomplice in the eyes of the law, and that there was not sufficient testimony without the testimony of the accomplice to connect the defendant with the offense. This argument, however, is concluded by the case of People v. Galli, 68 Cal. App. 682, 230 P. 20, and the cases therein cited, wherein it is held that, though the possession of the purchaser is similar to the offense of possession by the seller, yet similarity of offenses is not the same as identity of offenses and that "a purchaser of intoxicating liquors is not guilty of inciting, aiding, or abetting, counseling, or procuring the sale thereof to himself."

[2] The defendant also maintains that the judgment is void for the reason that it provides that upon failure to pay the fine of $1,000 he be confined in the county jail, receiving a credit of $2 per day for each day's confinement, but that he be not confined for more than six months. The invalidity, he says, arises from the fact that the maximum imprisonment for the offense of which defendant was convicted provided in title 2, § 29, of the National Prohibition Act (Fed. Stats. Ann. 1919 Supp. p. 215 [27 USCA § 46]), is 90 days. Section 1205 of the Penal Code, relating to imprisonment for the purpose of satisfying a fine imposed by the superior court, provides that the confinement shall not "extend in any case beyond the term for which the defendant might be sentenced to imprisonment for the offense of which he has been convicted." Therefore, as was held in the case of People v. Cenevich, 64 Cal. App. 39-45, 220 P. 448, 450, "the judgment * * * is void to the extent that it directs imprisonment beyond the period of 90 days." That does not mean, however, as counsel contends, that the entire judgment is void. It will be observed that in the case just cited and relied upon by appellant the judgment of the trial court was modified to conform to the law announced, and, as thus modified, was affirmed. As further authority for the proposition that the pronouncement of an erroneous judgment would not necessarily be sufficient grounds for a reversal, but rather an informality to be otherwise corrected, see People v. McNeet (Cal. App.) 251 P. 688.

[3-5] The appellant does not argue the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict in the event that Trivet might not be held to be an accomplice. For what reason he fails in this regard is hard to understand, unless it be that his assumption that he was an accomplice was so all persuasive to his own mind as to cause him to lose sight of the most unsatisfactory state of the record. He merely asserts that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence and presents a sufficient résumé of the evidence to show that the witness Trivet was not corroborated and to indicate that the evidence might not be sufficient, which indication is borne out by a reading of the testimony. Under these circumstances and the paramount duty incumbent upon all courts to exercise their power to the end that no one shall receive unjust treatment, we are under the compulsion of determining whether the verdict is contrary to the evidence. It needs no citation of authority for the assertion that the statements made by the witnesses Haynes and Raymond Lein to Deputy Sheriff White were pure hearsay and were entirely valueless as evidence. Subtracting these statements from the transcript, the defendant was convicted upon the uncorroborated testimony of a self-confessed "bootlegger" and perjurer. There is nothing in the story he related from the witness chair to commend it as a truthful version of the affair; in fact, it is conflicting and improbable. At first he was specific concerning 25 gallons of liquor contained in two kegs which when brought into the house where there was already 5 gallons made 30 gallons. Later these two kegs became 40 gallons of 25 gallons and 15 gallons, respectively. At first he testified in an apparent effort to demonstrate that it was liquor held in contravention of the law; that they drank some of the 5 gallons in the early morning hours, and subsequently discovering, in his own mind, that this would not hang together, changed the drinking time to 8 in the evening before. His account of the shooting is incredible and improbable. The liquor was loaded into the automobile which was some distance from the house and he says that when the defendant yelled for his gun he started to run and shoot. Somebody had to bring the gun and according to the witness the automobile was under way. There was no occasion for him to shoot. All that he had to do to make his escape was merely to run. Furthermore, no reason is assigned by Trivet why the defendant should have called for a gun. On the other hand, it is hardly probable that, had the defendant and his family been implicated in a sale of 50 gallons of liquor, they would have immediately called in a deputy sheriff. Their version of the shooting is logical and probable. In unadulterated English the witness Trivet attempted a "holdup," to which the defendant would not submit. Even though the statements made by the witness himself and Raymond Lein to Officer White are valueless as evidence, nevertheless, it is fitting to observe that these statements may easily have resulted from the defendant's statement that Trivet and Rye "had hi-jacked some whisky and wanted some money." The idea back of the testimony of the defendant can be gained from a portion of the testimony of the witness at the preliminary hearing, as follows:

"Judge: Mr. Trivet, will you tell the court, since you signed a complaint for sale of moonshine whisky on January 24, 1927, and sworn to before me, will you state just how that sale took place and what transpired at that time? A. I cannot remember just how it came up. I rather not testify. I cannot give you the information now."

Prosecutor continues questions:

"Q. What is the reason? A. It is rather a personal question is it not?

"Q. You swore that this crime was committed and now you refuse to testify relative to that matter. Now, tell the court the nature of this bargain relative to liquor; just tell your own story, just as it happened, that is all we are asking. Just tell where the conversation first took place relative to this liquor and your proposition, if any, his proposition, if any; just tell the court if any sale was consummated. What are you afraid of? A. If I testify here it will incriminate me in the other case.

"Q. No; it will not. You can tell with freedom here; it will not be used against you. Go ahead and talk. A. I am afraid it will be used against me.

"Q. Now, just tell what the bargain was. A. There was no bargain.

"Q. Did you not agree to buy something? What was the consideration? A. What do you mean by consideration?

"Q. I mean what was to change hands from you to Mr. Lein here, money? A. Maybe money.

"Q. Are you acquainted with Mrs. Lein, the wife of the accused in this case? A. I don't know her.

"Q. When did you see her first? A. When I walked in that door.

"Q. You already testified that you were out there at his home between 8 and 9 o'clock, and had a conversation with him. What did Mr. Lein say? A. I don't remember.

"Q. How many gallons of liquor did you want? A. All I could get.

"Q. How many did he sell you? Was it 10 gallons or was it 50 gallons as set forth in the complaint? What was the approximate amount? A. There was no bargain.

"Q. You stated the amount in the complaint. Who did he sell it to? A. Not to me.

"Q. Did you get any of his whisky that night? A. I hope I did not.

"Q. Did you take any in your physical custody, put it in your automobile by and and help? A. No; I did not put it in.

"Q. Did Mr. Lein put it in your automobile? A. I don't know. I was drunk.

"Q. You were intoxicated, then? A. Yes; that sounds more like it.

"Q. Were you possessed of your mental capacities? Do you remember what transpired? A. Once in a while I can remember.

"Q. You remember your name was Mr. Trivet, don't you? A. Yes.

"Q. Evidently there was a transaction that took place to get this whisky. Just tell the court about this bargain, about this purchase, this sale of 50 gallons. A. I told you before I did not remember just how it all happened.

"Q. You don't remember anything? A. I do not remember anything that took place that night."

This testimony is a part of that which the witness admitted at the time of the trial was untrue. It is evident that the witness was endeavoring to protect himself if possible and in most any way possible at the expense of the defendant.

[6, 7] While it is true that where there is any substantial testimony to support the verdict the appellate tribunal will not interfere with the result, nevertheless, where there is no substantial evidence to support the verdict, it ought not to be allowed to stand. It may be said that, ordinarily, the credence to be given the testimony of a witness is largely determined by his appearance on the stand, his manner of testifying, the inflection of the voice, the readiness of response, and the manifold actions that indicate sincerity or insincerity. But the testimony of the witness Trivet, as it appears in print, is so conflicting and improbable that it is entitled to no consideration and raises no substantial conflict in the testimony. It is so apparent from the record itself that it is entitled to no credence that observation of the witness is unnecessary. The verdict ought not for those reasons to be permitted to stand. We cannot escape the conclusion that the verdict in this case was the result of prejudice, rather than the calm and dispassionate judgment of the jury. As was said in People v. Hamilton, 46 Cal. 540: "A conviction upon such evidence would be a blot upon the jurisprudence of the country, and a libel upon jury trials." Being unable to place any reliance in the testimony of the prosecuting witness, the statement of the court in People v. Chew Wing Gow, 120 Cal. 298, 52 P. 657, "We do not think we should sustain verdicts against even Chinamen when it is manifest that they were procured by perjury," might well be paraphrased to meet the exigencies of this situation.

Judgment reversed.

MASSON v. NEW ENGLAND MUT. LIFE INS. CO. (Civ. 5459.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 27, 1927.

1. Insurance §141(3)—Stipulation of life policy, reciting issuance in consideration of "payment in advance" of annual premium, was acknowledgment of receipt and conclusive evidence of payment (Civ. Code, § 2598; Code Civ. Proc. § 1837).

Language of life insurance policy, reciting issuance in consideration of "payment in advance" of annual dividend, held to be acknowledgment of receipt of such premium, which is conclusive evidence of payment, under Civ. Code, § 2598, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1837, where policy was delivered to assured as valid and completed contract, notwithstanding that note for part of such premium was not paid when due.

2. Insurance §146(3)—Language of life insurance contract must be interpreted most strongly against insurer.

In construing language of life insurance contract, it must be interpreted most strongly against insurer, and in favor of assured, since insurer draws contract.

3. Insurance §141(3)—Where life policy provided that policy and application constituted entire contract, court is restricted to its terms in considering application of statute making recital of receipt of premium conclusive evidence of payment (Civ. Code, § 2598).

Where life insurance policy recited receipt of annual premium, and provided that "this policy and the application constitute the entire contract between the parties," court is restricted to terms of policy in determining application of Civ. Code, § 2598, providing that acknowledgment of receipt of premium in policy is conclusive evidence of payment, and cannot consider as part of contract notes and receipt given at time policy was delivered, affirmatively showing that annual premium was not paid.

4. Judgment §251(2)—Insurer, defending on single theory that policy was void, held not entitled to deduction for unpaid premium.

Where insurance company defended action on policy on single theory that policy was void for nonpayment of premiums, it was not entitled to deduction from plaintiff's recovery for unpaid portion of annual premium.

5. Evidence §383(7)—Recital in life policy as to payment of premium does not preclude recovery on notes given in payment thereof.

Recital in life insurance policy as to payment of premium in advance, though conclusive evidence of payment, so as to make policy binding, does not preclude subsequent recovery on notes given in payment of such premium.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by Philip Joseph Masson, a minor, by John Masson, guardian of the person and estate of said Philip Joseph Masson, against the New England Mutual Life Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thacher & Wright, of San Francisco (Thomas A. Thacher and Harrison A. Jones, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

A. E. Cooley and Lasher B. Gallagher, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Plaintiff, a minor, brought this action by his guardian to recover the proceeds of a life insurance policy in which he had been designated as beneficiary. The defendant insurance company contested payment on the ground that the policy had lapsed because of the failure to pay the premium. Judgment was entered in plaintiff's favor, and defendant appeals.

The following facts are established by the evidence, which is without conflict:

Plaintiff's father, Joseph Lee Masson, applied to the company's San Francisco agency for a $2,500 "twenty-payment" policy, and under date of April 27, 1922, the company at its home office in Boston issued to him a twenty-year "endowment" policy. Upon the arrival of the policy in San Francisco, a representative of the company, named Holland, called on Masson to explain the policy and to deliver the same and collect the annual premium thereon. The form of policy issued was acceptable to Masson, but he was unable at that time to pay the annual premium, amounting to $124.25, whereupon Holland informed him that under the terms of the policy he could pay the premium quarterly. Masson agreed to do this, and thereupon made a part payment of $20 in cash on the first quarterly premium of $31.25. Shortly thereafter Holland called on Masson again, at which time he collected $11.25 as the balance due for the first quarter ending July 27, 1922, and presented for execution three promissory notes, for the principal sum of $31 each, payable respectively three, six, and nine months after date, which Masson executed and delivered to Holland, and the latter in turn delivered to Masson the policy and a receipt. The notes were dated April 27, 1922, and were identical in form except as to dates of maturity. Besides containing a promise to pay the principal, each note provided that said principal sum was "for part of premium on policy No. 450153 of said company, which policy I hereby pledge for the payment hereof [which, however, was not done]; but this note, if not paid at maturity, is not to be considered as payment of said premium, and said policy will thereupon without notice become forfeited and void, except as provided by the statutes of Massachusetts." The receipt was in the following form:

notes, as stated in the margin, have been given by the insured, until said note or notes shall have been paid in cash; and if said note or notes, or any of them, are not paid when due, thereupon and without further notice, said policy will cease to be in force and will have no value.
* * *

The first note matured on July 27, 1922, but the terms of the policy gave the assured 31 days' grace to make payment. Within 15 days prior to the expiration of the period of grace the agency mailed to the assured a notice to the following effect:

"We respectfully advise that the three months' note on your policy No. 450153 is nearly 31 days overdue. The period of grace for the payment of said note and interest will expire August 27, 1922, and if not paid then the policy will lapse and reinstatement can be made only upon production of evidence of insurability satisfactory to the company. Please give this your prompt attention, as this is the last notice we shall send you."

Later, and on August 24, 1922, the cashier of the agency wrote a letter to the assured which read as follows:

"Re your policy No. 450153. My Dear Mr. Masson: If you are to protect your insurance under the above-numbered policy, we must have your check for $31.60 not later than August 27th, the expiration of the grace period. Please do not overlook this important matter, but forward the remittance for this amount by return mail."

The assured replied as follows:

"San Lucas, Cal., August 26, 1922. New England Mutual Life Ins. Co.—Dear Sir: I am writing to you asking for a thirty-day extension of time on my policy, which is now due, as I have been out of work for some time and will not be able to meet same until next month, when I get a pay day. Hoping this will be satisfactory to you, as I do not want to lose it. * * *

In answer to the request for further extension the cashier wrote Masson, on August 28th, as follows:

"August 28, 1922. Mr. Joseph L. Masson, Box 113, San Lucas, Cal. Re your policy No. 450153. My Dear Mr. Masson: We have your letter of August 26 requesting an extension of time of thirty days to meet the three months note of $31.00 and interest of 60c. due on your above-numbered policy. We are very sorry, but this we are unable to do. The company allows thirty-one days of grace to meet these premium payments and no further extension can be granted. We can, however, if it will assist you any, accept a payment of $20.75 and extend the balance for an additional thirty days, but, to take advantage of this, we must have the prompt return of a remittance for that amount. We have changed our records to show your address as given above and would thank you very much to keep us advised in the future of any further change. Trusting that you are in a position to avail yourself of the above settlement, I remain," etc.

The assured made no payment on this note, however, nor on either of the other two; and on September 9, 1922, said notes were forwarded by the agency to the home office of the company in Boston for cancellation. Ten days later, to wit, on September 19, 1922, and before said notes were surrendered, the assured was killed in an automobile accident, and thereupon plaintiff, as beneficiary, commenced this action to recover the proceeds of the policy.

The policy in question reads in part as follows:

"New England Mutual Life Insurance Company of Boston, Massachusetts. Number

450153. Age, 34. Amount, $2,500. Premium, $124.25. In consideration of the application upon which this policy is issued, which is made a part hereof, and of the payment in advance of one hundred and twenty-four and ²⁵/₁₀₀ (124-25) dollars, and of the payment of a like sum on or before the 27th day of April, in each year thereafter until twenty annual premiums have been paid during the life of Joseph Lee Masson of San Francisco, California, the insured, the New England Mutual Life Insurance Company promises and agrees to pay, at its office in the city of Boston, twenty-five hundred dollars, to Joseph Lee Masson, on the twenty-seventh day of April, 1942, but if the said insured shall de- cease before that date, then, upon due proof of death, to Phillip Joseph Masson, his son, if he shall survive him; otherwise, to the insured's executors, administrators or assigns (with the right reserved to the insured to change the benefi- ciary), less any indebtedness to the company on this policy, and less any unpaid portion of the premium for the then current policy year." (Italics ours.)

Said policy also contained the following conditions and stipulations:

"In case of failure to pay any premium when due or during the period grace, this policy shall cease to be in force and shall have no value, ex- cept as provided by the nonforfeiture provisions hereinafter set forth. * * * This policy and the application constitute the entire contract between the parties hereto, and all statements made by the insured, in the absence of fraud, shall be deemed representations and not war- ranties, and no such statement shall be used in defense to a claim under this policy, unless con- tained in the application and a copy of such application shall be endorsed hereon and at- tached hereto. * * * The rights, options, and provisions hereinafter set forth are hereby made a part of this contract. In witness whereof, the said New England Mutual Life Insurance Company, by its president or vicepresident, and secretary or an assistant secretary, has signed and delivered this contract at Boston, in the commonwealth of Massachusetts, this twenty- seventh day of April in the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two."

Among the provisions attached to and made a part of the policy was the following:

"Premiums.—Premiums shall be payable in advance at the home office in the city of Boston, but may be paid to an agent of the company upon the delivery of a receipt signed by the secretary or an assistant secretary. When re- quested, premiums will be made payable on a semiannual or a quarterly basis."

[1] The first question presented relates to the construction which shall be placed upon the language used in said policy as to the payment of the first annual premium. If it be construed as an acknowledgment of the receipt of said premium, then under section 2598 of the Civil Code such acknowledgment must be deemed to be conclusive evidence of the payment thereof. Said section is appar- ently the codification of a principle of con- struction affecting insurance policies which has existed for many years (Kent's Com- mentaries, p. 260; Cooley's Briefs on the Law of Insurance, p. 146; 25 Cyc. 730), and it provides as follows:

"An acknowledgment in a policy of the re- ceipt of premium is conclusive evidence of its payment, so far as to make the policy binding, notwithstanding any stipulation therein that it shall not be binding until the premium is actu- ally paid."

And section 1837 of the Code of Civil Pro- cedure defines "conclusive or unanswerable evidence" to be "that which the law does not permit to be contradicted. * * *"

In giving application to said section, it has been held in this state that, where an author- ized credit has been agreed upon as the equiv- alent or substitute for cash payment of the premium, and the policy is delivered as a complete contract upon the consideration expressed therein, the receipt of which is "impliedly acknowledged," the insurer is estopped to deny the validity of the policy, notwithstanding the declaration in it that it shall not be binding until the premium is actually paid (Farnum v. Phoenix Insurance Co., 83 Cal. 246, 23 P. 869, 17 Am. St. Rep. 233); also that, where a promissory note is taken as the equivalent of cash payment, the recital of payment in the policy does not con- clude the insurer in an action upon the note from showing that the premium has not been paid, but such recital, whether or not it is in the specific language of the Code, is conclu- sive evidence of payment, "so far as to make the policy binding," notwithstanding any stipulation therein to the effect that it shall be inoperative if the premium is not actually paid; that the recital has the same effect as a vendor's acknowledgment in a convey- ance of land of the receipt of the purchase price (Palmer v. Continental Insurance Co., 132 Cal. 68, 64 P. 97).

In other words, as stated in Joyce on In- surance (2d Ed.) § 86:

"In California, it is held that if an insurance policy contains a formal receipt of the premium, its unconditional delivery is conclusive evidence of payment so as to estop the company from de- nyng the validity of the policy notwithstanding the declaration in it that it shall not be bind- ing until the premium is actually paid; that the same result follows where the policy is deliv- ered as a valid and completed contract upon a consideration expressed therein, the receipt of which is impliedly acknowledged. And under the Civil Code of that state an acknowledgment in a policy of the receipt of the premium is con- clusive evidence of its payment, so far as to make the policy binding, notwithstanding any stipulation therein that it shall not be bind- ing until the premium is actually paid, and this applies to a recital in the policy of the con- sideration paid where there is also a provision against liability while any note for the premium is due and unpaid and the note for said consid- eration remains due and unpaid."

Our attention has been called to no adjudicated case in this state involving a policy containing the identical recital of payment used here, but in the state of South Dakota, which maintains a statute (Civ. Code S. D. § 1849) in the exact wording of our Code, § 2598, a case arose wherein the policy not only contained forfeiture clauses similar to those embodied in the present policy, but, with reference to the payment of the first year's premium, recited:

"This policy is issued in consideration of the stipulations, agreements, and representations made in the application for the policy, * * * and said policy and the application constitute the entire contract between the parties hereto, and in further consideration of the annual premium of $50.17 for one year's term insurance," etc. (Italics ours.)

The Supreme Court of that state held that the effect of the italicized language was to "clearly acknowledge receipt of the first premium," and that, therefore, the company would not be heard to deny payment, in so far as the binding effect of the policy was concerned. In the case of Britton v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 165 N. C. 149, 80 S. E. 1072, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 363, the language used in the policy relating to the payment of the first premium was nearly identical with that used in the policy under consideration, the only difference being that here the words "in advance" are included, which makes the present case even stronger against the insurer, and in all of its essential facts that case is parallel with the one here. There the policy read:

"Endowment: * * * Semiannual premium: $21.86. Metropolitan Insurance Company, in consideration of the application for the policy, copy of which application is attached hereto, and made part thereof, and of the payment of the semiannual premium of $21.86, and of the payment of the like amount upon each first day of November and May hereafter until twenty (20) full years premiums shall have been paid, or until the prior death of the insured, promises to pay," etc.

The evidence offered tended to prove that, when the policy was issued, the assured asked leave to pay the premium quarterly, instead of semiannually, as required by the policy, to which the agent of the company agreed; that thereupon the assured paid only the quarterly premium in advance, which was sent by the agent to the home office of the company in New York, and the latter receipted for the premium covering only the first quarter. However, the recital in the policy of the payment of a semiannual premium was not changed. During the period of the succeeding quarter the assured died. In sustaining the ruling of the trial court in holding that the acknowledgment in the policy of the receipt of the semiannual premium estopped the company to deny the validity of the policy on the ground of nonpayment thereof, the Supreme Court said:

"This court has held that the acknowledgment in a policy of the receipt of the premium for a definite period is something more than a receipt. It is a solemn admission, which, as long as it stands, estops the insurer from contesting the policy for nonpayment of premium. Grier v. Insurance Co., 132 N. C. 543, 44 S. E. 28; Kendrick v. Insurance Co., 124 N. C. 315, 32 S. E. 728, 70 Am. St. Rep. 592. In those cases it is held that, if the premium is not paid, the acknowledgment of payment in the policy, so far as it is a receipt for money, is only prima facie, and in an action to recover the premium may be contradicted by parol evidence, as the receipt in a deed may in an action for the purchase money of land, but so far as the acknowledgment is contractual, it cannot be contradicted so as to invalidate the contract. Rayburn v. Casualty Co., 138 N. C. 379, 50 S. E. 762, 107 Am. St. Rep. 548; Waters v. Annuity Co., 144 N. C. 663, 57 S. E. 437, 13 L. R. A. [N. S.] 805."

And after reviewing supporting authorities, including Basch v. Insurance Co., 35 N. J. Law, 429, and Vance on Insurance, p. 180, the court held:

"The policy sued on acknowledges receipt of premium for six months, and contains a provision that the premium is to be paid semi-annually. The law will not permit the defendant to avoid the policy in the face of such recital."

Turning to the decisions of this state, we find the following rule established as to the effect of a delivery to the assured of an insurance policy containing a recital of the payment where in fact such payment had not been made:

"And it has been repeatedly held that where any fact, which would constitute a breach of a condition precedent to any liability of the company on the policy, is fully known to an agent of the company, local or general, who is authorized to consummate the contract of insurance, the knowledge of such agent is the knowledge of the company, and his act in executing and delivering the policy, as a valid and completed contract, is an exercise of the power of the company, and constitutes a waiver by the company of such condition precedent, and also a waiver of the general requirement that waivers or conditions expressed in the policy shall be in writing indorsed on the policy." Farnum v. Phoenix Ins. Co., supra, citing a number of cases.

[2] The policy in question here shows by its terms that it was a completed contract when issued at the home office of the company in Boston, that the annual premium was $124.25, and that the policy and the application constituted the entire contract. The consideration for its execution, as specified therein, was "the payment in advance of the sum of one hundred and twenty-four and $25/100$ (124.25) dollars" (italics ours), and the policy was delivered in that form to the assured as being effective from the date of its issuance.

We therefore believe, in view of the authorities above cited and of the rule of construction that the language of an insurance contract must be interpreted most strongly against the insurer and in favor of the assured, because the insurer draws the contract (Mah See v. North American Acc. Ins. Co., 190 Cal. 421, 213 P. 42, 26 A. L. R. 123; Victoria S. S. Co. v. Western Assur. Co., 167 Cal. 348, 139 P. 807; Meyerstein v. Great American Ins. Co. [Cal. App.] 255 P. 220), that the recital on payment in the policy before us constituted, as the trial court held, an acknowledgment of the receipt of the annual premium within the meaning of said section 2598, and that, therefore, coupled with the fact that the policy was delivered to the assured as a valid and completed contract, estops the company, in so far as the binding force of the policy is concerned, to deny that full payment of the annual premium has been made.

[3] Appellant contends, however, that in the determination of the question of the application of section 2598 the court is not restricted to the terms of the policy, but must also consider as a part of the contract of insurance the notes and the receipt given at the time the policy was delivered, which affirmatively show that the annual premium was not paid. We are of the opinion that this contention is not maintainable for the reason that the policy itself declares that "this policy and the application constitute the entire contract between the parties hereto. * * *" But, assuming that the notes and the receipt could be considered as part of the contract of insurance, appellant's position would be no different because at most the forfeiture clauses in the notes and in the receipt would amount to no more than additional stipulations that the policy "shall not be binding until the premium is actually paid"; and, as already pointed out, section 2598 declares that such stipulations are not to be accepted in contradiction of an acknowledgment in the policy of the receipt of the premium. This latter proposition seems to have been definitely settled by the decision in Palmer v. Continental Ins. Co., supra. There "each of the notes contained a recital that, in case of its nonpayment at maturity, the company should not be liable for loss during such default, and that the policy for which the note was given should lapse until payment was made," and it was said:

"It is contended by the defendant that the note and policy are to be considered as parts of the same transaction, and are to be construed together, and that the proviso in the note is operative to defeat its liability upon the policy, notwithstanding the provisions of section 2598" of the Civil Code. "Without determining whether the two instruments can be considered as parts of the same transaction—the note having been made May 27th, and the policy not issued until after June 7th—if it should be so conceded the same conclusion would follow. If the two are construed as parts of the same instrument, the result would be that the policy would acknowledge the receipt of payment of the first year's premium, and would contain a stipulation in two places, one in the note and one in the agreement for insurance, that the failure to pay the note should forfeit the policy. Section 2598 is sufficiently comprehensive to include as many stipulations therein referred to, and as many different forms of such stipulation, as the insurer may express in its policy. By inserting in the section the phrase, 'notwithstanding any stipulation therein,' the Legislature intended to prevent the insurer in any action upon the policy from disputing its acknowledgment that it had received the payment. The section is not limited to a policy which contains a provision in specific language that it shall not be binding unless the premium has been 'actually paid,' but extends to any stipulation which is intended to have that effect."

Appellant has cited a number of cases upon the question of the interpretation of the recital of payment in the policy and also as to whether or not the policy itself constitutes the entire contract; but we do not deem any of those cases as controlling here. In Reagan v. Philadelphia Life Ins. Co., 165 Minn. 186, 206 N. W. 162, there was no valid delivery of the policy, the Supreme Court having sustained the trial court's finding that the policy was in the possession of the assured at the time of his death merely for the purpose of allowing him to examine its terms. In Raulet v. Northwestern Nat. Ins. Co., 157 Cal. 213, 107 P. 292, the recital of payment did not include the words "in advance." The cases of Hipp v. Fidelity Mutual Life Ins. Co., 128 Ga. 491, 57 S. E. 892, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 319, and Norris v. New England Mut. Life Ins. Co., 198 Ala. 41, 73 So. 377, adhere to a doctrine wholly at variance with the one established in this state by Farnum v. Phoenix Ins. Co., supra, and Palmer v. Continental Ins. Co., supra, and therefore those cases cannot be followed. The decisions in the other cases were apparently based upon recitals contained in documents separate from the policy, there being no provision in those policies, as there was here, that the policy and the application constituted the entire contract between the parties.

[4, 5] Nor do we find any merit in appellant's final contention that the trial court erred in not deducting from the amount of the judgment the unpaid portion of the annual premium, for the reason that appellant defended the action, as its pleadings show, upon the single theory that from and after the expiration of the first quarter the policy was void on account of the nonpayment of the subsequent premiums. Apparently, in order to be consistent in its position, appellant did not claim to be entitled to any relief whatever as a result of the execution of the notes, and therefore did not plead them as a counterclaim. However, as shown by the authorities hereinabove cited, the fact that the recital in the policy was conclusive evidence of the payment of the annual premium, so as to make the policy binding, does not preclude a subsequent recovery upon the notes given in payment thereof.

For the reasons stated the judgment is affirmed.

DREW et al. v. LINDSAY NAT. BANK et al.* (Civ. 3304.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 26, 1927.

Rehearing Granted Oct. 26, 1927.

1. Pleading $\S$ 245(1)—Denying motion to make fourth amendment to complaint, alleging mistake in contract set forth in complaint to which plaintiffs were not parties, held no error, especially where granting would have necessitated continuance and complaint had been filed fourteen months.

Where plaintiffs were assignees of a right of action on a contract, denying their motion to make a fourth amendment to the complaint, alleging mistake in the contract, which was fully set forth in the complaint, held not an abuse of discretion, especially where granting the motion to amend would have necessitated continuance and the complaint had already been filed for 14 months.

2. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 231(1)—Defendants had burden of proving denial in answer that rent was unpaid.

In action against lessee and bank in which lessee had deposited security against breach of lease, where the answer denied the allegation of the complaint that rent was unpaid, defendants held to have burden of proving payment.

3. Limitation of actions $\S$ 24(1)—Portion of rent due less than four years before action was brought held not barred by limitation statute (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 337, subd. 1).

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 337, subd. 1, providing that an action on a contract in writing must be commenced within four years, portion of rent due less than four years before action was brought was not barred, although portion due more than four years before was barred.

4. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 172(1)—Where tenant had abandoned premises, lessor's re-entry without notice was not ouster.

Where tenant had abandoned the leased premises and defaulted in payment of rent, the lessor's re-entry without notice to the tenant did not constitute an ouster.

5. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 223(5)—Damages for eviction may be set off against rent claim, but wrongful eviction is not defense to claim for accrued rent (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1935).

While any damages suffered by a tenant by reason of a wrongful eviction may be set out as an offset to a claim for rent, the mere wrongful eviction is not a defense to a claim for accrued rent, in view of Civ. Code, $\S$ 1935.

6. Banks and banking $\S$ 153—Where contract providing for deposit as security for performance of lease was filed with bank, bank, on lessee's default, was bound to pay amount of default.

Where contract for lease providing that the lessee should deposit a sum of money in bank as security for performance of the contract was filed with the bank at the time the money was deposited, on the lessee's default, the bank was bound to pay the lessor the amount of the default and had no right to seize such security under a writ of execution to satisfy indebtedness of lessee to bank.

7. Assignments $\S$ 23—Lessor's right of action against bank for refusal, on lessee's default, to pay over security deposited by lessee, held assignable.

Lessor's right of action against bank for refusal, on default of the lessee in rent payments, to pay over deposit made in the bank by the lessee as security for performance of contract of lease, held assignable.

8. Banks and banking $\S$ 154(3)—In action against bank for security deposited for performance of lease, rent need not be established by judgment before bringing action.

In action by lessor against bank for portion of money deposited by lessee as security for performance of lease, fact that the amount due as rent was not established by judgment before action was commenced did not prejudice rights of defendant, since both lessee and bank were parties and that issue was determined at the trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by A. M. Drew and others against the Lindsay National Bank and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Feemster & Cleary, of Visalia, and A. M. Drew, of Fresno, for appellants.

D. E. Perkins, of Visalia, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. August 1, 1918, the plaintiffs and R. M. Carr entered into a written contract with defendant Mennillo, by the terms of which Mennillo agreed to purchase the olives grown by the other parties to the contract during the succeeding five years at an agreed price per ton therefor. The contract contained the following clause:

"It is understood and agreed that this contract is not to be binding upon the said first parties until it is indorsed by some person, or firm, or corporation as security for the carrying out of the covenants and conditions thereof by the said second party, or that a satisfactory surety bond is furnished that the said second party will carry out all of the covenants and conditions of the said lease and the said contract."

In pursuance of the provisions of the clause quoted, and for the purpose of giving effect to the contract, Mennillo caused the following indorsement upon the contract to be executed by the Santa Barbara Olive Company, B. J. Ruddle and C. R. Mennillo:

"The undersigned for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar and other valuable considerations to ——— running does hereby indorse this contract and guarantee the said second party will carry out all the terms, covenants and conditions thereof during the running of the lease and contract."

At the time of the execution of the contract first mentioned, the Lindsay Ripe Olive Company leased its olive packing house and equipment to Mennillo for a term of five years at the semiannual rental of $390, payable in advance on the "first day of August and the first day of February" of each year during the term. The lease contained the following provisions:

"It is understood * * * that the said second party will use the said building for the processing of olives purchased from the members and stockholders of the said first party according to the terms and conditions of the agreement of even date herewith and hereto attached and made a part hereof, and that the said olives of the said stockholders of this corporation aforesaid shall have the first right to delivery and acceptance at such packing house according to the aforesaid agreement. It is understood, however, that the said second party shall have the right to purchase other olives from other parties on such terms and conditions as he may make and that the same shall be processed in the said house and that he may also use the said house for the packing of fruit and vegetables when not needed for olive packing."

Neither party was able to produce the lease at the trial, but the court found, from conflicting evidence, "that by the terms of said lease it was agreed that in case said F. A. Mennillo did not pay the annual rental at the time in the lease provided, that the lessors by giving 30 days' notice in writing of such default, should have the right to re-enter said premises and remove all persons therefrom and repossess and enjoy said property."

September 18, 1918, the Lindsay Ripe Olive Company, as party of the first part, and defendant Mennillo, as party of the second part, executed an instrument, which was attached to the contract of August 1, 1918, between plaintiffs and Mennillo, and which reads as follows:

"This addendum made this 25th day of September, 1918, to that certain contract dated August 1, 1918, made by the Lindsay Ripe Olive Company, first party, with F. A. Mennillo, second party, wherein the said first party, agrees to lease a certain olive packing house in the city of Lindsay to the said second party for the term of five years, and whereas the said second party was to give a bond or indorsors to the contract sufficient to satisfy the said first party that the said second party would carry out all the terms in accordance with the conditions of said agreement and of said lease, and whereas the said second party has failed to give such bond. It is now agreed that the said second party will deposit with the Lindsay National Bank in the form of a certificate of deposit, and that the said certificate of deposit shall remain in the possession of the said Lindsay National Bank during the running of this agreement, or to such subsequent time as shall hereafter be agreed upon between the parties hereto, the said sum of twenty-five hundred ($2,500.00) dollars, to be held as security by the said bank for the said first party to said agreement, that the said second party will carry out the covenants and conditions of the lease and the agreement required as aforesaid. * * * Should the said second party fail, neglect or refuse to carry out the provisions and conditions of the aforesaid contract the said sum of $2,500.00 shall be delivered to the said first party, or such proportion thereof as may be necessary to meet the liquidated damages incurred by any breach of said contract."

The sum of $2,500 was deposited in compliance with the terms of the agreement. Mennillo went into possession of the packing house and performed the covenants of the lease and of his contract to purchase plaintiffs' olives until the early part of the year 1920, when he disappeared and apparently abandoned the packing house and his business at Lindsay. It does not appear that he thereafter, at any time, asserted any right to use the premises or made any claim thereto. At the time of his departure he was heavily indebted to the defendant bank. He assigned his stock of processed olives to the bank, and the bank thereafter sold the same and applied the proceeds thereof upon the indebtedness. After such application, however, his remaining indebtedness to the bank was in excess of $2,500. In an action thereafter brought, the bank recovered judgment against Mennillo for the balance of such indebtedness and caused the money deposited as aforesaid to be seized under a writ of execution and applied in partial satisfaction of the judgment.

About September 1, 1920, the Lindsay Ripe Olive Company re-entered into possession of the packing house. During the remainder of the time covered by the lease and the sales contract, the plaintiff and Carr were unable to sell their olives for the prices specified in the contract, and they sold them at lower prices. The court found that on September 1, 1920, Mennillo was in default in the payment of rent in the sum of $390. The uncontradicted evidence shows that he was in default in a larger sum. Drew testified that the sum of $800 was then due as rent. This testimony was doubtless based on his previous testimony that the lease provided for a monthly rental of $100. He later testified that the lease provided for a semiannual rental of $390. A simple computation, based on such testimony, shows that the unpaid rental on September 1, 1920, amounted to $520. The plaintiffs and Carr and the Lindsay Ripe Olive Company made demand on the defendant bank that said sum of $2,500, deposited with the bank, be paid over to them; but the bank refused to pay any part thereof to any of them. After making such demand, Carr and the Lindsay Ripe Olive Company "assigned and transferred unto plaintiffs herein all of their claim to and all of their right, title and interest in the said $2,500." Thereafter this suit was brought to recover the amount of the deposit. Judgment was entered in favor of defendants for costs of suit, and the plaintiffs have appealed.

Appellants contend that the deposit of $2,500 with the defendant bank was made as security for the performance by Mennillo of the terms of the sales contract as well as those of the lease. The addendum contract of September 25, 1918, is so certain and explicit in its terms as to furnish a complete answer to this contention. It is true that the plaintiffs and Carr owned about two-thirds of the capital stock of the Lindsay Ripe Olive Company at the time the lease and other contracts were executed, but it is not perceived that that fact is at all material. Mennillo's contract with the corporation and that with the plaintiffs and Carr were independent transactions.

[1] During the progress of the trial the plaintiffs asked leave to amend their third amended complaint by alleging "that what was intended by the addendum was to make it a part of the purchase agreement"; that the failure to so provide in the addendum contract was due to the mutual mistake of the parties thereto. In asking leave to so amend, counsel for the plaintiffs stated that the granting of the request "will * * * necessitate the continuance of the case, and we are perfectly willing to take care of any expenses that have been incurred up to this time as a condition to the continuance." The court denied the motion. The trial was commenced in March, 1925. The original complaint, filed January 4, 1924, set forth the addendum contract in full. The plaintiffs were permitted to file three amended complaints. Under the circumstances stated, it was not an abuse of discretion to deny leave to file a fourth amended complaint. Further, the plaintiffs were not parties to the addendum contract. "While a court of equity will reform contracts under many varying circumstances, still it has no power to make a new contract. * * * A court of equity can neither add additional parties nor substitute other parties for those already appearing upon the face of the writing." Mabb v. Merriam, 129 Cal. 663, 664, 62 P. 212;

[2] As stated, the court found that on September 1, 1920, Mennillo was "in default in the payment of said rent to the extent of $390," while the uncontradicted evidence shows that he was then in default in the sum of $520. The complaint alleges that the rent was unpaid for the year 1920, and the answer denies that allegation. The burden was on defendants to prove payment of such rental if made. 20 Cal. Jur. 952. It must be taken as established, therefore, that Mennillo paid no rent for the year 1920.

[3, 4] The court found that plaintiffs' cause of action for such rent was "barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure," to the effect that an action upon a contract in writing must be commenced within four years. The transcript on appeal does not show when the action was commenced, but it appears from the original complaint, brought up by direction of this court, that the action was commenced January 4, 1924. Under the terms of the lease, the agreed rent for the six months ending January 31, 1920, was due and payable August 1, 1919, and, if not paid, it was barred at the time the action was commenced. But the rent from February 1 to September 1, 1920, amounting to $455, was not barred, and plaintiffs' assignor was entitled to payment of that sum out of the $2,500 deposited by Mennillo with the defendant bank.

The court found that the "plaintiffs conspired together for the purpose of ousting said F. A. Mennillo from said packing house, * * * and in pursuance of said conspiracy, * * * caused said Lindsay Ripe Olive Company to re-enter upon said leased premises and packing house and ousted the said F. A. Mennillo therefrom," without giving him the notice required by the terms of the lease. While these findings appear to be immaterial under the issues raised by the pleadings, the defendants having made no claim for damages on account of such ouster, it is deemed proper to say that no evidence has been discovered which tends to show the existence of such a conspiracy. It may be added that the conduct of Mennillo, as shown by the uncontradicted evidence, points strongly to the conclusion that he had abandoned the premises long prior to the re-entry by the lessor, and, if such was the case, the re-entry without notice did not constitute an ouster.

portion of the hire for such use as he has actually made of the thing, unless such use is merely nominal, and of no benefit to him." Civ. Code, § 1935.

[6-8] Respondents contend that the assignment by the Lindsay Ripe Olive Company to the plaintiffs "is insufficient to transfer to plaintiffs any right of action * * * that corporation * * * may have had to sue for the money." The addendum contract provides for the deposit of the $2,500 "as security" for the performance of "the covenants and conditions of the lease" by Mennillo, and that upon failure of such performance by him "the said sum of $2,500 shall be delivered to the said first party, or such proportion thereof as may be necessary to meet the liquidated damages incurred by any breach of said contract." This contract was filed with the defendant bank at the time the money was deposited, and the bank was bound by its terms. Upon Mennillo's default in payment of rent and the making of the demand by the Lindsay Ripe Olive Company for payment of such rent out of the money so deposited, it became the duty of the bank to pay the same, and, upon its refusal, an immediate cause of action accrued in favor of that corporation against the bank to compel such payment. No sound reason is advanced, and none appears, why such cause of action was not assignable, and the assignment is certainly sufficient in form to transfer any claim of the corporation against the deposit to the plaintiffs. The fact that the amount due as rent was not established by judgment prior to the commencement of this action did not prejudice the rights of the defendants, because that issue was determined in this action, to which Mennillo and the bank are both parties.

Under the provisions of section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, this court has jurisdiction to make findings of fact "contrary to, or in addition to, those made by the trial court." It is not deemed necessary to disturb immaterial findings, but this court hereby makes the following findings of fact, contrary to findings made by the trial court upon the issues to which said facts relate:

That by the terms of said lease of August 1, 1918, said defendant Mennillo agreed to pay to the Lindsay Ripe Olive Company a semiannual rental of $390; that said defendant duly paid said rental up to January 1, 1920, but paid no rental for the year 1920, and that on September 1, 1920, said defendant was indebted to the Lindsay Ripe Olive Company in the sum of $520 as rental for the first eight months of that year; that the plaintiffs' cause of action for the amount of such unpaid rent is barred to the extent of $65 by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but the remaining $455 thereof is not so barred.

As conclusions of law from the foregoing findings of fact and those not in conflict therewith made by the trial court, this court finds that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment against the defendants in the sum of $455, together with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum on $390 thereof from February 1, 1920, and on $65 thereof from August 1, 1920, and for their costs of suit.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiffs against the defendants in accordance with the aforesaid findings and conclusions of law, the appellants to recover their costs of appeal.

ORINDA PROPERTIES CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 5887.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 10, 1927.

1. Master and servant ⇨405(4)—Evidence held to sustain finding that permanent impairment of employee's wrist resulted from accident in employment.

Evidence held to sustain Industrial Accident Commission's finding that permanent impairment of function of employee's wrist resulted from accident occurring while in employ of defendant employer.

2. Master and servant ⇨417(7)—Court reviewing award of Industrial Accident Commission cannot weigh effect of positive evidence.

Appellate court, in reviewing awards of Industrial Accident Commission, cannot weigh effect of positive evidence, but must assume that commission believed all evidence given which tends to sustain award made.

3. Master and servant ⇨417(8)—Failure to officially file medical reports held not to have deprived employer of any substantial right (Workmen's Compensation Act).

In proceedings under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended), failure to officially file two medical reports made to employer held not to have deprived employer of any substantial right, where it cannot be assumed that they were not considered by Industrial Commission in making its award, and with or without such reports finding of commission is legally supported.

4. Master and servant ⇨419—Permanent disability is "new and further" disability for which applicant may file claim within six months (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11(c)).

A permanent disability is a "new and further" disability, within Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 841) § 11(c), and an applicant may file claim therefor at any time within six months after he becomes aware of the existence of such disability.

5. Master and servant §419—Application for adjustment of claim because of permanent impairment of use of wrist, held timely.

Evidence that compensation claimant, within few days after being informed that there was a permanent impairment of use of his wrist, filed application for adjustment of his claim held to show that application was filed in ample time.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by William Doran, employee, opposed by the Orinda Properties Company, employer, and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, insurer. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation, and the employer and insurer applied for certiorari to review such award. Award affirmed.

R. P. Wisecarver and Warren H. Pillsbury, both of San Francisco, for petitioners.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. On March 9, 1927, the Industrial Accident Commission awarded the respondent Doran compensation for a permanent impairment of the function of the left wrist, which the commission found had resulted from an accident occurring on July 3, 1925, while Doran was in the employ of the petitioner Orinda Properties Company, the compensability of which the petitioner insurance company at that time recognized. Petitioners now seek to have the award annulled, claiming that the evidence fails to support the commission's findings that the impairment to Doran's wrist was due to the injury of July 3, 1925, and that his claim was barred by the provisions of the statute and by his own laches.

The following facts appear from the record: On June 4, 1925, Doran was hired as a laborer at Orinda, Cal., by the Orinda Properties Company, and on July 3, 1925, sustained a fracture of the left minor wrist by falling from a roof. Said injury caused total disability up to and including September 9, 1925, during which period Doran was given medical treatment by Dr. Cuttle, of Oakland, and was compensated therefor by the petitioner insurance company. On December 3, 1925, Doran severed his employment with the Orinda Properties Company and went to San Diego, working there at odd jobs for six months. He then proceeded to Lafayette, Cal., where, on June 8, 1926, he entered the employ of Twohy Bros., bending steel. During this latter employment and on November 3, 1926, he sprained this same wrist while cranking a gas engine. He was treated for a period of three and a half weeks by Dr.

Holcomb, during which treatment X-ray pictures were taken of the wrist, and it was discovered that the wrist was permanently impaired as the result of a previous injury, and Doran was so informed.

Within a week thereafter Doran applied to the commission for an adjustment of his claim against petitioners upon the ground that the permanent disability to his wrist from which he was then suffering, and which had been revealed to him for the first time by the X-ray pictures taken by Dr. Holcomb, was the result of the injury of July 3, 1925. He was examined by Dr. Harbaugh, assistant medical director of the commission, whose written report, dated December 1, 1926, was filed with the commission, showing a permanent impairment in the motion and grasping power of the wrist. The next day Doran filed the present petition to obtain compensation for the permanent injury. Petitioners denied liability therefor, and at the hearing, which took place on December 16, 1926, Doran testified in answer to questions propounded by the referee that, in addition to the two injuries to his wrist above mentioned, he had sprained the same wrist about 20 years before, but that he was laid off as a result of it only 2 or 3 days; that he received no medical attention at the time, and that afterwards his wrist was just as "good or better" than the right wrist; that thereafter he had performed all kinds of hard work with it, in shipyards and in handling structural steel, and it had never given him any trouble until it was broken on July 3, 1925. So far as the record shows, the only additional proof adduced at the hearing relating to Doran's permanent disability consisted of the report of Dr. Harbaugh, which, after reciting the history of the case with reference to the fracture on July 3, 1925, and the sprain in November, 1926, stated, "X-ray pictures show evidence of an old fracture of a certain small bone of the wrist;" and the report concluded:

"It seems to me that the man has some permanent disability with reference to the injury in July. * * *

[1, 2] We are of the opinion that the foregoing evidence is sufficient to sustain the commission's finding that the permanent impairment complained of was due to the fracture of July 3, 1925. As said in Southern Pac. Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 177 Cal. 378, 170 P. 822:

"This court, in reviewing awards of the commission, is not acting as a court of appeal. It has no power to weigh the effect of positive evidence. It must assume that the commission believed all the evidence given which tends to sustain the award made. * * * The findings are not subject to review except in so far as they may have been made without any evidence whatever in support thereof. The review of the findings, even in such cases, is not based on the theory that they are not supported by the evidence and that we are weighing evidence to determine that proposition, but upon the theory that the commission has no jurisdiction to make a finding where there is no evidence to support it."

[3] Petitioners contend, however, that they were deprived of the benefit of the contents of two medical reports made to them by Drs. Cuttle and Carlson about the time that Doran was discharged from medical treatment for the fracture of July 3, 1925, and which reports, if considered by the commission, would have placed a different aspect upon the case as to the cause of the permanent impairment of the wrist. With reference thereto the record shows that at the conclusion of the hearing on December 16, 1926, an order was made that the case remain "open 5 days for filing medical reports, otherwise submitted." Pursuant to said order petitioners forwarded to the commission the two medical reports above referred to, but it seems the same were not received by the commission until 2 days after the expiration of the time allowed, and were never officially filed as exhibits in the case. Petitioners assert that it was not until after their motion for a new trial had been denied by the commission that they discovered said reports had not been filed, and that, therefore, they make complaint thereof for the first time in this proceeding.

The first report was dated July 30, 1925, and was made by Dr. Carlson, orthopedist, to Dr. Cuttle. He stated that the X-ray pictures taken by him showed that the accident of July 3, 1925, caused a "fracture of the distal end of the radius, running into the wrist joint"; also "an old impacted fracture of the scaphoid bone;" and that the examination showed a definitely limited motion of the wrist, some of which was "no doubt associated with his injury of July 3." The second report, dated September 14, 1925, which was several days subsequent to Doran's discharge from medical treatment for the July accident, was made by Dr. Cuttle, whereby petitioners were informed that "the case was not one of simple fracture of the radius, but that on account of the previous wrist injury aggravated by the recent accident there was a considerable amount of limitation of motion in the wrist joint"; that at the time of Doran's discharge "he still had a good deal of stiffness in the affected wrist"; and that "it may be necessary to take up at a later date the question of residual stiffness."

Even though it be conceded, as petitioners contend, that said reports should have been made a part of the record herein, we find nothing contained in either of them with reference to the existence of the earlier injury substantially or materially differing from the facts as they were established at the hearing before the commission by the testimony of Doran and the report of Dr. Harbaugh. Doran testified without hesitation that 20 years before he had sprained the same wrist; and the report of Dr. Harbaugh recites that "X-ray pictures show evidence of an old fracture of a certain small bone in the wrist"; consequently, the fact of an earlier injury was brought clearly before the commission before its award was made. No greater knowledge as to the existence of that injury could have been imparted to the commission by the contents of the reports in question, and since each report indicated that, notwithstanding the injury of 20 years previous, more or less of the stiffness which was then present and which was anticipated might continue in the future was, as Dr. Carlson expressed it, "no doubt associated with the injury of July 3," it cannot be said that the commission would have reached any different conclusion with reference to the cause of such permanent impairment had the contents of said reports come properly before it. Evidently petitioners were not taken by surprise at the testimony given by Doran, because they were informed as to the existence of the earlier injury by the reports of Drs. Cuttle and Carlson made to them some 15 months before; and if, as petitioners claim, Dr. Harbaugh had no information as to the earlier injury at the time he made his report, and therefore based his conclusion as to the cause of the permanent injury upon an erroneous assumption of facts, petitioners had ample opportunity before the hearing closed to have Dr. Harbaugh's report corrected, which they did not seek to do.

We think it cannot be assumed, however, from the mere fact that the reports of Drs. Cuttle and Carlson were not officially filed, that their contents were not considered by the commission in making its award. Admittedly the reports were in the possession of the commission for that purpose within the 7 days after the cause was heard, and were found among the records of the case at the time petitioner's motion for a new trial was made on November 20, 1926. Furthermore, petitioners concede that the failure to file said reports was doubtless due to a clerical error; that there was no order made excluding them from the record; and that the referee read them and gave them such consideration as he deemed proper in recommending a decision, which was rendered some 2½ months subsequent to the receipt of the records by the commission. From the circumstances mentioned it may be fairly inferred, we think, that, notwithstanding that the reports were not officially filed as exhibits, the commission, like the referee, gave the contents thereof such weight as it deemed proper.

For the reasons stated, we conclude that the failure to file said reports has not operated to deprive petitioners of any substantial right, and that either with or without said reports the finding of the commission as to the cause of the permanent impairment of the use of the wrist is legally supported.

[4, 5] Equally without merit are petitioner's further contentions that Doran's claim for compensation was barred by the provisions of the statute and by his own laches. A permanent disability is deemed to be a "new and further" disability, within the meaning of section 11 (c) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, being St. 1917, p. 841 (General Acc. & Fire & Life Assur. Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Comm. [Cal. App.] 246 P. 570), and an applicant is entitled to file a claim therefor at any time within 6 months after he becomes aware of the existence of such a new and further disability (Hutchinson Lumber Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm. [Cal. App.] 246 P. 118). The evidence here shows that although Doran was informed by Dr. Cuttle in September, 1925, that he would suffer some soreness and rheumatism as a result of the accident of July 3, 1925, it was affirmatively established that Doran did not learn that there was a permanent impairment of the use of the wrist until he was informed of such fact by Dr. Holcomb at the time the latter took the X-rays in November, 1926; and within a few days thereafter Doran filed the present application for an adjustment of his claim, which was well within 245 weeks from the date of original injury in July, 1925. Under such circumstances, his application was filed in ample time. Hutchinson Lumber Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra. The award is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MILLSAP. (Cr. 1463.) *

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 1, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 28, 1927.

1. Perjury ⇨11(3)—Complaint held to charge embezzlement, making defendant's verification of answer unnecessary, precluding prosecution for perjury if verification was false (Pen. Code, §§ 503 and 506; Code Civ. Proc. § 446).

The allegations of a complaint asserting that defendant, a fiduciary, received money in a fiduciary capacity, fraudulently appropriated it to his own use, and refused on demand of the owner to return it held sufficient to make out an embezzlement case, under Pen. Code, §§ 503 and 506, so that defendant was not required to verify his answer, under Code Civ. Proc. § 446, denying such allegations, and hence was not chargeable with perjury if verification was false.

2. Perjury ⇨11(3)—Verification of answer held not required, precluding charge of perjury for false verification, where complaint charged embezzlement within three years.

Verification of defendant's answer in a civil suit for the recovery of money held, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 446, not required, and hence defendant was not chargeable with perjury for alleged false verification, where he was charged with having embezzled at least a part of the money within three years before verifying answer, since defendant's admission of the truth of such allegation would have subjected him to a criminal prosecution for embezzlement of such money.

3. Perjury ⇨11(3)—False verification of affirmative defenses, not required by complaint, held not ground for perjury prosecution.

Where, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 446 and 437, a complaint is of such a character that defendant is not required to verify his answer to the plaintiff's allegations, he need not verify affirmative defenses which are made a part of such answer, and hence cannot be charged with perjury for alleged false verification of such defenses.

4. Perjury ⇨1—Not every false swearing constitutes perjury, even though it be as to material facts.

Not every false swearing constitutes perjury, even though it be as to material facts in a proceeding.

5. Perjury ⇨11(3)—Where nonessential verification to answer in civil action was not of nature to be used as an affidavit, prosecution for perjury could not be founded thereon.

Where defendant, in a civil action, verified his answer though verification was not required by law, prosecution for perjury could not be founded thereon, where the verified answer was not of such a nature as to be used as an affidavit.

6. Perjury ⇨11(3)—Where defendant verified answer unnecessarily, he could not be held to have waived nonverification right so as to be subject to perjury charge.

Where the defendant in a civil suit verified his answer although verification was not required by statute, he could not be held to have waived his right of nonverification so as to be subject to a perjury charge because of any false statements in such answer.

7. Perjury ⇨11(3)—Whether pleading requires verification so as to subject defendant to perjury prosecution if verification is falsely made depends entirely upon verification statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 446; Pen. Code, § 118).

Since necessity for the verification of a pleading arises from Code Civ. Proc. § 446, alone, the question whether verification is authorized or required so as to subject defendant to perjury prosecution, if verification is falsely made, must be solved entirely from the construction of such statute without regard to the provisions of Pen. Code, § 118, relative to oaths.

8. Perjury §11(1)—Taking unnecessary oath furnishes no ground for perjury charge.

Where, in a matter or proceeding in which there is no statutory requirement of an oath, a party, nevertheless, voluntarily takes an oath as to facts involved therein, this furnished no ground upon which to maintain a charge of perjury against such person.

9. Indictment and Information §159(2)—Where civil action contained no application for provisional relief, indictment for perjury for false verification of answer held not amendable to state public offense.

Where a civil action for the recovery of money contained no application for provisional relief so that a verified answer could be used as an affidavit, and indictment for perjury because of the answer held not amendable so as to state a public offense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Homer C. Millsap was convicted of perjury. From an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Judgment reversed, and the appeal from the order denying a new trial dismissed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Shenk, J., dissenting.

Paul W. Schenck and Leo V. Silverstein, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. Defendant was tried and convicted upon an indictment charging perjury and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. By demurrer to the indictment and also by motion in arrest of judgment he raised the point that the indictment does not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense. The act charged as perjury was the verification of an answer in a civil action. The indictment set up in full the complaint in that action and the answer thereto. The complaint was filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county on June 22, 1922, by Ida A. Morgan Clark, as plaintiff, against Homer C. Millsap, the appellant in this case, Berenice Williams Millsap, and M. M. Investment Company, a corporation, as defendants, for the purpose of obtaining an accounting from the defendants. The indictment alleged that this complaint was verified by the plaintiff and that an answer thereto was filed on July 25, 1922, in behalf of Berenice Williams Millsap and Homer C. Millsap, individually and as trustee for M. M. Investment Company, which was verified on the same day by Homer C. Millsap. This verification is the perjury charged.

In support of his contention that the indictment does not state a case of perjury, appellant argues that no verification of the answer was required by law, and therefore a false oath made in verifying it could not be perjury. The general matter of verification of pleadings in civil actions is governed by section 446 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads, in part, as follows:

"When the complaint is verified, or when the state, or any officer of the state in his official capacity, is plaintiff, the answer must be verified, unless an admission of the truth of the complaint might subject the party to a criminal prosecution, or, unless an officer of the state, in his official capacity, is defendant."

The complaint in this case being verified, appellant bases his claim that no verification of the answer was required upon the proposition that the complaint charged him with embezzlement and an admission of its truth would therefore subject him to a criminal prosecution. The complaint is long and complicated, alleging four causes of action. Appellant refers in support of his contention to the whole complaint and quotes with special emphasis a part of the third cause of action, in which all the facts necessary to show an embezzlement of $20,000 of the plaintiff's money by defendant, Homer C. Millsap, are grouped together and concisely stated. Unfortunately for this reference, the embezzlement there alleged is stated to have occurred on September 8, 1914, whereas the verification in question was not made until July 25, 1922, nearly eight years later. There is no suggestion in the civil complaint or in the indictment that appellant was out of the state on September 8, 1914, or at any time thereafter. Hence it appears that when the verification was made the statute of limitations had run against a prosecution for the embezzlement charged in the part of the complaint now under consideration. This fact raises the question whether, under the circumstances, an admission of the truth of these allegations would subject appellant to a criminal prosecution. This question has not been discussed in the briefs, and decision of it is not necessary, for other allegations of the complaint are sufficient, when taken together, to charge an embezzlement occurring within the statutory period before the verification of the answer was made by appellant.

In the first cause of action the complaint alleged, among other things, the following facts: That the defendant, Homer C. Millsap, was at all times therein mentioned an attorney at law; that in May, 1913, the plaintiff employed him as her attorney at law; that he accepted the employment and it continued without interruption to January, 1922; that at his request and on his advice, she delivered and intrusted to him the property mentioned in the complaint for his care, supervision, and preservation for plaintiff; that in May, 1914, she owned certain cash, notes, and other property; that defendant,

Homer C. Millsap, advised her that said property could be more easily and effectively managed if a corporation were formed and said property transferred to it; that she assented to this, and accordingly the defendant M. M. Investment Company was incorporated in June, 1914, by Homer C. Millsap; that he was at all times one of its officers and directors until it forfeited its charter in March, 1921, at which time he became, and ever since has been, a trustee for its stockholders; that plaintiff transferred the above-mentioned property to said corporation in 1914 shortly after its organization; that thereafter the corporation and Homer C. Millsap received from said property transferred by plaintiff to the corporation, by way of rents, sales and other collections, more than $71,201.38, the portion of said sum received by each being unknown to plaintiff; that said sum was received at dates and in amounts as follows: During the years 1914 to 1919, inclusive, $8,500; between May 12, 1914, and November 12, 1914, $25,945.83; March 3, 1915, $8,000; April 20, 1915, $2,500; February 14, 1916, $8,000; March 9, 1916, $8,000; April 21, 1920, $8,500, which was the proceeds of a sale of certain property which plaintiff had transferred to the corporation; and at unspecified dates $1,755.55; that all the property transferred by plaintiff to said corporation was the property of plaintiff, and all the money received by said defendants was at all times and now is the money of the plaintiff; that said corporation never had any business except that of obtaining, holding, and selling the said property of the plaintiff under the sole and exclusive management and control of said Homer C. Millsap, and all its books and record have always been in his possession and control, and his office was its office; that during the years 1919 and 1920 the defendant Berenice Williams Millsap was the stenographer of Homer C. Millsap and received certain of plaintiff's money without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, the amount thereof being unknown to the plaintiff. Paragraphs XV and XVII of the first cause of action read as follows:

"XV. That at the time of the assignment and transfer of plaintiff's said property as aforesaid to said defendant corporation, said defendant, Homer C. Millsap, advised plaintiff that the moneys derived and received from the sale of said properties, and each of them, would be and was invested by said defendant, Homer C. Millsap, an interest-bearing property; that said plaintiff discovered within 6 months last past, and not before, that her said moneys aforesaid had not been invested in any property, but, on the contrary, had been deposited in the personal bank account and accounts of said defendant, Homer C. Millsap, and by him unlawfully and fraudulently appropriated to his own uses and purposes, with the exception of certain of said moneys that said defendant paid out to plaintiff and for the care and preservation of said mining properties as aforesaid, and with the further exception of certain moneys received by said Berenice Williams Millsap, as aforesaid."

"XVII. That said defendants have paid to plaintiff of said sum of $71,201.38, as aforesaid, the sum of $10,968.81."

The first cause of action further alleged that plaintiff has repeatedly and from time to time demanded of the defendants an accounting and the return and payment to her of her money, and has demanded such accounting since February 5, 1922, no other dates of such demands being stated; that defendant, Homer C. Millsap, promised to account, but has failed, neglected, and refused to do so; that plaintiff is not indebted to any of the defendants in any amount; and that there is due, owing, and unpaid to her from defendants approximately $60,232.57.

In the fourth cause of action the plaintiff alleged that defendants are indebted to her in the sum of $60,235.57 for money had and received by them and each of them to her use, as alleged in the first and third causes of action, both of which are here repeated in large part by reference; that defendants concealed from her their dealings with her property; that on April 18, 1922, she finally obtained from Homer C. Millsap a statement of account, and found it "to be untruthful and incorrect, and that large sums of money which said defendant, Homer C. Millsap, admitted had been collected by him and received by the defendants had been appropriated to his own use, as hereinbefore alleged"; that plaintiff learned for the first time on April 18, 1922, except as to the $20,000 transaction, "that the said appropriation of said moneys had been done in secret by said defendants, as aforesaid; * * * that prior to the commencement of this action plaintiff demanded of said defendants and each of them the payment to her of said sum," and they and each of them refused to pay said sum or any part thereof to plaintiff, and it is now wholly unpaid.

[1, 2] The allegations which we have summarized from the complaint clearly show that the appellant received money of the plaintiff in said civil action in a large amount; that at the time he received it he was acting in a fiduciary capacity for her; that instead of investing and keeping it for her, which he should have done in the due and lawful execution of his trust, he fraudulently appropriated it to his own use and refused on demand to return it. This is sufficient to make out a case of embezzlement, under sections 503 and 506 of the Penal Code. 10 Cal. Jur. 265; People v. Shearer, 143 Cal. 66, 76 P. 813; People v. Gordon, 133 Cal. 328, 65 P. 746, 85 Am. St. Rep. 174; People v. Steffner, 67 Cal. App. 23, 227 P. 699. Although neither the date at which this misappropriation occurred nor the dates on which plaintiff demanded the return of her money are alleged, yet a prosecution for the embezzlement was not barred by the statute, at least as to the sum of $8,500, for that amount was received by appellant within three years before he verified the answer, and, of course, could not have been embezzled before it was received. An admission of the truth of these allegations would therefore have subjected appellant to a criminal prosecution for embezzlement, and he was not required by section 446 of the Code of Civil Procedure to verify his answer.

[3] The respondent attempts to defeat this conclusion by calling attention to the fact that the part of the answer which is the subject of the assignment of perjury, on which appellant was convicted, is not a denial of any allegation of the complaint, but is an affirmative allegation, and contends that, even though defendant might under the circumstances be excused from verifying so much of his answer as consisted of denials, he was bound to verify the affirmative allegations thereof. This contention finds no support in the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 437 of that Code, as it stood when this answer was filed divided defenses into two classes, (1) denials and (2) new matter, and as to the first class imposed stricter requirements in case of a verified complaint, but as to the second class permitted the same form of allegation whether the complaint was verified or unverified. There is, therefore, no reason to suppose that the Legislature intended to impose on the pleader any greater degree of strictness in regard to verification for such defenses than for those of the first class, nor does the language of the Code lend itself to any such differentiation. The provision of section 446 is that "when the complaint is verified, * * * the answer must be verified"; thus evidently regarding each document as a whole to be either verified or not verified, and not countenancing the splitting of either into parts or a piecemeal verification. Respondent cites no authority in support of its contention as to the verification, but concedes that the case of Martin v. Bernheim (Sup.) 34 N. Y. S. 784, is authority to the contrary. That case was based on a statutory provision that the verification "may be omitted" where the party pleading would be privileged from testifying as a witness concerning an allegation contained in the pleading which he answers. The court had before it a case of this kind, where the allegations of the complaint showed that the defendant was guilty of a misdemeanor, and in holding that the defendant was entitled to make an unverified answer said:

"Under the express provision of the Code, he is allowed to answer such an allegation contained in the complaint by an unverified answer. The fact that in the same answer he has the right to plead other defenses does not take away from a defendant a right to answer such an allegation as is contained in this complaint without verifying the answer. All of the defenses to the action, and all facts pleaded in mitigation of damages, must be set forth in one pleading."

[4] We conclude that the exceptions made by section 446 to the requirement that the answer be verified are intended to cover the answer as a whole, including everything which under section 437 may be contained therein, and hence the verification charged in the indictment was not required by law, even as to the affirmative allegations contained in the answer.

It is not the rule that every false swearing constitutes perjury, even though it be as to material facts. As stated in People v. Howard, 111 Cal. 655, 658, 44 P. 342, 343:

"One of the primary essentials of the crime of perjury is that the false oath must be material or of consequence in the matter or proceeding in which it is taken (Pen. Code, § 118); and it is well established that the matter or thing sworn or testified will not be held so material where the officer or tribunal before whom the oath is taken had not jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the oath, notwithstanding there may have been general authority to administer oaths in like cases, if within the jurisdiction."

In that case it was held that the defendant was not guilty of perjury, it being alleged that he had falsely verified a criminal complaint filed in a city recorder's court, because this complaint did not show that the recorder's court had jurisdiction of the offense charged.

In the case of Clark, 54 Cal. App. 507, 202 P. 50, it was held that a defendant who gave false testimony at the trial of a criminal case before a justice of the peace was not guilty of perjury because the complaint in the criminal case did not state facts sufficient to constitute a crime, although the testimony given was no doubt material to the charge made, the court saying:

"In order that a charge of perjury be made out against the petitioner, it was necessary that the alleged false testimony had been given in a judicial proceeding and that the same was material to a valid issue properly made therein. If the complaint in the gaming case failed to charge a public offense, as is asserted, then the testimony of petitioner would not amount to perjury as that crime is defined by the statute."

[5] These cases do not touch the precise point involved in the present case, but we think the principle on which they are based, as stated in the Howard Case, is controlling here. It cannot be said here that the false oath charged was material or of consequence in the proceeding in which it was taken, for it gave the answer to which it related no standing or weight which it would not have had without the oath. Circumstances might have arisen in the action under which the verification would have been of some consequence, as, for instance, if an application had been made for some provisional remedy, on which the answer could have been used as an affidavit; but the indictment charges nothing of this kind. As far as appears therefrom the answer was used solely as a pleading, and as such it was no more effective with the verification than it would have been without it.

The courts of several other states have had occasion to consider cases similar to that before us, and as far as we have discovered they have reached the same conclusion as that which we have stated. In the case of Beecher v. Anderson, 45 Mich. 543, 8 N. W. 539, the court was asked to issue a writ of mandamus to compel a sheriff to serve a warrant for the arrest of one Wheaton on a charge of perjury, and the court, while commenting on the extraordinary nature of the proceeding, decided the case on the theory that the sheriff might refuse to serve the warrant if the complaint upon which it was issued stated no crime, and proceeded therefore to consider the sufficiency of the complaint. The offense charged against said Wheaton was that he had as an officer of and in behalf of a certain corporation verified its answer to a bill in equity. The court in an opinion written by Judge Cooley said:

"Perjury is committed 'when a lawful oath is administered, in some judicial proceeding, to a person who swears willfully, absolutely, and falsely, in a matter material to the issue or point in question.' 3 Inst. 164; 4 Bl. Com. 137; People v. Fox, 25 Mich. 492. By this is meant that the oath must be material: the facts sworn to may be material, and yet the false swearing be no perjury because the oath performed no office in the case, and was wholly unimportant and immaterial. This point is well illustrated, in the case of People v. Fox, just referred to. Fox was informed against for having made a false affidavit in a suit at law pending in the circuit court for the county of Branch wherein he affirmed that one of the defendants in said suit did not execute the obligation sued upon. The fact sworn to was material, but it did not appear from the information that the affidavit was made to be used in the case, or that it actually was used, or that it performed or was to perform any important office whatever in the case. It did not therefore appear that the oath was of any materiality. People v. Gaige, 26 Mich. 30, is, if possible, still more directly in point. The alleged perjury was committed in swearing to a bill in chancery. It was averred that the facts sworn to were material, but the information did not show that the bill was one of a character required by law to be under oath, or that it was sworn to in order to be used as the foundation of any motion or other application to the court. So far as appeared, therefore, the oath was a merely idle ceremony, and its being taken in the case was of no importance. * * * The answer of a corporation is not required to be sworn to, but is put in without oath under the corporate seal. * * * It does not appear from the complaint that the answer was to be used for any purpose for which an oath to it could be of any importance. So far as appears, therefore, the oath of Wheaton to the answer was wholly an idle ceremony. The answer was no better with it than without it; it affected the issue in no manner whatever; it strengthened no statement made by the answer, and it made no statement evidence that would not have been evidence without it, and gave no statement weight or force that it would not otherwise have possessed. As an information the complaint would therefore have been fatally defective.

The language which we have quoted from Beecher v. Anderson sufficiently states the holding in two other Michigan cases, People v. Fox, 25 Mich. 492, and People v. Gaige, 26 Mich. 30. It appears from the Fox Case that the Michigan statute defining perjury refers to the oath taken as one "required or authorized by law."

In Silver v. State, 17 Ohio, 365, the court held that an affidavit of the truth of an answer in equity did not constitute ground for a charge of perjury where the bill did not call for an answer under oath, saying:

"To constitute perjury, the oath or affirmation must be material, or be required by, or have some effect in law. Under the late act, an affidavit of the truth of an answer in chancery, has no legal effect, unless the bill expressly calls for such answer on oath. Unless called for on oath, the affidavit of the truth of the answer is wholly immaterial; it neither benefits the respondent or injures the complainant. The answer has the same effect, and nothing more, than it would have had, had it not been sworn to."

In State v. Parrish, 129 La. 547, 56 So. 503, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 96, it was held, quoting the syllabus in 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 96:

"To falsely make oath before a notary public in order to obtain a saloon license is not perjury, when the law governing the issuance of such licenses does not require such an oath. An oath must be administered in accordance with the law before perjury can be charged."

In a note appended to this case a large number of authorities are cited to the proposition that perjury cannot be predicated of an oath not required by law.

In the case of Lapley v. State, 170 Wis. 356, 174 N. W. 913, 7 A. L. R. 1279, it was held that a charge of perjury may be based upon an oath taken in verifying a complaint in a civil action, although under the law of Wisconsin a complaint may or may not be verified, the court saying:

"A complaint in a civil action pending in a court having jurisdiction to hear the cause is a material matter in the proceeding, and an oath verifying it is one in regard to a matter before a court and is authorized by law."

The court did not state what the provisions of the Wisconsin statute were as to the effect of a verification of a complaint, but if they were like those of the California law, the case is clearly distinguishable from the one which we now have before us. Under our statute, the law authorizes verification of a complaint and annexes certain consequences to the taking of an oath for that purpose. If the plaintiff verifies his complaint, it follows under sections 437 and 446 of the Code of Civil Procedure that the denials of the answer must be in a certain form, and that the answer must be verified. Hence it may be said of the verification of a complaint, in the words of People v. Howard, supra, that the oath is of consequence in the proceeding in which it is taken, and a charge of perjury can be based upon it. Upon this ground the case of Lapley v. State could be sustained as consistent with the other authorities. In a note to this case where reported in 7 A. L. R. 1279, the authorities on this subject are again collected and cited, and the annotator states the rule as follows:

"It is well established that where the pleading is of a character which the law does not require shall be verified by oath, perjury cannot be assigned upon a false oath made in verifying such a pleading."

[6] Respondent also argues that the exception to the rule requiring verification of an answer is in the nature of a personal privilege which may be waived by the defendant, and was waived in the case at bar by the making of the verification; and likens the case to that of a defendant in a criminal prosecution who elects to take the stand and testify in his own behalf, citing authorities to the effect that such a defendant may be convicted of perjury if he gives false testimony. But the comparison attempted is not apt. Although the defendant is not required to testify, yet if he desires to do so he must be sworn in order to exercise that privilege and the oath is therefore required by law. The two situations would be more nearly analogous if the law provided that the defendant in a criminal case might make an unsworn statement to the jury and have it considered by them as testimony. If such a provision were in the law and a defendant should then voluntarily take an oath before making his statement, we hardly think he could be held guilty of perjury. In the case before us there is no personal privilege to be waived. The word "unless" is the equivalent of "except" (Estate of Smith, 131 Cal. 433, 63 P. 729, 82 Am. St. Rep. 358), and the part of section 446 introduced by it is therefore an exception to the rule previously stated. The case is simply excluded by the exception from the operation of the general provision requiring verification. As to it there is no provision for verification, and the right to file an unverified answer can no more be regarded as a privilege in this case than in a case where the complaint is not verified.

Respondent bases a further argument upon the use of the word "may" in section 118 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows:

"Every person who, having taken an oath that he will testify, declare, depose, or certify truly before any competent tribunal, officer, or person, in any of the cases in which such oath may by law be administered, wilfully and contrary to such oath, states as true any material matter which he knows to be false, is guilty of perjury."

[7, 8] The point made is that the word "may" is permissive and not mandatory, and hence under this section perjury may be committed where an oath is authorized or permitted, though not required. This may be correct in cases where the law does in truth permit an oath and annexes some consequence to it, as in the case of a complaint in an ordinary civil action, which we have already discussed, but it is not correct to say as to the case before us that the law authorizes or permits any oath. The necessity for the verification of a pleading arises from the statute alone, and the question whether it is authorized or required is to be solved entirely upon the construction of section 446 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Claiborne v. Castle, 98 Cal. 30, 32 P. 807. In the present case, section 446, as we have already seen, does not authorize or provide for a verification of the answer in question; it is merely a case excepted from the rule requiring verification. There is no more authority of law for an oath in such an excepted case than there is in any other case where an oath is not provided for. The most that can be truthfully said is that the law does not forbid an oath in such a case, and this can be said with regard to all voluntary oaths that may be made, upon which it is well established that no charge of perjury can be maintained.

The provisions of section 118 are not materially different in this respect from the Michigan statute (Comp. Laws 1915, § 14973) under which a charge of perjury could be based on any oath "authorized * * * or * * * required by law," and yet the Michigan cases above cited held that perjury could not be committed by an oath taken in verifying a pleading where no verification was required. So, too, under a federal statute (18 USCA § 231) providing that a false oath "in any case in which a law of the United States authorizes an oath to be administered" may be the foundation of a perjury charge it was held in United States v. Cameron (D. C.) 282 F. 684, 689, that:

"Nothing is better settled with reference to the offense of perjury than that it may not be based upon an oath, however solemnly taken, which is not required by the law to be taken by the party charged."

The same ruling was made under the same statute in United States v. Robertson (D. C.) 257 F. 195.

[9] We conclude that the false oath alleged by the indictment does not support the charge of perjury. Our conclusion on this point renders it unnecessary to discuss other objections which appellant makes to the indictment, or to consider the objections upon other grounds to the judgment. The original complaint in the civil action was introduced in evidence at the trial, and contains the same allegations appearing in the copy thereof set forth in the indictment. The evidence shows that there was in the civil action no application for provisional relief, on which the answer could be or was used as an affidavit, and hence the indictment is not amendable so as to state a public offense. It thus appearing that there can be no new trial on this indictment, the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial has become moot and should be dismissed.

The judgment is reversed, the appeal from the order denying a new trial is dismissed, and, it appearing that the defendant has given bail, it is directed that his bail be exonerated.

PEOPLE v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SOLANO COUNTY.*

SAME v. ELLIS.

(Civ. 3332; Cr. 985.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 1, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 31, 1927. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Nov. 28, 1927.

1. Criminal law § 97(1)—Penal laws of California have no extraterritorial force.

Penal laws of California are not to be given any extraterritorial force, and a crime committed in another state cannot be punished under them.

2. Statutes § 241(1)—Penal statutes will be not construed to reach further than their words.

No person can be made subject to penal statutes by implication; the statutes not being construed to reach further than their words.

3. Bigamy § 1—Cohabitation within state, following a second marriage outside state, is not "bigamy" (Pen. Code, §§ 281, 1106).

One having a husband or wife living, who marries another person without the state and subsequently cohabits with him within the state, is not guilty of "bigamy," since meaning of Pen. Code § 281, defining bigamy cannot be extended by section 1106, providing that proof that second marriage took place without state accompanied by proof of cohabitation thereafter within state is sufficient to sustain charge of bigamy; penal laws having no extraterritorial force.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Bigamy.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; William T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Henry W. J. Ellis, also known as Henry J. Ellis, was charged by information with bigamy. The court dismissed the case, and the State appeals and applies for a writ of review. Order affirmed.

Hearing granted by Supreme Court; PRESTON, J., dissenting.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Brantley W. Dobbins, Dist. Atty., of San Francisco, and Leo C. Dunnell, Deputy Dist. Atty., of Richmond, for the People.

Joseph M. Raines, of Fairfield, and Russell F. O'Hara, of Vallejo, for respondents.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem. In the first of the above-entitled proceedings the petitioner seeks to have annulled an order of the superior court of the county of Solano dismissing a certain criminal action wherein one Ellis is charged with the crime of bigamy. The second proceeding is an appeal from the same order.

From the record it appears that the trial court granted the motion because it was of the opinion that the information did not state a public offense under the laws of this state and that the defect could not be cured by an amendment.

The charging part of the information reads as follows:

"The said Henry W. J. Ellis, also known as Henry J. Ellis, on or about the 27th day of September, A. D. nineteen hundred and twenty-six, at Kansas City, state of Missouri, and before the filing of this information, did knowingly, willfully, and feloniously marry one Ida Lou Johnson, the said defendant being then and there the lawful husband of another person, to wit Alice Burton Ellis, then and there living, the marriage of said defendant and said Alice Burton Ellis not having been annulled, dissolved, and pronounced void by the judgment of any competent court, being then and there subsisting, as the defendant well knew, and the said Alice Burton Ellis not then and there being absent from the said defendant for five successive years without being known to defendant to be living; said defendant and said Ida Lou Johnson Ellis having on or about the 2d day of October, 1926, and ever since said date cohabited together as husband and wife, in Vallejo township, in the county of Solano, state of California."

To this information the defendant entered a plea of not guilty, and the cause was set for trial for the 26th day of April, 1927, and at that time the defendant made a motion that the action be dismissed and the defendant discharged from custody. The court granted the motion. It will be observed that the information alleges the marriage to have taken place in the state of Missouri, followed by a cohabitation of the parties in Solano county, Cal. The statute defining bigamy is section 281 of the Penal Code, which is entitled "Bigamy Defined," and reads as follows:

"Every person having a husband or wife living, who marries any other person, except in the cases specified in the next section, is guilty of bigamy."

[1] Admittedly this case does not fall within any of the exceptions contained in the next section. If the foregoing were the only section bearing upon the subject-matter, we feel confident that no contention would be advanced that the trial court erred in its order of dismissal of the action, for it is too well settled to require the citation of authorities that the laws of California can have no extraterritorial force and that a crime committed in the state of Missouri could not be punished under the laws of the state of California. But it is claimed on behalf of the petitioner that section 1106 of the Penal Code must be read in conjunction with section 281, supra, and when so read the two sections constitute the crime of bigamy as alleged in the information. Section 1106 of said Code is entitled "Evidence on a Trial for Bigamy," and reads as follows:

"Upon a trial for bigamy, it is not necessary to prove either of the marriages by the register, certificate, or other record evidence thereof, but the same may be proved by such evidence as is admissible to prove a marriage in other cases; and when the second marriage took place out of this state, proof of that fact, accompanied with proof of cohabitation thereafter in this state, is sufficient to sustain the charge."

It is further claimed that when the Penal Code of 1872 was enacted by the Legislature it was intended by the Legislature to re-enact or continue in existence the same definition of bigamy which had theretofore existed in our law. To a better understanding of the foregoing contention it is necessary to examine the law as it had previously existed. The Legislature of 1850, under the title of "Offenses Against Public Morality, Health, and Police" (Stat. 1850, p. 244, § 121), defined bigamy in the following language:

"Bigamy consists in having two wives or two husbands at one and the same time, knowing that the former husband or wife is still alive, * * * and when such second marriage shall have taken place without this state, cohabitation in this state, after such second marriage shall be deemed the commission of the crime of bigamy."

[2] The foregoing act was amended by the Legislature May 11, 1861 (St. 1861, p. 415), but did not alter the portion of the act above quoted. In 1872 the crime of bigamy was codified in section 281 of the Penal Code as it now stands and that portion of the Crimes and Punishment Act of 1850 and 1861, supra, relating to marriage without the state followed by cohabitation within this state, was omitted. Comparing the act of 1850 and the act of 1861 with section 281 of the Penal Code as it now stands, it appears that in both the former acts that when the second marriage was contracted without the state of California cohabitation in this state after such second marriage constituted the commission of the crime of bigamy, while in section 281 of the Penal Code all reference to a marriage contracted out of the state followed by cohabitation within this state is omitted. Section 1106 of the Penal Code provides that when the second marriage took place out of the state proof of that fact, accompanied by proof of cohabitation thereafter in this state, is sufficient to sustain the charge. The earlier statutes define a bigamous marriage out of the state followed by cohabitation within this state as constituting the crime of bigamy, while section 1106 merely states that it is sufficient to sustain the charge of bigamy, but does not undertake to make such facts constitute the crime. In our opinion there is a broad distinction between the earlier acts and section 281, even when read with section 1106, supra. In re Twing, 188 Cal. 261, 204 P. 1082, it was held that:

"Penal statutes will be construed to reach no further than their words; no person can be made subject to them by implication."

[3] The Penal Code is divided into three parts. The title of part 1 is "Crimes and Punishments." It covers sections 26 to 681a of the Code. Therein the various crimes are defined and punishment provided for. Crimes are classified therein and each title deals with crimes of one class or of a similar nature. Therein the substantive law and definitions of crimes are found. The title to title 9 of part 1 is "Crimes Against the Person and Against Public Decency and Good Morals." This covers section 261 to 267 of the Code. Chapter 5 of said title 9 is entitled "Bigamy, Incest," etc. It includes sections 281 to 288 of the Penal Code, which includes the definition of the crime of bigamy, as hereinbefore set out. The title to part 2 of the Code is "Criminal Procedure." It includes sections 681 to 1570. Therein matters of procedure are dealt with, including commitments, trials, appeals, and special proceedings. Part 2 is divided into various titles. The title of title 7 is "Proceedings After the Commencement of the Trial and Before Judgment." The title of chapter 2 of title 7 is "The trial." Therein we find section 1106, supra, dealing with evidence on the trial of a charge of bigamy. In Kerr's Cyc., Penal Code of 1920 (2d Ed.), the author says of section 1106 of the Penal Code:

"The latter portion of above section, relating to proof where second marriage takes place out of state, undoubtedly is, at most, rule of evidence, and cannot be deemed to extend scope of section 281, ante, defining bigamy in this state. Under section 281, ante, second marriage is gravamen of offense of bigamy. * * * This being so, it would seem that whenever second marriage is contracted, offense is then complete, and is offense against state in which overt act is committed. As laws of state can have no extraterritorial force, provisions such as that contained in this section cannot alone warrant punishment of offense committed in another state."

Counsel for petitioner cites in support of his contention that the information states a public offense. People v. Martin, 188 Cal. 281, 205 P. 121, 21 A. L. R. 1399. In that case the defendant was charged by indictment in the superior court of San Diego county with the crime of bigamy which was alleged to have been committed in the county of Orange, but the case is not analogous to the one now before the court, for the reason that section 785 of the Penal Code provides that, when the offense of bigamy is committed in one county and the defendant is apprehended in another county, the jurisdiction is in either county, and in the Martin Case the defendant was apprehended in the county of San Diego.

Many other cases are cited by both parties, but a reading of section 281 of the Penal Code, which defines the crime of bigamy, cannot be extended by section 1106 of the Penal Code, especially in view of the fact that the latter section does not undertake to define the crime of bigamy, but merely establishes a rule of evidence. A further examination of the authorities cited would serve no useful purpose.

Some question has been raised as to the proper remedy, whether it should be by appeal or by writ of review, but, as in either case the order must be affirmed, that question becomes immaterial.

The order is affirmed.

GEORGE et al. v. BEATY et al. (Civ. 5777.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 21, 1927.

Rehearing Denied with Modifications Oct. 20, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 17, 1927.

1. Pleading §129(1)—Where respondents neither admit nor deny material allegations of petition, they stand admitted.

In original proceeding in mandamus, admission of truth of material allegations of petition follows as legal conclusion from respondents' failure to traverse them, even in case where they neither admit nor deny averments by petitioners.

2. Mandamus §168(2)—Court cannot presume that supervisors of flood control district will not continue to do all things required in pending mandamus proceeding (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subsec. 15).

Where board of supervisors of flood control district who were defendants in mandamus proceeding took all action that they might be compelled to take in such proceeding, court cannot assume they will not continue to do so, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subsec. 15, relative to presumption that official duty will be regularly performed.

3. Mandamus §14(3)—Where respondents showed willingness to perform duty without coercion of writ, peremptory writ of mandamus will not issue.

Where board of supervisors of flood control district, who were respondents in mandamus proceeding, took all action that they might be compelled to take in such proceeding, peremptory writ will not be issued, since remedy of mandamus will not be employed where respondents show willingness to perform duty without coercion of writ.

4. Levees and flood control §9—Supervisors of Los Angeles flood control district have exclusive authority to determine whether change of conditions in relation to improvements existed authorizing change in improvement (St. 1915, p. 1502, § 15).

Under St. 1915, p. 1502, § 15, relative to improvements in Los Angeles flood control district, duty and authority of determining whether there has been change of conditions in relation to improvements authorizing change in improvement is on board of supervisors of district, and courts cannot prevent free and unhampered discharge of such duty.

5. Mandamus §14(3)—Mandamus is never granted until there has been actual refusal to perform act.

Mandamus is never granted to compel performance of act until there has been actual as distinguished from anticipated refusal.

6. Mandamus §19—Writ of "mandamus" being directed to person would not apply to persons becoming members of board of supervisors of flood control district after its issuance.

Writ of "mandamus" is command to person as distinguished from office so that writ would be inapplicable to new members elected to board of supervisors of flood control district after its issuance.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Mandamus.]

7. Mandamus §16(1)—Peremptory writ of mandamus should not issue where there has been compliance with alternative writ, question being moot.

Peremptory writ of mandamus should not issue as matter of course, where there has been compliance with alternative writ, since by reason of such compliance question has become moot.

Application by R. W. George and others for a writ of mandate, prayed to be directed to Fred T. Beaty and others, as the Board of Supervisors of the Los Angeles Flood Control District, requiring them to proceed with the construction of a dam at San Gabriel Canyon damsite. Writ denied.

Anderson & Anderson and Haas & Dunigan, all of Los Angeles, Nowland M. Reid, of Long Beach, and Arthur G. Wray, of Whittier, for petitioners.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, Roy W. Dowds, and Hill, Morgan & Bledsoe, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMPSON, J. In this original proceeding in mandamus the petitioners seek the peremptory writ compelling the respondents, as the board of supervisors of the Los Angeles flood control district, to proceed to construct a dam at the San Gabriel Canyon damsite of the height of 425 feet above the bed of the stream, with a storage capacity of 240,000 acre feet of water, or to construct to completion a dam of such height and capacity as can be constructed for the sum of $25,000,000. It is made to appear by the allegations of the petition that at a special election called for that purpose on May 24, 1924, the voters of the Los Angeles flood control district authorized bonds in the sum of $25,000,000 for the purpose of constructing a dam at the forks of the San Gabriel river of the height and capacity just mentioned, in accordance with a report of the engineer employed by the board of supervisors to make a report thereon and at the estimated cost of $25,000,000; that on May 18, 1927, the board passed a resolution reciting that subsequent exploration studies had demonstrated that a dam 385 feet high and with a capacity of 180,000 acre feet would be sufficient, and changed the plans and specifications and adopted plans and specifications for the smaller dam.

[1] From the return of the respondents it appears that subsequent to the issuance and service of the alternative writ, the board of supervisors, by resolution passed on August 1, 1927, rescinded the action of May 18, 1927, and ordered "that the dam in San Gabriel Canyon be constructed at the site and of the size and impounding capacity as provided in the report of the chief engineer of said district, adopted April 1, 1924, and for the construction of which bonds were duly and regularly voted by the voters of said district on May 6, 1924, and that the chief engineer of said district be instructed to present plans and specifications to this board for the construction of a dam in accordance therewith. * * * It is also alleged that the board is "now proceeding as fast as possible to construct to completion a dam at the San Gabriel damsite according to the plans and specifications and of the height and capacity authorized by the voters of said district," and that "they are now expressly and in every detail complying with the command set forth in the alternative writ of mandate in this case." No allegation of the petition is denied in the return, but the respondents make their allegations with the attempted reservation that they neither admit nor deny the averments by petitioners. Therefore all of the material allegations of the petition, in the eyes of the law, stand admitted. As stated by the court in the case of People v. Crabb, 156 Ill. 155, 40 N. E. 319, which was a proceeding in mandamus where a similar effort was made:

"The admission of their truth [allegations of the petition] follows as a legal conclusion from the defendants' failure to traverse them; and such conclusion is not obviated by a protestation on the part of the defendants that their truth is not admitted."

[2, 3] With the situation thus clearly before us the sole question is whether the peremptory writ should issue or the petition be dismissed with costs to petitioners. Originally the "writ of mandamus is a high prerogative writ issuing in the name of the sovereign power * * *" (Calaveras County v. Brockway, 30 Cal. 325, 336), and with that historical background it would seem the writ could not be invoked except for the accomplishment of some useful purpose. It has accordingly been determined that it will not issue "where it would be of no benefit to the applicant, or to enforce a mere abstract right, unattended by any substantial benefit to the petitioner." Spotton v. Superior Court, 177 Cal. 719, 171 P. 801. What would be accomplished in this proceeding by the issuance of the peremptory writ? It is certain that had the resolution of August 1, 1927, preceded the filing of the petition the alternative writ would not have issued. The board of supervisors have taken all action which we might at this time compel them to take and we cannot assume that they will not continue in accordance with their allegations "to construct to completion a dam at the San Gabriel damsite" of the height and capacity determined by the voters. In fact we are bound to presume, in line with the presumption contained in subsection 15 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, "that official duty" will be "regularly performed." There is a long line of authorities which hold that the remedy of mandamus will not be employed where the respondents show that they are willing to perform the duty without the coercion of the writ. As an example we quote from People v. Dulaney, 96 Ill. 503-506, a proceeding against the commission of the Illinois state penitentiary at Joliet:

"As respects the first contract, respondents admit its validity and their willingness to perform it, so far as it is practicable for them to do it. Waiving, for the present, the question made as to the jurisdiction of this court to * * * compel the execution of such a contract, there can be no occasion for a writ to compel respondents to do that which they admit, on the record, they are willing to do without coercion. The law will not do a useless thing."

And again in State v. Nash, 134 Minn. 73, 158 N. W. 730, it is said:

"Mandamus will not issue to compel the doing of an act which has already been done, or which the respondent is willing to do without coercion." 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 758. Neither will it issue to compel the revocation of a building permit for a defect which has been corrected, or which the parties concerned are ready and willing to correct." (Italics ours.)

To the same effect see State ex rel. Good v. Howard, 174 Ind. 358, 92 N. E. 115; American Eng. Co. v. Metropolitan By-Products Co. (C. C. A.) 280 F. 677; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Messenger, 26 Okl. 590, 110 P. 893; and Double v. McQueen, 96 Mich. 39, 55 N. W. 564.

[4] Counsel for petitioners argue that the board may change its mind in the future and rescind the action of August 1, 1927. The presumption to which we have adverted concerning the performance of official duty answers this contention. It must be remembered that by section 15 of the law creating the district (Stats. 1915, p. 1502) it is provided:

"That any improvement for which bonds are voted under the provisions of this act, shall be made in conformity with the report, plans, specifications and map theretofore adopted, * * * unless the doing of any of such work described in said report shall be prohibited by law, or be rendered contrary to the best interests of said district by some change of conditions in relation thereto, in which event said board of supervisors may, by a vote of four-fifths of all the members thereof, order necessary changes made in such proposed work or improvements. * * *"

[5] It will be observed that only where the doing of the work is prohibited by law or when by reason of some change of conditions in relation thereto it is not for the best interests of the district that the board is authorized not to proceed in accordance with the original plans. It will not and cannot be questioned that under the provisions just quoted the duty and authority of determining whether there has been "a change of conditions in relation" to the improvements has been cast upon the board by the Legislature, and the courts cannot prevent the free and unhampered discharge of that duty. Counsel do not assert that the board has not the right and the duty to change its mind in the event that a "change of conditions" actually takes place, but that, regardless of such a change, they might arbitrarily adopt a different policy. We cannot, in a proceeding of this character, indulge in such presumptions, particularly where, as here, conditions may arise where it is their duty to determine in the first instance, at least, that they are authorized by law, by virtue of different conditions actually arising, to adopt a change of plans. We are not justified in endeavoring to control the future action of public officials where their present actions are in line with their duty. Let us suppose that an alternative writ were sought directed to a public board which was proceeding to discharge its duty as enjoined by law; it certainly would not be argued that because the board might change its mind the writ should issue. It is suggested that in the event that the board of supervisors, acting honestly and in a conscientious endeavor to discharge the duty imposed upon it by section 15 of the act of 1915, should determine erroneously that there was a change of conditions occurring subsequent hereto and should cease construction of the dam before it had reached the required height or before the fixed amount of money had been expended, the question should then be tried in a contempt proceeding rather than to require petitioner to institute a new proceeding in mandamus. One consideration announced in State v. Public Service Commission, 44 Nev. 102, 190 P. 284, concludes the claim that petitioners are entitled to a peremptory writ, in order that they be not compelled to begin a new proceeding like the instant one, should the respondent board again try to alter the construction plan ordered by the voters. We refer to the principle that mandamus is never granted to compel the performance of an act until there has been an actual as distinguished from an anticipated refusal, yet that is the only purpose which a peremptory writ would serve in this proceeding. The rule which limits the use of mandamus to compel official action enjoined by law when its performance is refused may enjoin continued vigilance upon the interested taxpayers. However, if it were otherwise courts might be continually called upon to direct and supervise the conduct of public officials vested with ministerial powers. This might occur in any and all instances where an interested petitioner might entertain a doubt as to the official's intention to in good faith perform his legal duty. It is said in State v. Public Service Commission, supra:

"As the writ will not lie against the commission, neither will it go against the company, primarily for the reason that the petition does not show that the company has discontinued its service. Its application to the commission, and the order of the latter permitting the discontinuance, afford a strong presumption that it will do so, but, as previously stated, the writ of mandamus is in no sense a preventive [sic] remedy. Its function is to enforce action—to compel the performance of a duty or obligation which is enjoined by law. Mandamus is never granted in anticipation of a supposed omission.

of duty, however strong the presumption may be that the persons whom it is sought to coerce by the writ will refuse to perform their duty when the proper time arrives. High's Extraordinary Legal Remedies (3d Ed.) § 12."

And in keeping with this statement is a similar one found in State v. Gracey, 11 Nev. 223-233:

"It is incumbent on the relator to show, not only that the respondent has failed to perform the required duty, but that the performance thereof is actually due from him at the time of the application."

[6] There exists another very cogent reason why the argument, advanced by petitioner, that the election of new members to the board might cause a change of mind on its part, should have no weight in our consideration of this problem. We read in 16 Cal. Jur. 766, concerning the distinction between prohibition and mandamus, that "one is prohibitory and the other mandatory; one acts upon the person, the other acts upon the tribunal," which language we find approved in City of Coronado v. San Diego, 97 Cal. 440, 32 P. 518. Accordingly it has been held that the peremptory writ of mandate does not constitute an enforceable judgment against the successor in office who has not been made a party to the proceeding. Ex parte Tinkum, 54 Cal. 201, and Bauter v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. App. 195, 91 P. 749. For the purpose of a clearer concept of the original character of the writ of mandamus in relation to its command to a person as distinguished from that of an office, we quote from the opinion of Mr. Justice Strong in the case of United States v. Boutwell, 17 Wall. 604, 21 L. Ed. 721:

"The writ does not reach the office. It cannot be directed to it. It is, therefore, in substance a personal action, and it rests upon the averred and assumed fact that the defendant has neglected or refused to perform a personal duty, to the performance of which by him the relator has a clear right."

[7] The question then remains whether the peremptory writ should issue, as a matter of course, where there has been compliance with the alternative writ. This has been answered, not only by the authorities deciding that it will not issue except to accomplish a useful purpose, but also by those decisions wherein it is held that where the return to the alternative writ shows a compliance therewith, the petition will be dismissed. Such are the cases of Talmage v. Monroe (Cal. App.) 119 P. 526; Thornton v. Hoge, 84 Cal. 231, 23 P. 1112; O'Brien v. Superior Court, 189 Cal. 78, 207 P. 549; Wait v. Superior Court, 35 Cal. App. 330, 169 P. 916; Grinbaum v. Superior Court, 192 Cal. 783, 221 P. 653. These authorities are based upon the principle that the question originally involved has become moot. By reason of the board's compliance with the alternative writ in this case the question has become moot.

The petitioners, however, upon the authority of Talmage v. Monroe, supra, are entitled to their costs.

The writ is discharged and the proceeding is dismissed, the petitioners to recover their costs herein.

PEOPLE v. STRINGER. (Cr. 1531.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 11, 1927.

1. Criminal law § 695(1)—Permitting answer to question whether accused had been convicted of felony held not error, where trial court was not informed of appeal therefrom.

Where accused took stand and on being asked if he had been convicted of felony stated he had not, and in answer to later question stated he had, permitting answer to question held not error, where it was not called to attention of trial court that an appeal was pending from conviction to which accused referred, or that time for taking appeal had not expired.

2. Criminal law § 692—Where harm arose through questions to which no objection was interposed, permitting answer to previous similar question held not error.

Where accused took stand and was asked if he had been convicted of felony and stated he had not, and in answer to next question stated he had, entire harm done to defense arose through second question, to which no objection was interposed, and permitting answer to first question was not error.

3. Witnesses § 350—Permitting question whether accused had been convicted of felony held not error, where question was proper at time it was put.

Permitting question to accused who took stand whether he had been convicted of felony held not error, where question was entirely proper at time it was put, though harm resulted to defense from answer to subsequent question asking if he had not been convicted of certain crime in that very courtroom.

4. Criminal law § 1037(1)—No error could be predicated upon alleged misconduct of prosecuting attorney, where there was no assignment of wrongdoing, nor request for admonition.

No error could be predicated on alleged misconduct of prosecuting attorney in asking accused if he had been convicted of felony, where there was no assignment of wrongdoing, nor any request for admonition to undo it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Louis C. Stringer was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas J. Martin, John A. Deweese, and Josiah Coombs, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Warner I. Praul, for the People.

WORKS, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment convicting defendant of the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses. Defendant also appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant took the stand as a witness in his own behalf. On his cross-examination the record shows the following:

"Q. Have you ever been convicted of a felony? A. I have not.

"Counsel for Appellant: That is objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, no foundation having been laid and not the best evidence.

"The Court: Overruled. He may answer yes or no. A. I certainly have not."

The only point upon which appellant contends for a reversal is that the court erred in permitting an answer to the question asked, and that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in putting it, although it will be observed that the answer was favorable to appellant. A further excerpt from the record is necessary in order fully to present the point for which appellant contends. Following immediately the quotation above made, the cross-examination continued:

"Q. Weren't you convicted of the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses in this very courtroom? A. I want to beg your pardon. Pardon me, please; in connection with this case, yes, recently. I beg your pardon.

"Counsel for Appellant: Growing out of this same transaction? A. Yes; this same deal."

[1-4] It is insisted by appellant that the question to which he objected was improper for the reason, as he asserts in his brief, that at the time when it was asked an appeal was pending from the judgment of conviction which he had "recently" suffered. There are several answers to the point thus made. In the first place, appellant does not show that it was called to the attention of the trial court that an appeal was pending from the conviction to which he, as a witness, referred, or that the time for taking an appeal had not expired. Secondly, the entire harm which was done to the defense by the part of the record above set forth arose through questions to which no objection was interposed. Thirdly, the question to which objection was made was entirely proper at the time it was put, so far as the mere question of error is concerned. There is nothing in the record up to that time which showed the trial judge what particular conviction was being inquired about, nor, in truth, to indicate that the district attorney had any particular conviction in mind in asking the question. Again, and on the score of misconduct, there was no assignment of wrongdoing nor any request for admonition to undo it.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GARZA. (Cr. 994.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 14, 1927.

1. Criminal law — 1130(4)—Failure to support appeal by briefs or argument is deemed abandonment of appeal.

Failure of party taking an appeal to support the appeal by briefs or oral argument is to be taken as an abandonment of such appeal.

2. Criminal law — 1130(4)—That accused is without means to prepare briefs for appeal does not change rule requiring briefs on penalty of dismissal or affirmance (Appellate Court Rule 5).

That defendant, who has taken an appeal from a judgment of conviction, is without the necessary financial means to defray the expense incident to the preparation and printing of briefs in support of his appeal, does not change Appellate Court Rule 5, requiring briefs to be filed in such cases, or in default thereof suffer a dismissal of appeal or an affirmance of the judgment or order from which the appeal is taken, particularly where the record is voluminous.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Joaquin Garza was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Herbert C. Coblenz and George Stahlman, both of Stockton, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, Acting P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of conviction of manslaughter under an information charging him with the crime of murder.

The defendant has filed herein a document designated as, and purporting to be, a brief. All that said document contains, so far as it relates in any way to the merits of the appeal, is the following:

"Appellant has not funds sufficient to enable him to employ attorneys to make an extensive analysis of the transcript on appeal, and all that the attorneys for appellant are doing on this appeal is done voluntarily and without compensation. In order to adequately present a brief in this case it would be necessary for appellant's attorneys to analyze the testimony and write a very extensive brief, as the entire transcript is the main basis of the appeal."

The remainder of the "brief" is devoted entirely to a reply to the motion of the Attorney General to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the defendant, on taking the appeal, failed to comply with the requirements of section 1247 of the Penal Code in his application for a transcription of such testimony received and any other proceedings had at the trial as might be deemed necessary "to fairly present the points relied upon" for a reversal. Nor did the defendant, through his counsel, or otherwise, appear in court and offer or make an oral argument in support of the appeal, although the cause was placed upon the calendar of the October term of this court for hearing and decision, and counsel given due notice thereof by the clerk of this court.

[1, 2] Regardless of whether the motion of the Attorney General to dismiss is or is not tenable, it is clear that the judgment must be affirmed for failure on the part of the accused to file, or cause to be filed, a brief or to present an oral argument, pointing out the errors upon which he intended to base his demand for a reversal. Rule 5 of this court explicitly authorizes this course in cases in which the appellant or his counsel is guilty of such delinquency, and our courts of review have in many cases emphatically sanctioned the enforcement of the rule. This is so because, as the cases have explained, the courts of appeal are not required to assume the labor which it is the duty of attorneys to perform in the presentation of appeals, by groping through the record in search of possible errors of sufficient gravity in their effect upon the rights of the party complaining on appeal to compel a reversal of the judgment or order or both. Moreover, the fact of the failure by a party taking an appeal to support the appeal by briefs or oral argument is to be taken as an abandonment of such appeal. The fact that a defendant in a criminal case who has taken an appeal from a judgment of conviction is without the necessary financial means to defray the expense incident to the preparation and the printing of briefs in support of his appeal does not change the rule requiring briefs to be filed in such cases or, in default thereof, suffer a dismissal of his appeal or an affirmation of the judgment or order from which the appeal is taken. In such case, if the record be small, or the evidence be brief, a review court might excuse the default and examine the record; but even then the court is not required to do so, but, as in any other case, may dismiss the appeal or affirm the judgment. In the instant case the record is quite voluminous, and we will not, therefore, without the aid of counsel for defendant, be considerate enough to wade through the record in search of errors which it is declared in general language are submerged therein. No motion to dismiss the appeal was made in this case, but the cause was submitted upon the record and the briefs on file. Rule 5 is sufficient authority, if, indeed, express authority is required in such a case, for affirming the judgment appealed from for the omission to file a brief or to present an oral argument in support of the appeal.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. KHAN. (Cr. 1468.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 14, 1927.

1. Criminal law $\Leftrightarrow$ 511(2)—Testimony corroborating accomplice is sufficient if it tends to connect defendant with commission of offense (Pen. Code, § 1111).

Under Pen. Code, § 1111, requiring testimony of accomplice to be corroborated to support conviction, it is unnecessary that such evidence standing alone be corroborative of each and every fact testified to by accomplice, but if it tends to connect defendant with commission of offense it is sufficient, even though it is not absolutely convincing, but on contrary it may be slight and of itself entitled to but little weight.

2. Sodomy $\Leftrightarrow$ 6—Evidence corroborating alleged accomplice held to support conviction for infamous crime against nature (Pen. Code, § 1111).

In prosecution for infamous crime against nature, even if prosecuting witness should be considered accomplice, evidence corroborating him held sufficient under Pen. Code, § 1111, to support conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Hamit Khan was convicted of an infamous crime against nature, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Ugene U. Blalock, of Porterville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel B. Browne, of San Francisco, for the People.

HOUSER, J. This appeal is prosecuted from a judgment of conviction of defendant for the commission of the "infamous crime against nature." The victim of the assault was a boy of the age of 14 years, whose testimony with reference to the commission of the offense was to the effect that on several separate occasions, in the nighttime, and in sleeping quarters provided by defendant, wherein the prosecuting witness, another boy, and defendant were all occupying one bed, defendant had been guilty of the crime of which he was accused in the information presented against him.

Appellant attacks the judgment on the sole grounds that the prosecuting witness was an accomplice of defendant; that under the provisions of section 1111 of the Penal Code "a conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense"; and that the record of the trial herein fails to disclose a sufficient corroboration of the testimony of the accomplice. But while considering the particular circumstances surrounding the commission of the offense, as disclosed by the testimony of the prosecuting witness, together with judicial construction of the statute, as shown by cases decided by the Supreme and Appellate Courts of this state, a correct determination of the question of whether the prosecuting witness was an accomplice of the defendant possibly may be in accordance with the conclusions reached by appellant thereon—in view of the corroborative evidence adduced on behalf of the prosecution, which tended to connect defendant with the commission of the offense, it becomes unnecessary to rule directly upon the contention made by appellant to the effect that defendant and the prosecuting witness were accomplices.

As hereinbefore indicated, the prosecuting witness testified that the criminal act of the defendant took place at night on an occasion when defendant, the prosecuting witness, and another boy were occupying a certain bed belonging to defendant; also, that in the perpetration of the offense defendant made use of some vaseline which he kept in a can or bottle under his pillow on the bed, and that such receptacle had a screw-top lid or cover. The boy who occupied the bed with defendant and the prosecuting witness testified that he slept on one side of the bed, the prosecuting witness on the other side, and defendant occupied the middle portion thereof; that at about the time charged in the information he heard defendant take the lid or top off the vaseline bottle, which he kept under his pillow, and thereafter for "about three minutes or maybe longer" he could feel the bed shake. Another witness, who was the arresting officer, testified that he found a bottle of vaseline under the pillow of a bed in the home of defendant. Each of two physicians testified in substance that from a physical examination made by him of the prosecuting witness it appeared that the lower portion of his rectum had been dilated or enlarged from its normal size, and that the mucous membrane lining thereof, which in a normal state is made up of folds, was quite smooth. Each of the same doctors also testified that basing his testimony on his physical examination of defendant it would have been possible for defendant to commit the act of which he was accused. The father of the prosecuting witness testified that no operation had ever been performed on the rectum of the boy, nor had he ever taken a rectal treatment of any kind. It also appeared from the evidence that at the time the offense was committed the prosecuting witness was in the employ of defendant, and that theretofore, although defendant and the prosecuting witness were unrelated to each other, defendant had shown the prosecuting witness unusual courtesies and attentions in various ways.

[1, 2] In the case of People v. Kelly, 69 Cal. App. 558, 570, 231 P. 767, the rule relating to the sufficiency of corroborative evidence to sustain a conviction based primarily upon the testimony of an accomplice is discussed and the authorities cited. As to such evidence, among other things, it is there pointed out, as theretofore decided by the courts of this state, that it is unnecessary that such incriminating evidence, standing alone, be corroborative of each and every fact testified to by the accomplice, but that the statutory requirement simply is that it tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; that it need not be absolutely convincing, but, to the contrary, it may be slight and of itself entitled to but little weight or consideration. Measured by such standards, it is manifest that even assuming that the prosecuting witness was an accomplice of defendant, the other evidence in the case, to which brief reference has been had herein, was sufficiently corroborative of the testimony of the prosecuting witness to meet the demands of the statute.

It is ordered that the judgment be and it is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action of unlawful detainer by C. E. De Long and another against the Black's Package Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Peckinpaugh & Carter, of Fresno, for appellants.

Frank Kauke, of Fresno, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. This is an action of unlawful detainer, based upon the defendant's alleged violation of a covenant in its lease. The lease provided that the lessee should have the right to use said premises only "for the purpose of carrying on a general mercantile business." Judgment was for the defendant. It was and is the contention of plaintiffs that this condition of the lease was violated by the defendant by maintaining in a portion of the basement of the said demised premises a place where meats, vegetables, jams, and salads were cooked and prepared to be sold in a delicatessen department or counter in the store in the demised premises, and to some extent sold in two other stores conducted by defendant in the city of Fresno.

The evidence given at the trial shows with considerable particularity the kinds, quantities, and the manner in which the foods sold in the delicatessen department were prepared. The frontage of the whole store was approximately 50 feet. The number of employees in the store varied from 60 to 75, and sometimes a greater number was employed on special occasions. The number employed in the basement in preparation of foods was about 5 to 7, and they on occasion helped in the sale of goods in the store proper. It was a store for the sale of all kinds of foods which must mean substantially a grocery store. Its general nature, as it appeared to customers and others coming in and out, was clearly that of a general mercantile business. The landlords and their predecessors visited the store at different times, and, although the delicatessen department was established as early as 1913 in a small way and thereafter steadily grew and expanded, it was not until 1925 that they discovered the operations in the basement upon which they predicate the claim that the lessee had violated the conditions of the lease. The record shows that only a portion of the basement was used for the preparation of foods, and that the balance of it was used for storage and cold storage.

Appellants readily admit that respondent is carrying on a general mercantile business, but assert that in addition to that it is operating a factory, be it large or small, in violation of the terms of the lease.

The complaint alleged that the defendant carried on a business other than a general mercantile business, to wit, a delicatessen kitchen, condiment and jam factory. The court found this allegation to be untrue, but found that defendant had prepared various delicatessen products, condiments, and jams in the basement of said premises, using for that purpose, with the exception of certain meats, materials taken from the general stock in trade of the store. It found that this was done only in the course of the general mercantile business of purchasing and selling food products, and that such business at all times was in the usual and customary manner of purchasing products at wholesale, and preparing and placing the same in an appropriate and convenient manner for sale at retail. It is the contention of appellants that this finding is unwarranted. They do not claim it is unwarranted by the evidence, but that it is unwarranted by law. They state that if this reasoning is followed out, it would mean that the tenant here could just as well convert the whole of the premises into a factory to produce or prepare food for other stores throughout the city. On the other hand, respondent claims that if this reasoning is not followed it would result that the grocery man, who roasted and ground his own coffee for sale as a part of his grocery business, would thereby forfeit his leasehold if it was held for general mercantile business only. The determining question is not whether a particular isolated part of the store taken by itself and enlarged so as to occupy the entire store to the exclusion of all other activities there would constitute a business other than a general mercantile business, but whether that store as it exists is or is not permitted under the clause of the lease given for general mercantile purposes only.

[1-3] The finding that the tenant's activities in the basement were incidental to and a part of the general mercantile business was supported by the fact that its extent was small in comparison with the whole, by its nature, which was ancillary to the sale of foods, and by the frequent practice of selling delicatessen articles in grocery stores. There must necessarily be certain activities conducted in the grocery business, such as delivery, bookkeeping, coffee grinding, and refrigeration, which are not strictly buying and selling, but which are necessary to carry on the buying and selling of merchandise. Incidental activities necessary for the complete enjoyment of the premises for the purpose for which they were leased are permitted. Meredith v. McCormick, 208 Mich. 563, 175 N. W. 280, 3 A. L. R. 669. Whether or not such activities in any given case have assumed too large and disproportionate relation to the object for which the premises were let must necessarily be a question of fact, which may be decided differently under varying circumstances.

[4] The clause "general mercantile business" is a liberal one. It embraces all commodities that are purchased and sold by merchants, wholesale or retail. We may mention that it includes fireworks and gunpowder, inasmuch as appellants justify their complaint against the gas plates upon the ground that they increase the fire hazard.

[5] A forfeiture is not favored. It is enforced only where there is such a breach shown as it was the clear and manifest intention of the parties to provide for. Randol v. Scott, 110 Cal. 590, 42 P. 976 (citing Taylor on Landlord and Tenant [8th Ed.] § 590; Civ. Code, § 1442).

We conclude that the court's finding of no breach is sustained by the evidence and the law. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PADILLA. (Cr. 1512.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 14, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 12, 1927.

1. Criminal law § 564(1)—Evidence held to support allegation of venue of larceny of wheat.

In prosecution for larceny of wheat, evidence held to support allegation as to place where offense took place.

2. Criminal law § 304(6)—Court takes judicial notice of location of towns and of counties in which townships are located.

In prosecution for larceny, evidence showing in what county township of which witness was constable was located was not necessary, since court will take judicial cognizance of its location, and could have instructed jury that certain town was in such township.

3. Criminal law § 111—Even if larceny was committed near boundary line between counties, prosecution in one of counties was proper (Pen. Code, §§ 777, 782).

Under Pen. Code, § 782, providing that jurisdiction of offense committed on boundary line of two or more counties or within 500 yards thereof is in either county, even if larceny of wheat was committed at or on boundary line between two counties, prosecution in one of them was proper, regardless of section 777, relating to venue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; Frank Lamberson, Judge.

Fred Padilla was convicted of petit larceny with prior conviction, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Thomas, of Visalia, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

YORK, J. [1] The principal contentions of appellant are, first, that the county in which the offense is alleged to have occurred was not proven on the trial, and, second, that there was no evidence that defendant took the wheat as charged.

As to the first question: The Attorney General's brief apparently quoted certain words as to Alpaugh being "in the county of Tulare," which we do not find in the transcript before us. However, there is evidence following this statement as to Alpaugh and as to the location of the ranch from which the wheat was taken, and as to the distances and as to the county line; and a map of Tulare county was before the jury when the owner was asked as to the location of the land from which his wheat was abstracted, part of the evidence being:

"Q. And whereabouts is the county line? A. Right at the west edge.

"Q. This is over right east of the county line? A. Joins the county line on the east."

This statement and this line of questioning at the trial having taken place in the county of Tulare, and the court taking judicial cognizance of the fact that Alpaugh is in the county of Tulare, the proper and only inference that can be drawn from the record is that the land from which the grain was abstracted was in the county of Tulare, near the west edge of the county and on the east side of the county line of the county of Tulare.

[2, 3] Concerning the testimony of D. O. Howard as to the town of Earlimart being located in the township of which he was constable, to wit, Alila, it was not necessary that there should have been any testimony showing in what county said township was located. The court will take judicial cognizance of its location and could have properly instructed the jury that the said town was in said township. We believe that the case of People v. Wright (Cal. App.) 250 P. 204, properly sets forth the law as to judicial cognizance, in spite of the fact that possibly some attorneys still think that the judicial procedure known as a trial is merely a chance for a display of their forensic effort and technical by-play. The law fortunately does not require a useless thing, although it is true that, in the absence of technical objection thereto, the simplest way to prove the venue was to have witnesses testify as to what county the grain was located in at the time it was stolen. However, it clearly appears from the record, independent of the judicial cognizance which the court had a right to rely on, that the property from which the grain was abstracted was in the county of Tulare. Even stretching the evidence to the point appellant desires, it might be construed that the offense was committed at or on the boundary line between Tulare county and the adjoining county; but reference is made by appellant to section 777 of the Penal Code only, no reference being made by appellant to section 782 of the Penal Code, which provides:

"When a public offense is committed on the boundary of two or more counties, or within five hundred yards thereof, the jurisdiction is in either county."

The proof of theft is circumstantial, but, nevertheless, sufficient.

The other points raised are not worthy of discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Landlord and tenant §157(1)—Lessors held not entitled to damages for failure of lessee to make deposit required as guaranty of performance of building clause.

Where lease provided for deposit by lessee in lieu of commencing construction of building during first year of lease, which should be returned when construction was begun, if within four-year period provided in lease, but if not begun within four-year period, or if lessee did not exercise option to purchase, deposit was to be property of lessors, title to such deposit did not pass to lessors until lessee had failed to commence construction of building within four-year period, or to purchase property before certain date; and where such construction was begun within four-year period lessors were not entitled to recover damages for failure to make deposit on theory that they could have lent deposit and received interest thereon.

2. Landlord and tenant §157(1)—Lessor held not entitled to use or invest deposit made by lessee as guaranty of performance or to receive or keep earnings therefrom.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by J. C. Ingram and wife against Alexander Pantages. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Farrand & Slosson, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an action for damages for breach of contract. This case was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, from which judgment plaintiffs prosecute this appeal, based on the judgment roll alone.

[1] The facts are not in dispute, and are briefly these: Appellants were the owners of certain real property in the city of Fort Worth, state of Texas, and on November 18, 1919, they entered into a written lease and agreement with the respondent wherein appellants agreed to lease to respondent their property in Fort Worth, Tex., for a period of 30 years from January 1, 1920, at an annual rental of $15,000. Respondent immediately went into possession of the property under the lease and was in possession on the date of the trial of this cause in the superior court.

Said lease and agreement provides, among other things, that the lessee (respondent herein) should construct a building on said leased property within four years from January 1, 1920, at a cost of not less than $100,000; and, if respondent did not begin the construction of said building on said leased premises within the first year of the lease, that is, on or before January 1, 1921, he would deposit with the appellants (the lessors herein) the sum of $12,000, which sum appellants agreed to return to respondent immediately upon his beginning the construction of said building, if begun within the four-year period. Said lease also provided that respondent should have the exclusive right and option to purchase said leased property for the sum of $250,000 at any time on or before January 1, 1924. The provision of the lease with reference to the deposit of $12,000, and the return thereof, is set forth in article VI of the lease, and is as follows:

"If lessee does not begin the construction of said building within the first year of this lease, then lessee shall deposit with lessors the sum of twelve thousand dollars ($12,000.00), which shall be immediately returned to lessee upon his beginning the construction of said building within the four-year period herein provided for, or his exercising his option to purchase hereinafter provided for, but if said building is not begun within said four-year period or said option to purchase exercised, then this twelve thousand dollars ($12,000.00) shall belong to lessors."

Respondent did not deposit the $12,000, or any part thereof, with appellants, and did not begin the construction of the said building within the first year of said four-year period, but did begin the actual construction of same in December, 1923, which was the last month of the four-year period within which the building should be constructed, according to the lease. Respondent also failed to exercise the option to purchase given him by the lease. Appellants, immediately after the expiration of the first year, demanded of the respondent that said sum of $12,000 be deposited, which demand was not complied with.

Appellants contend that by reason of respondent's failure to deposit the $12,000, as provided in said lease, they have been damaged to the extent of $2,450; claiming that they could have earned 7 per cent. interest on $12,000 from January 1, 1921, the date said $12,000 should have been deposited, until December, 1923, the date that respondent actually began the construction of the building on said leased premises; or, in other words, appellants contend that they are entitled to interest on said $12,000 at the rate of 7 per cent. for two years and eleven months, being the time intervening between the date said $12,000 should have been deposited and the actual commencement of the construction of the building. The court found that appellants could have earned and received 7 per cent. per annum on $12,000 for the period from the expiration of the first year of the lease until the commencement of the construction of said building.

Therefore, the sole question presented is this: Would appellants have been entitled to employ and retain the earnings on this $12,- 000, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum during the period it should have been on deposit with appellants, according to the lease? We think this question must be answered in the negative.

The portion of the lease above quoted plainly provides that if the lessee (respondent herein) did not begin the construction of the building within the first year of the lease, he was then to deposit with the lessors (appellants herein) the sum of $12,000, which was to be returned to him immediately upon his beginning construction of the building at any time within the four-year period, and further provided that said sum was to be returned to respondent if he exercised the option to purchase at any time before January 1, 1924, and provided that if the said building was not begun within the said four-year period of said lease, and said option was not exercised to purchase, then, and in that event, this $12,000 was to belong to the lessors. In other words, the lease provided that the title to said deposit of $12,000 should not pass from respondent to appellants until respondent had failed to do two things: (1) To commence the actual construction of said building within four years from January 1, 1920; (2) to purchase the property on or before January 1, 1924.

There is no provision in the lease and agreement which provides that the lessors are to use or acquire any benefit whatever from the $12,000 during the time it is on deposit with them. The lease merely provides for the deposit of $12,000 by the lessee in lieu of commencing the actual construction of said building during the first year of said lease, and the lessee was entitled to an immediate return of said $12,000 the very moment he began the construction of the building, if begun within the four-year period provided in the lease. Certainly, under such an arrangement, appellants would have no right to use this money or retain the earnings therefrom, until respondent had forfeited his ownership thereto by failing to comply with the terms of said lease above set forth.

[2] It seems too clear to admit of argument that appellants, under the plain provisions of the lease, would not have been entitled to use, or employ, or invest, said sum of $12,000, or any part thereof, or to receive or retain the earnings therefrom, if it had been deposited.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. McKELVEY. (Cr. 1547.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 5, 1927.

1. Criminal law § 376—Testimony regarding accused's bad reputation is admissible only when accused has introduced evidence regarding good reputation for traits involved in charge.

Evidence regarding accused's bad reputation is admissible on part of prosecution only when defendant has himself opened door for such evidence by endeavoring to establish his good reputation for traits involved in charge against him.

2. Criminal law § 1169(5)—Generally, admission of improper evidence is harmless where stricken out and jury instructed to disregard it.

General rule is that, under ordinary circumstances, admission of improper evidence is harmless if subsequently stricken out and jury instructed to disregard it.

3. Criminal law § 1169(5)—Admitting evidence of bad reputation of accused held prejudicial error, although court instructed jury to disregard it (Pen. Code, § 288).

In prosecution for crime of violation of Pen. Code, § 288, where accused introduced no evidence as to his good character, admitting evidence that accused's reputation for morality and virtue was bad held prejudicial error resulting in miscarriage of justice, although court struck testimony from record and instructed jury to disregard all questions as to defendant's reputation for morality in community.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

James McKelvey was convicted of violating Pen. Code, § 288, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Rush & Beirne, Jud. R. Rush, and William B. Beirne, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. The defendant was convicted of the crime of violation of section 288 of the Penal Code, and appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant did not introduce any evidence as to defendant's general reputation in the community for the traits involved in the charge against him; but the prosecution in rebuttal was permitted to introduce the testimony of five witnesses that defendant's reputation for morality and virtue was bad. Defendant objected to each question propounded to each of these five witnesses, but the objections were all overruled. Appellant then assigned the asking of each question as misconduct on the part of the district attorney and requested the court to instruct the jury to disregard both the questions and the answers, which was denied by the court. Appellant then moved that all of the testimony of these five witnesses be stricken, which motion was also denied. When court convened for the afternoon session, the court informed the jury that it had admitted the character evidence offered by the prosecution while under a misapprehension as to the state of the record, and then struck from the record all of the testimony given by said five witnesses, sustained appellant's objection to all of the questions asked said witnesses, and instructed the jury to disregard all questions as to defendant's reputation for morality and chastity in the community and all of the answers given by said witnesses to those questions, and to treat their testimony as though they had never heard it. Similar instructions were given at the close of the trial. The jury was instructed that the defendant was presumed in law to be of good moral character and that the evidence in the case was to be considered by the jury in the light of that presumption.

[1-3] It is elementary that such testimony is admissible upon the part of the prosecution only when the defendant has himself opened the door for such evidence by endeavoring to establish his good reputation for the traits involved in the charge against him. In the case at bar no evidence was introduced by the appellant as to his good character, and under the rule as stated it was clearly prejudicial error for the court to admit the testimony of the five witnesses who testified for the state on rebuttal that the appellant's reputation for morality and virtue was bad. Moreover, such error was not cured by the fact that the trial judge after examination of the record did everything in his power to correct his former ruling by sustaining appellant's objections, granting appellant's motions to strike from the record, and instructing the jury to disregard the testimony as though it had never heard it. It was an intellectual impossibility for the jury to wholly erase such testimony from their memory and to disregard it as though they had never heard it. They had before them the testimony of five apparently credible witnesses that appellant's reputation for the traits involved in the charge was bad. Upon the strength of this testimony, if the case was closely balanced, the jury might have been convinced that there was more likelihood of the defendant's guilt than of his innocence. If any juror had a reasonable doubt as to defendant's guilt after a consideration of the rest of the evidence, then surely this additional evidence offered on behalf of the prosecution upon an issue vital to appellant's case, and overturning as it did the presumption of good moral character, might have turned the scales against the appellant.

It is a general rule that under ordinary circumstances the admission of improper evidence is harmless if subsequently stricken out and the jury instructed to disregard it. It has also been held that in certain cases where the incompetent evidence goes to the main issue, and where the proof of defendant's guilt is not clear and convincing, the error in admitting the incompetent evidence cannot be cured by striking out and instructing the jury to disregard that evidence. From a review of the evidence in the case at bar it cannot be said that the proof of defendant's guilt was clear and convincing. The evidence was in sharp conflict. It would serve no good purpose to relate the details of the evidence submitted; but suffice it to say that the evidence offered by the prosecution consisted of the testimony of the prosecuting witness, a six year old girl, that the defendant committed the acts as charged in the information on April 8, 1927, while passing through a school-crossing tunnel and later at the defendant's home, where the prosecuting witness was taken by the defendant. She testified that she saw no one present in the defendant's home on the day these acts were committed. The testimony of the prosecuting witness was corroborated by the evidence that she complained to her mother that defendant had taken her to his home and had hurt her. These complaints were not sufficiently definite to cause any investigation to be made by the girl's mother until April 20th, when the mother requested a police woman to make such investigation. There was also testimony by police officers that certain admissions were made by the defendant. Defendant testified that he did not commit the acts charged against him, and denied any admissions to the police officers. He testified that he met the prosecuting witness near the entrance of the school tunnel, where she fell down crying; that he talked with her and consoled her and then took her home with him to play with his niece; that when he went home his mother, sister, and niece were present in the house, and that the prosecuting witness played with his niece; that when the prosecuting witness left, defendant's sister requested him to button a portion of the clothing of the prosecuting witness which had become unbuttoned, which he did in the presence of the sister and at her request. He was corroborated in this respect by the testimony of his sister. Much of the testimony of the defendant was corroborated by that of his sister and other witnesses. The defendant's mother testified that she was in her house when the defendant brought the prosecuting witness, and that her daughter and defendant's niece were also present. It also appears that defendant was ill on April 8th, the day of the alleged crime, and was returning from his doctor's office at the time he met the prosecuting witness; that on the next day his physician lanced his throat, which was infected. An affidavit was filed by appellant on his motion for a new trial, in which the deponent stated that she saw the defendant help the prosecuting witness to her feet at the entrance to the tunnel and then take her by the hand and guide her to his home; that she immediately went to defendant's home to visit defendant's sister, and there saw the defendant, his sister, and the two little girls, the prosecuting witness and the defendant's niece, all in the front room; that she later saw defendant's mother in the dining room. The witness was pregnant at the time of the trial and could not be called. It thus appears that the testimony of defendant's mother and sister and the affidavit filed on the motion for a new trial directly contradicted the testimony of the prosecuting witness that no person was present in the defendant's home at the time she was taken there by the defendant.

The case of People v. Anthony, 185 Cal. 152, 196 P. 47, is particularly pertinent to the instant case. While the facts are to be distinguished yet the governing principle of law is identical in the two cases. In that case the court said, page 158 (196 P. 49):

"Where, however, a series of questions were asked, as they were here, each suggesting to the court and to the jury that the district attorney was advised that this man was guilty of lewd and lascivious conduct with numbers of his young female charges and that he had had sexual intercourse with several of them, one as young as nine years, it is a psychological impossibility for the jury to wholly eradicate the impression made by such questions from their minds in weighing the evidence as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant on the particular item charged. * * * A district attorney is charged with the public duty of seeing that the defendant has a fair trial. The jury is aware of this fact and must have assumed that he had information which justified the question. The question of the district attorney asked of the defendant amounted to a charge against the defendant that he had been guilty of the offense of rape committed upon two small girls in his custody. The human mind is not so constructed that a thing of that kind can be either forgotten or overlooked by a jury. We are not called upon to consider the good intentions of the district attorney in asking the question. The good faith of the district attorney in asking questions upon debatable ground is always an element to be considered. But the good faith of the district attorney in a case of this kind in asking questions that are clearly improper does not take away from the question the prejudicial effect resulting to the defendant. The real question is, Has the defendant had a fair trial? It is clear under the circumstances of this case where the evidence and the conflicting considerations are so evenly balanced that if the jury attached the slightest weight to the innuendoes of the district attorney, that this weight might be sufficient to turn the scales. Ordinarily, the prompt sustaining of objections to improper questions, coupled with instructions to the jury to disregard the question, will cure an error of this kind. But where the offense has been repeated in various forms and where the evidence is so evenly balanced and the district attorney after being warned by the court continues in his course, we must hold that the misconduct was so prejudicial as to entitle the defendant to a new trial."

People v. George, 72 Cal. App. 124, 236 P. 934, was another case where the defendant was accused of lewd and lascivious acts with a six year old girl, and the district attorney sought to introduce incompetent evidence. In that case the court said, page 130 (236 P. 936):

"When we recall the nature of the case; the extreme danger, as shown by experience, of convicting men on the testimony of a child of the tender years of Etta Peterson unless strongly corroborated by competent evidence, and how little is required to turn the scale in the minds of the jurors, naturally inflamed by the revolting character of the offense charged, we cannot but believe that this testimony did have a profound effect upon the jury, and that, as a fair probability, it outweighed in their minds the testimony of the appellant in denial, the evidence of his previous good character, his associations and employment, his domestic situation and the inherent improbability that he, in view of these facts, would commit the crime charged."

In People v. Edgar, 34 Cal App. 459, 471, 167 P. 891, 895, the court said:

"While it is the general rule that if it can fairly be said, from all of the circumstances of the case considered in conjunction with the nature and extent of the assigned misconduct, that an admonition of the court had the desired effect, there can be no just cause for complaint, nevertheless it is a recognized exception to that rule that, where, as here, in a closely balanced criminal case, misconduct is repeated and persisted in, despite the warnings and admonitions of the trial court, and is so pronounced and pernicious that it is not in human nature to forget or disregard its prejudicial effect, then manifestly a mere admonition or any number of admonitions will not suffice to right the wrong done, and the only remedy remaining is to be found in a reversal of the judgment."

We conclude that the error complained of prevented the defendant from having a fair trial. After a review of the entire cause, including the evidence, we are of the opinion that such error resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

By reason of the foregoing it becomes unnecessary to discuss the appellant's contentions that the trial court erred in permitting the complaining witness to testify because it is alleged she appeared incapable of receiving a just impression of facts respecting which she was examined, or of relating them truly, as required by section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and in denying appellant's motion to strike such testimony.

The judgment and the order appealed from are reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

PEASE, KOLBERG & CO., Inc., v. BATES.
(Civ. 5785.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 6, 1927.

1. Corporations $\S$ 308(11)—Evidence held sufficient to support finding as to reasonable value of defendant's services as secretary of corporation.

In action for goods sold and delivered, in which defendant filed counterclaim for value of services as secretary of plaintiff corporation, evidence held sufficient to support court's finding that reasonable value of defendant's services as secretary was $1,105.68.

2. Corporations $\S$ 308(1)—That one employed as secretary of corporation became stockholder did not affect right to compensation.

That one employed as secretary of corporation became stockholder did not affect his right to compensation for services as secretary.

3. Corporations $\S$ 308(1)—Implied obligation arose out of appointment of secretary to pay reasonable worth of services, in absence of circumstances showing different understanding, though compensation was not fixed as required by corporation's by-laws.

Where by-laws of corporation provided that compensation of officers of corporation should be fixed by by-laws, implied obligation arose out of defendant's appointment as secretary to pay reasonable worth of his services unless services were performed under circumstances showing understanding that they were to be gratuitous, even though no by-law was adopted fixing his compensation.

4. Corporations $\S$ 308(11)—Evidence supported conclusion that circumstances of employment did not show understanding that defendant's services as corporation's secretary were to be gratuitous.

In action for goods sold and delivered in which defendant filed counterclaim for value of services as secretary of plaintiff corporation, evidence held sufficient to support conclusion that circumstances of employment did not show understanding that defendant's services were to be given gratuitously.

5. Appeal and error $\S$ 1058(1)—Excluding evidence of custom of corporation regarding compensation of officers held not prejudicial, in view of evidence later introduced.

In action for goods sold and delivered in which defendant filed counterclaim for value of services as secretary of plaintiff corporation, excluding evidence that it was custom and usage of plaintiff corporation that no compensation should be paid to officers held not prejudicial, where evidence was later introduced that president and vice president of corporation both received salary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by Pease, Kolberg & Co., Inc., against George L. Bates to recover the balance due on an open account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered, in which defendant filed a counterclaim. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Head, Rutan & Scovel, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

L. F. Coburn, of Orange, for respondent.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff brought suit for the sum of $1,305.68, balance due on an open account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered to the defendant. Defendant answered, alleging payment in full, and filed a counterclaim, alleging that defendant had become indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $1,390.53 and no more; that defendant had paid to plaintiff on said account the sum of $384.85; that defendant performed work, labor, and services as secretary of said plaintiff of the reasonable value of $1,583.33; that plaintiff was indebted to defendant in the sum of $577.65 for the balance of a mutual, open, and current account. Judgment was rendered that plaintiff and defendant take nothing. From this judgment plaintiff appeals.

[1] Defendant acted as secretary of plaintiff corporation for a period of about 16 months. He purchased one share of stock in the corporation when he assumed office. The defendant testified the president of the plaintiff corporation assured him that it would be worth his while to act as secretary, that he would be given a discount on building material, but that no such discount was ever given. The by-laws of plaintiff corporation, with which defendant became familiar, provided that the salaries of all officers should be fixed and determined by the by-laws. No provision was made in the by-laws for any compensation for the office of secretary. Defendant testified that while acting as secretary of the corporation he attended directors' meetings, wrote the minutes, completed the minutes of former meetings, made thirty entries in the corporation stock book, corrected twelve stock certificates, made a report to the state board of equalization and a capital stock tax return; that he negotiated the sale of a packing house owned by plaintiff for the sum of $40,000, and negotiated for the exchange of another property worth $7,500, and for the purchase of a lot at $1,100. He further testified that the reasonable value of his services as secretary was $1,600. Witnesses testified that the reasonable value of the secretary's work was approximately $800, and that a reasonable commission on the real estate transactions aggregated $1,212.25. Defendant, however, did not claim that he was entitled to the regular commission for his services. The evidence is sufficient to support the finding of the court that the reasonable value of defendant's services was the sum of $1,105.68, as determined by the trial court.

Appellant contends that the respondent is bound by his testimony that the only compensation he was to receive was in discounts on material purchased by him and extended credit, and he failed to prove what discounts he was entitled to, if any. We do not so interpret respondent's testimony that such considerations were to be his only compensation.

[2, 3] The following provisions appear in the by-laws of appellant corporation:

"The compensation and terms of office of all the officers of the corporation other than the directors shall be fixed and determined by the by-laws."

No by-law was ever adopted fixing the compensation of the defendant as secretary. Appellant contends that respondent is entitled to no compensation for his services unless fixed by appellant corporation's by-laws. We cannot agree with this contention. Respondent at the time of his employment was a stranger to the plaintiff corporation. He was neither a stockholder nor a director. It was thought necessary in order to qualify him for the office of secretary that he become a stockholder, and respondent bought one share of stock of the appellant corporation. The fact that respondent became a stockholder of appellant corporation can make no difference as to his right of compensation. Rosborough v. The Shasta River Canal Co., 22 Cal. 557, 562. Unless the services were performed under circumstances which showed an understanding that they were to be gratuitous, an implied obligation would arise out of his appointment to pay respondent what his services as secretary were reasonably worth. McCarthy v. Mount Tecate Land & Water Co., 111 Cal. 328, 341, 43 P. 956; Bassett v. Fairchild, 132 Cal. 637, 641, 64 P. 1082, 52 L. R. A. 611; Rosborough v. The Shasta River Canal Co., supra.

[4] We believe the evidence sufficient to support the trial court in concluding that the circumstances of employment did not show an understanding that respondent's services were to be given gratuitously.

[5] While it was error for the trial court to refuse to permit appellant, corporation, to prove that it was the custom and usage of appellant, corporation, that no compensation should be paid to the officers, yet such error was not prejudicial, in view of the fact that evidence was later introduced that the president and vice president of the corporation both received a salary.

There being no prejudicial error, it is ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

Ex parte WILSON. (Cr. 3046.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 27, 1927.

1. Criminal law §999(1)—Prisoner, incarcerated under two commitments for same offense, held not entitled to release on habeas corpus where one commitment was valid.

In habeas corpus proceeding, prisoner, incarcerated in a state institution, held not entitled to release from custody on the ground that his commitment thereto was void, where it was shown that he had been committed twice for the same offense, and was being held on both commitments, the first of which was valid.

2. Criminal law §1216(1)—Prisoner's removal from prison to jail through habeas corpus did not vacate original judgment; hence, upon recommitment, sentence held begun upon first commitment.

Where prisoner was released from the state prison through habeas corpus proceedings and resentenced to the county jail, the original judgment was not vacated thereby; hence upon recommitment to the state institution, his sentence should be considered to have begun upon his first commitment and to have continued at least up to the time of his removal to the county jail.

Application by William Wilson for a writ of habeas corpus against the Warden of Folsom State Prison. Writ denied, and petitioner remanded.

E. B. D. Spagnoli and Walter F. Lynch, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and F. W. Richards, Dep. Atty. Gen., for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Petition for writ of habeas corpus by William Wilson, wherein said petitioner, among other matters, alleges as follows:

"On or about February 21, 1922, petitioner pleaded guilty to an information filed against him in the superior court of Kings county, charging him with violation of section 464 of the Penal Code, namely, burglary with explosives, and that by reason of said imprisonment (plea) he was sentenced, on or about February 21, 1922, to be imprisoned in the state prison, and was removed to the state prison and there confined.

"Thereafter, and on or about December 29, 1924, petitioner was discharged from said state prison, where he was confined because of said conviction. That said discharge was ordered by the superior court of Sacramento county in a habeas corpus proceeding pending before said court. That said superior court of Sacramento county ordered petitioner returned to the superior court of Kings county for resentencing to the county jail because of said conviction, and, in conformity with the decision of the honorable the District Court of Appeal of the State of California, First District, Division Two, in the case of In re Schiaffino, 232 P. 719, 70 Cal. App. 65, which latter case held that the crime of burglary with explosives was a misdemeanor and not a felony and that accordingly a person convicted of said offense could not be imprisoned in a state prison.

"That thereafter, and on or about December 31, 1924, said superior court of Kings county resentenced petitioner to be imprisoned in the county jail of Kings county for the term of 25 years.

"That thereafter the petitioner applied to this honorable court for a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that his imprisonment in the county jail was illegal for various reasons, and that this honorable court, in its decision made on July 29, 1925, reported in 196 Cal. 517, 238 P. 359, discharged the writ of habeas corpus and remanded petitioner to the custody of the sheriff of Kings county, and ordered the superior court of Kings county to vacate and set aside the judgment of sentence that petitioner be imprisoned in the county jail, and ordered that a new judgment be pronounced and entered against petitioner according to law and the views expressed in its decision, namely that petitioner be sentenced to be imprisoned in the state prison. That thereafter, to wit, on or about August 12, 1925, and because of the said decision of this honorable court, the said superior court of Kings county did resentence petitioner to be confined in the state prison by reason of said conviction (of February 21, 1922), and that the petitioner has ever since been confined in the state prison solely by reason of said sentence last mentioned.

"That the petitioner's confinement in the state prison ever since on or about August 12, 1925, is illegal, for the reason that said judgment of sentence, pronounced and entered by the superior court of Kings county, on or about August 12, 1925, is void because the said judgment of the superior court of Kings county, made and entered on or about February 21, 1922, was at all times and is valid and in full force and effect."

Upon the presentation and filing of this petition, this court ordered that a writ of habeas corpus as prayed for therein be issued. The return to said writ by the warden of the state prison sets forth that he held said William Wilson under two commitments issued out of the superior court of the county of Kings; one upon the judgment of conviction of date February 21, 1922, and the other upon the judgment of conviction of date August 12, 1925.

[1] It is first contended by petitioner that the judgment of conviction entered by said superior court on the 12th day of August, 1925, is illegal and void for the reason that the law does not compel nor countenance two distinct final judgments covering the same matter. This contention appears to be sustained by the ruling of this court in the case of People v. Mess, 65 Cal. 174. In that action facts quite similar in principle to those in the present proceeding were before the court. It was there held that:

"The judgment of October 27, 1883, is a valid judgment, and that the defendant is legally in custody under it. It results that the proceedings subsequently taken in the superior court, looking to a resentencing of the defendant, were void."

Assuming that the judgment of August 12, 1925, is void and the commitment issued thereon of no greater validity, there still remains the prior judgment of date February 21, 1922. The return of the warden in this proceeding shows that petitioner is held under a commitment issued under this judgment as well as upon the one issued upon the latter judgment. That being the case, his imprisonment is legal, and he is not entitled to be discharged therefrom. It is true that petitioner claims that the commitment issued upon the second judgment is the "sole warrant" for the present detention, but the return of the warden shows otherwise.

In another portion of petitioner's brief he states:

"In the instant case the judgment of February 21, 1922, was the only valid judgment in the case. If it were void a different situation would be presented. The superior court of Sacramento county, in ordering the petitioner to be taken to Kings county for resentencing to the county jail simply interrupted the execution of said judgment of February 21, 1922. It did not vacate, set aside, or annul said judgment. Habeas corpus proceedings attack a judgment collaterally only. They simply grant relief against alleged unlawful restraints. Judgments can only be vacated and annulled by direct attack, such as motion to vacate, etc. The judgment of February 21, 1922, still being in full force and effect, petitioner's present sentence should commence from his original delivery to the state prison under the first judgment and he not be held to have lost nearly 3½ years' service credit on his sentence by reason of his present confinement solely under said second void judgment of August 12, 1925. The Supreme Court has heretofore held that the judgment of February 21, 1922, was valid."

[2] This statement we think in the main fairly sets forth the true status of petitioner's imprisonment. The judgment of February 21, 1922, is valid. The order of the superior court of Sacramento county did not vacate it or annul it. The commitment issued upon this judgment, and by virtue of which the warden is holding petitioner, is legal and valid and constitutes a legal warrant on the part of the officer for the imprisonment of petitioner. His imprisonment would commence to run from the date of his delivery to the prison authorities under this commitment, and he is entitled, at least, to credit for the time served thereunder from the date of his first delivery to the prison by virtue of said judgment of February 21, 1922, until the date when he was removed therefrom by order of the superior court of the county of Sacramento. As to the time spent in the county jail of Kings county under the judgment of date December 31, 1924, while he may not be legally entitled to credit therefor upon his imprisonment in the state's prison, it is a circumstance which the state board of prison directors may well consider when fixing his time of imprisonment.

The writ is denied, and the petitioner is remanded to the custody of said warden.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Proceeding by David S. Zediker and others contesting the probate of the will of Emma A. Stump, deceased. From a judgment sustaining the will, contestants appeal. Affirmed.

Hugh P. Graves and Stanley Moffatt, both of Fresno, for appellants.

Charles A. Hill, of Fresno, for respondents.

WASTE, C. J. Emma A. Stump, a widow, died, leaving a will by which she gave the sum of $1 to each of her eight brothers and sisters, and the remainder of her property to a nephew, Roy Zediker, and his wife, in joint tenancy. After the document was admitted to probate, David S. Zediker, a brother, Laura All, Susan Woodward, and Carrie Foster, sisters, instituted a contest, alleging as grounds of opposition the mental incompetency of the decedent; that the will was not executed in the manner required by law; that it was the product of coercion and undue influence exerted by Roy Zediker upon the mind and will of the decedent; and that it was obtained through fraud, connivance, and conspiracy of the nephew and other persons practiced upon and against the decedent. Upon the conclusion of the testimony the trial court, over the objection of contestants, directed the jury to return answers favorable to the proponents on all the special issues about to be submitted to it relating to the mental competency of the decedent, and the due execution of the will, thereby leaving for the consideration of the jury only the questions as to undue influence and fraud alleged to have been practiced upon the decedent. On these issues the jury also rendered its verdict in favor of the proponents. Judgment was thereupon entered sustaining the will, and the contestants have appealed.

[1] The decedent had resided on a ranch in Fresno county with her husband, Allen E. Stump, for a period of approximately 20 years. She had been an invalid, and practically helpless for 2 or 3 years prior to her death, and was confined to her bed during the last illness of her husband, who died in October, 1923. Shortly before his death, the husband and wife executed wills, giving all of their property each to the other for life, with remainder over to the nephew of Mrs. Stump, Roy V. Zediker, and his wife, jointly, no other legatees being named. W. J. Lohman, cashier of the First National Bank of Parlier, was named as the executor of each will. Some time after the death of her husband, Mrs. Stump executed another will, the one here in question. The instrument was prepared by the attorney for the First National Bank of Parlier, who was also the attorney for the executor of the estate of Allen E. Stump. It was executed in the presence of the attorney, the family physician, and W. J. Lohman, the executor of the husband's will, who was again named as executor by Mrs. Stump. The testimony is clear and without contradiction that the will was properly executed, and that at the time of its execution the testatrix was in possession of her faculties, and comprehended the nature of her testamentary act. The will is not unnatural. The testatrix was childless, and her nephew and his wife had looked after the affairs of her husband and herself for 2 or 3 years before Mr. Stump died, and had cared for her after her husband's death, and managed her property. The trial court very properly admitted the contents of the former will of the testatrix as tending to show a permanent and fixed state of mind with regard to her plan for the disposition and administration of her estate. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 593, 82 P. 252.

[2, 3] The principal assignments of error relied on by the appellants relate to the granting of the motion for a directed verdict on the question of testamentary capacity and the instructions given on the subject of undue influence. Our examination of the record, however, convinces us that, while the testatrix was no doubt subject to the infirmities and idiosyncracies of old age, she was nevertheless, clearly possessed of sufficient soundness of mind to make a legal disposition of her property. The wills of aged and infirm people, or people sick in mind as well as in body, must be upheld as in other cases, if, notwithstanding their enfeeblement, testamentary capacity is shown. Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 161, 168, 113 P. 130. While there is evidence in this case from which it might be reasoned that Mrs. Stump was enfeebled in body and mind, the evidence falls far short of establishing that the will itself was the creature or product of any hallucination or delusion, or that any of the mental infirmities of the testatrix bore directly upon, and influenced, the creation and terms of the testamentary instrument. The conflict, which appellants argue is raised by the evidence introduced by them, was not of such substantial character as to deprive the court below of the right to direct a verdict on the issue of the testamentary capacity of the decedent. Had the jury found in favor of the contestants on that issue, it would have been the duty of the trial court to set such verdict aside. It was therefore its duty, in the first instance, to withdraw the issue from the consideration of the jury.

Appellants contend that the jury should have found for contestants on the issues of undue influence and fraud claimed to have been practiced on the testatrix by Roy V. Zediker and others. The most that need be said on that point is that the evidence, while contradictory as to certain matters, falls short of the effect claimed for it by appellants. Considered in its entirety, the evidence amply supports the conclusion arrived at by the jury.

[4] Appellants further contend that the court erred in its instructions relating to the issues of undue influence and fraud alleged to have been practiced on the testatrix. Mere proof of opportunity to influence the mind of a testatrix, even though shown to be coupled with an interest, or a motive to do so, does not sustain a finding of undue influence in the absence of testimony showing that there was pressure operating directly on the testamentary act. Estate of Graves (Cal. Sup.) 259 P. 935; Estate of Morcel, 162 Cal. 188, 191, 121 P. 733. While a presumption of undue influence may arise from proof of the existence of a confidential relation between the testator and the beneficiaries, coupled with activity on the part of the latter in the preparation of the will, we are unable to agree with the appellants that there was in this case such an actual and active participation in procuring the execution of the will on the part of Roy V. Zediker and his wife as to place on them the burden of showing that the will was not induced by coercion or fraud. For these reasons the instructions complained of by the appellants were not improperly given.

The judgment is affirmed.

METROPOLITAN LIFE INS. CO. v. WELCH et al. (S. F. 11637.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 21, 1927.

1. Judgment ⇨117—Where there is no answer, prayer for general relief cannot enlarge power to grant relief not specifically prayed for (Code Civ. Proc. § 580).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 580, where there is no answer, prayer for general relief cannot enlarge power of court to grant relief not specifically prayed for.

2. Divorce ⇨254—Judgment awarding wife all community property held effective only to award her community property specifically described in complaint.

In wife's action for divorce with prayer to be awarded community property, alleged to consist only of household furniture, judgment which awarded to her all community property was a nullity and without effect to award her any community property except that specifically described, which did not include a life insurance policy, because mention thereof was not made in pleadings, findings, or decree.

3. Divorce ⇨255—Decree, silent as to other community property, operated as adjudication that other property was separate property of spouses.

Where in divorce petition wife prayed to be awarded community property, alleged to consist of household furniture only, and decree set aside for her all community property of parties, since it was silent as to other property than that named in her complaint it operated as an adjudication that at time action was begun there was no other community property, and hence other property owned by the parties in so far as concerned its community character was thereby determined to be separate property of the spouse in whose name it was held.

4. Divorce ⇨255—Judgment in divorce action held conclusive determination of rights of parties not only to community property, but all property owned by either.

Where, in wife's divorce action, parties had opportunity to litigate question as to what portion of their property was community property and having obtained final decree establishing respective rights thereto, decree was conclusive determination of their rights not only to community property described in the complaint as consisting only of household furniture, but to all property owned by either.

5. Insurance ⇨585(6)—Husband was not estopped from claiming wife had no interest in insurance policy, notwithstanding her payment of premiums after divorce.

Where life insurance policy provided for payment of principal to wife in event of husband's death and for cash surrender to him at expiration of 20 years, husband was not estopped from claiming she had no interest in policy, notwithstanding her payment of premiums thereon after divorce, since her payments were to protect her rights therein if he had died before expiration of the 20-year period.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Interpleader by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company against Lawrence J. Welch and Marietta Gross, formerly Marietta Welch. From a judgment for defendant Lawrence J. Welch, defendant Marietta Gross appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Plunkett and Knight, Boland, Hutchinson & Christin, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Walter Christie, F. J. Kilmartin, and Roland Beesey, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This is an action in interpleader instituted by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company against the appellant, Marietta Gross, and the respondent, Lawrence J. Welch, who were formerly husband and wife. On October 28, 1903, and while appellant and respondent were husband and wife, a policy of insurance was issued by the plaintiff, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. This policy provided that on payment of the annual premiums therein called for said insurance company would pay to appellant, then Marietta Welch, the sum of $1,500 on the death of respondent, provided his death should occur within 20 years after the date of said policy of insurance. If, however, said Welch should be alive at the expiration of said period of 20 years, said policy provided that the cash surrender value of said policy should be paid to him at the expiration of said period. All premiums on said policy falling due during said period of 20 years were paid, and at the expiration thereof the said Lawrence J. Welch, the respondent herein, was living and the cash surrender value of said policy was then the sum of $1,241.74. In the meantime, however, the appellant, under her then name of Marietta Welch, instituted an action of divorce in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against the said Lawrence J. Welch, in which said action said court, on the 14th day of November, 1912, entered its decree in favor of the plaintiff therein and against the defendant therein, in which decree the said plaintiff was awarded an interlocutory decree of divorce, the custody of the minor children, the household furniture as community property, and "all of the community property of plaintiff and defendant." On January 8, 1914, said court entered a final decree of divorce in said action, the terms of which, in all respects material for the purpose of the present action, followed those contained in the interlocutory decree. The defendant in said divorce action, the said Lawrence J. Welch, after being regularly served with process, made no appearance in said action, and the judgment therein rendered was accordingly by default. In the complaint it was alleged "that plaintiff and defendant had acquired the following community property, to wit, all of the household furniture, etc., contained in the dwelling house at 1529 Hudson avenue, San Francisco, occupied by plaintiff and defendant," and the prayer of said complaint asked that plaintiff therein "be awarded said community property" and for general relief. Said divorce decree was granted upon two grounds, one of which was extreme cruelty.

[1] In an action wherein the judgment is entered by reason of the failure of the defendant to appear and answer the complaint therein, the relief granted cannot exceed that which is demanded in the complaint. Code Civ. Proc. § 580; Brooks v. Forington, 117 Cal. 219, 48 P. 1073; Mudge v. Steinhart, 78 Cal. 34, 20 P. 147, 12 Am. St. Rep. 17. "And where relief is given beyond the scope of that asked for, it is a nullity, and may be attacked collaterally, or its effect avoided under the doctrine that it is not res adjudicata." Lang v. Lang, 182 Cal. 765, 769, 190 P. 181, 182. Where there is no answer, the prayer for general relief cannot enlarge the power of the court to grant relief not specifically prayed for. Staacke v. Bell, 125 Cal. 309, 312, 57 P. 1012.

[2] That part of the judgment in the divorce case of Welch v. Welch purporting to set aside to plaintiff therein "all of the community property of plaintiff and defendant" is therefore a nullity, and said judgment cannot be held to have had the effect of awarding to plaintiff in said action any of the community property of said parties except that specifically described in the complaint, which did not include the life insurance policy, the proceeds of which are in controversy in this action. No mention of said life insurance policy was made in the pleadings, findings or either of the decrees in said divorce action. There is nothing in the case of White v. White, 86 Cal. 212, 219, 24 P. 996, cited by appellant, inconsistent with the foregoing conclusion. The appellant therefore acquired no right to said insurance policy by virtue of the decree of divorce awarding to her "all of the community property of plaintiff and defendant," or by any other provision of said decree. If she has any right to said policy or its proceeds, it must be by virtue of some interest therein acquired while she and the defendant were husband and wife, and which was not determined by said decree of divorce. The trial court, however, held that the decree of divorce was an adjudication in favor of respondent that he was the owner of said policy of insurance, and accordingly gave judgment in his favor for the full amount of the proceeds thereof.

[3] In support of said judgment respondent contends that the appellant having in her complaint in the divorce action specifically described the community property belonging to her and her then husband, and the court having found said community property to consist of the articles so described in her complaint, and having made an award of said community property by the final decree in accordance with and based upon the allegations of said complaint, said final decree is a complete adjudication and determination of the character and extent of the community property belonging to them at the commencement of said action and establishes the status of all property belonging to them or either of them at the commencement of said action as to whether it is community or separate property. In support of this contention respondent relies upon the two cases of Brown v. Brown, reported in 170 Cal. at pages 1 and 8 (147 P. 1168, 1171), respectively, wherein the court held that where a plaintiff in a divorce action had alleged in her complaint that there was no community property and a default judgment had been entered in her favor based upon said complaint, she could not thereafter claim that certain property acquired by herself and husband prior to the filing of said complaint was community property. The court held in the second of said two cases, page 9 (147 P. 1172) thereof, that:

"The judgment of divorce, based upon the complaint declaring that there was no community property, is a conclusive determination against the plaintiff that this property is not community property, and by said judgment she is estopped from claiming any interest whatever in this part of the estate of Brown."

In that action it appeared that the property in question was an insurance policy issued upon the life of plaintiff's former husband, who had died after the entry of the final decree in said divorce action. Thereafter, Mrs. Brown, the plaintiff in said divorce action, instituted an action against the estate of her former husband and sought therein to recover from the estate a portion of the proceeds of said life insurance policy. The trial court denied any relief to plaintiff in said action, and the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In the first of said cases, Brown v. Brown, supra, at page 5 (147 P. 1170) thereof, Mr. Justice Shaw, speaking for the court, said:

"It is earnestly contended by the respondent that the final decree is of no force whatever upon the right of the plaintiff in the property of the husband. In this we think the plaintiff is mistaken. Where a defendant is served with a summons and complaint stating the facts upon which he is required to act, and he makes default, he is presumed to admit all the facts which are well pleaded in the complaint. The judgment which follows upon this sort of admission is, in contemplation of law, a complete adjudication of all the rights of the parties embraced in the prayer for relief and arising from the facts stated in the complaint, including the facts in his favor as well as those against him. The defendant here is presumed to have acceded to the proposition embraced in the complaint and to have consented that plaintiff should obtain the relief therein prayed for, upon the conditions and facts set forth in the complaint. The proceeding is equivalent to a statement by Brown to plaintiff that he did not object to a divorce for the cause alleged, based upon the theory that there was no community property existing at the time the action was begun. When judgment is rendered upon such a complaint and default, it becomes, in effect, a contract between the parties that the judgment shall be final with respect to everything properly embraced within the allegations of the complaint and in the prayer for relief. 1 Freeman on Judgments, § 330; Hoh v. Hoh, 84 Wis. 378, 54 N. W. 731. Although the final decree is silent as to property, it nevertheless operates as an adjudication that at the time the action was begun there was no community property. Thompson v. McKay, 41 Cal. 227; Champion v. Wood [Woods], 79 Cal. 17, 21 P. 534, 12 Am. St. Rep. 126."

In the present proceeding we find that the trial court in the divorce action, following the allegations of the complaint therein, found that the parties thereto had acquired as community property the property described in said complaint, and in the final decree of divorce this property was awarded to the plaintiff in said action as community property. While the decree is silent as to any other property either of said parties may have then owned or have been interested in, yet we think from what was said in the case of Brown v. Brown, supra, that said decree operates as an adjudication that at the time said action was begun there was no other community property. Therefore whatever other property either of said parties then owned or was interested in, in so far as its community character was concerned, was by said decree determined to be the separate property of the particular spouse in whose name it was then held. Not only would this be so from the reasoning of the court in Brown v. Brown, supra, but for other reasons as well. Unless the property rights of the parties in a divorce action are conclusively settled by a decree like that rendered in Welch v. Welch, neither of the parties thereto would, after the rendition of such a decree, at least before the intervening of the statute of limitations, be certain as to his or her rights in any property owned at the commencement of the divorce action, except that described in the divorce proceedings, and either would be subject to the suit of the other to account for any or all property held by the former at the time of the commencement of said divorce action.

[4] The parties having had an opportunity to litigate the question as to what part or portion of their property is community property, and having actually, under proceedings in which all of the community property apparently was involved, obtained a final decree establishing 'and determining the respective rights of the parties to said community property, said decree must be held to be a conclusive determination of all the rights of said parties in and to not only the community property described therein, but in and to all property owned by either of them. This rule, of course, would not be applicable when the final decree makes no disposition whatever of the community property. In such a case the former spouses become tenants in common in the community property, and their rights thereto could be determined in a subsequent action. Estate of Brix, 181 Cal. 667, 676, 186 P. 135.

Again referring to the second of the Brown Cases, supra, where the court was referring to the life insurance policy and in which it was held that the judgment which described no property whatever, but which was based upon a complaint that there was no community property, was "a conclusive determination against the plaintiff that this property is not community property," then upon the same principle the judgment in the present action awarding to plaintiff all the property described in her complaint and claimed by her as community property is a conclusive determination as against plaintiff that the life insurance policy in the present action, not being mentioned in said final decree, is not community property. By its terms it was made payable to respondent in case he survived the 20-year period mentioned therein. Being alive at the end of said period the proceeds thereof legally belong to him, and the appellant by the judgment in the divorce action is estopped from claiming said proceeds or any part thereof.

[5] Appellant further contends that the evidence shows that after the divorce proceedings were terminated she paid all premiums falling due on the policy, and therefore the respondent is estopped from claiming that she has no interest therein. We are unable to see how the principle of estoppel can apply under these facts. Appellant undoubtedly had an interest in the policy during the time she paid the said premiums. Had respondent died before the expiration of said 20-year period, she would have been entitled to the face of said policy upon his death. It was to protect this right in part, at least, that she kept the premiums paid up, and the fact that respondent knew that she was making these payments and permitted her to do so cannot in any way be held to estop him from asserting whatever rights he may have under said policy, when by the terms thereof they shall have matured.

The judgment is affirmed.

JEFFREYS v. POINT RICHMOND CANAL & LAND CO. et al. (S. F. 11426.) ★

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 18, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 17, 1927.

1. Constitutional law § 143—Statute, authorizing holder of street improvement bond to foreclose lien, applied only to bonds issued after enactment; otherwise, contract obligations were impaired (Street Improvement Act, § 76, as amended by St. 1921, p. 297, § 10).

Street Improvement Act (St. 1911, p. 763) § 76, as amended by St. 1921, p. 297, § 10, providing that holder of street improvement bond may file and maintain suit to foreclose lien thereof in same manner as provided for the foreclosure of the lien of delinquent assessments, applies only to bonds issued after its enactment, and not to bonds issued before its enactment and unpaid, since a construction rendering it applicable to the latter bonds would impair the obligation of contracts.

2. Constitutional law § 48—Construction of act rendering it constitutional must be adopted in preference to construction which would impair obligation of contracts (Street Improvement Act, § 76, as amended by St. 1921, p. 297, § 10).

Court must adopt construction of Street Improvement Act (St. 1911, p. 763), § 76, as amended by St. 1921, p. 297, § 10, providing that holder of street improvement bond may maintain suit to foreclose lien thereof, which will render statute constitutional as applying only to bonds issued after its enactment, rather than a construction which would make it impair obligation of contracts as applying to bonds issued before its enactment and unpaid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action on street improvement bonds, brought by W. M. Jeffreys against the Point Richmond Canal & Land Company and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, the defendant Mintzer Estate Company appealed to the District Court of Appeal, which affirmed the judgment (255 P. 848). On hearing in Supreme Court. Judgment of trial court reversed.

Rehearing denied; PRESTON, J., dissenting.

McCutchen, Olney, Mannon & Greene and John F. Cassell, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Rufus H. Kimball, of San Francisco, and A. F. Bray, of Martinez, for respondent.

Ernest A. Wilson, of San Mateo, amicus curiae.

LANGDON, J. [1] Plaintiff sued as the purchaser for value of over 200 street bonds issued by the city of Richmond in the year 1917 under the Street Improvement Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730). Judgment went for the plaintiff for the amount prayed and also for the foreclosure of separate liens upon the lots involved. The defendant Mintzer Estate Company was the owner of a mortgage upon the property upon which the bonds were a prior lien, and said company is the only defendant who has appealed from the judgment.

The facts are undisputed. The appellant is the holder of two promissory notes from the owner of the lots involved, which were secured by a mortgage on the lots, and which were taken in the year 1920, subsequent to the issue and delivery of all the bonds and at a time when the owner of the lots was in the hands of a receiver. Both notes were taken by the appellant to secure payment of a past-due indebtedness and both the notes and the mortgage were taken at a time when the corporation debtor was insolvent.

No question is raised on this appeal affecting the validity of the proceedings under the Street Improvement Act by which the bonds were issued and no suggestion is made that the work, in payment for which the bonds were issued, was not properly done in accordance with the contract.

The action was brought in 1923. Between the date of the issuance of the bonds in 1917 and the commencement of the action, the act under which the bonds were issued had been amended (St. 1921, p. 297, § 10), providing for foreclosure proceedings in court in the event of default in payment of principal or interest. Prior to this amendment, the Street Improvement Act provided two distinct remedies against the delinquent property owner: First, a summary sale of the property by the city treasurer on demand of the bondholder: and, second, a foreclosure of the lien of the assessment at the suit of the contractor. By the amendment to section 76 of the act made in 1921, it was expressly provided that:

"By way of a separate, distinct and cumulative remedy, the holder of any bond * * * may file and maintain a suit to foreclose the lien of the bond in the same manner provided in this act for the foreclosure of the lien of delinquent assessments."

The amendment also provided for a simple method of pleading and proof in such cases, for substituted service of process where the lot owner could not be found, for the foreclosure of the lien of the bond, and for attorney's fees and costs. The right of redemption or the property after sale was preserved "as in other cases."

It is contended upon the appeal (1) that the amendment of 1921 is not retroactive and was not intended to apply to bonds issued before its enactment, and (2) if the amendment is retroactive, it is unconstitutional, in that it impairs the obligation of a contract. While the language is somewhat general and does not specifically refer to existing bonds, it does purport to give a remedy to "the holder of any bond." This may well apply to bonds outstanding and unpaid, as well as those issued in the future. However, we are of the opinion that to so construe the amendment would render it inoperative as impairing the obligation of a contract.

In the case of Chapman v. Jocelyn, 182 Cal. 294, 187 P. 962, it was held that:

"A street assessment is a contract and the provisions of the statute in force at the time prescribing the manner of its enforcement are a part of such contract. Creighton v. Pragg, 21 Cal. 115; Houston v. McKenna, 22 Cal. 553. The bond issued upon such assessment, by reason of the failure of the owner to pay the same within the 30 days allowed to the contractor for the work to collect the same, must therefore also constitute a contract. * * * The Constitution forbids the passage of a law impairing the obligation of a contract. Article I, § 16. It follows that a law enacted after such contract is made, and which materially alters the remedy of the bondholder to enforce his lien by means of a sale, or the rights of the owner under the law existing at the time the bond was issued, cannot apply to previous contracts and can have only a prospective effect. Houston v. McKenna, supra. The case in this aspect is not distinguishable from Welsh v. Cross, 146 Cal. 621, 81 P. 229, 106 Am. St. Rep. 63, 2 Ann. Cas. 796, wherein it was held that a law extending the time for redemption from a foreclosure sale impaired the obligation of a mortgage executed before its enactment."

The case of Johnson v. Taylor, 150 Cal. 201, 88 P. 903, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 818, 119 Am. St. Rep. 181, is also authority for the general proposition that the law in force at the time of a sale for taxes regulates the right of redemption therefrom, and it is not within the power of the Legislature to take away that right, or prejudicially to affect it, by subsequent legislation. In that case the court quoted from an earlier case (Teralta Land, etc., Co. v. Shaffer, 116 Cal. 518, 48 P. 613, 58 Am. St. Rep. 194) the following language:

"The right of property acquired by the purchaser at this sale and the right of redemption remaining to the owner must both be governed by the law in force at the time of sale. Neither, in our judgment, could be either abridged or enlarged by subsequent legislation. This is unquestionably so as to the right of the purchaser. The same rule ought to apply in favor of the owner as against any statute shortening the time to redeem, as it is equally unjust to legislate against the owner of the land as in his favor."

[2] Since we have reached the conclusion that the amendment in question would be unconstitutional if construed to apply to bonds outstanding and unpaid at the date of the amendment, but issued prior thereto, and since it is possible to construe it in a manner which will render it legal and operative, and not unconstitutional and void, it is our duty to place the latter construction upon the amendment.

The rights of property owners against whose property assessments were levied and bonds issued under the "Improvement Act of 1911" prior to the amendment of 1921 became vested under a statute which did not render them subject to any suit whatever in any court at the hands of a bondholder. While the Legislature had power to make retroactive a law relating purely to a remedy, it could not alter the substantive rights of the property owners or their successors in interest. The amendment we are considering, although nominally aimed solely at providing a remedy, in fact, changes a substantive right of the property owner, and therefore impairs, to the detriment of the property owner, the contract rights which became fixed when the street proceedings were taken and the bonds issued.

The judgment appealed from its reversed.

SETZER v. MOORE. (S. F. 11644.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 27, 1927.

1. Attorney and client ⚡144—In agreement for attorney's fees on date action was settled, meaning of "settled" was determinable from context and circumstances.

Where agreement settling compensation to be paid attorney provided that last payment was payable upon date action was settled, meaning of word "settled," not having acquired well-defined meaning enabling courts to interpret intent of parties, and to be determined from context of written agreement between the parties, circumstances under which agreement was made, and from conferences and correspondence between parties pending negotiation of agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Settle—Settlement.]

2. Attorney and client ⚡144—Under agreement for payment of attorney on date action was "settled," compensation was due on dismissal by plaintiff without prejudice.

Where agreement settling amount of compensation due attorney provided for payment of $5,000 on execution of agreement, and $5,000 on date of commencement of certain action, or upon date said action was "settled," and litigation in which such attorney was employed was incidental to main litigation between parties being conducted in New York, second $5,000 was due upon date of dismissal of action by plaintiff without prejudice, since client could not claim that dismissal was not predicated upon sufficient consideration.

3. Attorney and client ⚡144—That action was dismissed without prejudice to plaintiff could not deprive attorney of right to compensation, under agreement for payment when action was "settled."

That action was dismissed without prejudice to right of plaintiff to commence another action could not deprive attorney of right to compensation, under agreement providing for payment of second installment upon date action was "settled," since services of attorney were to be limited to pending action and were to be terminated when it came to an end.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action upon a contract for legal services by Abraham Setzer against George Gordon Moore. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. V. Keesling and C. A. S. Frost, both of San Francisco, and Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for appellant.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, and Leo J. Rabinowitz, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment rendered and entered by the superior court in and for the county of San Mateo in favor of the plaintiff as the assignee of Archibald M. Johnson and against the defendant, for the sum of $4,911.79 principal, $220.71 interest, and $41.10 costs. The action for the recovery of said sum was founded upon a contract in writing between the defendant and plaintiff's assignor, dated July 6, 1923, which had for its purpose, as expressed by its terms, that of definitely settling the compensation to which said Archibald M. Johnson was entitled to receive for professional services which had been rendered and were to be rendered in the matter of certain litigation which had theretofore been commenced and was then pending in the courts of California, wherein said Archibald M. Johnson was to act thereafter as one of the attorneys of record for the defendant, George Gordon Moore. The relation of attorney and client between said parties which had preceded and led up to the making of said contract may be briefly stated as follows: On May 4, 1922, an action was instituted in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, wherein Equitable Trust Company of New York, a corporation, was plaintiff and George Gordon Moore was defendant, which had for its purpose the recovery on the part of the plaintiff of the sum of $9,819.41, with interest and costs, alleged to be due to it from Moore. In said action an attachment had been issued and levied upon the property of the defendant, situate in the county of San Mateo. On May 12, 1922, another action was instituted in said superior court wherein Investment Registry of America, a corporation, was plaintiff and said Moore was defendant, which action had for its purpose the recovery of a judgment against the defendant for the sum of $49,600, with interest and costs.

Upon the institution of these two actions the defendant therein, who was then in New York, acting through his duly authorized attorney at law and in fact, also residing in said city, entered into negotiations for the employment of Archibald M. Johnson and R. P. Henshall, who were each duly licensed attorneys in the state of California, with a view to having them represent said Moore in each of said actions above referred to, and also on his behalf to commence and prosecute an action against the Equitable Trust Company of New York and certain other defendants to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by said Moore by reason of the alleged false and malicious issuance and levy of the attachment which had been issued in the first above-named action. The result of these negotiations was the making of an agreement, in writing, for the employment of said California attorneys for the purposes of the foregoing litigation, by the terms of which it was agreed that said Moore was to pay said attorneys a retainer of $10,000 for the handling of the foregoing cases, and was to further compensate them for their services therein by the payment of the reasonable value of their services thereafter to be performed. Upon the execution of this agreement Messrs. Johnson and Henshall proceeded to render such legal services as were necessary to adequately conserve and protect the interests of their client, in the course of which they instituted on his behalf an action for damages against the Equitable Trust Company of New York, above referred to. After the litigation in these several matters had progressed for some time Mr. Johnson apparently concluded that the nature, importance, and extent of his legal services during that period were such as to entitle him to a further payment on account of his fee, and accordingly entered into a correspondence between himself and his client, Moore, and the latter's eastern attorney, which ran through several months of both correspondence and conferences, and which finally terminated on July 6, 1923, in the making of the supplemental contract which came to form the basis of this action. By the terms of said contract the said George Gordon Moore—

"has agreed to pay and the said Archibald M. Johnson has agreed to accept the sum of $10,000, payable at the times and in the manner following:

"(1) Five thousand dollars ($5,000) payable on the execution of this agreement. * * *

"(2) Five thousand dollars ($5,000) payable upon the date of commencement of the trial of said action of George Gordon Moore v. Equitable Trust Company et al., hereinabove referred to, or upon the date said action is settled."

The first installment of $5,000 due under the foregoing agreement was paid by Moore, and said litigation proceeded in its various phases until June 4, 1924, when said action of Moore v. Equitable Trust Company et al. was dismissed by virtue of a stipulation entered into between the several parties to said action and also between their counsel, which stipulation read as follows:

"It is hereby stipulated that the above-entitled action may be dismissed without prejudice to the rights of the plaintiff herein to commence another action if he so desires."

It may be well at this point to state that the litigation which has hereinbefore been referred to as being instituted and conducted in the state of California was complicated with other litigation between the parties thereto which was at the same time pending in the courts of New York, and wherein George Gordon Moore was seeking to recover certain large sums of money from the said Investment Registry of America, and which eastern litigation had resulted in a judgment or judgments in favor of said Moore prior to the time of the dismissal of the action of Moore v. Equitable Trust Company et al., on June 4, 1924, in the California court. Upon the dismissal of said action Mr. Johnson began to make demands for the payment of the balance of his counsel fees provided for in the aforesaid agreement, which demand after considerable correspondence being refused resulted in the institution of the present action for the recovery of the balance alleged to be due on account of said fees. The complaint herein was stated in three counts or causes of action—the first being upon an account stated; the second upon a common count based upon the foregoing express agreement; and the third count upon a statement at length of the circumstances which had led up to the making of said contract, as a result of which it was alleged that a balance of $4,911.79 was due to the plaintiff's assignor. It is conceded that each of these counts or causes of action relate to the same transaction, and it is further expressly conceded by counsel for the appellant that "neither the quantity of services rendered by attorney Johnson nor the value of his services were in any way to be brought into the action." The answer of the defendant consisted in denials that any account had ever been stated between the parties, and that any sum whatever was due, owing, or unpaid to said Johnson or his assignee under the terms of the agreement, which was set forth in full in the complaint. Upon the trial of the case the respective parties went quite fully into the relation and correspondence of the parties which had preceded and resulted in the institution of said litigation, and upon the conclusion of the trial court made and filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law, in the course of which the trial court found against the plaintiff upon the first alleged cause of action upon an account stated, but found in the plaintiff's favor upon the other two causes of action treated as having relation to one and the same transaction, and accordingly rendered judgment in the plaintiff's favor for said amount sued for in his complaint. A judgment having been entered for said amount, this appeal has been taken and is being prosecuted by defendant, Moore, against said judgment.

[1-3] The main contention upon which the appellant relies for a reversal of the judgment depends upon the interpretation which this court is asked to place upon the terms of said contract of July 6, 1923, wherein the appellant agrees to pay "five thousand dollars ($5,000) payable upon the date of the commencement of the trial of said action of George Gordon Moore v. Equitable Trust Company et al., hereinabove referred to, or upon the date said action is settled." It is the contention of the appellant that the dismissal of the action at his instance and by stipulation entered into between himself as plaintiff and the several defendants in said action is not to be considered to be such a settlement of the action as would entitle plaintiff's assignor to the payment of the balance of his counsel fees under the terms of said agreement, and for the recovery of which this action was brought. In making this contention the appellant insists that a proper interpretation of the phrase "settled" would contemplate the prior or contemporaneous payment to the plaintiff in the action to which said contract relates of a substantial sum of money as a basis for the dismissal of said action, and that, since it nowhere appears herein that any sum of money was received by Moore as a consideration for his dismissal of the action, the same has not been "settled," within the proper meaning of that term. We are unable to give our concurrence to this interpretation of the terms of said agreement. It would seem to be established by the authorities that the term "settled," when used with relation to pending litigation, has not acquired such a well-defined meaning as would enable the courts to interpret the intent of the parties in making use of said term in connection with the ending of such litigation without the aid of extrinsic evidence. Walsh v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co., 204 N. Y. 58, 97 N. E. 408, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1137-1140; Williams v. Marine Bank of Norfolk, 132 Va. 379, 111 S. E. 94, 95; Adam v. Columbian Nat., etc., Co., 191 Ill. App. 378; Wright v. Takito, 210 Ill. App. 58-60; Michael v. Donohoe, 86 W. Va. 34, 102 S. E. 803. This being so, the courts must have recourse to the context of the written agreement between the parties in which said term is employed, to the circumstances under which the agreement was made, including the state and various phases of the litigation to which the agreement relates, and to the conferences and correspondence between the parties pending the negotiation of the agreement wherein said term is employed. When we look to the context of the agreement, we discover that the purpose of the parties as therein expressed had relation to a particular action, and that the intent of the parties was to "definitely settle the compensation which the said Archibald M. Johnson is entitled to for services that have been rendered and are to be rendered in connection with" said action, and we further learn that the sum of $10,000 was the sum thus definitely fixed upon as and for the amount of such compensation. The delayed half of such definite sum was by the terms of said agreement to be paid to said Johnson upon the happening of one of two events; the first of which was the commencement of the trial of said action, upon the date of which Johnson was to be paid said final sum. The other definite date upon which said final payment was to be made was "the date said action is settled." It would thus appear by reasonable intentment that said Johnson was to be paid this final portion of his fee either at a date prior to the termination of said action, or at the date when said action was terminated and ended without a trial.

When we look beyond the context of said agreement for light upon the meaning of the term "settled" as employed therein, we find that George Gordon Moore had become involved in a quite tangled web of litigation, both in the New York and California courts, arising out of his business relations with the Equitable Trust Company and the Investment Registry of America, each apparently being a New York corporation, involving claims and counterclaims of large sums of money; that the California litigation in which his said local counsel were employed was in a large measure incidental to the main litigation between the parties which was being conducted and carried on in New York during the period between the date of the employment of said California counsel and the final termination of said litigation in the New York courts. It is also fairly inferable that the termination and dismissal of the case of Moore v. Equitable Trust Company, which up to said latter date had been pending here, depended in a large measure upon the result of the New York litigation. It is quite apparent from the record herein that the dismissal of the case of Moore v. Equitable Trust Company in California was a matter agreed upon between Moore and his opponents in that litigation in New York and after the main differences of said parties had been or were about to be adjusted there. This being so, it may not fairly be argued by the appellant herein that the stipulation for the dismissal of the California action was not based upon considerations which would be equally or even more valuable to the plaintiff, Moore, than would have been the payment of a sum of money to him by way of damages as a basis for the dismissal of the California case. But, however this may be, we are of the opinion that it does not lie in the mouth of Moore to say, under such circumstances, that the dismissal thereof upon his own initiative and by his direction to his California counsel, was not predicated upon such a sufficient consideration as would have justified him in agreeing to a termination of said action without a trial thereof upon the merits; and, if this is taken to be true, the conclusion is inevitable that his direction to his California counsel to terminate said action by dismissal amounted to such a settlement thereof in his favor as would, under the terms of said agreement, have entitled the plaintiff's assignor to recover the remainder of his fee. The mere fact that in the stipulation for the dismissal of said action there was a provision that such dismissal was to be without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to commence another action cannot be held to qualify the agreement therein for the termination of the particular action to which such stipulation related. Both of the agreements entered into between the defendant herein and plaintiff's assignor had reference to this particular action, and not to whatever cause of action said Moore may have had against his opponents in the entire litigation. A fair interpretation of said agreement leads us to the conclusion that the agreed services of plaintiff's assignor were to be limited to the then pending action and were to be terminated when it came to an end, either by its trial or by its dismissal without trial, and that neither the services nor the fee of plaintiff's assignor was to be extended or to depend upon the institution of any later action or actions after the termination of the pending one.

[4] In conclusion, it may be stated that the evidence presented before the trial court in this case was quite conflicting in so far as it related to the intent of the parties to the contract sued upon, with reference to the meaning of the term "settled" as employed therein. This being so, and the trial court having resolved such conflict in favor of the interpretation of said term insisted upon by the plaintiff's assignor, we are not disposed to interfere with the conclusion reached by the trial court in that regard.

The judgment is affirmed.

BRIDGE v. RUGGLES. (S. F. 11646.)★

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 27, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 23, 1927.

1. Bills and notes $\S$ 94(1)—Pre-existing debt was sufficient consideration for debtor's note to creditor (Civ. Code, $\S$ 3106).

Where maker was indebted to payee before note was given, such pre-existing indebtedness was, under Civ. Code, $\S$ 3106, sufficient consideration for the note.

2. Bills and notes $\S$ 92(3)—Extension of time or forbearance to sue held sufficient consideration for note.

Where the maker was indebted to the payee and gave a note because of such debt, extension of time or payee's forbearance to sue on original debt was sufficient consideration for the note given.

3. Bills and notes $\S$ 371—Accommodation indorser was liable to payee as ordinary indorser, where payee was holder for value (Civ. Code, $\S$ 3110).

Where note payee was holder for value, accommodation indorser was, because of Civ. Code, $\S$ 3110, liable to such holder as an ordinary indorser.

4. Bills and notes $\S$ 489(1)—Allegations and proof did not make issue of duress in obtaining signatures of maker and accommodation indorser so as to make evidence of state of mind admissible as exception to hearsay rule (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1569).

Where, in payee's action against maker and accommodation indorser of note, indorser sought to introduce, for purpose of showing payee's duress in obtaining signature and indorsement, evidence of a conversation such indorser had had with maker on date of signing, not in presence of payee, in which maker had urged that payee was threatening criminal action against him that would result in injury both to maker and indorser unless latter indorsed maker's note to payee, such evidence held properly refused, as not within exception to hearsay rule making hearsay evidence admissible to show one's state of mind, since, under Civ. Code, $\S$ 1569, defining duress, no issue thereof was made by pleading and proof offered.

5. Evidence $\S$ 314(1)—Hearsay evidence relative to accommodation indorser's state of mind when indorsing was incompetent to show maker executed note because of menace practiced on him (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1570).

In an action on a note, hearsay evidence relative to the accommodation indorser's state of mind when indorsing the instrument was incompetent to show that the maker executed the note because of menace, as understood either generally, or defined by Civ. Code, $\S$ 1570, practiced on him.

6. Witnesses $\S$ 388(3)—Accommodation indorser, sued on note, could not show custom of district attorney's office to impeach plaintiff's testimony without first laying foundation (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2052).

Where payee sued accommodation indorser of note who set up duress in obtaining signatures of maker and indorser in applying for citation to issue to maker from district attorney's office, which maker denied, though his name appeared in citation, evidence, in impeachment, of custom of district attorney's office to insert in citations name of applicant, was not admissible without first laying foundation for impeachment, as required by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2052.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action by H. S. Bridge against Mary A. Ruggles and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Ruggles appeals. Affirmed.

R. P. Henshall and Robert R. Moody, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edwin T. Cooper and Charles T. White, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in an action by the payee against the maker and indorser of a promissory note for $4,000. The maker, L. D. Allen, defaulted in the action, and after a trial of the issues framed by the complaint and the amended answer of the indorser, Mary A. Ruggles, the trial court, sitting without a jury, gave judgment for the plaintiff for the principal sum, interest, and costs. From that judgment the defendant Mary A. Ruggles appeals.

The fact of the making of the note, dated August 14, 1922, and the signature of Mrs. Ruggles as accommodation indorser are undisputed. The appellant, however, contends (1) that there was no consideration for the note; (2) that there was no consideration for the indorsement; and (3) that the execution and delivery of the note by defendant Allen and the indorsement of Mrs. Ruggles were obtained by duress.

[1-3] At the trial the evidence disclosed that Mrs. Ruggles had advanced to Allen about $25,000 to be used in real estate transactions, and that Allen had been indebted for some time to plaintiff, Bridge, in the sum of $4,000, to cover which the note in question was given. Any question as to the sufficiency of the consideration for the note and for Mrs. Ruggles' signature as accommodation indorser may be dismissed at once, as the pre-existing debt was sufficient consideration for the note (Civ. Code, § 3106); and an extension of time or forbearance to sue was also a sufficient consideration. Whelan v. Swain, 132 Cal. 389, 64 P. 560; Mahana v. Van Alstyne, 179 Cal. 725, 178 P. 853. The court found on sufficient evidence that the plaintiff was a holder for value, and under the provisions of section 3110 of the Civil Code an accommodation indorser is liable to such a holder as an indorser.

In her answer the defendant Ruggles alleged that on the 11th day of August, 1922, Allen called upon her and told her that plaintiff had procured the issuance of a citation for him to appear before the warrant and bond department of the district attorney's office to show cause why a warrant should not be issued for his arrest on a criminal charge; that if said warrant was issued it would immediately stop all his work in the matter of subdividing and improving the properties he had purchased with moneys loaned by Mrs. Ruggles, and that there would be a complete and irretrievable loss of the moneys so expended unless he executed and delivered a note indorsed by Mrs. Ruggles to said Bridge forthwith to prevent him from carrying out his threat to have him arrested; that said Bridge would grant no further time to pay the indebtedness; that the plaintiff knew that Mrs. Ruggles had advanced a large sum of money to Allen for the above purposes; that by reason of said threats communicated to her by said Allen and by reason of the fear and oppression thereby engendered, and her belief that the arrest of Allen would cause her great and irreparable financial loss, she was deprived of the free exercise of her will; and that by reason of the duress, compulsion, intimidation, and coercion to which she was so subjected, and not otherwise, she indorsed said note.

The court ordered judgment for the plaintiff and later made its findings of fact and conclusions of law resolving the disputed questions of fact in favor of the plaintiff. Therein the court found and decided that Allen did not sign the note, nor did Mrs. Ruggles indorse the same as the result of duress or compulsion. It is not contended that the evidence was insufficient to support the findings, but it is insisted that the court committed prejudicial error in two instances: First, it is urged that such error was committed in granting the motion to strike out the testimony of Mrs. Ruggles and Mrs. Louise Thomas relating to a conversation between Mrs. Ruggles and Allen two or three days before the note was signed and indorsed. This conversation took place at the home of Mrs. Ruggles, not, however, in the presence of the plaintiff. Concerning it Mrs. Ruggles testified as follows:

"Mr. Allen came to my home in the morning, and he said, 'Well, I fear trouble this morning. He (Mr. Bridge) has a citation out for my arrest, and unless I satisfy him in some way, by having you sign a note for me, why, he is going to throw me in jail;' and I said, 'Oh, he will never think of doing a thing like that, Mr. Allen;' and he said, 'Yes; he would do it; that is just what he is going to do;' and he said, 'If I am in jail, why I can't do anything in real estate.' I said, 'That is quite true, Mr. Allen;' and he said, 'Then, we are all going to lose—you are going to lose all the money you put in there;' and he walked around the room in a terrible state of mind, and he had me very much worked up; and I said, 'My goodness, you must try to do something about it, Mr. Allen;' and he said, 'No; he won't let me off; I have to have that note signed by you;' and then he said, 'If you will come down with me and sign that note;' and I said, 'Why, yes, I will go down.'

"Q. Did Mr. Allen at that time say anything to you regarding the conversation he had with Mr. Bridge prior to going to your house? A. Yes; * * * he said that he had a talk with Mr. Bridge, and Mr. Bridge wanted me to sign that note, or he would have him arrested.

"Q. Did he say whether or not if Mr. Bridge knew that he was going up to your house? A. He said Mr. Bridge knew he was coming up.

"Q. What did he say about it? A. Well, he wanted—he was talking to me about going back there and signing that note for him.

"Q. Did you believe those statements made to you by Mr. Allen? A. Why, I certainly did."

[4, 5] The testimony of Mrs. Thomas, by deposition, corroborated that of Mrs. Ruggles. The testimony of both was received in evidence, subject to a motion to strike it out. Before the close of the trial the court granted the plaintiff's motion to strike it from the record. The plaintiff, as a witness in his own behalf, denied that he had ever threatened the arrest of Allen, and denied that he had made the statements attributed to him by Allen concerning the alleged threatened arrest. It is the plaintiff's position that the evidence of Mrs. Ruggles and Mrs. Thomas was properly stricken as hearsay. It is the contention of the defendant Ruggles that, as said evidence was offered not for the purpose of proving the truth or falsity of the statements of Allen to her, but for the purpose of proving her state of mind at the time she indorsed the note, it was competent as proof for the latter purpose.

It is a well settled exception to the hearsay rule that, when the belief, feeling, and mental state of a person at a particular time is material to the issue, evidence of such person's declarations indicative of his then mental state are admissible, and it is immaterial whether or not such declarations were made in the presence of the adverse party or what the character of the litigation may be so long as evidence of such state of mind is material to the issue. Adkins v. Brett, 184 Cal. 252, pp. 255, 256, 193 P. 251; Estate of Carson, 184 Cal. 437, 445, 194 P. 5, 17 A. L. R. 239; Kyle v. Craig, 125 Cal. 107, 57 P. 791; 3 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1790. See 10 Cal. Jur. pp. 1073, 1074. Such evidence is admissible, not to prove the truth of the statements made, for which it is incompetent, but for the purpose of supporting the issue to which proof of state of mind is material. Adkins v. Brett, supra; 10 Cal. Jur. p. 1078 et seq. It becomes, then, of vital importance to determine whether proof of the state of mind of Mrs. Ruggles was relevant to any issue presented. The issue to which it is claimed to be competent is that of duress. In this connection it is alleged that:

The "plaintiff procured the said alleged note to be executed and delivered by the defendant L. D. Allen and indorsed by this defendant Mrs. Ruggles by duress."

Section 1569 of the Civil Code defines "duress" as (1) the unlawful confinement of the persons mentioned in the first subdivision of the section, (2) the unlawful detention of the property of any such person, and (3) the "confinement of such person, lawful in form, but fraudulently obtained, or fraudulently made unjustly harrassing or oppressive." It is readily perceived that the allegations of the answer do not bring the issue within the scope of duress as thus defined, for the reason that none of the acts of which duress is there declared to consist are alleged. Nor did the proof received or afforded tender an issue of duress as thus defined. Nor did Allen or Mrs. Ruggles come within the classes mentioned in the section. If the facts alleged might be said more appropriately to justify the charge of "menace," we find that term defined in section 1570 of the Civil Code, and the defendant Ruggles has not presented an issue either by pleading or proof coming within that definition. Under that section "menace" consists, among other things not material here, of a threat of "injury to the character of" the persons mentioned in the section defining duress. Although neither the defendant Allen nor the defendant Ruggles comes within the literal classification of the persons so defined, it is well settled generally that a threat of arrest on a criminal charge in aid of the collection of a debt constitutes menace. In criminal law it is extortion and amounts to a felony. Pen. Code, § 518-520. On the civil side it warrants rescission and may be set up in defense in an action on debt, and the defense is available, even though the person threatened be subject to a criminal charge, as a threat of arrest is a gross perversion and abuse of criminal process, and no court will permit it to be used to enforce a settlement of a civil claim. Morrill v. Nightingale, 93 Cal. 452, 28 P. 1068, 27 Am. St. Rep. 207; 6 Cal. Jur. 67.

But the alleged threat of arrest in the present case was directed not to Mrs. Ruggles, but to Allen. Notwithstanding the default of Allen and the consequent waiver by him of the defense of menace, and assuming that it would be competent for Mrs. Ruggles to allege and prove as a complete defense as to herself that the threatened arrest of Allen had rendered the note void, we are unable to see how proof of her state of mind at the time of the indorsement would be competent to prove menace practiced on Allen. Mrs. Ruggles was not threatened with arrest, and the evidence excluded was offered to prove her state of mind and not the state of mind of Allen, who was alleged to have been threatened. As before stated the court found on sufficient evidentiary proof that Allen was not so threatened. The cases relied on by appellant proceed on the proposition that it is competent to show a state of mind of the person on whom duress, menace, undue influence, etc., are alleged to have been practiced to prove the effect on such person of the action threatened or accomplished, but no authority has been cited holding that the state of mind of another person, against whom no threat of arrest is made, is relevant to the issue. We therefore conclude, on the record presented, that proof of the state of mind of Mrs. Ruggles was incompetent evidence on the issue tendered, and that no error was committed in excluding the same.

[6] The witness Sheridan, a deputy in the office of the warrant and bond department of the district attorney's office, produced from his office records a copy of a document dated at San Francisco, August 3, 1922, addressed to L. D. Allen, signed "Sol. N. Sheridan," and reading, in part, as follows:

"Kindly call at this office on the 7th day of August, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m., relative to a complaint which has been made against you by H. S. Bridge."

The plaintiff denied that he had lodged the complaint. At the time of the trial in February, 1925, Sheridan testified that he did not remember that the plaintiff had called at his office in August, 1922, to request this citation, and Allen testified that the citation had never been served upon him. This document was received in evidence, but there was no showing that it had ever been issued. For the purpose of proving that the plaintiff had applied for the citation, the appellant sought to show that it was the custom of the warrant and bond department to insert in the citation the name of the person who applied for the same. The court excluded evidence of the alleged custom, and this is the second specification of error. The document and the proof of the alleged custom were offered for the purpose of impeaching the testimony of the plaintiff. If it was intended to prove that the document was made out in his presence and at his direction, no foundation for its introduction was laid as required by section 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Furthermore, no satisfactory reason has been advanced in support of proof of a custom in the district attorney's office which would serve as a substitute for proof of what was actually done at the time in question, in this particular case in order that the plaintiff be bound.

We find no error in the record. The findings of the trial court, which we do not feel at liberty to disturb, resolve the controverted questions of fact in favor of the plaintiff. The judgment must therefore be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

CONTOS v. MANETAS et al. (Civ. 6033.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 18, 1927.

Appeal and error §776—Where principals filed dismissals of appeal and deposited money to cover judgment against them and surety, appeal was dismissed, notwithstanding surety's opposition.

In action upon laborer's lien where principals filed dismissals of appeal and deposited money to cover judgment against them and surety, and plaintiff's counsel stipulated that the amount deposited would be accepted in full settlement, appeal was dismissed, notwithstanding surety opposed the dismissal, since the surety could not be prejudiced.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Caba-niss, Judge.

Action by James Contos against Theodore Manetas, the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. All defendants filed dismissals of the appeal, except defendant Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, which opposes dismissal. Appeal dismissed.

Melvin, Dingley & Stevick, Melvin & Dingley, and Melvin & Sullivan, all of San Francisco, for appellant Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland.

L. L. James, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant Theodore Manetas.

Joseph Edward Connolly, of San Francisco, for appellants J. Wilmshurst, Theodore Manetas, and Wilmshurst-Manetas.

Heidelberg & Murasky, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. In this action plaintiff brought suit against defendants on a claim for money due for services performed as a laborer by himself and certain co-laborers who assigned their claims to him, which labor and services were performed for defendants J. Wilmshurst and Theodore Manetas in the construction of a certain highway. The defendant Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, a corporation, was made a party defendant by reason of its having as surety made and executed a bond to secure payment of all claims for labor and materials in and about the construction of such highway. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff and against defendant Theodore Manetas and J. Wilmshurst individually and as copartners and Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, a corporation, and each of such defendants, for the sum of $11,402.20 and costs amounting to $28. From this judgment defendants appealed.

All of the defendants, excepting defendant Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, a corporation, have filed in this court dismissals of the appeal. The dismissal of the appeal is opposed by appellant Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland.

It appears from affidavits on file and which are not disputed that prior to an appeal being taken Henry Heidelberg, attorney of record for plaintiff, agreed with Bradford M. Melvin, attorney of record for defendant Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, that no execution would issue as against the bonding company, and that no bond on appeal would be demanded from defendants and appellants, if a sufficient sum of money was deposited in lieu of such bond in the San Francisco Bank, and that the sum of $11,869, agreed upon as a sufficient amount, belonging to Wilmshurst-Manetas was so deposited.

Appellants Theodore Manetas and J. Wilmshurst individually and as copartners desire the appeal dismissed and the money deposited in lieu of a bond on appeal applied in satisfaction of the judgment, which appears to be sufficient in amount to hold the bonding company free from any liability, but, in the event that there should for any unforeseen cause be a deficiency, counsel for respondent has stipulated here in open court on the argument of this matter to accept such sum in full of all claims and demands of any nature.

It appears, therefore, that appellant Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, a corporation, will not be prejudiced by a dismissal of the appeal, and it is ordered that the same be and it is hereby dismissed.

RIO GRANDE OIL CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUN-TY et al. (Civ. 5882.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 19, 1927.

1. Certiorari ⇨ 28(2)—Superior court did not exceed jurisdiction so as to warrant writ of review, notwithstanding error, if any, in judgment.

Superior court held not to have exceeded jurisdiction in reversing judgment of municipal court so as to authorize issuance of writ of review, notwithstanding error, if any, in its judgment.

2. Appeal and error ⇨ 43—Judgment of superior court reversing judgment of municipal court for defendants in action for $750 for rent on land held appealable.

District Court of Appeal held to have jurisdiction; over appeal from judgment of superior court reversing judgment of municipal court in favor of defendants in action to recover $750 for arrears of rent on leased land.

Proceeding for writ of review by Rio Grande Oil Company against the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles, Hon. K. S. Mahon, Judge of said Court, and others, to annul a judgment of the named court reversing a judgment of the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles. Writ denied.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

CONREY, P. J. [1] In an action brought in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles against Rio Grande Oil Company and others to recover $750 for arrears of rent on leased land, judgment was rendered in favor of defendant company. The plaintiff thereupon appealed to the superior court. That appeal was heard upon a statement of the case, including the evidence received in the municipal court and certain rulings of that court concerning the admissibility of offered evidence. The superior court reversed the judgment. The company now applies to this court for a writ of review, and contends that the superior court exceeded its jurisdiction. The gist of the contention on behalf of petitioner seems to be that the evidence shown in the statement on appeal established without conflict certain facts which entitled petitioner as defendant in the municipal court and as respondent in the superior court to a judgment in its favor; that the superior court, in ignoring this evidence, and in assuming the facts to be contrary thereto, and in its resulting reversal of the municipal court judgment, exceeded the appellate power conferred upon the superior court. Counsel for petitioner insist that the superior court must have assumed certain facts which were contrary to the record and findings of the municipal court, and that the superior court exceeded its jurisdiction, because, as contended, it acted upon something outside of the record or some conclusion or inference improper to be drawn from the record.

We think that the petition is without merit. If the superior court was wrong in its judgment, this was nothing other than an error committed within the exercise of its jurisdiction over the appeal brought before it from the municipal court. Counsel for petitioner refer to Goodall v. Superior Court, 37 Cal. App. 723, 174 P. 924, as the leading case upon the question. In that case, this court annulled an order made in a contempt proceeding. The court there applied the rule that, where the power to make the order depends upon the existence of facts as to which there is no evidence whatever, the question presented is one of law, and subject to review by direct attack on writ of certiorari. This rule has been often applied, especially in proceedings for review of awards made by the Industrial Accident Commission. But those cases also rest upon principles which directly affect the power of the commission. "The findings are not subject to review except in so far as they may have been made without any evidence whatever in support thereof. The review of the findings, even in such cases, is not based on the theory that they are not supported by the evidence and that we are weighing evidence to determine that proposition, but upon the theory that the commission has no jurisdiction to make a finding where there is no evidence to support it." Southern Pac. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 177 Cal. 378, 170 P. 822.

In the case at bar, the superior court may or may not have erred in reversing the municipal court judgment. We are not called upon to determine that question. It suffices that the superior court in rendering its judgment was acting within its jurisdiction, since it was merely exercising its undoubted right to hear and determine the appeal.

[2] So far we have assumed, in accordance with petitioner's allegation, that there is no right of appeal from a superior court judgment rendered on appeal from a municipal court. But we think that the law gives such right of appeal in certain cases, and that the case in question falls within the appealable class. Scott v. Larson (Cal. App.) 255 P. 248.

The petition is denied.

PEOPLE v. GILBERT. (Cr. 1392.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 11, 1927.

1. Criminal law §517(4)—Extrajudicial statements, admissions, or confessions of accused may be admitted after prima facie proof of corpus delicti.

While extrajudicial confessions of accused must be corroborated by proof aliunde of the corpus delicti, extrajudicial statements, admissions, or confessions of accused may be admitted in evidence after prima facie proof of the corpus delicti is made.

2. Criminal law §409, 538(3)—Defendant's extrajudicial statements, admissions, or confessions once admitted may be considered with other evidence in determining whether elements of crime and defendant's connection therewith have been established.

Extrajudicial statements, admissions, or confessions of defendant may be admitted on prima facie proof of corpus delicti, and, after admission, may be considered by jury with all the other evidence in determining whether all of the elements of the crime and defendant's connection therewith have been established beyond reasonable doubt.

3. Criminal law §44—Offense of "attempt to commit crime" must be manifested by acts which would end in commission of attempted crime, but for circumstances independent of defendant's will.

In order to constitute the offense of "attempt to commit crime," there must be acts which would end in the consummation of the attempted crime, but for the intervention of circumstances independent of the will of defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Attempt to Commit Crime.]

4. Criminal law §517(4)—Admitting extrajudicial statement held not error, where elements of offense were prima facie otherwise established.

Admission of evidence of extrajudicial statements in prosecution for attempted burglary held not error, where evidence was sufficient without aid of the extrajudicial statements to establish prima facie the elements of the offense charged.

5. Burglary §41(10) Conviction of attempt to commit burglary held sustained by evidence.

In prosecution for attempt to commit burglary, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Leon E. Gray, Judge.

Harry Gilbert was convicted of attempt to commit burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest S. Leslie, of Oakland, and Frank W. Greely, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel B. Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CASHIN, J. The defendant was charged by an information filed in the superior court of Alameda county with a felony, to wit, an attempt to commit burglary, and was convicted. An appeal was taken from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial; and it is claimed that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict.

The offense was alleged to have been committed at a dwelling house in Berkeley, and the testimony shows that at about 11 o'clock p. m. on October 25, 1926, the occupants of the dwelling, whose bedroom in the second story opened upon a balcony, observed a person who climbed over the balcony and approached the doors which led therefrom into the bedroom. Upon the occupants becoming aroused, the intruder dropped from the balcony to escape. The police were notified, and about 30 minutes after the occurrence the defendant was arrested in the vicinity, and brought to the dwelling, where he was identified by one of the occupants as the person seen upon the balcony. It was a moonlight night, and the identification was based upon the size and build of the person observed, the color of his clothes, and the fact that a gray cap was worn—all of which corresponded with the appearance of the defendant. Subsequently, according to the testimony of another of the occupants of the dwelling, the defendant, who was then in jail, stated to the witness that he was the person seen upon the balcony, and that it was his intention to enter the dwelling for the purpose of obtaining something by the sale of which he might procure food, and this statement was repeated by the defendant in a written confession signed by him. The record sufficiently shows that the statement and confession were freely and voluntarily given without inducement or intimidation, and both were properly admitted in evidence.

Defendant contends that, aside from the statements mentioned, the evidence was insufficient to prove the corpus delicti, and that the verdict is therefore unsupported.

[1, 2] Although no conviction may be had upon the extrajudicial confessions of a defendant, unless such confessions be corroborated by proof aliunde of the corpus delicti, it is held in the following cases that upon prima facie proof of the corpus delicti the extrajudicial statements, admissions or confessions of the accused may be admitted in evidence; and, having been so admitted, may, with other evidence, be considered by the jury in its determination whether or not all the elements of the crime and the defendant's connection therewith have been established beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Selby, 198 Cal. 426, 245 P. 426; People v. Domenighini (Cal. App.) 254 P. 292.

[3, 4] In order to constitute the offense of an attempt to commit a crime, the attempt must be manifested by acts which would end in the consummation of the particular offense, but for the intervention of circumstances independent of the will of the party. People v. Murray, 14 Cal. 159. While mere intention to commit a crime followed by no overt act is not an offense, here the evidence showed an overt act from which, in view of the circumstances, an intention to commit the crime of burglary might reasonably be inferred; and the evidence was sufficient without the aid of the extrajudicial statements to establish prima facie the elements of the offense charged.

[5] The verdict of the jury was fully supported by the evidence, and, no error being shown, the judgment and order are affirmed.

GLENN v. BACON. (Civ. 5520.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 13, 1927.

1. Landlord and tenant ⚡86(1)—Recital demising premises for one year, "with option of four years more," if standing alone, would give right to exercise option to lessee only.

Provision of lease, reciting lease of premises to party of second part for term of one year, "with option of four more years," if standing alone, would give option to renew for additional four years to lessee only.

2. Landlord and tenant ⚡86(1)—Provision that lease shall run at option of the parties for five years held nugatory so far as it attempts to authorize lessor to nullify previous option to renew given lessee.

Recital in lease for one year that "lease shall run at the option of the parties for five years" held nugatory and meaningless in so far as it attempts to confer any rights on lessor to nullify option given lessee in previous clause to renew for further period of four years.

3. Landlord and tenant ⚡37—Any doubt as to meaning of lease must be resolved in favor of lessee (Civ. Code, § 1654).

Under Civ. Code, § 1654, any doubt as to meaning of provisions of lease because of ambiguity or uncertainty must be resolved in favor of lessee and against lessor who prepared lease.

4. Landlord and tenant ⚡86(1)—Lease for one year, to run at option of parties for five years, held not to authorize lessor to terminate it in face of lessee's option to renew.

Lease for one year, "with option of four years more," further providing that "lease shall run at the option of the parties hereto for five years from date hereof, the rental for the first two years and six months shall be $45 per month after which the rental shall be rated in accordance to the conditions of the rents in that community," held to run "four years more" at the option of either lessor or lessee, but did not give lessor the right to terminate it in the face of lessee's election to take the additional term.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by W. W. Glenn against Henry Bacon. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Porter C. Blackburn, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clarence A. Jones, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

COLLIER, Justice pro tem. This is an action in unlawful detainer. On July 2, 1923, appellant and respondent entered into a written contract, drawn by appellant, wherein W. W. Glenn leased to Henry Bacon certain premises in the city of Los Angeles in the following words:

"* * * Said party of the first part do hereby lease, demise and let, unto said party of the second part (certain premises, describing them) for the term of one year, with option of four more years commencing on the 19th day of July, 1923, and ending on the 18th day of July, 1924 (which clause is hereafter referred to as clause 1). * * * (Here follows considerable matter extraneous to the issues presented herein.) It is expressly agreed and understood that the said lease shall run at the option of the parties hereto for five years from date hereof (which clause we shall hereafter refer to as clause 2), the rental for the first two years and six months shall be $45 per month, after which the rental shall be rated in accordance to the conditions of the rents in that community. * * * That said W. W. Glenn agrees after the first year to have constructed in said house a bath tub and fixtures at his own expense. * * * And that, at the expiration of said term * * * the party of the second part (Bacon) will quit and surrender. * * * And if said party of the second part shall hold over the said term * * * such holding shall be construed to be a tenancy only from month to month. * * * " (Italics ours.)

Before the expiration of the first year, Bacon gave Glenn notice that he (Bacon) elected to exercise his option to continue the lease for the period of four years more. On August 15, 1924, Glenn notified Bacon that he (Glenn) would not permit said Bacon to occupy said premises after September 18, 1924, and demanded the possession thereof. On October 30, 1924, Glenn served on Bacon a demand for possession, alleging, among other things, that "your tenancy at said premises has been legally and rightfully terminated heretofore"—evidently referring to said notice of August 13, 1924.

Plaintiff raises two contentions:

(1) That the lease by its terms has expired. Defendant denies the expiration of the lease and contends that it had and has four years to run after July 18, 1924.

(2) During the trial the court overruled plaintiff's objections and permitted evidence to be introduced to show the intentions of the parties at the time of and in the execution of the lease. This action of the court is assigned as error, in that it is claimed that the evidence tended to vary the terms of a written instrument and was not responsive to any issues pleaded.

These are the only points in the case.

The trial court found and adjudged that, by error of the scrivener of the lease, the words, "it is expressly agreed and understood that the said lease shall run at the option of the parties," were used instead of "at the option of the party of the second part," and that it was intended by the lessor and lessee that said option for a further term of four years should, by the terms of the lease, be given to Bacon, and that the plaintiff was entitled to no relief. From said judgment and rulings plaintiff appeals.

[1] Let us first consider clause 1:

"* * * Said party of the first part do hereby lease, demise and let, unto said party of the second part (certain premises, describing them) for the term of one year, with option of four more years commencing on the 19th day of July, 1923, and ending on the 18th day of July, 1924."

Had the lease stopped there no question would have arisen that the option was to be exercised by Bacon only. 35 C. J. 1012, § 130 (2) (a); Sheppard v. Rosenkrans, 109 Wis. 58, 85 N. W. 199, 83 Am. 68 P. 715; Gates v. Investment Co., 88 Wash. 522, 153 P. 322, 324. We quote from the opinion in the Rogers Case, supra:

"Mitchell, the owner in fee of the property in question, entered into an agreement with one Pearce to let the same to Pearce for five years from the 1st of September, 1905, to be used as a drug store and dwelling. The agreement sets out certain terms, and finishes thus: 'And the lessor further agrees with the said lessee that he will at the end of the term of five years give the said lessee the option of a further term of five years and the lessor further agrees that, in case of sale, he will give the said lessee the first option to purchase.' Pearce accepted this, and entered into possession. In July, 1907, Mitchell sold and conveyed the property to the plaintiff; before doing so, however, he offered the land to Pearce, but Pearce refused to buy. Pearce, in August, 1907, assigned all his interest in the agreement to one Smuck; and he, in October, 1908, assigned all his interest in the property to the defendants, who entered and paid rent to the plaintiff until the end of August, 1910. On the last day of August, 1910, the defendants wrote the plaintiff: 'We hereby give you notice that we accept the lease for a further term of five (5) years, as provided in the said lease.' On the 1st September, 1910, the plaintiff demanded possession, which was refused. Action was brought on the 18th October, 1910, and the case came on for argument upon the admitted facts.

"The interpretation and legal effect of the last clause is the crux of the case. I think it clear that what is meant is: (1) That, upon sale by Mitchell, the lessee, Pearce, was to have the first chance to buy—this was done, and nothing turns upon that provision. (2) The lessee was, at the end of the period, to have an option of a renewal of the lease for five years longer. 'Option' is used here, I think, with a somewhat different connotation from that of its previous use—and I read the clause as though it said 'give the said lessee a renewal of this lease for a further term of five years at his option.' It was argued that all that was meant was that the lessee should have an opportunity of making arrangements with the lessor for a new lease for five years, upon terms which would be satisfactory to both; but that, it seems to me, is not what the parties meant. If, then, the clause contained an 'option' for a renewal for five years, it is clear that the lessee had a right to a term of five years, beginning at the end of the previous term, and upon the same terms with the exception of the right to renew." Affirmed in 24 Ont. Law Rep. 486.

Whatever uncertainty there is in the instant case comes from clause 2, which, as we have seen, follows clause 1, but with other matter intervening the two clauses. Clause 2 provides:

"It is expressly agreed and understood that said lease shall run at the option of the parties hereto for five years from date hereof."

The uncertainty occurs from the use of the words "at the option of the parties," which is interpreted by the appellant to mean that the additional term should only become effective upon the joint agreement of Glenn and Bacon. Appellant cites the following language from 35 C. J. 1012:

"It is of course permissible to provide by contract that the lessor shall be given the privilege to extend or renew the lease, in which event he cannot be required to do so."

Unless otherwise limited by contract, the landlord always had and has that right. To so state in the contract gives no additional right to him. This is apparent from the following decisions:

In the case of Gray v. Maier, etc., 2 Cal. App. 653, 84 P. 280, the court was considering a clause that, at the expiration of the lease, the party of the first part (the lessor) should have the privilege of leasing said premises for a further term of one year. The court said, at page 656 (84 P. 281) et seq.:

"A most casual reading of the lease will demonstrate that an error was made in the designation of the parties to whom the option was granted. Reading the lease literally, it sought to confer an optional right upon the first party [the lessor] which she possessed under all circumstances; one needs no optional or other contract right to confer the privilege to grant a lease of his own. In addition, the right 'to lease' by the ordinarily accepted meaning of terms is unto the lessee. The owner or first party grants the lease, lets or demises the leased premises, and it is the second party who leases. These considerations would lead any one examining the lease to see at once that the intention was to grant an optional right to the second party, and that the word 'first' was an error of the scrivener. * * * That an option to lease for another year was the subject of the contract is evident; that to give such option to the first party would be meaningless. To give it effect as a contract, therefore, it would necessarily follow that the intention was to give the option to the party who alone could be affected in his status with relation to the property by such option. 'It is not the practice of courts of justice to divest persons of their estates * * * by a strict interpretation of the language of an instrument, when the sense in which the words were used is apparent from other portions of the instrument, viewed in the light of attending facts. To ascertain the real intention of the parties, we view the whole contract and all of its provisions, together with the relations of the parties toward each other * * * and effect will be given to the intent thus ascertained, however clumsily the instrument may be worded' (Sprague v. Edwards, 48 Cal. 249), 'and will be so read in an action at law, and resort need not be had to a court of equity for reformation.'" (Italics ours.)

Supplementing the language of our own appellate court above quoted is the very apt wording of Owen, J., in Nelson v. Nelson, 168 Wis. 115, 169 N. W. 278:

"The plaintiff contends that from February 10, 1916, to February 10, 1917, defendants were tenants from year to year, under the statute, resulting from a holding over after their term under the lease had expired. The defendants claim that they were holding over under the lease. The character of their possession, as to whether they were tenants holding over under the statute or tenants under the lease is the principal question to be considered. This involves, first, a construction of the marginal clause appearing on the lease in the following words: 'It is further agreed and made a part of this contract that at the option of the party of the first part or the party of the second part this lease can be extended for one (1) year and at the end of each year leased for a period of five years from the date of this lease.' The plaintiff contends that this option is meaningless and void, because it gives the same option to either party and the exercise of the option by one party automatically destroys the option accorded to the other. The word 'option' is defined by lexicographers as the right, power, or liberty of choosing; liberty to elect between alternatives; election; choice; preference. It is apparent that, if the word 'option' is to be accorded its literal meaning, the exercise of the option by either party, either to continue or not to continue the lease for a further period, would nullify the exercise of a contrary option on the part of the other. It is obvious that both parties cannot exercise the option unless they both exercise it in the same way. If the lessee desires to continue the lease, and the lessor desires to discontinue it, both options cannot be exercised. One must give way to the other. This makes it very apparent that the word 'option,' in the marginal clause, was not used by the parties in its literal sense. That clause, manifestly, was inserted for a purpose. To accord to the term 'option' as therein used, its literal meaning would be to construe the acts of the parties in inserting it, as purposeless, and would be an abandonment of all effort to ascertain and to give effect to the intention of the parties.

"It is fundamental that in construing contracts the intention of the parties should be ascertained and enforced. We have little doubt that this marginal note was inserted for the purpose of giving to either party the right or privilege of continuing the lease as therein provided. A provision in a lease according to one or both of the parties a right of continuing the same is not at all unusual. This, it seems clear to us, is the thought that the parties to this lease had in mind, and it was to accomplish this purpose that the clause was inserted. We so construe it." (Italics ours.)

In the instant case we are of the opinion that, to accord to the term "option," as used in clause 2, the meaning as claimed for it by appellant, would be construe the acts of the parties in inserting it as purposeless, and would be an abandonment of all effort to ascertain and to give effect to the intention of the parties.

The case of Stetler v. North Branch Transit Co., 258 Pa. 299, 101 A. 980, is instructive, not only with reference to clause 2, but also to clause 1. In its opinion the court says:

"The lease contemplated the use and improvement of the land as a place of entertainment and amusement for the public, and it contained the following clause: 'It is further agreed and understood that if at the expiration of this lease the party of the second part, its successors and assigns shall desire to re-lease the said premises for a further period of ten years it or they shall have the first privilege of re-leasing the same at the rental and upon the terms herein contained.' The controversy turns upon the construction to be given to the words 'first privilege' in the above clause. Counsel for plaintiff contends the words mean that at the end of the ten-year term the lessee has nothing more than the first right to re-lease the premises for another term, provided the lessor was willing at that time to lease to anyone. * * * But as the court below well says: 'If the plaintiff's theory as to the meaning of the paragraph is to be accepted, it would, so far as the lessee is concerned, become wholly meaningless, and might as well have been omitted.'

"We are not to suppose that the parties intended such a result. An inspection of the clause shows that if the word 'first' had not been used in connection with the word 'privilege', the right of the lessee to a renewal could not be questioned. Did the privilege of renewal then become any the less a privilege by being termed a 'first' privilege? The expression is awkward and perplexing, but we think it is more consistent with the expressed purpose of the lease to hold that the renewal was dependent upon the desire of the lessee, and that the expression of that desire was to give to it the first privilege of re-leasing, that is, priority of privilege over anyone else. The thought was not well expressed, but we feel that the words 'first privilege' in this connection should not be so construed as to nullify a valuable right in the hands of the lessee, which, under the paragraph as a whole, was evidently intended to be created. It was of no possible use to make provision merely that one party should enjoy a certain right, if the other party should consent thereto. The settled rule of construction is, that any uncertainty as to the meaning of a clause in a lease is to be determined in favor of the lessee." (Italics ours.)

See, also, the case of Pause v. City of Atlanta, 98 Ga. 92, 105, 26 S. E. 489, 493, 58 Am. St. Rep. 290, where it is said:

"Nor was it competent upon the part of the leaseholder to prove that she had an option upon the premises for a term of years longer than three, it appearing that the option was not to be exercised at her will alone, but was dependent likewise upon the concurrence of the landlord. Such testimony would be irrelevant, as, under the peculiar terms of the option claimed in the present case, the leaseholder acquired no interest, but only a privilege of making a new contract with her landlord at the termination of her lease, the new contract being dependent upon the consent of the landlord; and this she would have had the right to have done with or without the alleged option." (Italics ours.)

See, also, Winston, etc., Co. v. Union Guano Co., 162 N. C. 87, 77 S. E. 1106.

Mr. Tiffany, in his work on Landlord and Tenant, has this to say:

"An 'option' in the lessee to renew on such terms as may be satisfactory to both parties is obviously nugatory; it giving him merely the right to enter into a new contract with the owner of the reversion, which right he would have had without any such privilege." 2 Tiffany, Landlord and Tenant, 1521. (Italics ours.)

[2] We therefore conclude that clause 2, "that said lease shall run at the option of the parties for five years," is nugatory and "meaningless" in so far as it attempts to confer any rights upon the appellant, Glenn, to nullify the option previously given to respondent, Bacon, in clause 1.

Appellant relies on the case of Gardella v. Greenburg, 242 Mass. 405, 136 N. E. 106, 26 A. L. R. 1411, and which is the sole authority for the quotation from Corpus Juris, also relied upon by appellant and set forth supra. In that case the clause involved was as follows:

"It is agreed that six months' written notice before the termination of this lease shall be given by either of said parties to the other in event that either of said parties desire[s] a renewal of said lease, and failure to give said notice shall be regarded as an intention on the part of the parties failing to give the same, that said lease shall not be renewed."

Construing that clause, the court said:

"A desire to have a lease is not equivalent to a right thereto. Not only is provision made for the manifestation of this wish, but it is declared with equal definiteness that the failure to give notice shall be 'regarded as an intention' that the lease shall not be renewed. The negative intent manifested by failure to give notice is on an equal footing with the desire declared by giving one. One provision is as strong as the other. Construing them together, we think that the true interpretation of the covenant is that it furnished a timely means of information whether the parties were willing to execute another lease on the same terms. There are no words indicating a right in the lessor to bind the lessee beyond the expiration of the term, or to obligate the lessor in like manner. The covenant did not create an absolute and unqualified right in either." (Italics ours.)

Now compare the foregoing with Burgener v. O'Halloran, 111 Misc. Rep. 203, 181 N. Y. S. 235, where the court was construing the following clause in a lease:

"That the said tenant shall notify the said landlord one month before the expiration of the term, if he desires to renew the lease."

The court said:

"The appellants contend that, lacking, as it does, the words 'covenant,' 'grant,' 'option,' 'refusal,' or 'privilege,' the clause in question is a mere statement that the tenant shall notify the landlord 30 days in advance, if he wants to remain in the premises, and they claim that it is elementary law that 'a landlord is not bound to renew a lease without an express covenant to do so,' citing McAdam on Landlord and Tenant (2d Ed.) p. 254. This same authority, however, says that no particular form of words is necessary to constitute a covenant for renewal, and the general rule for the construction of leases is that they must be construed most favorably to the lessee, and this especially when the clause to be construed is claimed to be one destroying or defeating the estate of the lessee. * * * The lease in question is upon a printed form known as the 'Gilsey Form.' It is partly printed and partly typewritten; it contains a number of mutual covenants, some 13 in all, and the words under construction by us appear to have been specially incorporated into the lease, in typewriting, in a blank space between the seventh and eighth paragraphs of the lease in question. The clause immediately follows the covenant on the part of the tenant, wherein he agrees to allow the landlords permission to show the premises to persons wishing to hire or purchase the same, and wherein the tenant further agrees that on or before the 1st of September, 1919, the landlords or their agent shall have the right to put up signs 'To Let' or 'For Sale' upon the property. Then follows the clause under discussion.

"As I look upon this proposition, the pertinent and cardinal questions to be asked here are: What is the meaning of the clause in question? and why was it thus put in the agreement under consideration? If it does not mean that this tenant was to have the option of the renewal of the lease for one year, upon his giving one month's notice, what does it mean, and why was such a clause put into the lease at all? If it is to be given the construction claimed for it by the appellants, then the phraseology is absolutely meaningless. And my deduction is that, taking into consideration the situation of the parties, their relationship to each other, and other outstanding features of this controversy, and applying the well-known canons of construction to contracts of this nature, it clearly can be held that the tenant is given the privilege of a renewal of this lease for one year upon his giving the landlords 30 days' notice. Any other construction would be repugnant to common sense. There are many cases in the books, but none that I can find with the precise phraseology of this case; the decisions of the court, however, as I read them, are to the effect that, whatever ambiguity there may be in the words of the covenant, the intention of the parties absolutely must prevail, and this, even though the intention of the parties is in opposition to the strict letter of the contract, when such intention is clearly ascertained. As courts have said in construing certain of these covenants, more apt language might have been used; but the intent is clear and must prevail. [Citing cases.] * * * The present lease was prepared by the landlords, and was tendered to the tenant, and hence, under all known principles of construction, it must be construed, if its meaning is doubtful, most strongly against the landlords. A clause capable of two different interpretations should be construed in a sense which will have some operation. An instrument should be construed most strongly against the party who drew it, and should be given the meaning he ought reasonably have understood that the person to whom he delivered the instrument should put upon it. [Citing cases.]" (Italics ours.)

We prefer to follow the reasoning of the Burgener Case, particularly with reference to the interpretation of the word "desire." We do not think the Gardella Case is controlling, not only because the language of its clause is so entirely different from that in the instant lease, but because the question of intent in the Gardella lease was clearly defined, as the court in that case said:

"Not only is provision made for the manifestation of this wish, but it is declared with equal definiteness that the failure to give notice shall be 'regarded as an intention' that the lease shall not be renewed. The negative intent manifested by failure to give notice is on an equal footing with the desire declared by giving one." ([242 Mass. 407] page 106.)

At this point it may also be well to consider the whole sentence in which clause 2 occurs. It is worded as follows:

"It is expressly agreed and understood that the said lease shall run at the option of the parties hereto for five years from the date hereof, the rental for the first two years and six months shall be $45 per month, after which the rental shall be rated in accordance to the condition of the rents in that community, if rents are advanced in said community then rents on said building shall be advanced, if lower, then the rents on said building shall be diminished; all of which shall be decided between the parties hereto."

It might seem that the final phrase, "all of which shall be decided between the parties hereto," would tend to support the previous phrase, "it is expressly agreed and understood that said lease shall run at the option of the parties hereto for five years from date hereof," but we think not. On the contrary, we are of the opinion that said final phrase refers only to fixing the rental rate—that is to say, whether it was to be raised or lowered or remain the same. It may further be argued that, if the parties could not agree upon the rental rate for the last 2½ years, the lease would terminate. This is not true, and has been so decided in various cases where the fixing of the rental rates has been left to the parties or to arbitrators or to appraisers. It has been held that such an appraisal provision is neither indefinite nor uncertain. See Nakdimen v. Atkinson, etc., Co., 149 Ark. 448, 450, 233 S. W. 694, 697, where the court was considering the following clause:

"It is mutually agreed that at the expiration of said period of ten years, the rental to be paid by the party of the first part to the party of the second part for the concession and privilege herein granted, as herein set out, shall be fixed by a board of arbitrators, three in number, one to be named by each of the parties hereto, and the third to be selected by the two so named by the parties hereto, and that the award of any two of said arbitrators shall be final and conclusive upon the parties hereto."

The court said:

"In the present case the essence of the contract was the renewal of the lease for another term of ten years, and the fixing of the rental for that period was merely ancillary to the main contract. Where the provision for an appraisal is incidental and subsidiary to the substantive part of the agreement, the party refusing to name an appraiser or arbitrator cannot be heard to complain where the court performs or provides for the performance of such service. The court in fixing the reasonable rental value treats the method as a matter of form rather than substance. So it may be said in the present case that the clause of the contract providing for a board of arbitrators to fix the rental value of the premises does not render the contract void as being too indefinite to be enforceable."

In the case of United Woolen Mills Co. v. Honaker, 96 W. Va. 166, 122 S. E. 440, the court had before it the following clause:

"It is agreed between the parties hereto that at any time not less than six months nor more than nine months before the expiration of this lease, the parties hereto, if the above premises are then for lease, enter into an agreement for an extension or renewal of this lease for another five (5) years' term and the lessee shall have the privilege of extending or renewing the same provided it is willing to pay the same rental therefor as offered by any other responsible person, firm, or corporation in good faith."

In its opinion the court uses the following language:

"Volume 2, Underhill, Landlord and Tenant, § 805, treats the matter thus: 'The expression, "what responsible parties will agree to give," when applied to renting business property, means its highest rental value.' We find that the author of this text based the above language on the case of Arnot v. Alexander, 44 Mo. 25, 100 Am. Dec. 252, and, while that decision seems to be practically the sole support of the text-book expressions on the proposition (see 24 Cyc. p. 992), we are so favorably impressed by its logic and reasoning that we are perfectly willing to adopt its principles, so far as they are applicable. The renewal clause involved there read as follows: 'If this lease shall not be terminated by forfeiture, or any other cause, before the expiration of the five years, then said lessee or his legal assigns shall be entitled to a renewal of the same for five years longer, provided said parties can agree upon terms, or that said lessee is willing to give as much as any other responsible party will agree to give.'"

"The suit was, as here, to compel specific performance of the renewal covenant. The chief defense was that the covenant was too uncertain and indefinite to constitute the basis of a specific performance decree, but the court held: 'Equity will hear evidence, fix amount of rent, and decree specific performance, or hold the covenantor liable in damages for the breach of his covenant to renew a lease, providing that the amount of rent for the renewal is to be ascertained by what responsible parties would agree to pay for the use of the premises, as that fixes the rent with as much certainty as though it were to be determined by appraisers, and only means the highest market value of the premises at the time of renewal or valuation.'"

* * * There is a principle of long standing that equity will not compel parties specifically to perform an agreement to submit to arbitration, but, in these renewal cases, Jones, Landlord and Tenant, § 346, says: 'However, there seems to be a doctrine, in the later cases, that equity will, to prevent a failure of justice, apply its own remedies, and thus, where the substantial terms of a contract are agreed upon, arrive approximately at the minor details and then specifically enforce the contract. In the case of a covenant of this kind, it is obvious that it is not of the essence of the contract that the valuation should be made by appraisers rather than by a court of equity.' And so, in this case, it does not seem to us that it is material whether the rental value of the premises be fixed by the offers of third parties or by the court. See accord on this general proposition, 24 Cyc. p. 1006. The only phase of the renewal lease not made certain by the express terms of the original contract can thus be rendered certain in a manner not abhorrent to the agreement of the parties."

Many phases of this question have been passed upon by the courts. In the two cases cited, and in the following decisions, there was a failure to agree in some respect and the courts stepped in, took evidence and fixed the rental rates. We have classified the cases as follows:

Where one party refused to arbitrate. Atkinson, etc., Co. v. Nakdimen, 157 Ark. 403, 248 S. W. 561; Strohmaier v. Zeppenfeld, 3 Mo. App. 429; North Coast, etc., Co. v. Kraft Co., 63 Wash. 250, 115 P. 97. Where the arbitrators failed to agree and also failed to appoint a third person. Tobey Furniture Co. v. Rowe, 18 Ill. App. 293; Grosvenor v. Flint, 20 R. I. 21, 37 A. 304; Lehigh, etc., Co. v. Andrus, 91 N. J. Eq. 225, 109 A. 746. Where the parties failed to agree on arbitrators. 1 Paige, 412. Where the arbitrators failed to agree on the rental rate or value of the property upon which the rental rate was to be based. Van Beuren v. Wotherspoon, 12 App. Div. 421, 42 N. Y. S. 404; Lehigh, etc., Co. v. Andrus, 92 N. J. Eq. 238, 112 A. 307; Kaufmann v. Liggett, 209 Pa. 87, 58 A. 129, 67 L. R. A. 353, 103 Am. St. Rep. 988. Where the appraisers disagreed and failed to appoint a third. Springer v. Borden, 210 Ill. 518, 71 N. E. 345. Where one appraiser died. Weir v. Barker, 104 App. Div. 112, 93 N. Y. S. 732. Where the appraisers failed to agree and one party refused to appoint new appraisers. Lowe v. Brown, 22 Ohio St. 463.

[3] Furthermore, if there be any doubt about the meaning of the two clauses in the instant case—if there be any ambiguity or uncertainty—that ambiguity or uncertainty must be resolved in favor of the lessee; the lessor being the scrivener. Section 1654, Civ. Code. This rule has long been enforced in grants and leases. One of the earliest pronouncements is contained in Dann v. Spurrier, 3 Bos. & Pull. 403, 127 Eng. Rep. 220:

"Much is to be found in the books relative to the construction of deeds which contain covenants in the alternative; from all of which the rule appears to be perfectly clear, that if a doubt arise as to the construction of a lease between lessor and lessee, the lease must be construed most beneficially for the latter." (Italics ours.)

This rule was followed by our appellate court, and concurred in by the Supreme Court, in Butt v. Maier, etc., Brewery, 6 Cal. App. 581, 92 P. 652. The court was there construing the following clause in a lease:

"At the expiration of this lease the said second party shall have the prior right to lease the same, said premises, for a further term of five years, for the rental sum of $3,000 for the full term, payable at the rate of $50 per month on the first of each and every month of said term. Provided, however, that if the said second party shall avail itself of that privilege, that then and in that event, the said first party shall not be required to pay for any improvements at the end of said second term of five years, but that then, at the option of said first party, the said premises shall be surrendered to her with all improvements thereon."

With reference thereto, the court said:

"The word 'prior,' as used in clause 2, does not qualify the right of renewal. The right given the lessee to lease for a further term of five years must necessarily be prior to the right of other parties to lease the property. As we construe the lease, it was optional with the lessee whether it made any improvements or erected any buildings upon the leased premises, or elected to renew the lease for a further term. If it erected buildings and the lessor exercised its option to demand the surrender of the leased property and offered to pay the value of such buildings, it was optional with the lessee to assent thereto, thus waiving its right to renewal, but there was no legal obligation so to do. Thus construed, there is no ambiguity in the provisions of the lease. If, however, it be conceded that the lease is conflicting in its terms, or uncertain in meaning, then under the provisions of section 1654, Civil Code, it 'should be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist.' 'The promisor is presumed to be such party.' In this case, the lessor is the promisor. [Citing cases.]" (Italics ours.)

Hence, any "conflicting terms" in the instant lease should be construed most strongly against Glenn, the appellant. As the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has well said, in Kaufmann v. Liggett, 209 Pa. 87, 97, 58 A. 129, 132 (67 L. R. A. 353, 103 Am. St. Rep. 988):

"As a general rule, in construing provisions of a lease relating to renewals, where there is any uncertainty, the tenant is favored, and not the landlord, because the latter having the power of stipulating in his own favor, has neglected to do so, and also upon the principle that every man's grant is to be taken most strongly against himself."

To the same effect, see Fergen v. Lyons, 162 Wis. 131, 155 N. W. 935, 937; Gates v. Hutchinson, etc., Co., 88 Wash. 522, 153 P. 322, 324; Burgener v. O'Halloran, supra.

[4] Therefore, viewing the lease in the instant case from its four corners, and resolving all conflicting terms, ambiguities, and uncertainties in favor of the lessee, Bacon, we are of the opinion that said lease by its terms was to run for "four years more," or "five years," as it has been differently phrased, at the option of either Bacon or Glenn; that is to say, either of them had the option to continue the lease in effect for four years after July 18, 1924. The lease does not, in any view of it, give to the appellant Glenn the right to terminate it in the face of Bacon's election to take the additional term.

This being so, it remains unnecessary to consider the rulings of the court in the admission of evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

We concur: WORKS, P. J.; CRAIG, J.

SPERRY FLOUR CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.
(Civ. 5992.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 21, 1927.

Master and servant — 417(9)—Award on evidence showing claimant was not dependent, may be set aside and matter remanded for adjudication of rights of other dependents (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 67c).

Where evidence showed that claimant was not dependent on deceased employee, award could be set aside and matter remanded to Industrial Accident Commission in order that testimony might be had showing dependency in other members of family, which was overlooked at time of hearing, under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 876) § 67c, so that rights of all dependents could be adjudicated in one award.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by E. M. Joseph for the death of E. A. Joseph, his son, claimant, opposed by the Sperry Flour Company, employer. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded claimant compensation, and the employer brings certiorari. Award annulled.

R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. It appears therefrom that one E. A. Joseph was on September 18, 1926, in the employ of petitioner, Sperry Flour Company, and on that date he came to his death by reason of an industrial injury due to his having been overcome with poisonous fumes while fumigating a warehouse. Thereafter E. M. Joseph, father of the employee, filed an application for adjustment of claim with the Industrial Accident Commission, and subsequently upon a hearing the applicant's testimony was taken, which is the only testimony in the case. It showed that, at the time of the death of his son, applicant had his own home in Sacramento, while the son was living in Oakland and working for the Sperry Flour Company in that city. Residing with the father were the mother and two other children, a grown son, 23 years of age, a minor son aged 9, and a grandfather. The father was earning $225 per month. He owned his own home and was fully able to support his wife and minor son. The oldest son was working and living with the father, and he contributed to the family about $30 per month. The testimony of the applicant further showed that the deceased employee gave the father from $40 to $50 a month in cash; that this payment was made to the father partly in recompense for obligations that the father had assumed for the son; that the father used the money so obtained indiscriminately, at times depositing it in the bank and at other times settling bills with the same; that previously when the son was living at home he paid from $30 to $35 a month, which sum nearly equaled his board. It also appeared that at times the son paid a larger amount, which was applied on the debt to the father. Under these facts, the commission found that the applicant was partially dependent for support upon the deceased employee; that the annual amount devoted for such purpose was $120, entitling the claimant to a death benefit of $1,260, payable in weekly installments of $17.81, based on a wage of $125 a month; that claimant was also entitled to an award for $150 burial expenses, payable to himself. Accordingly an award was made in favor of applicant in the total sum of $1,410. Petitioners asked for a rehearing upon the ground that the evidence did not justify the findings of fact, and that the finding did not support the award. It was claimed, in support of the application before the commission, that the payments by the son to the father were not contributions for support, but were, on the contrary, payments for his own board over weekends and holidays, and upon an indebtedness under a special agreement with the father. The petition for a rehearing was denied. The same argument is here advanced in support of this petition. We are cited to cases to the effect that payment of money to repay an old obligation and for actual support are not contributions to a parent for his support. See Federal Mutual Liability Ins. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 186 Cal. 517, 199 P. 796; Great Western Power Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 191 Cal. 724, 218 P. 1009; 27 Cal. Jur. 543.

Respondents contend that there is evidence in the record to show that at least a portion of the sums advanced by the son to the father were used by the latter in obtaining the necessities of life. Petitioners contend that, even assuming this to be true, nevertheless it was not such a contribution as was relied upon by the father for necessities, as the evidence conclusively shows that he was not a dependent. Attorney for respondent commission concedes this to be true, and he asks that the award be annulled and that the matter be remanded for further proceedings before the commission under the provisions of section 67c of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 876), in order that testimony may be had showing dependency in other members of the family, a matter that was overlooked at the time of the hearing. The request is made in order that the rights of all dependents may be adjudicated in one award. We are inclined to grant the request.

The award is annulled, and the case is remanded for the purpose indicated.

In re STEIN. (Civ. 3110.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 21, 1927.

1. Infants $\S$ 19—Weight of testimony and credibility of witnesses in proceedings to adjudge minors wards of juvenile court is for juvenile court, not for appellate court.

In proceedings to adjudge minors wards of juvenile court, credibility of witnesses and weight of testimony indicating that home influence and example were inimical to welfare of children is for juvenile court and not for appellate court.

2. Evidence $\S$ 598(1)—Credibility of witnesses having limited opportunity for observing does not lend special weight to their testimony sufficient to overthrow testimony of witness testifying from investigation.

Where opportunities of witness for observing are limited, fact that witness is otherwise credible does not lend special weight to his testimony, so that number of highly credible witnesses testifying on matters of which they have little information cannot be said, by appellate court, to overthrow testimony of one witness who has investigated circumstances and testifies therefrom.

3. Infants $\S$ 19—Judgment of juvenile court, adjudging minors wards thereof and based on sufficient evidence, is conclusive on appeal.

In proceeding to adjudicate minors wards of juvenile court, where there is evidence which if believed by juvenile court is sufficient to sustain judgment, appellate court must accept findings and judgment of lower court as conclusive.

4. Infants $\S$ 19—Error committed by juvenile court in adjudging minors wards thereof is within province of juvenile court on proper application to correct at any time.

Under Juvenile Court Law, providing for application to modify or set aside order of juvenile court at any time before minors adjudged wards of court attain their majority and authorizing court to restore minors to custody of mother if conditions warrant, or to make such other order as may seem just and proper, if error has been made by juvenile court in its estimate of testimony on which it adjudged minors wards of court, such error is within province of juvenile court, on proper application to correct at any time.

5. Infants 19—Change of condition of mother of minors adjudged wards of juvenile court is matter for presentation to juvenile court.

Where minors were adjudged wards of juvenile court, change of condition of mother, who was operating dairy at time of decree, which kept her from home practically all day and prevented her giving minors attention to which they were entitled, is matter for presentation to juvenile court.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Application by Mattie M. Stein to have Lena Epp and others adjudged wards of the juvenile court, opposed by the mother of said minors. Decree for applicant, and the mother appeals. Affirmed.

Jacobs & Jacobs, of Stockton, for appellant.
Edward Van Vranken, Dist. Atty., of Stockton, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. On the 17th day of November, 1925, a petition was filed by Mattie M. Stein, one of the juvenile court officers of the county of San Joaquin, in the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, praying that the above-named minors be adjudged wards of the juvenile court of said county. The petition shows that the oldest of said minors was of the age of 12 years and the youngest of said minors of the age of 5 years. It is further set forth in the petition that the whereabouts of the father of said minors was unknown; that said minors had no parents exercising proper parental care and control, and that said minors were in need of the same; that said minors have been kept and maintained in a bunkhouse unfit for such purposes; that the minors were residents within the county of San Joaquin; and that said minors should be dealt with according to the juvenile law of the state of California. A citation was thereupon issued, and in due time an answer to said petition was filed by the mother of said minors. The matter came on for hearing on the 30th day of November, 1925, and after the taking of the testimony, the further hearing of said matter was continued until the 7th day of December, 1925, upon which day the taking of testimony in said matter was concluded. At the conclusion of the taking of the testimony, the court found therefrom that Lena Epp was a minor of the age of 12 years; Verna Epp, a minor of the age of 10 years; Emma Epp, a minor of the age of 8 years; Alfred Epp, a minor of the age of 5 years, and Walter Epp, a minor of the age of 4 years; that it further appeared to the satisfaction of the court that Alfred Epp was the father of said minors and Frances Epp the mother of said minors; that the whereabouts of the father of said minors was unknown, and that the mother of said minors was a resident of the county of San Joaquin; that it further appeared to the satisfaction of the court that said minors have no parent actually exercising proper parental control and care over them, and that such minors were in need of such control, and that the best interests of said minors would be subserved by their being adjudged wards of the juvenile court. Thereupon the court ordered and adjudged said minors to be the wards of the juvenile court and placed them under the general supervision and control of the probation officer of the county of San Joaquin. It was further ordered that Frances Epp, the mother of said minors, pay to the probation officer of the county of San Joaquin, until the further order of the court, the sum of $15 per month for the maintenance of each of said wards.

Upon this appeal it is contended that the evidence introduced in this cause was insufficient to justify an order or decree adjudging said minors wards of the juvenile court of said county. Neither the sufficiency of the petition nor of the order of the court appears to be questioned upon this proceeding. Our attention is directed simply to matters of fact. While several cases have been cited to the effect that the custody of minors should not be taken from parents upon slight or trivial causes, and that it is a serious thing to interfere with a parent's control, care, custody, and education of his child, there is nothing in any of the cases cited which would lead to the conclusion that the court in this case proceeded without jurisdiction, or that its judgment went beyond the provisions of the Juvenile Court Law (St. 1915, p. 1225). When the record in this cause is sifted and analyzed, we are really presented with an argument that the testimony in this cause should have led the court to an opposite conclusion from that at which it arrived. The appellant has set out in an appendix to her brief all the testimony favorable to the appellant, and at the same time has omitted from her brief all the testimony which would indicate that the judgment of the juvenile court was well founded.

By turning to the testimony set forth in the reporter's transcript we find: That the minors in question were under the observation of the probation officers of the county of San Joaquin for some period of time prior to the actual filing of the petition herein on the 25th day of October, 1925. That the mother of the minors lived in the town of Lodi for a period of time. That she lived for a short period of time just north of the north line of the county of San Joaquin.

and then again moved to the place from which they were taken within the county of San Joaquin. That the minors were left, a good portion of the time, at a place where there was no one present but a man who is supposed to have been a milker. At this place the premises were found to be very filthy and in a dirty condition. That the beds were all in one room. That the children all slept in one room. That a part of the time the man supposed to be a milker slept in the same room. That the appellant herein was asked to better the conditions, and that the appellant wanted the probation officers to take care of the children, but was informed that what was wanted was for the mother to take care of them. That the persons of the children at this time in question were not unclean. After leaving the first residence mentioned Mrs. Epp moved to Lodi with her children and lived there a short period of time. The children were not kept in school regularly, and of this the mother was notified. Thereafter the mother moved with her children to a bunkhouse on what was known as the Noble ranch. This place was found to be in a filthy condition. It appears that it was at this place where the children slept in one room, and the room in which a man supposed to be a milker also slept—one of the little girls stating that she slept in the same bed with the milker. That when the children were taken from this home to the county hospital they were in a filthy and ragged condition and were affected with what is called "scabies." It thus appears that the minors were kept in three different places, all of which were other than fit places for the maintenance of children.

[1] The testimony also shows that the father of the minors was addicted to the excessive use of intoxicating liquor, had disappeared, and his whereabouts was unknown. The testimony further shows that for a number of days all of the minors were lodged in a hay barn at night. There is also testimony in the record indicating that the home influence and example were inimical to the welfare of the children. As it appears in the reporter's transcript, this testimony is not very strong, but its weight was for the juvenile court, and not for us.

[2, 3] As against this testimony which we find in the record there is considerable testimony given by apparently responsible people, which testimony is set out in appellant's brief, indicating that the interposition of the juvenile court in behalf of said minors was unnecessary. The juvenile court had before it all of the witnesses. It was the duty of the juvenile court to give to the testimony of each witness the credibility and weight to which it might be considered entitled. The opportunity of the witness to observe and learn the conditions and all the circumstances under which the minors were being maintained were the really important facts or matters to be considered by the juvenile court, as well as the credibility of the witnesses, in coming to a conclusion. Where the opportunities of a witness for observing are limited, the fact that the witness is otherwise credible does not lend special weight to his testimony. In other words, the testimony of a number of highly respectable witnesses concerning matters of which they have but little information cannot be said by an appellate court to overthrow and destroy the testimony of only one witness who has investigated the circumstances and testifies therefrom. Judged by mere numbers of witnesses testifying, the order of the juvenile court should be reversed. But where there is sufficient evidence set forth in the transcript which, if believed by the juvenile court, is sufficient to sustain the judgment, this court, on appeal, must accept the findings and judgment of the lower court as conclusive.

[4] Under the provisions of the Juvenile Court Law application for a modification or setting aside of the orders of the juvenile court may be made at any time before the minors attain their majority, and under the provisions of the Juvenile Court Law the court below, upon application, should the conditions so warrant, might restore any and all of the minors herein referred to to the custody of the mother, or make such other or further order concerning their custody or the amount of money which should be contributed by the mother for their maintenance as may seem just and proper. This method of procedure being open to the appellant in this cause, if error has been made by the lower court in its estimate of the testimony upon which it acted, it is an error which is within the province of the juvenile court, upon proper application, to correct at any time.

[5] It may be here stated that the record in this cause shows that the mother was, at the time of the hearing hereof, engaged in conducting a dairy, which kept her away from the home practically all of the time every day, and doubtless tended in considerable measure to prevent her giving the minors in question the care and attention to which they were entitled, and it may be that these conditions are entirely changed at this time. This, again, is a matter for presentation to the juvenile court.

No legal reason appearing why this court should interfere therewith, the judgment of the juvenile court is affirmed.

HALEY et ux. v. BLOMQUIST et ux.*
(Civ. 5519.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 3, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 1, 1927.

1. Auctions and auctioneers ⇨7—Party to faked auction sale on sham bid will be given no relief.

Public policy forbids making of faked auction sale on sham bid, and the courts will give no relief to a party to such a sale.

2. Auctions and auctioneers ⇨7—Finding that chattel mortgagors were parties to agreement that auction sale to mortgagee should be faked held sustained by evidence.

In action for amount of bid made by mortgagee of chattels at auction sale thereof, evidence held to sustain finding that mortgagors were parties to agreement suggested by auctioneer that mortgagee make a sham bid and become party to a faked sale.

3. Auctions and auctioneers ⇨7—Finding that bid of chattel mortgagee at auction sale was sham held sustained by evidence.

In action for amount of bid made by chattel mortgagee at auction sale of mortgaged chattels, evidence held to sustain finding that bid was sham and made solely for the purpose of protecting the interest of the mortgagors and to prevent sale at inadequate price.

4. Auctions and auctioneers ⇨7—Finding that pretended purchase by chattel mortgagee at auction of chattels was without consideration held sustained by evidence.

In action for amount of bid made by chattel mortgagee at auction sale of chattels, evidence held to sustain finding that sales agreement was signed by mortgagee without consideration.

5. Auctions and auctioneers ⇨7—Buyer at sham auction sale held not estopped to assert fraud.

In action to recover amount of sham bid at faked auction sale, bidder might not be held to pretended sale on the ground that he was estopped to assert the fraud, on the ground that the written sales agreement could not be varied by parol, or on the ground that pretended sellers had not relied on fraudulent character of sale, but only buyer, and that he could not profit by his turpitude, since courts will not enforce a contract contrary to public policy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action for money by I. M. Haley and wife against A. Blomquist and wife. From judgments in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 260 P. 571, 260 P. 572.

Morris Abraham and Charles I. Rosin, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

D. K. Gault and Schweitzer & Hutton, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. Pursuant to stipulation three appeals in suits between the same parties and involving interrelated matters have been herein briefed together. The one which will be the subject of this decision is designated in the complaint as an action for money, in which I. M. Haley and T. E. Haley, husband and wife, are plaintiffs, and A. Blomquist and his wife, Hattie Blomquist, are defendants.

The following statement of facts is intended to suffice in that regard for the decision of all three appeals: On January 31, 1923, A. Blomquist and Hattie Blomquist owned a certain hotel in the city of Los Angeles, known as the St. George. On that day they leased it to Jack Zeller for the period of 10 years, at a rental of $1,150 per month. As a part of the transaction Zeller executed his promissory note for a total rental amounting to $138,000, and as security therefor gave a chattel mortgage on the furniture and lease; he also purchased from the Blomquists the furniture and furnishings of the hotel and gave his promissory note for $24,500, payable in installments of $500 per month. This note was also secured by a chattel mortgage on the furniture and furnishings. Later, Zeller assigned both his interest in the furniture and in the lease to I. M. Haley, the appellant in these cases, who assumed the obligations of his assignor to make the payments above mentioned. Haley paid installments on the furniture only until January, and the rent until May, 1926. On February 11, 1926, appellant held a public auction to sell the furniture and furnishings and lease of the hotel.

At this point the parties disagree as to what took place. Appellants' contention is that Blomquist bid $19,000 at the sale and became the purchaser. Respondent A. Blomquist insists that he permitted the auctioneer to announce him as bidder and purchaser merely to prevent the property being sold too cheaply, and that it was understood between the parties that he was not required to take the property, and was not in fact to be regarded as buying it, and claims that he had no intention of doing so. There is evidence that respondent A. Blomquist first authorized a bid of $17,000; some one else bid $18,000; the auctioneer then importuned Blomquist to bid $19,000, which he refused to do; after that the auctioneer announced that Blomquist had offered $19,000, at the same time stating privately that he need not take the property. However, Blomquist signed the customary certificate of sale. Thereafter, on a number of occasions, Haley demanded of Blomquist and of Hattie Blomquist the payment of the $19,000, after deducting therefrom the amounts then due on the furniture. The Blomquists at all these times refused to comply with the demands. After May, 1926, Haley refused to pay further rent, but continued to occupy the premises. As before stated, the Blomquists did not pay as demanded, nor did they take possession of the hotel. Haley then instituted suit for $19,000, with interest thereon from February 11, 1926, less $8,500, the amount still due on the $24,500 note. This is the purpose of action Civil No. 5519. A judgment of nonsuit was entered as to Hattie Blomquist, and at the end of the trial judgment was rendered for the defendant A. Blomquist.

[1, 2] If the respondents' version of the conversation at the auction is taken to be true, there can be no doubt that fraud was perpetrated in the purported sale to Blomquist. According to the testimony of several witnesses, the auctioneer, Byrens, induced Blomquist to make a sham bid and to become a party to a fake sale. Such a transaction is against public policy, and courts will refuse to give relief to any party thereto. Dealey v. East San Mateo Land Co., 21 Cal. App. 39, 130 P. 1066. But appellants insist that they were not parties to whatever may have been said and agreed between Byrens and Blomquist. Upon this question there is a direct conflict of the evidence. Certain witnesses stated that neither T. E. Haley nor I. M. Haley was present when the matter of Blomquist's bidding was discussed, but Blomquist testified that at the time "two feet away was standing Mr. Haley." In answer to a question by the court, Mrs. Blomquist testified that Haley was present when the conversation in question took place. Another witness, Mrs. Margaret Hutton, also corroborated the Blomquists both as to the arrangement between Byrens and Blomquist and the fact that T. E. Haley was present. Appellants point out that no witness testified that Haley took part in the conversation, and that certain of these witnesses gave other evidence contradictory to that to which reference has been made. These are considerations which might affect the credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony, but which, of course, the trial court alone had a right to take into account.

[3, 4] It is next contended that there is no evidence to support the finding that Blomquist had no intention of buying the property, no evidence to support the finding that Blomquist bid solely for the purpose of protecting the interest of Haley and preventing a sale at an inadequate price, and no evidence to uphold the finding that the agreement was signed by Blomquist without consideration. Blomquist himself testified that he had no intention of purchasing the property. The testimony of witnesses that Byrens, in the presence of Haley, urged Blomquist to bid because Haley "is your tenant; you ought to help him out," to which Blomquist replied, "All right," and that later Byrens stated that Blomquist did not "have to take it; just bid it"; following which Byrens announced that Blomquist had bid $19,000, and the latter finally signed the certificate of sale. This evidence, and more of a similar character, is amply sufficient to justify the second finding to which reference is above made. The same evidence warrants the finding that the agreement was signed by Blomquist without consideration, since the evidence permits the conclusion that the entire transaction was fraudulent.

[5] It is said by appellants that respondents (1) were estopped to assert facts constituting the fraud in this case; (2) that the oral agreement was superseded by the writing which cannot be varied by parol; (3) that appellants have not alleged the fraudulent part of the agreement, and it is only respondents who have sought to rely upon it, and, therefore, that the latter will not be permitted to profit by their own turpitude. Each of these considerations is a false quantity in a case of this character. We are here concerned with a fraud, not against any individual, but against the public. The rule is well stated in Dealey v. East San Mateo Land Co., supra:

"It makes no difference how or when the fact was brought to the attention of the court that the contract sued upon is against public policy. Neither does it matter whether or not one of the parties raises the question of its illegality upon that account, but courts of law and of equity, as the true character of such a contract is disclosed, refuse to permit themselves to be used in settling a controversy arising out of such a contract."

This decision cites many authorities to the effect that the court must sua sponte refuse relief to either party to an agreement which contemplates a fraud upon the public, or which is void as against public policy.

Certain rulings of the trial court upon the introduction of evidence are mentioned by appellants, but no attempt is made to point out any prejudice which may have resulted therefrom. The rulings in question under this head, if considered to be error, become unimportant in view of our decision upon the principal legal issue presented. We find no other points requiring decision, and no error of a substantial character.

The judgment is affirmed.

BLOMQUIST et ux. v. HALEY et ux.★
(Civ. 5518.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 3, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 1, 1927.

1. Pleading $\S$ 129(2)—Answer admitted allegation of complaint as to assignment of lease by failing to deny it.

Answer admitted truth of allegation of complaint that lease was assigned to both of certain persons by failing to deny truth of allegation.

2. Pleading $\S$ 129(1)—Assertion in complaint, unadmitted in answer, and hence admitted, held sufficient to warrant finding of fact asserted.

Where complaint alleged that lease was assigned to both of certain persons and answer failed to deny it, and hence admitted allegation, there was sufficient basis for finding that the lease was so assigned.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 1047(3)—Striking out testimony respecting auction sale, if error, held harmless, where sale was void.

Court's order striking out testimony concerning an auction sale of mortgaged chattels to the mortgagee, if error, held harmless, where the auction sale was void as sham.

4. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 291(17)—Judgment in unlawful detainer, based on failure to pay rent under unexpired lease, need not provide that execution shall not issue for 5 days (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1174).

Judgment for plaintiffs in action of unlawful detainer, based on failure to pay rent under unexpired lease, held not erroneous because it contained no provision that execution should not issue for 5 days after entry of judgment, since Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1174, providing that execution shall not issue for 5 days in such a case, merely regulates time of issuance of execution and not contents of judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action for unlawful detainer brought by I. Blomquist and wife against I. M. Haley and wife. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 260 P. 572.

Morris Abraham and Charles I. Rosin, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

D. K. Gault and Schweitzer & Hutton, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. This action is one of unlawful detainer. It concerns the property and one phase of the transaction mentioned in Haley v. Blomquist (Civil No. 5519) reported in 260 P. 569. The opinion in that case states the principal facts involved in this appeal. The appellants make no denial of respondents' assertion that in the instant case the former failed to make certain payment required by the lease. The principal defense on the merits is that Blomquist purchased the lease, furniture, and furnishings of the hotel in question, and that not having paid Haley the purchase price the latter had a lien, under section 3046 of the Civil Code, for the sale price and had a right to hold the property until the purchase price was paid. In view of our decision in Haley v. Blomquist, supra, this defense is not available.

[1, 2] It is contended that there is no evidence to support the finding that Zeller assigned the lease to the appellants, and that they promised to carry out its terms. The point in this connection is that the written transfer between Zeller and Haley shows that the assignment was made to I. M. Haley, and that T. E. Haley does not appear as a party to it. An inspection of the instrument shows this to be true. However, the complaint contains the allegation that the assignment was made to I. M. Haley and T. E. Haley. The answer fails to deny this assertion, and therefore admits it to be true. This is sufficient basis for the finding that the transfer was so made. 24 Cal. Jur. 952. Any finding otherwise would be outside the issues and erroneous. Welch v. Alcott, 185 Cal. 731, 198 P. 626.

[3] Certain testimony concerning the auction sale was admitted and later was ordered stricken out. The making of this order is assigned as error, but in view of the holding in Haley v. Blomquist, supra, that the sale was void and against public policy, the ruling becomes immaterial.

[4] It appears that the judgment contained no provision that execution should not issue until 5 days after the entry thereof. It is contended that the failure of the court to include such a provision in the judgment was prejudicial error. In that behalf reliance is placed upon section 1174 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under the subdivision entitled "Execution." This provision does not affect the contents of the judgment. It merely regulates the time of issuance of execution after judgment, and the Code provision is sufficient to protect the appellants' rights, regardless of the judgment.

We find no other points requiring our consideration. The judgment is affirmed.

(Civ. 5520.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 3, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 1, 1927.

1. Chattel mortgages §162—Mortgagees held to have right to possession of mortgaged chattels on default in payments, under express term of mortgage.

Chattel mortgagees held right to take possession of mortgaged chattels on failure of mortgagors to make stipulated payments, by the express terms of the mortgage.

2. Pleading §129(1)—Answer admitted allegation of complaint by failing to deny it.

Answer admitted truth of allegation of complaint that lease was assigned to both of certain persons by failing to deny truth of allegation.

3. Pleading §129(1)—Assertion in complaint, undenied in answer, and hence admitted, held sufficient to warrant finding of fact asserted.

Where complaint alleged that lease was assigned to both of certain persons and answer failed to deny it, and hence admitted allegation, there was sufficient basis for finding that lease was so assigned.

4. New trial §165—Order attempting to vacate order granting new trial in general terms held void.

Where order granting new trial was general in terms, it exhausted court's jurisdiction, and subsequent order attempting to vacate order granting new trial was void.

5. Appeal and error §1176(1)—Where order vacating order for new trial was void, but new trial could result only in one way, appellate court might itself direct entry of proper judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 956a, as added by St. 1927, p. 583).

Where trial court's order vacating order granting new trial and directing entry of judgment for lesser sum than original judgment was void, but a new trial could result only in entry of judgment to same effect, District Court of Appeals was not bound to send case back for new trial, but might itself direct entry of proper judgment in court below, under Code Civ. Proc. § 956a, as added by St. 1927, p. 583.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action in claim and delivery brought by A. Blomquist and wife against I. M. Haley and wife. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed with directions.

Morris Abraham and Charles I. Rosin, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

D. K. Gault and Schweitzer & Hutton, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. [1] This appeal is from a judgment against the appellant giving the respondents possession of certain personal property, which is the subject of the suit, and damages for the value of said property. The action is one in claim and delivery in the usual form. It is a companion case to Haley v. Blomquist (No. 5519) 260 P. 569, and Blomquist et al. v. Haley (No. 5518) 260 P. 571. The opinion in the first of the two companion cases just named relates the principal facts referred to in the instant appeal.

It appears that by the terms of the chattel mortgage mentioned in that opinion, on the 1st day of May, 1926, there became due the sum of $500. The defendants and appellants as assignees of the personal property were obligated to make this payment, but refused to do so. The chattel mortgage expressly provides that, if the mortgagor shall fail to make any payment agreed to be made, the mortgagees have the right to take possession of the mortgaged property. Therefore appellants' default gave the respondents the right to claim possession.

Since the auction sale was void as against public policy (Haley v. Blomquist, supra), we need not consider appellants' contentions in reliance upon that transaction.

[2, 3] As in Blomquist v. Haley, supra, the failure of the answer to deny the allegations of the complaint that the lease was assigned to T. E. Haley, as well as I. M. Haley, was an admission of the truth of that statement. With the pleadings in this condition, the finding that Zeller assigned to both appellants was warranted.

[4] At the close of the trial judgment was rendered for plaintiffs and respondents for $25,000, in the event that the property covered by the chattel mortgage should not be restorable to them. There was no justification or basis for a judgment naming this sum. Later, on September 17, 1926, the court granted appellants' motion herein for a new trial; then on September 20, 1926, the respondents having consented to a judgment for $8,999.80, the order granting a new trial was vacated and set aside and the judgment modified in accordance with the stipulation. Respondents insist that the order made on September 17th was based upon an understanding that it should not take effect in the event that respondents consented to a modification of the amount of the judgment. The order is general in its terms and the record contains nothing in support of this assertion. Without doubt, the trial court exhausted its jurisdiction by granting the new trial, and the order made in attempting to vacate that order was void. Holtum v. Greif, 144 Cal. 521, 524, 78 P. 11, and cases there cited; Dorland v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 484, 6 P. 135. No attempt was made to set the order aside upon a proper showing that it had been entered peremptorily or by inadvertence, as was done in Odd Fellows' Savings Bank v. Deuprey, 66 Cal. 168, 4 P. 1173, or to correct it, as in Garoutte v. Haley, 104 Cal. 497, 38 P. 194.

[5] None of the grounds set forth in appellants' motion for new trial have merit except that the judgment rendered was erroneous because for a wrong amount in case the personal property involved was not recoverable. Nevertheless, it clearly appears from the evidence and the pleadings herein that the sum of $8,999.80 was, at the date of the trial, due to plaintiffs from the defendants. It further appears that on September 17, 1926, plaintiffs executed and on September 20, 1926, caused to be filed their written consent to the modification of the judgment in their favor reducing the amount from $25,000 to said sum of $8,999.80, and on September 20, 1926, the court, in the presence of counsel for both parties, set aside its previous judgment and its order granting the motion for a new trial, and modified said judgment in accordance with said consent that day filed. While the order vacating the order granting a new trial was void, still, as we have said, the true amount is that provided by the judgment as modified. We can see no benefit in sending the case back for a new trial which can only result in a judgment in favor of plaintiffs for $8,999.80 as of September 20, 1926. Section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure as added by St. 1927, p. 583 authorizes this court, under such circumstances, to make any order necessary in the interests of justice and to the end that final disposition of the case may be made upon a single appeal. The primary purpose of that section is as stated in its own language, that:

"Wherever possible causes may be finally disposed of by a single appeal and without further proceedings in the trial court."

The principal need for this reform in procedure was apparently regarded to be in cases where it might be necessary to take more evidence and make additional findings; but other instances of similar character occur. Such, we think, is the instant appeal. To care for these, as well as better to effectuate the general purposes of the law, it was enacted that the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeals "may give and direct the entry of any judgment or order, and make such further or other order as the case may require."

The judgment appealed from is reversed. It is directed that the order of the trial court granting a new trial be vacated, that said court enter a new judgment for the plaintiffs that they have possession of all of the furniture, fixtures, and furnishings described in the complaint, and, in the event that said property cannot be restored to plaintiffs upon the return of the writ of the sheriff so stating, then that plaintiffs have judgment against the defendants in the sum of $8,999.80, with interest from September 20, 1926, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, the amount due and unpaid upon the note and chattel mortgage covering said property, and interest, and for their costs.

CORGIAT v. REALTY MORTGAGE CORPORATION OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 5873.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 13, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1008(3)—On appeal from order made on affidavits involving question of fact, conflict must be resolved in favor of prevailing party.

On appeal from order made on affidavits involving the decision of question of fact, court is bound by same rule which controls when oral testimony is presented for review, and, if there is any conflict in affidavits, those in favor of prevailing party must be taken as true, and facts stated therein considered established.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1024(4)—Order setting aside default on conflicting affidavits is conclusive on appeal.

Order setting aside default, made on conflicting affidavits, is conclusive on appeal.

3. Judgment ⇨136—Statute permitting setting aside default judgments is to be liberally construed (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 473, as to setting aside default judgments, are to be liberally construed so as to dispose of cases on their merits and to give party, claiming in good faith to have a substantial defense, opportunity to present it.

4. Appeal and error ⇨957(1)—Judgment ⇨139—Setting aside default judgment is largely within trial court's discretion, which will not be disturbed unless abused.

The question of setting aside default judgment rests almost entirely in trial court's discretion, and appellate court will not interfere unless it clearly appears there has been a plain abuse of discretion.

5. Judgment ⇨163—On application to set aside default, existing doubt will be resolved in favor of application.

On application to set aside default judgment, any doubt which may exist should be resolved in favor of application to end of securing trial upon its merits.

6. Judgment ⇨143(1)—Court held not to have abused its discretion in setting aside default in view of evidence of defense on merits and prompt application for relief.

Court held not to have abused its discretion in setting aside default judgment, where it appears that defendant has defense on merits, application for relief was promptly made, and that default was due to inadvertence and excusable neglect and not through want of due diligence on part of defendant's attorney.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Helen Corgiat against the Realty Mortgage Corporation of California, wherein default judgment against defendant was rendered. From an order vacating and setting aside such judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Richard Liebman, of Oakland, for appellant.

Clifton R. Gordon, A. B. Dunne, and Dunne, Dunne & Cook, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An appeal from an order vacating and setting aside a judgment. The action was brought by appellant against respondent corporation to recover damages for the alleged conversion of certain corporate stock. The summons was served on December 17, 1926, and thereafter a verified answer to the complaint was filed by respondent. A motion to set the cause for trial was regularly made by appellant, and the trial, by stipulation of counsel of record made in open court, was set for February 17, 1927, in department 2 of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, following which a notice of trial was served upon the attorneys of record for respondent. These attorneys failed to appear at the time the cause was heard, and the court entered its judgment in favor of appellant. Thereafter respondent served and filed a notice of motion for an order vacating the judgment upon the grounds that the same had been made and entered through the mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect of the respondent, and after a hearing the motion was granted on February 27, 1927.

The notice of motion, which was accompanied by a substitution of attorneys, referred to the verified answer and the files and records in the case, and was based upon certain affidavits, one being an affidavit of merits, which was served and filed.

Appellant contends that, in view of the facts, the order was an abuse of discretion.

On the date of the entry of judgment, Messrs. McGee and Mather were attorneys of record for respondent; no formal substitution of attorneys being had until the filing of the motion. It appears, however, from the affidavits filed that these attorneys had in fact terminated their connection with the case before the trial, and that Clifton R. Gordon, the attorney who was subsequently substituted as the attorney of record, was acting for respondent before and on the day of the trial. According to the affidavit of the latter, the attorney for appellant was notified on February 11, 1927, that affiant would be engaged on February 14, 1927, in the trial of another action in department 7 of the same court; that at the hour of 10:30 a. m. on the latter date affiant left the courtroom of department 7, where he was engaged, and went to department 2 in order to ascertain the condition of the calendar in that department; that another action was then on trial in the latter department, and, from a conversation with counsel engaged therein, it appeared to affiant that the hearing would occupy the whole of that day; that he returned at 4:40 o'clock p. m., the hour at which the trial in which he was engaged in department 7 ended, and found that the action against respondent had been heard and the judgment entered.

It was shown by the affidavit of the attorney for appellant that the case was called at 10:30 o'clock a. m. on February 14, 1927, was continued until 2 p. m. of that day, and was not reached on the calendar until 3:05 p. m., at which hour the hearing was had and the judgment entered. It further appears from this affidavit that a conversation was had between the attorneys on February 11, 1927, and, according to affiant, Attorney Gordon then requested a continuance, and affiant was not advised that he would be engaged in another department on the day set for the trial of the cause.

[1-3] In the consideration of an appeal from an order made upon affidavits involving the decision of a question of fact, this court is bound by the same rule which controls when oral testimony is presented for review. If there is any conflict in the affidavits those in favor of the prevailing party must be taken as true and the facts stated therein must be considered as established (Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 17, 91 P. 1001), and an order setting aside a default made upon conflicting affidavits is conclusive on appeal (Patterson v. Keeney, 165 Cal. 465, 132 P. 1043, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 232). The provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure are to be liberally construed so as to dispose of cases upon their merits, and to give the party claiming in good faith to have a substantial defense an opportunity to present it. Nicol v. Weldon, 130 Cal. 667, 63 P. 63; Waybright v. Anderson (Cal. Sup.) 253 P. 148. As was said in Mitchell v. California, etc., S. S. Co., 156 Cal. 576, 105 P. 590:

"It is for this reason that we more readily listen to an appeal from an order refusing to set aside a default, than where the motion has been granted, since in such a case a defendant may be deprived of a substantial right, whereas it may be assumed, if nothing to the contrary is shown, that the plaintiff will be able at any time to establish his cause of action. If for any reason he will be unable to do so, that fact should be made to appear; but, if he is merely subjected to delay or inconvenience by having the default set aside, he can be compensated therefor by the terms which the court would impose as a condition to granting the motion."

[4, 5] As the rule is stated in O'Brien v. Leach, 139 Cal. 220, 222, 72 P. 1004, 1005, 96 Am. St. Rep. 105:

"In matters of this sort the proper decision of the case rests almost entirely in the discretion of the court below, and this court will rarely interfere, and never unless it clearly appears that there has been a plain abuse of discretion."

Any doubt that may exist should be resolved in favor of the application to the end of securing a trial upon the merits. Jergins v. Schenck, 162 Cal. 747, 124 P. 426; Savage v. Smith, 170 Cal. 472, 475, 150 P. 353.

[6] In the present case it was not shown that appellant would be unable to establish her cause of action should the default be set aside; and, while it appears that the order subjected her to inconvenience and caused delay, compensation could, and no doubt would, have been allowed as a condition to granting the order had an application therefor been made to the trial court; and it sufficiently appears that respondent has a defense on the merits to the action which is urged in good faith. The application for relief was promptly made, and, from the circumstances shown, the trial court might reasonably have concluded that the attorney for respondent was not wanting in due diligence on the day of the trial, and that the default was due to inadvertence and excusable neglect. In view of the facts, we cannot say that this conclusion was not fairly supported, or that its action in granting the relief sought was an abuse of discretion. The order is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

IN RE BRADLEY'S ESTATE.

GIRARD TRUST CO. et al. v. PACIFIC SOUTHWEST TRUST & SAVINGS BANK et al.

(Civ. 5687.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 18, 1927.

1. Wills $\S$ 449—Will should be construed to effectuate intention to dispose of all property by will.

If, by any fair construction of language used by testator in drafting his will, it appears reasonably certain that he had in mind possibility that after disposition of specific legacies and devises portion of property would remain without testamentary disposition, and that he attempted to provide therefor, will should be construed to make operative such intention irrespective of expression employed by him to effectuate purpose.

2. Wills $\S$ 587(1)—Will disposing of "full one-third" of estate and "remaining full two-thirds of entire estate," containing no residuary clause, did not show intention to provide for distribution of residuum of estate.

Under will directing executors to use full one-third of entire estate for charitable devise and remaining full two-thirds of entire estate for children, containing no formal residuary clause, words "full one-third" and "remaining full two-thirds of entire estate" did not indicate any intention on part of testator to provide for distribution of residuum of estate, but simply indicated testator's intention to deal with different portions of the estate.

3. Wills $\S$ 448—Construction of will rendering it operative, rather than defeating it, will be adopted.

Court will adopt such construction which will render will operative, rather than one which would defeat testamentary disposition.

4. Wills $\S$ 849—Lapsed devise under will, showing no intention to provide for distribution of residuum, went to legal heirs rather than to devisees.

Under will disposing of "full one-third of entire estate" in specific devise, and "remaining full two-thirds of entire estate" to children, but containing no formal residuary clause, and showing no intention to provide for distribution of residuum, lapsed specific devise went to legal heirs of testator as distinguished from legatees and devisees expressly provided for by will.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Petition for the final distribution of the estate of Thomas Bradley, deceased, by the Girard Trust Company and others against the Pacific Southwest Trust & Savings Bank, administrator, and others. Decree for defendants, and petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

Cruickshank, Brooke & Evans, Lloyd W. Brooke, and L. L. Riccardi, all of Pasadena, for appellants.

John Perry Wood, of Los Angeles, and Frank C. Dunham and Raymond G. Thompson, both of Pasadena, for respondent Walter S. McEachern.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal from a judgment or decree of final distribution in the matter of the estate of Thomas Bradley, deceased.

The controversy arises from the admitted fact that as to one-third of the estate of the deceased the direct provisions of the will with reference thereto became inoperative, and, as a consequence therefrom, that as to such portion of the estate the devise thereof was lapsed.

On the part of appellants, it is urged that such lapsed devise became a part of the residuum of the estate, and that the order of the trial court should have contained a direction for distribution of such lapsed devise to the residuary legatee of the will of the deceased. On the other hand, it is the contention of respondents that the will contains no provision for the distribution of the residuum of the estate, and consequently that as to the property covered by the lapsed devise the legal heirs of the testator, as distinguished from the legatees and devisees expressly provided for by the will, were entitled to have distribution made to them as specified in the decree from which the appeal herein is taken. In such circumstances it becomes necessary to consider those portions only of the will of the testator which, as conceded by respective counsel, bear upon the several contentions of the appellants and the respondents.

After directing the payment of debts against the estate and certain specified legacies, the will provided, in substance, that the entire estate of the testator should be held in trust for the payment during the lifetime of the widow of the testator of one-third of the net income of the estate to her, and the remaining two-thirds of such net income to the children of the testator. As suggested by appellants, so far as is here material, the remainder of the will was as follows:

"Upon the decease of my said beloved wife, I order and direct my said executors and trustees to expend and use the full one-third of my entire estate, real, personal, and mixed, whatsoever and wheresoever situate, in the purchase of a sufficient quantity of real estate, conveniently located to the said city of Philadelphia, and in and for the erection thereon of cottages or dwelling houses for the benefit and use of retired and superannuated ministers of the Philadelphia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. * * *

"The remaining full two-thirds of my entire estate, real, personal and mixed, shall be and remain under the control and supervision of my said executors and trustees and the full net income shall be paid to my above named children, or the survivors or survivor of them during the full term of their and each of their natural lives as aforesaid."

It may also be stated that immediately following the provisions of the will to which reference has just been had, the will contained such provisions that as a matter of law no final disposition was directly made of one-third of the estate.

It thus appears that, as such, the will contains no formal residuary clause. Appellants, however, point to the use of the words "the remaining full two-thirds of my entire estate," which, taken in connection with the former phrase, "full one-third of my entire estate," it is claimed indicated an intent on the part of the testator to provide for the disposition by his will of any property of which he was the owner at the time of his death, and of which no disposition had been made by the direct terms of his will. The argument of appellants primarily rests upon the use of the words "remaining," "full," and "entire," and the suggestion is forcefully made that as nearly as possible, without express direction to that effect, the testator thereby indicated an intent to set up a general residuary clause in his will. Attention is also directed by the appellants to certain general rules of construction to the effect that in such matters no particular form of phraseology is required, but that, when from the language employed in the will it clearly appears that the intent of the testator was to provide for the disposition of any residuum in his estate, such intention should be effectuated by appropriate construction. Furthermore, that unless a contrary intent is clearly expressed by the terms of the will, an ineffectual devise will not pass to the heirs at law, but will become a part of the residuum of the estate. But, as frequently occurs, the solution of the question depends not so much on the principles of law which may be applicable in the premises, but rather upon the construction to be placed upon the facts, as disclosed by the language of the will itself.

[1] If by any fair construction of the language used by the testator in the drafting of his will it may appear reasonably certain that he had in mind the possibility that, after the disposition by him of specific legacies and devises, a portion of his property would remain without testamentary disposition, and that an attempt on his part was made by the terms of his will not only to recognize such situation, but as well to appropriately provide therefor, it is undoubtedly the law that such a construction should be placed upon the will as to make operative such intention on the part of the testator, irrespective of the expression employed by him to effectuate his purpose. Returning, therefore, to the determining words of the will, to which reference has been had, it is urged by appellants that the words "remaining," "full," and "entire" show that at the time the will was executed the testator had in mind all his estate remaining after the specific disposition made by him under prior provisions of his will had been satisfied, and that the words "full" and "entire" signify an intent on the part of the testator to establish a general residuary provision in his will. From an examination of the entire will it is apparent that it was prepared by one skilled in, or at least accustomed to, such work. At any rate, if the testator had anticipated the possibility of the existence of a situation such as is here presented, judging from the facility in the use of words, as exhibited throughout the will, to have clearly and unmistakably expressed the wishes of the testator regarding the final disposition of any property not specifically provided for in the will would have been very easy of accomplishment. But considering the language which was employed by the testator, first, in providing for the disposition of a "full one-third" of his estate; and, secondly, of the "remaining full two-thirds thereof," it is only by the greatest strain on the ordinary meaning of the words used by the testator that it may be discerned that the testator had in mind anything relating to a residuum.

Regarding the expression "full," as applied either to the one-third or to the two-thirds portion of the estate, it is clear that anything less than a one-third necessarily would not be a "full one-third"; just as anything more than a "full two-thirds" would represent a different fraction of the estate than would be indicated by the fraction as given. If more than a one-third interest was bequeathed or devised by the provision first mentioned, incontestably the remainder of the estate, instead of being represented by a two-thirds fraction, necessarily would be as much less than two-thirds, as the value of the estate over the "full one-third" thereof was expressed in a one-third thereof as increased by such added amount—from which it follows that the use of the word "full," as applied in the will to the said two fractions, neither adds to nor subtracts from either of such fractions. In other words, a direction simply that one-third of the estate should receive such and such a disposition, and that two-thirds thereof should be disposed of according to a separate disposition, would have carried the identical significance as though (as in the instant will) the word "full" had preceded each of such fractions. While under fitting conditions and circumstances the word "remainder" is considered as appropriate for designating an intention on the part of the testator to recognize the existence, or possible existence, of a residuum in his estate, it must appear that in a given case such word, or some cognate expression, was used by the testator intentionally or advisedly for the express purpose of conveying a thought, if not identical with a residuum, at least approaching such a condition.

[2] In the instant case, it will be noted that the testator, instead of using the word "remainder," as applied to his estate, coupled the word "remaining" with the other words "full two-thirds." It is, of course, obvious that if a "full one-third" of the estate has received testamentary disposition, a "remaining two-thirds," "full" or otherwise, ordinarily would require some sort of treatment at the hands of the testator. In other words, had one-third of the estate been devised or bequeathed, necessarily there would have been a "remaining two-thirds" thereof. As in the use of the word "full," the word "remaining" had no effect upon a designation of the fraction of the estate attempted to be acted upon by testamentary disposition. After providing for the disposition of one-third of the estate, two-thirds thereof would be "remaining," but the expression "remaining full two-thirds" carried with it a meaning no different than would have been expressed by the omission of both the words "remaining" and "full." So far as thus may be perceived, the use of such words was a superfluity. Their omission from the will in the connection in which they were used therein would have produced no effect whatsoever upon the construction thereof. While it is a rule of law that in construing an instrument, so far as possible some meaning must be attached to each word thereof, it is manifest that even by the greatest latitude and by the utmost allowance for inaccuracy of expression, it is impossible to render the word "remaining," as used by the testator, into the word "remainder," so as to indicate an intention on his part to provide for the distribution of the residuum of his estate.

As hereinbefore stated, it is clear that the will was drawn by no novice in that line of work. As is well known, the ordinary language employed in the preparation of a residuary clause in a will usually contains such statement as "all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate." Nowhere in the will in question is any language to be found which approximates in meaning any one of the three words "rest," "residue," or "remainder." While purely in sound, the word "remaining" is a near approach to the word "remainder," considering its use in the will as hereinbefore treated, it is entirely foreign to any legitimate expression indicative of a residuum. It would seem apparent that the intention of the testator was to deal, first, with one fraction of the estate, and latterly with that part thereof which was "remaining," rather than with any "remainder," considered in the sense of a residuum of the estate. In no part of the will is any direct reference made by the testator to any part of his estate which is left without specific testamentary disposition; nor by any reasonable deduction from the language of the will may it be inferred that the testator either believed that he had failed by his will to make disposition of his entire estate, or that he intended to provide for any possible contingency with reference to a failure in that regard. So far as may be ascertained, either from a consideration of the will as a whole, or from any part of it other than the single word "remaining," to which reference has been had, the will is absolutely silent on the subject of "rest, residue, or remainder" of his estate. It should also be remembered that the words to which particular attention has been directed were used, not in an attempt to distribute the fee of the real property, but only in connection with the distribution by trustees of the estate of two-thirds of the net income arising therefrom; and, consequently, that the word "remaining," if it ever could be considered in the sense of a technical "remainder," would have no application to the residue of the estate here under consideration. Viewed from a standpoint of its effect as in any way modifying the word "remaining," the use of the word "entire" is deemed of no significance, nor are we able to perceive that the words "entire estate," as used in the will, had any bearing upon the question as to whether the testator intended to provide for the distribution of the lapsed devise to a residuary legatee.

[3, 4] While this court recognizes the principle that a construction which will render a will operative, rather than one which will defeat testamentary disposition, is favored in law, nevertheless it would appear clear that the word "remaining" as used by the testator, standing alone and substantially unaided by any other sentence, clause, or word in the will, is insufficient to overcome the evident purpose of the testator to refer, in the connection in which the word "remaining" was used, simply to that portion of the estate which was left immediately after one-third thereof had been the subject of his testamentary consideration.

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed; it is so ordered.

CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.
(Civ. 5845.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 19, 1927.

Master and servant  387—Persons superintending construction, though controlled by architect, held "general superintendent," within statutory provision for increased compensation for injury by employer's misconduct (Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 6[b]).

Person having charge and control of men engaged in construction work, though he was subject to the advice and direction of the contractor and architect, held "general superintendent," within Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 834) § 6(b), providing for an increase in compensation in case injury is caused by serious and willful misconduct of the employer, or, if the employer is a corporation, on the part of an executive or managing officer or general superintendent.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, General Superintendent.]

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act by Thomas P. Barnes, claimant, opposed by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, employer, and another. To annul an order of the Industrial Accident Commission, awarding additional compensation for injuries, the employer applies for certiorari. Writ denied.

F. Britton McConnell, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent Commission.

CONREY, P. J. Petitioner was the employer of one Barnes, who claimed compensation for injuries received, arising out of and in the course of his employment. The principal award, which runs against the employer's insurance carrier, is not questioned here. But the claimant was awarded additional compensation against the employer, upon the ground that the injury was caused by reason of serious and willful misconduct of the employer. Petitioner contends that the commission exceeded its jurisdiction in the rendition of said award of additional compensation, and particularly, that the evidence did not justify or support the finding of fact that the employee was injured by reason of serious and willful misconduct of the employer, on the part of an executive, or managing officer, or general superintendent thereof.

Petitioner, as owner, entered into a contract with Nowell, as architect and contractor, for the construction of a church building. Nowell was to receive a fee of 3 per cent. on the cost of the building. He agreed to construct the house, and to supervise the entire work. In the transactions with Nowell, the church was represented by the bishop and by one Jensen, chairman of the finance committee of the church.

If the accident and resulting injury to Barnes were caused by misconduct of any one, the misconduct was that of one Taylor, who occupied a position in relation to the work of such description that, at least, he was foreman in charge of the work in which Barnes was occupied at the time of the accident. Barnes was hired by Taylor. It does not appear whether Taylor's contract of employment came to him through Nowell or through some officer of the church.

The evidence produced before the commission is not here, and is not set out in the petition. For the purpose of deciding upon the application for the writ, we assume that the evidence is as stated by counsel for petitioner, together with the supplemental statements of evidence as contained in the answer presented by counsel for respondent commission.

The provisions of law allowing an increase of compensation, in case of "serious and willful misconduct" of the employer, are directed against such misconduct on the part of "the employer, or his managing representative," etc., "or if a corporation, on the part of an executive or managing officer or general superintendent thereof." Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 834) § 6 (b).

There are, therefore, two propositions upon which petitioner must depend. First, that the evidence is not sufficient to warrant the commission in finding that Taylor was a "general superintendent" of the corporation, within the meaning of those words as found in the statute. Second, if Taylor was such general superintendent, that the evidence is likewise not sufficient to prove that he was guilty of willful and serious misconduct.

The accident was caused by the breaking of a floor board of a scaffold platform on which Barnes was standing. The scaffold was being put up within the building, and was to be used in further progress of the work. Jensen testified that Taylor was foreman in charge of the construction of the scaffold and the direction of the work of Barnes, at the time when the plank broke, and was in charge of the construction as well as the work that was carried on upon the platform. Barnes testified that he was hired by Taylor, under whom he was working at the time of the injury.

"Q. Do you know he was an officer of your employer? A. I don't know, but I don't think so.

"Q. Who was next over him, if you knew? A. The church itself, was the way I take it.

" * * * Q. Do you know whether there was a general superintendent over you? A. Nothing but the architect. * * *

"Q. Do you know from whom Mr. Taylor got instructions about the work? A. From the architect. That is what he told me, at least. That he followed nobody's instructions but the architect's."

It is further shown by the testimony of Jensen that Taylor hired men to work on the job and was actually present on the job and supervising it; that the contract of Nowell was to prepare the plans and supervise the entire construction; and that Nowell was actually superintending as the work progressed.

"Q. Why do you say he was actively superintending the construction of the church? A. As he was responsible to us for the bids and everything that went into the building and construction of it under his entire jurisdiction. * * *

"Q. And he was to represent your committee and the bishop in superintending it? A. Yes.

"Q. Or placing of the— A. Bids."

It is the contention of respondents that the nature of the supervision to be exercised by Nowell as architect was different from the supervision that was to be exercised by Taylor in charge of the actual work of construction and of directing men doing the work of construction.

The difficulty in determining the main issue here arose out of the fact that both Nowell and Taylor were described as persons superintending the work of construction. We think, however, that from the testimony the commission was justified in drawing the inference that the superintendency by Taylor was general in its nature and covered the actual work of construction, and that the superintendency contracted for by Nowell was not of such nature that it excluded such superintendency as was exercised by Taylor or reduced Taylor to the status of a mere foreman bound to obey orders of Nowell. Although Taylor was subject to advice and direction from Nowell, nevertheless Taylor had charge and control of the men engaged in the work. This conclusion is in harmony with certain decisions of the Supreme Court. In E. Clemens Horst Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 184 Cal. 180, 193 P. 105, 16 A. L. R. 611, the claimant for compensation was an employee of the company, of which Horst was president and general manager. Miller was general superintendent of petitioner's ranches. Conrad was superintendent of the particular plant where the claimant was injured. The misconduct which led to the injury was that of Conrad. The question to be determined was whether or not Conrad was "an executive or managing officer," within the meaning of that phrase as used in the statute. The court said at page 190 (193 P. 109):

"It seems clear, therefore, that the Legislature by this section did not use 'officer' in its technical, legal sense as one who has been elected, or whose office is provided for by the articles of incorporation, or the by-laws, but that by an 'executive or managing officer' was meant a person in the corporation's employ, either elected or appointed, who is invested with the general conduct and control at a particular place of the business of a corporation."

In Blue Diamond Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 188 Cal. 403, 205 P. 678, wherein the question at issue related to a liability similar to that sought to be enforced in the present case, one Haines was superintendent of the plant and one Schreiner was manager of production of the company's rock-crushing plant. One Hay was general manager of the corporation. After reviewing the facts of the case, the Supreme Court said:

"In addition to this evidence of an opportunity on the part of the petitioner, through its general manager, to have gained actual knowledge of the unguarded and dangerous condition of its appliances, there is the evidence, ample in character, of the previous knowledge of both Haines and Schreiner, not only of the unguarded condition of the said belt and pulley, but also of the terms of the general safety orders of the commission and of its express and repeated directions given to them, and to each of them, as the executive and managing officers of the former owner with relation to the safeguarding of the belts and pulleys of the plant. It is urged by the petitioner that this knowledge on the part of these persons, so retained in their positions under the petitioner's ownership of the plant, cannot be imputed to the petitioner."

This contention apparently was based upon the fact that the knowledge of the persons named respecting said conditions of the plant and said orders was obtained prior to the transfer of the property from a former owner to the petitioner. However, the court declined to sustain this contention, and upon the assumption that these named persons represented the corporation petitioner in conducting the business of the plant, affirmed the award. No distinction appears to have been made by the court between Schreiner and Haines and Hay, but apparently it was considered that the misconduct of all or either of them was imputable to the corporation.

We are satisfied from the evidence as indicated in the petition and answer herein that the employee was injured by reason of the serious and willful misconduct of Taylor. It is not necessary to occupy space here with a review of that evidence. We are further of the opinion that Taylor was an executive or managing officer, or at least a general superintendent, of the corporation for the purposes of the construction work of which Taylor had charge; that is to say, that he was a "general superintendent," within the meaning of section 6 (b) of the Workmen's Compensation, etc., Act of 1917.

The petition for writ of review is denied.

STATE FINANCE CO. v. ISAACSON.★
(Civ. 3233.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 14, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 12, 1927.

1. Estoppel ⇨75—Facts held to warrant conclusion that finance company authorized dealer to resell automobile, giving purchaser good title as against claims of finance company (Civ. Code, § 1142).

Where finance company, on default of purchaser of automobile, notified dealer who sold car to remove it to dealer's place of business, and demanded from dealer payment of amount due on contract, held, in view of Civ. Code, § 1142, conclusion that finance company conferred on dealer power to make resale of automobile, and that purchaser on such resale received title good as against claims of finance company, was justified.

2. Pleading ⇨409(4)—Defect in pleading in failing to allege estoppel held waived by reception of evidence without objection.

Any defect in defendant's pleading in failing to plead estoppel was waived by plaintiff permitting introduction of evidence without objection.

3. Estoppel ⇨72—Finance company held to bring itself within provision that one of two innocent persons whose negligence brought about act of third person must be sufferer (Civ. Code, § 3543).

Even though action of finance company in authorizing dealer to retake car on default of purchaser did not warrant inference that authority was given dealer to resell car, as against purchaser on resale, finance company brought itself within Civ. Code, § 3543, providing that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer by act of third, he by whose negligence it happened must be the sufferer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by the State Finance Company against Peter Isaacson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Goldman & Altman and Edgar Sinton, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

W. H. Carlin and W. E. Davies, both of Marysville, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. On the 25th day of July, 1925, one Ed L. Wissler, a dealer in new and secondhand automobiles, at Marysville, Cal., entered into a contract of conditional sale with one Emanuel Kanupes for a certain automobile known and called a "Jewett businessman's coupé." This contract set forth the purchase price of the automobile, the payment thereon of the sum of $440 upon the signing of the contract, and the balance thereof to be paid in monthly installments ending on the 1st day of February, 1927. The contract specifies that the purchaser agreed to make such payments according to the terms of the contract; that, in the event of a failure to make such payments, the seller might repossess himself of said automobile and sell the same, and apply the proceeds thereof upon the contract, or might declare all of the unpaid installments immediately due upon the contract and bring suit therefor. The title to the property was reserved to the seller, and was to remain in him until the full completion of the contract. Immediately upon the execution of this contract the said Wissler sold and transferred all of his right, title, and interest in and to the property, and also to the conditional sales agreement, to the plaintiff in this action, and further guaranteed that the purchaser named in the conditional contract would comply with all the requirements thereof. The buyer of the automobile under the conditional agreement made one payment to the plaintiff herein, and then defaulted. After the default of the buyer, the plaintiff herein located the automobile in question in Fresno, took possession thereof, and placed the same in a garage in the city of Fresno. After doing this, the plaintiff, through its agent and representative, C. J. Busby, sent the garage check for the car to the original seller, Wissler, at Marysville, with directions to him to get the car, and demanded that said Wissler pay to the State Finance Company the sum of $1,276 balance due on the contract. Wissler, either by himself or through one of his employees, after receiving the garage check, as herein stated, went to Fresno, received the car in question, and took it to Marysville, where it was placed upon the premises where Wissler was conducting the business hereinbefore referred to, the testimony also showing that Wissler maintained a garage in connection with his other business, the testimony being that Wissler, at Marysville, had a garage, a showroom, and a used-car lot, and place out back for cars and a salesroom. The car was taken possession of by the State Finance Company and placed in a garage in Fresno, as above stated, late in November. Early in December, 1925, the agent of the plaintiff company saw the car at Wissler's place of business, but just where it is not stated. The testimony of some other witnesses is to the effect that the car was in the salesroom maintained by Wissler, and also that it stood for some days in the doorway or entrance thereto. Early in December, 1925, the automobile in question was sold to the defendant in this action, the defendant giving in exchange or purchase therefor to Wissler a car owned by him and the sum of $250. The car, at the time, contained no registration certificate. The purchaser, being the defendant herein, requested new plates and a certificate, and was told the matter would be looked after. Upon cross-examination the agent Busby testified that he notified Wissler that his car was in Fresno, and to come down and take it up to Marysville. This witness further testified: "I supposed he would get the car in order to save storage charges on it in Fresno, and probably take it to his own place of business." After stating that he had demanded payment from Wissler of the sum of $1,276, this witness testified that he made no other demand upon Wissler, and that he gave him no other instructions. The witness further testified that he did not, and did not know of any one giving instructions to Wissler to resell the car. The car was subsequently taken from the defendant's possession by the plaintiff and sold, and the proceeds thereof, in the sum of $1,100, applied upon the Kanupes contract hereinbefore referred to. The action herein was tried before a jury, and the defendant was given judgment for the value of the car. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

Only one question is really tendered for decision herein. Do the facts which we have narrated in brief justify the conclusion that Wissler was given authority by the plaintiff to resell the "Jewett" automobile? Section 1142, Civil Code, reads:

"Where the possession of personal property, together with a power to dispose thereof, is transferred by its owner to another person, an executed sale by the latter, while in possession, to a buyer in good faith and in the ordinary course of business, for value, transfers to such buyer the title of the former owner. * * *"

The facts in this case differ from the circumstances upon which any of the cases cited to us by either appellant or respondent were decided. In the cases of Kenny v. Christianson (Cal. Sup.) 253 P. 715; Carter v. Rowley, 59 Cal. App. 486, 211 P. 267; Chucovich v. San Francisco Securities Co., 60 Cal. App. 700, 214 P. 263; there was testimony to the effect that the automobile dealer was given authority, in so many words, to make sales. In the case of Pacific Acceptance Corp. v. Bank of Italy, 59 Cal. App. 76, 209 P. 1024, possession only (the truck involved) went into the hands of Peniston for a short period of time. In that case the court in its opinion said:

"Conceding that the bank transferred the possession of the truck to Peniston, there is no evidence that it gave him power to dispose of this truck, which is also a condition to make the statute above quoted applicable."

The statute referred to is the section of the Civil Code which we have cited. All that was done in that case was that the owner of the truck permitted it to be used in certain work, together with other trucks which were being used by purchasers on the same job. The compensation earned by the trucks being used on the particular job in question, over and above the expense of operating the trucks, was turned over to the bank to be applied on Peniston's indebtedness. Peniston had already sold several trucks upon conditional contracts, and assigned the contracts to the bank to secure a promissory note executed by him representing money borrowed from the bank. Nothing was done by the bank in that case indicating that the truck in question was turned back to Peniston; that the bank looked to him alone for payment, or had in any wise surrendered its security. In the case at bar, the plaintiff not only relinquished its security and turned back the possession of the truck to Wissler when it sent him the garage check, and notified him to retake the car, with the expectation and understanding that he would remove the car from Fresno to his place of business at Marysville, a distance of some 220 miles, but also demanded payment of Wissler of the balance due on the Kanupes contract which Wissler had guaranteed. What was the intent of the parties when this action was taken? Was it intended by any of the parties that the "Jewett" automobile should remain in the salesroom or upon the premises operated by Wissler for an indefinite period of time? Was it intended that Wissler should be looked to for the balance of the money due by the plaintiff rather than to its security, the possession of which it had voluntarily relinquished and restored to the custody of the original seller? The testimony, we think, is sufficient to show that the agent of the plaintiff saw the car upon Wissler's premises in a position and place which would indicate to the general public that the car was there for sale. If the plaintiff did not, by its acts in surrendering the possession of the car to Wissler and demanding payment of him, intend that Wissler should make resale of the property, the conduct of the plaintiff in relinquishing its security is not reasonably susceptible of explanation. There is no intimation that the plaintiff desired to escape storage charged for the car, but, on the contrary, the intent is evident that the plaintiff expected Wissler to take steps to secure himself against further expenses. This case is more nearly analogous to that of Carter v. Rowley, 59 Cal. App. 486, 211 P. 267, where it is said that, if the owner of an automobile, knowing that a certain dealer is engaged in the business of selling second-hand cars, delivers his machine to said dealer for the purpose of finding a purchaser, he thereby clothes such dealer with such indicia of authority to sell the car as usually accompanies such authority according to the custom of trade and general understanding of business men, etc. In the opinion in the case of Carter v. Rowley, supra, the court quotes with approval the language of Lord Ellenborough in Pickering v. Busk, 15 East (Eng.) 38, to wit:

"If the principal * * * send his commodity to a place where it is the ordinary business of the person to whom it is confided to sell, it must be intended that the commodity was sent thither for the purpose of sale. If the owner of a horse sent it to a repository of sale, can it be implied that he sent it thither for any other purpose than that of sale? Or if one send goods to an auction room, can it be supposed that he sent them thither merely for safe custody? Where the commodity is sent in such a way and to such a place as to exhibit an apparent purpose of sale, the principal will be bound, and the purchaser safe."

In the Carter-Rowley Case the distinction which we have made between this case and the case of the Pacific Acceptance Corp. v. Bank of Italy is likewise pointed out.

[1] We think the fact that the finance company sent the storage check for the car to Wissler at Marysville, notifying him to get the car which was stored at Fresno, with the understanding that he should remove the same to his place of business at Marysville, and at the same time demanded from Wissler payment of the amount due on the contract which he had guaranteed, justified the jury in inferring therefrom that the plaintiff intended to, and did, confer upon Wissler the power to make resale of the car in question, and that upon resale thereof the purchaser from Wissler would receive a title good as against any of the claims of the plaintiff in this action.

[2] That the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 522 et seq., as amended by St. 1925, p. 399) relative to registration of automobiles has no bearing upon the facts of this case appears from the cases of Boies v. Stiles, 188 Cal. 304, 204 P. 848; Chucovich v. San Francisco Securities Co., 60 Cal. App. 700, 214 P. 263; Kenny v. Christianson (Cal. Sup.) 253 P. 715. The appellant makes the further contention that no question of estoppel was raised by the defendant in his answer to the plaintiff's complaint in this action. The evidence which we have referred to, however, all came into the case without objection, and, in fact, was introduced by the plaintiff itself, and, therefore, if necessary to be pleaded, any defect in pleading was waived.

[3] As hereinbefore stated, we think the acts of the plaintiff justified the inference on the part of the jury that authority was given to Wissler to resell the car, and, if it did not actually confer such authority, the plaintiff went so far as to bring itself within the terms of section 3543, Civil Code, to wit:

"Where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he, by whose negligence it happened, must be the sufferer."

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. RICHARDS. (Cr. 1503.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 14, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 12, 1927.

1. Statutes $\S$ 241(1) — Provisions of Penal Code are to be construed according to fair import of their terms to effect its objects and to promote justice (Pen. Code, $\S$ 4).

Common-law rule as to strict construction of penal statutes does not apply to the Penal Code, but, under Pen. Code, $\S$ 4, all its provisions are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms, with view to effect its objects and to promote justice.

2. False pretenses $\S$ 18—Maxim, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius," held not applicable to statute prohibiting presentation of false claims to state boards or officers (Pen. Code, $\S$ 72).

The maxim, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius," held not applicable to Pen. Code, $\S$ 72, making presentation of false claims to state board or officer, or to county, town, etc., board or officer, a felony; the enumeration of county, town, etc., boards and officers being made by way of example and not for purposes of exclusion, and statute does not limit the expression "state board or officer" to those whose powers and duties are state wide.

3. Statutes ~~6211~~—Original section headings in Penal Code are integral parts of Code and must be consulted in ascertaining legislative will.

The original section headings of the Penal Code are not merely editor's notes, but are integral parts of the Code itself, and must be consulted in ascertaining and interpreting legislative will as expressed in the various sections.

4. False pretenses ~~618~~—Boards and officers of county flood control, irrigation, reclamation, and school districts held "state boards and officers," within statute as to presentation of false claims (Pen. Code, § 72).

The Los Angeles County flood control district, created by St. 1915, p. 1502, as well as irrigation, reclamation, and school districts, are state agencies for carrying out state purposes, and their boards and officers are "state boards and officers," within purview of Pen. Code, § 72, making presentation of false claims to any state board or officer a felony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Douglas L. Edmonds, Judge.

O. H. Richards was indicted for alleged violation of Pen. Code, § 72. From a judgment dismissing the indictment, the People appeal. Reversed, with directions.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., and A. H. Van Cott, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

Hewitt, Ford, McCormick & Crump and J. F. Moroney, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the people from a judgment of dismissal given upon an order sustaining defendant's demurrer to an amended indictment. The amended indictment undertook to charge defendant with a violation of section 72 of the Penal Code, which, at the time of the offense alleged, read as follows:

"Every person who, with intent to defraud, presents for allowance or for payment to any state board or officer, or to any county, town, city, ward, or village board or officer, authorized to allow or pay the same if genuine, any false or fraudulent claim, bill, account, voucher, or writing, is guilty of felony."

The indictment contained nine counts, each charging in language identical with the others, except as to the details of the claim, the presentation of a false and fraudulent claim to the board of supervisors of the Los Angeles County flood control district. The only argument made by respondent in support of the order sustaining the demurrer is that said board of supervisors is not one of the boards described in section 72, and hence the presentation of a false claim to that board is not made a public offense by this section. Manifestly that board is not within the section unless it can be regarded as a "state board or officer."

The term "state officer" has been frequently considered by the courts, and various meanings have been given to it according to the context and the nature and purpose of the constitutional or statutory provision in which it is found. In some cases it has been limited to officers exercising a state-wide jurisdiction, and in others it is further limited to such officers as belong immediately to the three constituent branches of the state government, or to the officers provided for in the Constitution. In other decisions, the criterion has been whether the duties of the office directly concern the affairs of the state, and it has been said that an officer with such duties may be a state officer, although his duties are to be performed in a limited territory or district.

It has been held that a mine inspector is a state officer, although elected by a district, because the office directly concerns the affairs of the state. In re Lamb, 251 Pa. 102, 96 A. 255. Another case held that because the functions of a county game warden concerned the state at large or the general public, he was not a county officer, although his duties were to be performed within the territorial limits of a county, but he was either a state officer or a joint state and county officer. State v. Shagren, 91 Wash. 48, 157 P. 31. It has also been held that a local registrar of vital statistics who reports to a state registrar, although he may be a city or county officer acting ex officio as local registrar, is a state officer, because he is performing state functions. Ft. Smith Dist. v. Eberle, 125 Ark. 350, 188 S. W. 821; Sacramento v. Simmons, 66 Cal. App. 18, 25, 225 P. 36. In holding that a public administrator for a particular county is a state officer, the Supreme Court of Illinois said:

"All officers whose duties concern the state at large or the general public are state officers, although such duties are exercised within defined territorial limits."

In the same case that court declared that an officer might be both a state officer and a county or city officer. Ramsay v. Van Meter, 300 Ill. 193, 133 N. E. 193.

[1] Bearing in mind the evident purpose of section 72 to penalize the making of false and fraudulent claims against public funds, we see no reason for giving to the words "state board or officer," as used therein, any narrow or limited meaning. The common-law rule as to the strict construction of penal statutes does not apply to the Code, but all its provisions are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice. Pen. Code, § 4; People v. Soto, 49 Cal. 67; People v. Fowler, 88 Cal. 136, 25 P. 1110.

[2] Respondent's argument is that, under the rule embodied in the maxim, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius," the mention in section 72 of county, town, and other boards and officers, all of whom, as he claims, might be regarded as state boards or officers, in the broadest sense, shows that the expression "state board or officer" must have been used in a more limited sense as referring only to boards and officers whose powers and duties are state wide. It is scarcely correct to say that all of the various boards and officers named in the section are state boards and officers, even in the broadest sense given to those terms by the authorities cited, for many of them do not perform services for or on behalf of the state. But aside from this, the rule of expressio unius is not of universal application. Blevins v. Mullally, 22 Cal. App. 519, 529, 135 P. 307. "The maxim does not apply to a statute the language of which may fairly comprehend many different cases, in which some only are expressly mentioned by way of example merely, and not as excluding others of a similar nature." 2 Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction, § 495. In McKendrick v. Western Zinc Min. Co., 165 Cal. 24, 28, 130 P. 865, 867, it was held that the maxim should not be applied to a statutory enumeration very similar in its framework to that here involved. We think the enumeration of county, town, and other boards and officers in section 72 is made by way of example, and not for purposes of exclusion, and does not limit the effect of the preceding language.

[3] Our conclusion is fortified by a consideration of the section heading prefixed to section 72. That section had never been amended up to the time when this case arose, and as originally enacted had the following section heading:

"Fraudulently Presenting Bills or Claims to Public Officers for Allowance or Payment."

These original section headings are not merely editor's notes, but are integral parts of the Code itself, and must be consulted in ascertaining and interpreting the legislative will as expressed in the various sections. Bettencourt v. Sheehy, 157 Cal. 698, 109 P. 89; Matter of Application of Wilson, 30 Cal. App. 567, 158 P. 1050, 23 Cal. Jur. 772. At the time this section was adopted there were in existence school districts, reclamation districts, swamp land districts, and levee districts, none of which are expressly mentioned in section 72, and upon the argument of respondent all of them would be excluded from its operation. No logical reason can be imagined for excluding them or any other public board or officer from the operation of the section, and the section heading just quoted indicates that the Legislature had no such intention. As we shall see, all of these existing public corporations have been classed as state agencies, and their boards and officers, as well as those of the numerous other state agencies of similar character for which statutory provision has since been made, should be regarded as state boards and officers, within the meaning of section 72. We adopt the following language of the court in Milliken v. Meyers, 25 Cal. App. 510, 514, 144 P. 321, 323, as indicating the meaning of those terms as used in this section:

"If, on the other hand, the services rendered by petitioner were those required to be performed for and on behalf of the state, such fact would render the position a state office. And, notwithstanding the duties in performance are restricted to the city, they do not, merely by reason thereof, become municipal in character."

[4] Accepting that meaning, we next inquire as to the duties and functions of the officers of the Los Angeles County flood control district. That district was created in 1915 by a special act of the Legislature. Stats. 1915, p. 1502. The purposes for which it was formed as declared in this statute were:

"The objects and purposes of this act are to provide for the control of the flood and storm waters of said district, and to conserve such waters for beneficial and useful purposes by spreading, storing, retaining or causing to percolate into the soil within said district, or to save or conserve in any manner, all or any of such waters, and to protect from damage from such flood or storm waters, the harbors, water ways, public highways and property in said district."

To carry out these purposes, it was made a body politic and corporate, and given power to acquire and own property, to incur indebtedness, to issue bonds, to levy taxes, which are in reality special assessments, and to construct all necessary or proper works and improvements. The statute also provides:

"The board of supervisors of Los Angeles county shall be, and they are hereby designated as, and empowered to act as, ex officio the board of supervisors of said Los Angeles County flood control district, and said board of supervisors is hereby vested with the same powers, and shall perform the same duties for and on behalf of said district, and the government thereof, to carry out the objects and purposes of this act that the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county now have or may hereafter have by law for said Los Angeles county, and shall also have such other or additional powers for said district as may be necessary to carry out any of the objects or purposes of this act above mentioned, or to exercise any of the said powers of said district. * * *

This district is substantially similar in character, at least so far as the present matter is concerned, to irrigation districts and reclamation districts. Los Angeles County Flood Control District v. Hamilton, 177 Cal. 119, 169 P. 1028. In the Madera Irrigation District Case, 92 Cal. 296, 322, 28 P. 272, 278 (14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106), the nature of an irrigation district was elaborately discussed, and this declaration was made:

"The district officers thus become public officers of the state. * * * Here are found the essential elements of a public corporation, none of which pertain to a private corporation. The property held by the corporation is in trust for the public, and subject to the control of the state. Its officers are public officers, chosen by the electors of the district, and invested with public duties."

Regarding reclamation districts, the Supreme Court has said:

"If these districts can be said to be corporations at all, I think they are properly called public corporations for municipal purposes. That phrase means no more than that they are state organizations for state purposes. They certainly are not municipal corporations in the strict sense. * * * They are public agencies, which would cease to exist when the policy of the state has changed so that they are no longer required, or when there is no further function for them to perform." People v. Reclamation Dist. No. 551, 117 Cal. 114, 120, 48 P. 1016, 1017. "Such districts are, in strictness, not corporations at all, but rather governmental agencies to carry out a specific purpose—the agency ceasing with the accomplishment of the purpose." People v. Sacramento Drainage Dist., 155 Cal. 373, 382, 103 P. 207, 212.

Declarations of a similar character have been made regarding school districts, levee districts, and other similar organizations in Pass School Dist. v. Hollywood Dist., 156 Cal. 416, 419, 105 P. 122, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 485, 20 Ann. Cas. 87; Reclamation Dist. v. Birks, 159 Cal. 233, 238, 113 P. 170; Webster v. Board of Regents, 163 Cal. 705, 126 P. 974; Reclamation Dist. v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 672, 676, 154 P. 845; and Southern Pac. Co. v. Levee Dist. No. 1, 172 Cal. 345, 156 P. 502.

In Reclamation Dist. No. 551 v. County of Sacramento, 134 Cal. 477, 479, 66 P. 668, 669, the court held that the property of a reclamation district is exempt from taxation, under section 1 of article 13 of the Constitution, which exempts from taxation property that "may belong to the United States, this state, or to any county, * * * or municipal corporation within this state." Referring to the property of reclamation districts, the court said:

"It is not necessary to hold this property, thus acquired, to be the property of a municipal corporation, in order to make it exempt from taxation. It would be sufficient to hold that it is public property of the state, within the meaning of the Constitution. The whole scheme of reclamation originates with the state, and is carried to a conclusion by agents of the state—the district, as we have already seen, being a public agency—in furtherance of public policy. The property mentioned in section 3471 of the Political Code is public property, acquired by the agents of the state, for state purposes, and we think is exempt from taxation, as such."

In Turlock Irr. Dist. v. White, 186 Cal. 183, 189, 198 P. 1060, 1063 (17 A. L. R. 72), where it was contended that the property of irrigation districts had been exempted from taxation merely because of the inclusion in the exempting provisions of section 1, article 13, already quoted, of the words "municipal corporation," the court said:

"To the contrary, such exemption existed because of the express exemption of the property of 'the state,' contained in that section and because of the implications in favor of the exemption of public property."

The plain conclusion from these authorities is that the quasi corporations under consideration, including irrigation districts, reclamation districts, and school districts, are all merely state agencies for carrying out state purposes and their property is state property. It follows that their boards and officers are state boards and officers, within the purview of section 72 of the Penal Code. We see no reason for making any distinction in this respect between the Los Angeles County flood control district and the other quasi corporations above mentioned.

Respondent contends quite urgently that the case of Rose v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 252 P. 765, is decisive of the point here involved, but we do not so regard it. In that case it was held that an irrigation district officer is subject to removal, under section 772 of the Penal Code, which provides for the removal by a superior court of "any officer within the jurisdiction of the court." In Kilburn v. Law, 111 Cal. 237, 43 P. 615, it was held that section 889 must be considered with section 772 and limits it to proceedings against district, county, municipal, or township officers, and hence bank commissioners, being state officers, are not subject to its operation. The argument made in the Rose Case was that Rose, who was a director of an irrigation district, was a state officer and hence not subject to removal under section 772, the argument being largely based on the declaration in the Madera Irrigation District Case that "the district officers thus become public officers of the state." As the court pointed out in the Rose Case, this does not mean that they are officers exercising a state-wide authority, and the word "district" as used in section 889 is descriptive merely of a geographical part of the state, having no reference to the nature of the officer's functions. To put the matter in another way, the court in order to reach its conclusion in the Rose Case was not required to hold and did not hold that irrigation district officers are not state officers, the latter term not being used in the statute under consideration. The decision is based merely on the proposition that they are district officers within the jurisdiction of the superior court. They are, of course, district officers because elected in and for a district, but we see no reason why they may not by reason of the nature of their functions be also state officers, within the meaning of section 72.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from is reversed and the court is directed to overrule the demurrer to the amended indictment.

In re GOLDMAN'S ESTATE. (Civ. 5689.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 15, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 12, 1927.

1. Wills §55(3)—Evidence that testator believed contestant of will desired his death supported finding that testator was under insane delusion.

In petition to probate will, evidence that testator stated he believed contestant of will would poison or kill him, and that testator would therefore have nothing to do with him, which was shown to be utterly without foundation on part of testator, supported finding that testator was subject to insane delusion which affected making of will.

2. Wills §300—Requirement that evidence must be sufficient to support verdict is same in will contest as in any other action.

Requirement regarding necessity of sufficiency of evidence to support verdict of jury is same in law as between a will contest and any other kind of action.

3. Wills §386—Jury's conclusion in will contest, based on conflicting evidence, is just as conclusive as in other actions.

Where substantial conflict exists in evidence, conclusion reached by jury is just as conclusive in will contest as in any other class of litigation.

4. Wills §324(2), 386—Whether evidence of insane delusion by testator preponderated for contestant or proponent of will was for jury, whose decision cannot be disturbed by appellate court, though evidence was conflicting.

In will contest question whether evidence to show testator was under insane delusion when making will preponderated in favor of contestant or proponent was solely within province of jury, and, though evidence was conflicting, appellate court would not be justified in disturbing judgment rendered on verdict.

5. Wills §384—Allowance of amendment to contestant's pleading to show testator was acting under insane delusion, in addition to general allegation of lack of testamentary capacity, made after reading depositions, held not prejudicial.

In will contest presenting issue of general testamentary capacity of testator, permission to contestant to amend pleading to include issue whether testator was acting under insane delusion when making will, allowed after depositions taken in case were read, was not prejudicial to proponent of will, where no request was made by proponent for continuance and no claim was made that witnesses whose depositions were read could have furnished any evidence other than contained in depositions.

6. Pleading §229—Amendment to pleadings should be liberally allowed, especially where no new issue is presented.

Great liberality should be shown by trial court in permitting amendments to pleadings, especially where no new issue is presented.

7. Appeal and error §959(3)—Pleading §236(1)—Allowance of amendment to pleading is within trial court's discretion, whose ruling cannot be disturbed in absence of abuse.

Allowance of amendment to pleading during trial is within discretion of trial court, and trial court's ruling cannot be disturbed unless abuse of discretion is shown.

8. Wills §384—Amendment to pleadings of contestant of will alleging lack of testamentary capacity to allege insane delusion narrowed issue and was not prejudicial to proponent.

In will contest issue of insanity generally or utter lack of testamentary capacity is broader than issue of single insane delusion, and hence amendment to complaint alleging lack of testamentary capacity to allege insane delusion narrowed issue and could result in no prejudice to substantial rights of proponent of will.

9. Depositions §88—Admission of cross-examination in deposition, over objection, submitted by party taking deposition in chief, held not error.

Where deposition, taken at instance of contestant in which proponents conducted cross-examination, was taken under stipulation that it might be used by either party in will contest, it was not error to read in evidence cross-examination of witness, over proponent's objection.

10. Depositions §88—That party producing witness making depositions or party cross-examining witness is adversely affected by facts adduced is no ground for denying party benefit of facts brought out by opposite party.

Where deposition is taken to obtain testimony of witness unable to attend trial, witness "belongs" to neither side, and that facts may adversely affect contentions of party producing witness or party cross-examining witness is no ground for denying to either party benefit of facts adduced by opposite party.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge pro tem.

Petition by Harry W. Goldman and another to probate the will of Abe Goldman, deceased, contested by Ben F. Goldman. From a judgment denying probate, proponent and the Pacific Southwest Trust & Savings Bank appeal. Affirmed.

Hardy, Elliott & Aberle, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Charles W. Ostrom and John Henderson Pelletier, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in pursuance of a verdict by a jury in a contest of the will of Abe Goldman, deceased. Contestant is the son of the testator.

The contest of the will as originally filed presented both the issue of undue influence in the making of the will and that of unsoundness of mind of the testator. On the hearing of the matter, by order of court, the former issue was withdrawn from the consideration of the jury, and by an amendment, contestant was permitted to modify the other issue from that of general incompetency to that of a fixed delusion on the part of the testator, which, at the time of the execution of the will, operated directly upon its provisions.

Special issues were submitted to the jury which included, first, the question as to whether, at the time or times when the testator made his will and the codicil thereto, he was suffering from a specific insane delusion which affected the making of such will and codicil, respectively, and except for which neither the will nor the codicil would have been made; and, secondly, whether at such time or times the testator was suffering from such a complete mental degeneration as to denote utter mental incapacity to know and understand the nature and extent of his act. As to the questions which signified a specific insane delusion on the part of the testator, the answers given by the jury were in the affirmative, but as to the questions relating to the testator's complete mental incapacity, the answers were in the negative. Judgment on the verdict having been rendered in favor of the contestant, the proponent of the will has appealed therefrom.

In effect, the principal point relied upon by appellant is that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict.

[1] Without attempting to set forth herein the testimony given by the several witnesses who testified at the hearing, it may suffice to state generally that at least six of such witnesses testified, in substance, that on many occasions, both precedent as well as subsequent to the making of both the will and the codicil thereto, the testator had made statements to the effect that he believed that the contestant would poison him or kill him; that the contestant desired the death of the testator in order that contestant might inherit the property of the testator; that it was for that reason that the testator would have nothing to do with the contestant; and that the testator, by his will, would leave the contestant very little, if any, of the testator's property. No evidence was produced which showed the slightest foundation for such belief on the part of the testator. On the other hand, evidence was introduced from which the jury properly might have decided that the reason for the practical disinheritance of the son by the father was due to conditions and circumstances other than those which tended toward the establishing of an insane delusion of the testator which directly affected the provisions of the will and the codicil thereto, so far as the contestant was concerned.

[2, 3] Many authorities are cited by appellant with reference to the law affecting testamentary incapacity, insane delusions, and the burden of proof. The evidence is reviewed, and it is argued with much earnestness that the law, as applied to what appellant insists were the facts as shown by the evidence, clearly indicates that a reversal of the judgment should be had. At the outset, it should be noted that so far as the requirement regarding the necessity of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict of the jury is concerned, there is no essential difference in the law as between a will contest and any other kind of an action. Where the issue is clean-cut and any substantial conflict exists in the evidence relating thereto, the conclusion reached by the jury is just as conclusive in a will contest as it is in any other class of litigation. As is stated in the matter entitled In re Presho's Estate, 196 Cal. 639, 643, 238 P. 944, 945:

"As to the sufficiency of the evidence, if from all the evidence the verdict is based on material facts legally proved or on inferences which may be reasonably drawn from those facts, even though there be an honest difference of opinion as to the effect of the evidence, the verdict will be deemed supported."

[4] On a consideration of the evidence introduced on the trial, this court is convinced that the testimony of the several witnesses on behalf of the contestant brought the facts squarely within the definition as stated in numerous decisions by the courts of this state relating to what constitutes an insane delusion. The question of whether such evidence preponderated in favor of the contestant, or of the proponent of the will, was one which lay solely within the province of the jury to determine. As hereinbefore indicated, the finding by the jury on the issue of the insane delusion of the testator and its effect upon the execution of the will was amply supported by the evidence. It follows that because of the fact that the evidence may have been conflicting with relation to such issue, this court would not be justified in disturbing the judgment rendered by the lower court in pursuance of the verdict of the jury.

[5-7] Appellant contends, also, that the court erred in granting leave to the contestant to file an amended complaint. As hereinbefore stated, it appears that one of the issues, as originally drawn, presented the question of the general testamentary capacity of the testator, and that in the course of the trial the contestant was permitted to so amend his pleading as to specifically include therein the issue of whether at the time of the execution of the will in question the testator was acting under the influence of an insane delusion which operated directly upon the provisions of the will. It is urged by appellant that the amendment was permitted at a time after a number of depositions taken in the case had been read in evidence, and that none of the witnesses whose depositions were taken by appellant were questioned on the issue relating to an insane delusion of the testator, and that no opportunity was afforded the proponent of the will to meet the allegations of the contest as amended other than by such witnesses as were in the court room. But so far as is disclosed by appellant's brief, no request was made by the proponent of the will for a continuance of the trial in order that he might procure the attendance of witnesses who would or might testify regarding the issue as amended. Nor is it now contended by appellant that either or any of the witnesses whose depositions were taken by him could have furnished any evidence other than such as is contained within the depositions which already had been taken which would have tended to offset the evidence produced by the contestant in that behalf. It is, therefore, difficult, if possible, to see in what manner injury resulted to the proponent by reason of the amendment to the pleading. But whatever may have been appellant's position in that regard, the rule is well established that great liberality should be shown by the trial court in permitting amendments to pleadings, especially where no new issue is presented thereby.

[8] Furthermore, the allowance of amendments to pleadings during the trial is a matter resting largely within the discretion of the trial court, and the ruling of which court cannot be disturbed unless an abuse of discretion be clearly shown. Neher v. Kauffman, 197 Cal. 674, 242 P. 713; Milliken v. Valencia, 47 Cal. App. 16, 189 P. 1049, and cases there cited. It is clear that the issue of insanity generally or utter lack of testamentary capacity is broader than the issue of a single insane delusion. It is therefore manifest that if the amendment had any effect it was that of narrowing the issue already before the court, rather than creating a new issue on the subject of insanity of the testator—to which situation the proponent could have no objection, and which course could result in no prejudice to his substantial rights in the premises.

[9] Appellant further complains of the action of the trial judge in permitting the contestant, over proponent's objection, to read in to evidence the cross-examination of a witness as shown by a deposition. It appears that the deposition of the witness was taken at the instance of the contestant, and that such cross-examination was produced by questions propounded to the witness by the proponent of the will. Before the taking of the deposition it was stipulated by respective counsel that the deposition might "be used by either party upon the trial of the contest." But aside from such stipulation, it is clear that no error was committed by the trial court. The presumed purpose in the taking of a deposition is to obtain the testimony of a witness who is unable to attend the trial of an action.

[10] The witness "belongs" to neither side. He is presumed to narrate certain facts within his knowledge which bear upon the issues in the case. That such facts may adversely affect the contentions or claims of the party producing such witness offers no just or substantial ground for denying to the other party the benefit of such facts; and the same rule should apply where the party cross-examining such witness is disappointed or displeased by the answers given by him to questions propounded to the witness by the cross-examiner.

This court can find no substantial error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

BUTTRICK v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO.
et al. (Civ. 5958.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 17, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨867(2)—After granting of new trial for error in instructions only appellate court cannot consider sufficiency of evidence to support verdict (Code Civ. Proc. § 657).

Where motion for new trial was granted solely for error in giving instructions, the appellate court is precluded, under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, from considering sufficiency of evidence to support verdict.

2. Street railroads ⇨118(11)—Instruction that if plaintiff suddenly went on street car tracks from place of safety, she could not recover, held inapplicable to facts.

In personal injury action against a street railroad and its motorman, charge that, if plaintiff or her companion, being in place of safety, suddenly went on the tracks so as to be in danger of being struck by a passing car, then she could not recover, held error, as inapplicable to facts.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1066—Trial ⇨252(1)—Giving instruction finding no support in evidence is improper, and, if prejudicial, is ground for reversal.

Giving of an instruction which finds no support in evidence is improper, and, if prejudicial, is ground for reversal.

4. Negligence ⚡141(11)—Instruction denying recovery if plaintiff or her companion suddenly went on tracks held error, where companion's negligence was not imputable to her.

Where companion of plaintiff, while they were walking near a street car track, was struck by approaching car and thrown against plaintiff, causing injury, instruction that, if plaintiff or her companion, being in place of safety, suddenly went on the tracks so as to be in danger of being struck by a passing car, plaintiff could not recover, was error, where negligence of her companion could be imputed to her.

5. Negligence ⚡89(1)—To impute negligence, persons must be in such privity that doctrine of "qui facit per alium facit per se" applies (Civ. Code, § 1714).

In order that negligence of one person may be imputed to another, under Civ. Code, § 1714, the two must stand in such relation of privity that the doctrine of "qui facit per alium facit per se" directly applies.

6. Trial ⚡253(4)—Instruction that, if plaintiff struck by street car left place of safety, she could not recover, held error, as omitting element as to what motorman was doing.

Where plaintiff's companion was struck by passing street car, thrown against, and injured her, in action against street railroad and motorman, instruction that, if plaintiff or her companion, being in place of safety, suddenly went on tracks so as to be in danger of being struck by passing car, she could not recover, held error, as omitting element as to what the motorman was doing, because, if injury was sustained by separate but concurring negligence of her companion and the motorman, she could recover from one or both.

7. Trial ⚡194(17)—Instruction that, if plaintiff or her companion suddenly went on tracks, she could not recover, held error, as directing verdict.

Where plaintiff's companion, while walking along street car tracks, was struck by passing street car and thrown against plaintiff, causing injury, instruction that, if plaintiff or her companion, being in place of safety, suddenly went on tracks so as to be in danger of being struck by passing car, she could not recover, held error, as directing verdict for defendants, if jury found her companion suddenly went from place of safety and was struck by the car.

8. Trial ⚡295(1)—In determining whether jury was properly instructed, instructions must be taken as a whole.

In determining whether the jury was properly instructed as to the law, instructions given must be taken as a whole.

9. New trial ⚡39—New trial should be granted, where it cannot be told which of consistent or contradictory instructions jury followed.

If instructions are inconsistent or contradictory and it is impossible to tell which was adopted by jury, a new trial should be granted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Gussie C. Buttrick against the Pacific Electric Railway Company and another. Judgment for defendants. From an order granting plaintiff's motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank Karr, E. E. Morris, and C. W. Cornell, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendants Pacific Electric Railway Company, a corporation, and R. H. Ludwigson from an order granting a new trial, after the jury had rendered a verdict in their favor.

The plaintiff, Gussie C. Buttrick, brought this action for damages for injuries which she alleges resulted to her from the negligence of defendants. The plaintiff made a motion for a new trial upon six grounds set forth in the notice, among them being:

"(5) That the court misinstructed the jury; (6) that the court failed to properly instruct the jury by refusing certain written instructions requested by the plaintiff."

[1] The trial court granted the motion for a new trial and in so doing used this language:

"Motion for a new trial is granted on the sole ground that the court was in error in giving instruction No. 17 on page 7 of the instructions."

Section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"When a new trial is granted upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, the order shall so specify; otherwise, on appeal from such order, it will be presumed that the order was not based upon that ground."

We are therefore precluded from considering the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict of the jury.

The evidence is conflicting, but the facts are substantially these: The accident occurred in the city of Los Angeles, on Sunday, December 23, 1923, at about 2:45 p. m., at a point where the railroad tracks of the defendant Pacific Electric Railway Company cross Sunset boulevard. Plaintiff, accompanied by one William Weeks, left a drug store at the northwest corner of the intersection of Sunset boulevard and Gardner street and walked southerly across a single track in the center of Sunset boulevard to a point about 5 feet or 6 feet north of the north side of the double track of said Pacific Electric Railway's railroad, which runs diagonally across Sunset boulevard. When they had reached this point Weeks and plaintiff both testified that they saw the car that afterwards struck Weeks, standing in a station up the double track on the north side of Sunset boulevard.

They turned and walked southwesterly parallel to the double track for about 25 feet, Weeks being on the left of plaintiff (the side next to the track), and Weeks being in about 4 or 5 feet to the right of the track, and plaintiff being immediately to his right, with their backs to the car. While walking in this position and just about the time they stepped upon the sidewalk to enter another drug store at the southwest corner of Sunset boulevard and Gardner street, Weeks was struck by the right end of the street car that they had seen standing up the track at the station, and knocked violently against plaintiff, and she was thrown against a power pole and severely injured. Both plaintiff and Weeks testified that no bell was rung until just at the time the car struck Weeks. Both Weeks and plaintiff also testified that Sunset boulevard was badly congested by automobile travel and they had difficulty in crossing Sunset boulevard and were positive that no warning was given by the car until just before Weeks was struck. The defendant Ludwigson, the motorman on the car, testified that, when he got about the center of Sunset boulevard with his electric car, an automobile turned east in front of him and he sounded the gong and applied the air to keep from hitting this automobile; that he was nearly across the Sunset boulevard before he saw the plaintiff and Mr. Weeks, who were about 8 feet from the curb and 5 or 6 feet from the track at that time; and that he was traveling about 6 or 8 miles an hour when he crossed the intersection. Ludwigson further testified:

"As they got to the curb, there seemed to be plenty of clear at the time they reached this curb, and at the time I started to go by, and, when the fender had gotten by, the gentleman stepped close to the car, catching him along by the step and door, the right front corner of the car. After I rung the gong for the automobile, I rung the gong again. Just as I got close to these people I rang the bell again; then I applied the brakes as soon as I saw they were getting too close. * * * I didn't see either one of these parties fall. I just saw the man throw up his hands; then I went by."

The specified acts of negligence alleged against defendants are: (a) "In negligently operating said electric car of defendant corporation" and (b) "In negligently failing to give timely or any warning or notice by bell, whistle, or otherwise of the approach of said car."

The defendants filed separate answers and each of said answers denies any negligence on behalf of each defendant. In each of said answers each defendant sets up contributory negligence of the plaintiff as a separate and distinct defense.

[2, 3] Said instruction No. 17 reads as follows:

"If you believe that the plaintiff, or Mr. Weeks, being in a place of safety, suddenly went on the track, or so close thereto as to be in danger of being struck by a passing car, then plaintiff cannot recover."

[4-6] This instruction is erroneous for several reasons. In the first place, there is no testimony in the record that we can discover that shows that plaintiff was ever on the car track or close enough thereto as to be in danger of being hit by defendants' car; in fact, the testimony of all the witnesses seems to be to the effect that she was at all times at least 4 or 5 feet to the right of the car track and in a place of perfect safety, and never went into a place of danger. Therefore, for this reason alone, the instruction would be inapplicable to the facts of the case, and should not have been given. The giving of an instruction which finds no support in the evidence is improper, and, if prejudicial, is ground for a reversal. Boone v. Oakland Transit Co., 139 Cal. 490, 73 P. 243; Idemoto v. Scheidecker, 193 Cal. 661, 226 P. 922; Eppinger v. Kendrick, 114 Cal. 620, 46 P. 613; Bosqui v. Sufro R. Co., 131 Cal. 390, 63 P. 682; Wallis v. S. P. Co., 184 Cal. 663, 195 P. 408, 15 A. L. R. 117; Griffith v. Oak Ridge Oil Co., 190 Cal. 389, 212 P. 913; Badostain v. Pacific Electric Co. (Cal. App.) 256 P. 576. Secondly, it must be borne in mind that this is an action by Mrs. Buttrick against the railway company and its motorman alone. The appellants have not indicated, and we cannot see in the record any evidence, indicating that the relationship between Mrs. Buttrick and Weeks, at the time of the accident, was such that any negligence or contributory negligence on the part of Weeks would be imputed to Mrs. Buttrick. For this reason the instruction is erroneous. In order that the negligence of one person may be imputed to another, the two must stand in such relation of privity that the doctrine of qui facit per alium facit per se directly applies. Indeed, no other rule is consistent with section 1714 of the Civil Code, wherein it is declared that every one is responsible for any injury occasioned to another by his want of ordinary care, "except so far as the latter has, willfully or by want of ordinary care, brought the injury upon himself." Bryant v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 737, 164 P. 385; 19 Cal. Jur. 659 et seq., and cases cited. Thirdly, the instruction also omits the very important element as to what the motorman was doing or not doing, because, if direct personal injury occasioned to plaintiff by the separate but concurring negligence of both Weeks and the motorman at one and the same time, plaintiff could recover from one or all of them, provided, of course, she was not guilty of contributory negligence. Tompkins v. Clay Street R. Co., 66 Cal. 163, 4 P. 1165; Lang v. Lilley & Thurston Co., 20 Cal. App. 223, 128 P. 1028; Kimic v. San Jose-Los Gatos Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 386, 104 P. 986; Cordiner v.

Los Angeles Traction Co., 5 Cal. App. 407, 91 P. 436. In Spear v. United Railroads, 16 Cal. App. 660, 117 P. 966, the court said:

"All the authorities recognize the right of recovery against either or both of the defendants whose concurring acts of negligence united in producing the injury. 1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, 122; 1 Thompson on Negligence, p. 75; Doeg v. Cook, 126 Cal. 213, 58 P. 707, 77 Am. St. Rep. 171; Thompkins v. Clay St. Ry. Co. [supra], Pastene v. Adams, 49 Cal. 87."

[7] Said instruction omits other important elements and also tends to take the minds of the jury away from the two vital issues of the case, viz. (1) the conduct of defendants, and (2) the conduct of plaintiff, and focus their attention upon the conduct of Weeks alone. It amounted to a peremptory direction to the jury to bring in a verdict for defendants, provided they find as a fact that Weeks suddenly went from a place of safety and was struck by the car. Such is clearly not the law.

[8, 9] Appellants contend that, in determining whether the jury was properly instructed as to the law, the instructions given must be taken as a whole. This is, of course, the law. Moore v. San Vicente Lumber Co., 175 Cal. 212, 165 P. 687; Taylor v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 172 Cal. 638, 158 P. 119. We have followed this rule and we find that instruction No. 12 given by the trial court reads:

"You will notice in speaking of 'contributory negligence' I refer to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. Neither the negligence, or contributory negligence, if any, of William M. Weeks, who was walking with the plaintiff at the time of the accident, can be imputed to, nor is it the negligence of the plaintiff in this case, and you cannot consider it at all, except that, if you should find that he was negligent, and that his negligence was the sole cause of the injury to plaintiff, and that she was not negligent, and the railroad company was not negligent, why, then the plaintiff could not recover."

In said instruction No. 12 the jury is told that:

"Neither the negligence or contributory negligence, if any, of William Weeks, * * * can be imputed to nor is it the negligence of the plaintiff."

This instruction is contradictory of said instruction No. 17, above quoted, in essential particulars, and the jury could not determine which of the two instructions correctly stated the law. They were bound to accept all the propositions that the court instructed them upon as a correct statement of the law by which they were to be guided, and, if the instructions are inconsistent or contradictory, it is impossible to tell which was adopted in reaching their verdict in this case, and for that reason a new trial should be granted. Brown v. McAllister, 39 Cal. 573; Chidester v. Consolidated People's Ditch Co., 53 Cal. 56; Watts v. Murphy, 9 Cal. App. 564, 99 P. 1104; Hayden v. Consolidated Min., etc., Co., 3 Cal. App. 136, 84 P. 422.

It is not necessary to discuss the other contentions made by respondents that said instruction No. 17 is erroneous and prejudicial.

From what has been said, it follows that we are of the opinion that the order granting plaintiff a new trial was proper, and said order is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PAGE. (Cr. 987.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 17, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 15, 1927.

1. Homicide ☞250, 268—Evidence in prosecution for murder held sufficient to take case to jury and support conviction.

In prosecution for murder, evidence of defendant's interest in getting rid of deceased, with whom he was operating hotel, quarrels between parties, and defendant's movements, was sufficient to make case for jury and supported conviction.

2. Criminal law ☞404(4)—Homicide ☞170 —Inner sole fitting defendant's shoe, found at place of homicide, and similarity of soil at such place to that on defendant's socks, held material in prosecution for murder.

In prosecution for murder, presence of inner sole near place where body was found, alleged to have been worn in defendant's shoe, and character of soil adhering to defendant's socks, claimed to be similar to soil at place of murder, held material circumstances entitled to some weight in chain of circumstantial evidence.

3. Criminal law ☞1159(6)—Appellate court cannot substitute its judgment for decision of jury whether circumstances are equally consistent with guilt or innocence.

Appellate court cannot substitute its judgment for that of jury's in determining whether circumstances relied on to establish defendant's guilt are equally consistent with his innocence.

4. Criminal law ☞486—Expert witness' testimony that he examined soil at scene of homicide without microscope was sufficient foundation for opinion that it resembled soil on defendant's socks.

Testimony by expert witness that he examined soil around place of murder without aid of microscope was sufficient foundation for admission in evidence of witness' opinion that such soil was similar to that found on defendant's socks.

5. Criminal law ⚡696(2)—Failure to renew motion to strike expert testimony after failure of prosecution to connect it up waived objection to testimony.

Objection to expert testimony as to similarity of soil taken from scene of homicide to that found on defendant's socks for failure to show soil was taken from scene of homicide held waived by failure to renew motion to strike out testimony after failure of prosecution to prove that samples of soil furnished witness were taken from scene of homicide.

6. Criminal law ⚡1169(9)—Opinion of expert, based on facts which jury could draw for themselves if they believed facts, if erroneously admitted, was not prejudicial.

Opinion of expert witness that marks on inner sole might have been made by nails of defendant's shoe, based on accurate measurements of distance between imprints in inner sole while under pressure of 150 pounds and that between nails in shoe, was conclusion from facts which jurors could have reached themselves if they believed facts, and, if not proper subject of expert testimony, was not prejudicial.

7. Homicide ⚡287—Refusal to instruct that absence of motive in murder prosecution favors innocence of defendant was not error.

In prosecution for murder, refusal by court to instruct jury that absence of motive is circumstance in favor of innocence of defendant was not error.

8. Homicide ⚡156(1)—Evidence of defendant's relation with deceased was relevant to show malice and instruction limiting testimony to question of motive was properly refused.

In prosecution for murder, requested instruction that any evidence showing conduct or relation of defendant with deceased can only be considered in determining whether or not defendant might have had motive to commit crime was properly refused, since such evidence was relevant to show malice.

9. Criminal law ⚡854(7)—Separation of juror during deliberations to receive dental treatment in immediate custody of sheriff at all times was not prejudicial to defendant.

Where one of jurors suffering from infected tooth was taken to dentist's office after case was submitted to jury and was at all times in immediate presence and custody of sheriff, and no reference was made to case except question by dentist as to when jury would be through and no vote was taken during such time, defendant was not prejudiced by separation of jury.

10. Criminal law ⚡927(5)—Separation of jury under circumstances showing possibility of tampering is ground for new trial unless state shows no prejudice.

Where jury has been permitted to separate while deliberating on verdict under such circumstances as to make it appear that they might have been tampered with, new trial should be granted unless there is affirmative proof by state explaining separation and showing defendant was not prejudiced thereby, and if such burden is met new trial should be denied.

11. Criminal law ⚡995(7)—Judgment sentencing defendant to imprisonment in state prison at San Quentin held valid (Pen. Code, § 1168).

Judgment sentencing defendant to "imprisonment in state prison of state of California at San Quentin" held valid under Pen. Code, § 1168.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Frank E. Page was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.
See, also, 255 P. 887.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; PRES-
TON, J., voting for a hearing.

D. B. Robnett and A. K. Wylie, both of Al-turas, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles
Jones, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder of the second degree. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction and the order denying a new trial.

For more than a year prior to the homicide the defendant and Mrs. Pearl Connell, who was of the age of about 40 years, jointly conducted a hotel at Cedarville, Modoc county. Apparently he was a widower and she a widow. Mrs. Connell disappeared during the evening of July 6, 1926, and two days later her body was found in an old cellar in the town. This cellar was a mere excavation, partly covered with a board roof and without any wall at one end thereof, that end being entirely open. An autopsy showed that she had been severely beaten about the head and face and that her death was caused by strangulation, her windpipe being crushed, evidently by the grip of some person's fingers on her throat and neck.

The evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime is entirely circumstantial. There is substantial evidence: That he desired to purchase Mrs. Connell's interest in the business, but was unable to raise sufficient money to do so. That the parties engaged in frequent bitter quarrels. That in May or June, 1926, "he said they had just had a hell of a row, and he said that Francis (his adopted son, of the age of 15 or 16 years) had knocked her down with a cup, and he (defendant) laughed about it." That about two weeks before her death he said "she just gave me hell and I can't stand it any longer." That he frequently said "he was going to get rid of her because she was a detriment to the public and a nuisance around the hotel." That in June, 1926, he said: "Pearl and I just had it upstairs; I grabbed her by the nape of the neck and pushed her up against the wall, and I just took my fist and popped her one. * * * I showed her where she belongs." That during that month he told her she was a "lowdown dirty cur," and applied other and viler terms to her. That in March or April of that year he "packed Mrs. Connell out the house and told her to stay out of there." That in February, 1926, he said: "I have got to get rid of her. * * * I don't know how I am going to do it, but * * * it is going to be done." That at that time one of the witnesses, to whom the defendant had related his troubles, said to him, "Pearl is jealous, you make her jealous," to which he replied, "Yes; and I will make her a damn sight more so, too."

About five years prior to the homicide, a young woman, who will be called May, her given name, resided in Cedarville for two or three months, and during that time she and the defendant became "pretty good friends," after which time they met but once prior to the day of the homicide, and then only for a few minutes. May was married to a man in a Sacramento valley town May 22, 1926, and thereafter resided in that town. With one of her brothers and another man she went by automobile from her home to Alturas, where they all attended a rodeo from the 2d to the 5th of July. Apparently their supply of money was running low, and they decided to go to Cedarville. The woman at whose place May stayed while in Alturas testified that May "was talking about going over there (to Cedarville), * * * and they thought they would go to the Frank Beebe house. May says, 'Well; if we go there and it don't suit us, we will go to the hotel. I might be in there in a couple of weeks. * * * I got his money once, and I can get it again.' * * * They got ready to go, * * * and I says, 'Well; are you coming back, or when will I look for you, or what are you going to do?' and May says, 'Well, you know what we are going for.'" May and her companions drove to Cedarville July 6th, arriving there about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and went to the "old Beebe house," but, finding no water in the well there, they finally went to an unoccupied house, known as the Mabrier house, and "camped in that house," they having a light camping outfit with them. May and her brother went to the store to buy some provisions, and on the trip she met Nick Tisserand, whom she had known for many years. She testified:

"I asked him where Frank Page was. * * * He said he was in the hotel. * * * I told him if he saw him to tell him to come up to the Mabrier place, that I wanted to see him. * * * Between 7:30 and 8 o'clock * * * he (defendant) drove up and honked the horn, and I went out. * * * We went down on the Eagleville road and turned around near the Dyke place. * * * We pulled off the road and stopped for a few minutes, and then we came back to the Mabrier house. * * * We stayed there a little while and then drove to the mouth of the canyon and then came back to the Mabrier house."

She further testified that, after the ride, the defendant left the Mabrier house about 9 o'clock; that she thought it was not later than 9 o'clock. May was interrogated by the district attorney on the 8th of July, after the body was found. Relative to the time at which she and the defendant returned to the Mabrier house, she then said:

"I judge it was right around 10 o'clock or maybe later when we got back. * * * We sat there for awhile, * * * maybe an hour or so; I don't know."

At the trial she testified that the statement last quoted is false and that she made it for the purpose of "trying to help Frank"; that "I just figured it this way, if Frank did it, he did it immediately after he left me, and I wanted to help him if I could, and I was not looking for any notoriety myself." The defendant testified that after leaving May at the Mabrier house, on their return from the ride mentioned, he drove directly to the hotel, arriving there after 10 o'clock. Other witnesses testified that he arrived there about 10 o'clock or later. It requires but a few minutes' time to drive from the one place to the other. May and the defendant are the only witnesses who testified as to the time at which the defendant left the Mabrier house.

Relative to the movements of Mrs. Connell during the evening of July 6th, a guest at the hotel testified:

"I saw her when she went out of the hotel. * * * I think it was about a quarter to 9 that evening; it was after half past 8. It was between half past 8 and 9 o'clock. * * * She asked me where Frank was. * * * I told her maybe he had went to see May. * * * I told her that Nick Tisserand had told me that he had brought Frank Page word from May that if he wanted to see her he would find her at the Mabrier house. * * * She (Mrs. Connell) seemed to act quite mad and got wild looking. * * * She went to the safe and looked around the safe and the shelf behind the counter. * * * She pulled out a drawer, and there was something knocking against the end of the drawer."

The next morning the defendant said that "the gun was missing that was in there"; that "it did not make much difference anyway, as there was no loads in the gun."

Several witnesses testified that they heard the screams of a woman during the evening of July 6th between 9 and 10 o'clock. The witnesses who gave the most plausible reasons for the accuracy of their statements fixed the time between 9:15 and 9:30. One woman testified that she heard "one big and two little screams." Another woman testified that she heard a man's voice say, "God damn you!" and "then a scream, and then another scream and then a kind of a—I don't know what kind of a noise." In the street, a short distance from where the body was found, "the weeds had been mashed down and it looked like the appearance of a struggle having taken place there." Mrs. Connell's shoes were found at that place.

A woman employed in the hotel testified that the defendant was up at an unusually early hour in the morning of July 7th; that at that time he said that the door of Mrs. Connell's room was open and that she was not in the room; that he had gone to Eagleville the evening before to see a man who "wanted to go out and look at some mine," and that he reached the hotel on his return about 9 o'clock; that between 9 and 10 o'clock in the forenoon of the same day "he came into the kitchen and said, 'I did not get home last night until 11 o'clock, because I was out with that damned —, May —, and I did not want any one to know it'"; that shortly after the body was found the witness said to the defendant, "Frank Page, you killed that woman as sure as there is a God in Heaven," to which he made no reply, but "turned around and walked out." This witness identified a rubber inner sole of a shoe, hereinafter referred to, as one that she had seen during June, 1926, behind the hotel counter. A witness who heard the woman's screams testified that, between 7:30 and 8 o'clock in the morning of July 7th, the defendant called at the home of the witness and stated that Mrs. Connell left "yesterday afternoon," and that on leaving he said, "Don't say anything about Pearl being gone."

A pair of shoes and a pair of socks, both admittedly worn by defendant during the evening of July 6th, were introduced in evidence. Also, the rubber inner sole referred to was admitted in evidence. The defendant testified that he never saw the inner sole until it was produced at the trial. A witness, who was district attorney at the time of the homicide, testified that he picked up this inner sole at the time the body was found and about ten feet from the old cellar.

Edward Oscar Heinrich, a consulting criminologist employed by the district attorney, testified that, from "two abrasions of the composition of the rubber" inner sole "which correspond in their position with two nails in the heel" of the left shoe, it was his opinion that "the marks on the inner sole might have been made by the nails of that shoe." On cross-examination by counsel for defendant, the witness was asked, "Will you state to the jury as a fact, beyond all reasonable doubt, that those imprints in that inner sole were made by the tacks in that left shoe which is in evidence here?" The witness answered, "Yes, sir." The witness also testified that the soil on the defendant's socks is "very similar" to "the soil at and around" the old cellar.

Chauncey McGovern, a consulting criminologist employed by the defendant, testified with equal positiveness that Heinrich's opinions are entirely erroneous, saying, "It is my definite positive opinion that it (the inner sole) was never used in that shoe, and was never made for that shoe, but was made for a shoe that was at least three sizes smaller."

Both criminologists produced powerful microscopes for the use of the jurors in their inspection of the exhibits. It is not improbable that the jurors were influenced more by their own examinations of such exhibits than by the opinions of the experts.

The defendant testified that the shoes in question were formerly owned by a guest at the hotel, who died in January or February, 1926; that "when his sister came, I offered her the shoes, and all his shoes, * * * but she said she did not want them. Then I picked out these shoes and commenced wearing them. * * * I saw they were a good pair of shoes, and I kept them and wore them; they was good for me when I did not have any."

The defendant was put to the necessity of squarely contradicting a large number of witnesses, and 13 citizens of Cedarville testified that his reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity was bad.

[1, 2] It cannot be held, as a matter of law, that the evidence is insufficient to warrant the verdict. There is substantial evidence to justify the inference that the defendant greatly desired to be rid of the deceased; that he was financially unable to purchase her interest in the business; that he had frequently quarreled with her and had, on at least two occasions resorted to physical violence; that she was jealous of him; that about 9 o'clock in the evening she took a gun and left the hotel when informed that the defendant had gone to see May; that about a half hour later, in a struggle with some man, she received violent blows upon her head and face and was then strangled; that the defendant's movements from 9 to 10 o'clock are accounted for only by his own testimony, which is squarely contradicted by that of May; that the defendant at first gave a false account of his whereabouts during the evening of the homicide; that he at first made a false statement as to the time of his return to the hotel that evening and, a few hours later, when he probably perceived that the truth would serve his purpose better, he correctly stated the time of such return; and that he remained silent when directly accused of the murder by a woman in his employ. Neither can it be said that the presence of the inner sole near the place where the body was found and the character of the soil adhering to defendant's socks are not material circumstances entitled to some weight in the chain of circumstantial evidence. Shoes often leave tell-tale tracks which could have been avoided by their removal.

Considering all the circumstances enumerated, including defendant's attitude towards the deceased and the latter's evident agitation at the time she left the hotel, the jury may have reasonably inferred that she left the hotel and the defendant the Mabrier house about the same time; that they met in the street opposite the old cellar and there engaged in an altercation; that in the altercation the defendant violently assaulted the deceased with his fists; and that, for the purpose of stifling her screams, he then seized her by the throat and choked her, thereby causing her death. Whether or not the deceased met her death in the manner stated, the circumstances thereof are such that the defendant's guilt or innocence was a question of fact for the jury.

Appellant contends that such circumstances are equally consistent with the hypothesis of defendant's innocence as that of his guilt, and that, therefore, "there is a failure of proof necessary to sustain a conviction, and the question presented is one of law for the court," citing People v. Staples, 149 Cal. 405, 425, 86 P. 886, 894, where it is said:

"The deduction to be drawn from these circumstances is ordinarily one for the jury, but where, * * * every circumstance relied on as incriminating is equally compatible with innocence, there is a failure of proof necessary to sustain a conviction, and the question presented is one of law for the court."

[3] It is not to be presumed that it was intended, by the language quoted, to declare that an appellate court may substitute its judgment for that of the jury in determining whether the circumstances relied on to establish a defendant's guilt are equally consistent with his innocence. In the language of this court in People v. Muhly, 15 Cal. App. 416, 419, 114 P. 1017, 1018, "we do not understand that case to hold that where the circumstances are such as to reasonably justify the inference of guilt, the case will be taken from the jury because an inference of innocence might also reasonably have been drawn. Between these two inferences the jury must choose, and it is only where the evidence obviously does not warrant the inference of guilt that the court will interfere." This language was quoted with approval in People v. Martinez, 20 Cal. App. 343, 345, 128 P. 952, and People v. Strauss, 75 Cal. App. 447, 455, 243 P. 67. In the latter case a hearing in the Supreme Court was denied.

[4, 5] Heinrich testified that he had examined the soil in the vicinity of the old cellar and that it is similar to that found on defendant's sock. This examination, apparently, was made without the use of a microscope. He also testified that he made a microscopic examination of samples of soil furnished by the sheriff, presumably from the cellar, but that he did not know that they were taken from the cellar. Counsel for defendant then moved the court to strike out the testimony of the witness "in regard to the soil on the socks being similar to the soil in the cellar, on the ground that it is not shown that this soil that was brought to him came from the cellar." The court said: "I will allow it to stand subject to your motion in the event it is not connected up." It is now contended that it was not connected up and that the court erred in not striking out the evidence. There are two answers to the contention. First, the witness had testified that he had examined the soil around the cellar without the aid of a microscope. This was a sufficient foundation for the admission in evidence of his opinion. Secondly, the defendant waived his objection by not renewing his motion after failure of the prosecution to prove that the samples of soil furnished by the sheriff came from the cellar. 24 Cal. Jur. 782; Estate of Wempe, 185 Cal. 557, 564, 197 P. 949.

[6] It is urged that the court erred in permitting Heinrich "to give his opinion and conclusion with regard to what made the holes in the rubber inner sole; and to testify as to his reasons for such opinion." The question to which objection was made at the trial was whether the marks on the inner sole "might have been made by the nails of that shoe." The witness had testified that he had made accurate measurements of the distance between the imprints in the rubber inner sole while under a pressure of 150 pounds and of that between the nails in the shoe and had found them the same, and his answer that the imprints might have been made by such nails was an obvious conclusion from the facts stated—a conclusion which the jurors themselves doubtless reached if they believed such facts. If, therefore, it be conceded that the matter was not a proper subject of expert testimony, the error complained of was not prejudicial.

[7, 8] The court refused to instruct the jury that the absence of motive "is a circumstance in favor of the innocence of the defendant." Such refusal was not error. People v. Wilkins, 158 Cal. 530, 536, 111 P. 612. The court properly refused to instruct "that any evidence that has been introduced in this case, showing the conduct or relation of the defendant with the said deceased, Pearl Connell, can only be considered by you in determining whether or not the defendant might or might not have had a motive to commit the crime charged against him." Obviously such evidence was relevant to show malice.

[9, 10] From affidavits presented on the hearing of defendant's motion for a new trial, it appears that the case was submitted to the jury about noon, May 12, 1927; that the jury returned a verdict about 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the following day; that one of the jurors was suffering from an infected tooth, which was being treated by a dentist; that it was necessary for the dentist to clean and re-pack the tooth after each meal; that after the evening meal of May 12th and the morning and noon meals of the next day the sheriff or his deputy took such juror to the dentist for treatment, remaining in the dentist's office with the juror about 15 minutes on each occasion; that during all of the times that he was absent from the jury room the juror was in the immediate presence and custody of the officer, and that no reference was made to the case during any of said times, except that on one occasion the dentist asked the deputy sheriff in charge of the juror when the jury would be through, to which the deputy replied that he did not know; and that "no discussion was had upon any phase of said cause and no vote thereon was taken" at any time during which such juror was absent from the jury room. "Where the jury has been permitted to separate while deliberating upon a verdict, under such circumstances as to make it appear that they might have been tampered with, a new trial should be granted, unless there is affirmative proof upon behalf of the people explaining the separation and showing that the defendant was not prejudiced thereby. * * * If this burden is met by the people a new trial should be denied." People v. Cord, 157 Cal. 562, 571, 108 P. 511, 515. The proof in this case is ample to show that the defendant was not prejudiced by the separation of the jury.

[11] The defendant was sentenced to "imprisonment in the state prison of the state of California, at San Quentin." Appellant contends that the judgment is void. It is in the form approved in People v. Ure, 68 Cal. App. 545, 548, 229 P. 987, except that in that case the judgment contained the additional words, "as prescribed by law." Section 1168 of the Penal Code provides that "the court in imposing * * * sentence shall not fix the term or duration of the period of imprisonment." In People v. Mendosa, 178 Cal. 509, 510, 173 P. 998, it is said:

"Under this section the judgment of the court properly consists of a recital of the offense of which the defendant stands convicted, a designation of the state prison to which he is committed, and nothing more."

Measured by this rule, the judgment is valid.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

MORGAN et al. v. GREEN. (Civ. 5922.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 21, 1927.

1. Evidence $\Rightarrow$ 448—Parol evidence was inadmissible to explain meaning of lease contract containing complete statement of obligations of parties without uncertainty (Code Civ. Proc. § 1856).

Where lease, providing that lessees should have use of pumping plant now being installed and pay all charges in connection with making a cotton crop, was complete statement of undertakings of parties, without uncertainty as to their respective legal obligations, parol evidence was inadmissible to explain meaning thereof, in view of presumption under Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, that agreement embraced all terms agreed on.

2. Evidence $\Rightarrow$ 450(1)—Parol evidence is admissible, where terms of instruments are sufficiently uncertain to leave intention in doubt.

An exception to the parol evidence rule is that such evidence is admissible, where terms of the instruments are sufficiently uncertain to leave intention of parties in doubt.

3. Landlord and tenant $\Rightarrow$ 331(6)—Evidence held not to establish landlord's covenant to furnish water to irrigate land for cotton crop.

In tenant's action for breach of landlord's contract to furnish water, evidence held insufficient to establish landlord's covenant to furnish water to irrigate land for cotton crop to be grown by tenants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by W. O. Morgan and another against Frank E. Green. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Emmons & Aldrich, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

C. O. Bettys, of Los Angeles, and Brittan & Brittan, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs sued for damages for breach of contract. The cause was tried before a jury, resulting in a verdict of $7,000 in favor of the plaintiffs, and from the judgment following the verdict the defendant has appealed upon a typewritten record.

The complaint alleged that on April 22, 1924, the plaintiffs and defendant executed a written lease covering 120 acres of land owned by the defendant. It was recited in the lease that the lessees, having plowed and cultivated the land, agreed to plant the same to cotton and to irrigate, cultivate, chop, and care for said cotton to maturity, and to keep the said land free and clear of weeds and grass; that the lessees "shall have the use of the buildings, corrals, and pumping plant now being installed" throughout the season, and shall furnish all tools and implements and pay all expenses in connection with the planting and bringing to maturity of the cotton, and that "the lessor shall pay for the cotton seed to plant said land and shall pay all charges for power to operate said pumping plant"; that the cotton produced, together with the cotton seed, shall be divided equally between the lessor and the lessees, "which portion the lessees agree shall constitute in full their entire compensation for their undertaking herein." The complaint alleged that, as a part of the consideration for signing and executing the lease, the defendant at the time and concurrently with its execution agreed with the plaintiffs that he would furnish and supply the plaintiffs from the pumping plant that was being installed on the property a sufficient and ample amount of water to irrigate all the land sufficient for raising to maturity the cotton that was to be planted on the land; that plaintiffs, in pursuance of said agreement, did immediately plow, cultivate, list, and plant the whole of said land to cotton; that they had faithfully and completely performed all acts to be performed by them, but that the defendant has failed and refused to furnish the water to irrigate the land; that by reason thereof the plaintiffs were unable to irrigate the land or to raise any cotton thereon to their damage. The answer admitted the execution of the written contract of April 22, 1924, and denied all allegations relating to any oral agreement covering the supply of water for irrigating the crop. It denied that pursuant to the terms of the written contract the plaintiffs plowed, cultivated, or performed any labor upon the land, but alleged that all labor performed by the plaintiffs on the land was done prior to the execution of the lease while they were operating as subtenants under a lease between the defendant and George and Griffin; that prior to April 22 all the planting of cotton upon said land had been performed from cotton seed furnished by the defendant to George and Griffin under the terms of their lease. It was denied that the defendant made any agreement to furnish any water to irrigate the land either before or after the execution of the lease of April 22d.

Upon the trial it developed that George and Griffin had leased the premises from the defendant under a written contract dated January 26, 1924, for the purpose of planting the land to cotton. In the month of February the plaintiffs agreed with George and Griffin to take over their lease and had a conversation with the defendant in which the latter agreed that this might be done if the original lessees would hold themselves responsible for the performance of the terms of the lease. Under this arrangement the plaintiffs prepared and planted the land to cotton, commencing work about February 27th, and finishing some time before April 22d. At the time they started work upon the premises a well had been drilled, but no pump installed. On or about March 2d, the defendant installed a pump in this well, but was able to develop only a small quantity of water. For a period of some two months thereafter he made every endeavor to develop water in the well, but was finally compelled to abandon operations because the well continually filled with sand. During the month of March the plaintiffs and the defendant had several conversations relating to defendant's efforts to develop water from the well, and on April 1st occurred the conversation upon which the plaintiffs rely as establishing a contemporaneous oral agreement to furnish sufficient water for the irrigation of the crop. The plaintiff Morgan's version of this conversation is R. T. (page 12, line 23):

"I says to Mr. Green, I says, 'Mr. Green, I think the well is a failure, it has just about quit running, there don't seem to be any water.'

" 'Don't seem to be any water, what about it?' and he says, 'There is plenty of water there, all we need is to perforate the well.' * * * I said, 'Mr. Green, what if the water isn't there, what will we do about it?' and he says, 'You go ahead with your work, go right on, and if I fail to produce the water I will pay for your work.' Well, I went on back then, and told my partner what he said."

Another conversation occurred shortly after this as testified to by plaintiff Morgan, as follows (R. T. page 14, line 18):

"He says, 'There is an abundance of water there, I will guarantee the water, you go ahead and do the work; * * * I am going to send over and get an air compressor and blow that sand and water out and put that pump back, and we will have an abundance of water.'"

Plaintiffs continued to live upon the land and to do some work in connection with the cleaning out of the well under their arrangement with George and Griffin until April 21st, when they approached the defendant and asked that they be given a lease in their own names covering the premises. A lease was accordingly prepared and handed to the plaintiffs for their examination. They returned on the following day, having signed the lease which is in evidence. Asked as to conversations relating to the water supply at this time, the plaintiff Morgan testified (Tr. page 17, line 25):

"I don't remember anything said about the water at all at that time."

The plaintiff Townsend testified (Tr., page 78, line 12):

"Mr. Green, he said that the pump would be all right now, he thought, we would have plenty of water. He says, 'After it rains a while the well will get stronger.' * * *

"That was about all that was said about the water then."

On behalf of the defendant it was shown that he had made every effort to develop water from the particular well in which the pump was installed, but that the well continually filled with sand until finally abandoned some time in the month of May, 1924. It was also shown that when it appeared that the water could not be developed the defendant offered to procure for the plaintiffs another tract of land in the immediate neighborhood which he agreed to lease to the plaintiffs under the same terms of the contract of April 22d. Plaintiffs, however, refused to accept this offer, stating that they were wholly unable to finance themselves during the summer, and that they would have been unable to have continued their contract with the defendant unless he had furnished them with funds to carry them over until the returns from the crop were received. It was also shown that the sanding of the well was not an unusual occurrence in that locality, but that it was known that many wells in the immediate vicinity had been abandoned on account of that condition, and that these facts were all known to the plaintiffs before the execution of the lease.

During the trial of the case the defendant objected to the admission of all the testimony relating to the conversations had covering the supply of water upon the grounds that it tended to contradict and vary the writing of April 22d. On this appeal respondent argues that the testimony was admissible under the exception to the general rule that when a portion only of the agreement between the parties had been reduced to writing it was proper to allow parol evidence covering the portion omitted, and that it was also admissible for the purpose of explaining the true meaning of the portion of the contract reading:

"The lessees shall have the use of * * * pumping plant now being installed throughout the season, and shall * * * pay all charges in connection with the planting and bringing to maturity of the cotton planted on said land."

[1] It will be noted that the theory upon which the complaint was drawn was that the contract to furnish sufficient water to mature the crop was a contemporaneous collateral agreement made at the time of the execution of the written agreement and as a part of the consideration for the latter. This theory, however, was abandoned during the course of the trial, and respondents insisted that the conversations were admissible for the purpose of explaining the true meaning of the written contract, and that as so explained that contract contained an express covenant on the part of the appellant to furnish water sufficient to irrigate the land and to bring the crop to maturity.

The two theories in support of the judgment are inconsistent. If the language of the lease relating to the pumping plant is to be interpreted as relating to the supply of water in the well, then a collateral covenant to furnish sufficient water to bring the entire crop to maturity could not be proved by parol. The rule is found in section 1856, Code of Civil Procedure, which declares that when the terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing it is presumed to embrace all the terms agreed upon. The decisions are all in harmony with the section of the Code running from Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 327, 330, 26 P. 830, 23 Am. St. Rep. 469, to Thoroman v. David, 199 Cal. 386, 390, 249 P. 513. We cannot improve upon the language of Thompson v. Libby, 34 Minn. 377, 26 N. W. 1, quoted in the Harrison Case, and approved in the later decisions:

"If it imports on its face to be a complete expression of the whole agreement—that is, contains such language as imports a complete legal obligation—it is to be presumed that the parties have introduced into it every material item and term; and parol evidence cannot be admitted to add another term to the agreement, although the writing contains nothing on the particular one to which the parol evidence is directed."

Upon the theory first advanced by respondents that the evidence was admissible because the writing did not include all the terms agreed upon—the rule is uniform that evidence of such collateral agreements is admissible only when the circumstances attending the execution of the writing show that the parties did not intend it to be a complete and final statement of the whole transaction. 10 Cal. Juris. p. 927. The lease here does not come within this exception. It appears upon the face to be a complete statement of the undertakings of the respective parties without any uncertainty as to their respective legal obligations within the rule of Harrison v. McCormick, supra. Gardiner v. McDonogh, 147 Cal. 313, 319, 81 P. 964, and Germain Fruit Co. v. Armsby Company, 153 Cal. 585, 595, 96 P. 319.

Respondents cite Henika v. Lange, 55 Cal. App. 336, 203 P. 798. The case is not in point. The court was there considering the admissibility of parol evidence of the kind of crop which the parties contemplated was to be planted by the lessees under a written lease. By the terms of the lease the lessor contracted to furnish the lessees "a pumping plant of sufficient size to irrigate the above-described land properly," and the lessees agreed to run said pumping plant "continuously during the growing season of the crop." During the course of the trial parol evidence was admitted for the purpose of showing that the parties had agreed that the land should be planted in rice, that it was not suitable for raising any other crop, and that in the raising of rice a large supply of water was needed—greater than for any other crop. All of this evidence was admitted on the theory that it was necessary to show what the parties contemplated by the language of the lease reading: "A pumping plant of sufficient size to irrigate the above-described land properly." The difference between the Henika Case and the case at bar is apparent. In the first the lessor obligated himself to furnish and install a pumping plant of sufficient size to irrigate the land for the purpose of raising a particular crop. If one well or one pumping plant was insufficient for this purpose, the obligation was upon him to seek other wells or install other pumping plants. In the case at bar the lessor merely agreed to turn over to the lessees a particular pumping plant described in the lease as the one then being installed on the premises, and he further agreed to furnish power for the use of the lessees in the operation of that particular pumping plant. He did not covenant to furnish or maintain a pumping plant of sufficient size to irrigate all or any portion of the land as was done in the Henika Case. Respondents also cite Greathouse v. Daleno, 57 Cal. App. 187, 206 P. 1019, where the court admitted parol evidence of an independent agreement upon the part of the owner of the land to remove trees from his land prior to the execution of an agreement for the leveling and grading of the land. The evidence was admitted under the well-known exception to the general rule that, where the subject-matter of the parol agreement is distinct from that to which the writing relates and the writing itself is silent on that matter, the agreement may be shown by parol particularly when it does not alter or vary the terms of the written contract.

A case more closely in point is Ayers v. So. Pac. Co., 173 Cal. 74, 159 P. 144, L. R. A. 1917F, 949. The defendant had subdivided a tract of land to be sold in lots for a town site. The plaintiff purchased lots from the defendant under a deed containing a covenant that no intoxicating liquor should be sold or given away on the premises. After she had erected a hotel on the premises other lots were sold, all containing the same covenant, but the purchasers of these lots erected saloons on their lots and sold intoxicating liquors in violation of their covenants. The defendant refused to enforce the covenants, and the plaintiff sued for damages. The trial court admitted evidence of oral representations made to plaintiff, as an inducement to her purchase, tending to show that the defendant promised that no intoxicating liquor would ever be sold or given away upon any of the lots sold. In reversing the trial court the Supreme Court held that these representations did not amount to a contract of warranty, but were merely matter of opinion or prophecy, and, in the absence of an allegation of fraud or that they were false, they were not actionable. On the question of the admissibility of the parol evidence, the court said:

"The so-called agreement that sales of liquor should never take place in Moron was essentially a warranty regarding the permanent advantages of the property sold. Such a warranty, if made, would be a part of the contract of sale and not collateral thereto. To justify the admission of parol evidence of a contract between parties who have made an agreement in writing, on the ground that it is collateral, it must be upon a subject distinct from that to which the writing relates. Germain Fruit Co. v. J. K. Armsby Co., 153 Cal. 594, 96 P. 319. Here the written agreement itself speaks on the subject of the sale of intoxicating liquors, and provides that none shall ever be sold on the premises described. To add to this provision the further stipulation that none should ever be sold in the entire town of Moron, and that the railroad company should see that none was ever sold there, would be to add by parol to a written agreement which on its face purports to be complete upon that subject, and which, under section 1856, is presumed to embrace all the terms agreed on. Such evidence is inadmissible."

[2] One of the well-known exceptions to the parol evidence rule is that such evidence is admissible where the terms of the instrument are sufficiently uncertain to leave the intention of the parties in doubt. It is argued by the respondents that the parol evidence in this case was admissible under this theory. In support of the argument it is said that the term "pumping plant now being installed" is uncertain and unintelligible, and that to explain its meaning it is proper to show that the appellant covenanted to furnish water from this particular well upon which the pumping plant was being installed sufficient to irrigate the entire 120 acres and to bring the cotton crop planted thereon to full maturity. We are unable to perceive any uncertainty in the language of the lease. The lessor obligated himself to give the lessees the use of a particular pumping plant—the one which was then being installed upon the premises—and he also undertook to pay all charges for power to operate that particular pumping plant. There is nothing in this language which justifies an interpretation that by leasing the pumping plant the lessor undertook to guarantee any particular quantity of water. It might as well be said that in leasing the land he warranted it to be suitable for the raising of a particular quantity of cotton; that in agreeing to furnish the cotton seed he warranted its quality or the crop which it should produce; that in giving the lessees the use of the buildings and corrals he meant to furnish the buildings for living purposes or to fill the corrals with live stock.

[3] Aside from the question of the admissibility of the evidence, it wholly fails to establish the covenant upon which the respondents recovered. By the verdict they were given the full amount which it was estimated they would have received from the sale of one-half of the cotton crop if the land had produced at its maximum capacity. The evidence shows without conflict that all the conversations relating to the water occurred long prior to the execution of the lease and at a time when the respondents were operating under a lease given to George and Griffin. The evidence is also without conflict that the parties to the original lease made no engagements as to the amount of water to be supplied from the well, but on the contrary it was shown in the testimony of the witness George that this factor was intentionally omitted from their lease because it was not customary in that locality to require the lessor to guarantee any certain amount of water in a lease of that character. It also appears that during all of this period when these conversations were had neither the appellant nor the respondents had in contemplation the execution of a lease between themselves. Thus if a covenant to furnish sufficient water to bring the cotton crop to maturity can be implied from any of these conversations, it was a covenant which would have inured to the benefit of the lessees, George and Griffin, and not to the respondents herein. But there is nothing in the evidence which warrants an inference that such a covenant was intended by either party. The most that this evidence does show is an independent contract wherein the appellant agreed that if sufficient water was not developed from the well he would pay the respondents for the work which they had expended upon the premises. If the extent of the agreement as shown in these conversations was that the lessor should pay the lessees for their labor if the water failed, then their measure of recovery is not that represented in the judgment, and the record fails to contain any competent evidence to support a judgment upon the obligation pleaded. We do not deem it necessary to consider the other errors assigned.

Judgment reversed.

SNYDER v. REEG. (Civ. 3323.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 21, 1927.

1. Municipal corporations $\S$ 705(2)—“Throwing hand out” held not proper signal of automobile driver’s intention to turn (Motor Vehicle Act, $\S$ 130, subd. [a], par. 3, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, $\S$ 15a).

In action for property damage from an automobile collision, defendant’s evidence, “I threw my ‘hand out’” to make a turn, held insufficient to meet requirement of Motor Vehicle Act, $\S$ 130, subd. (a), par. 3, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, $\S$ 15a, requiring that the arm shall be extended during the last 50 feet preceding the turn about to be made.

2. Municipal corporations $\S$ 706(5)—Evidence held to sustain finding plaintiff’s speed was less than 15 miles per hour at time automobiles collided at street intersection.

In action for property damage from an automobile collision at street intersection when defendant’s automobile in making left-hand turn collided with plaintiff’s, evidence held to sustain trial court’s finding that at time of collision plaintiff was traveling at rate of speed less than 15 miles per hour.

3. New trial $\S$ 150(2)—Affidavits of plaintiff’s intoxication at time of automobile collision held insufficient to justify new trial.

Affidavits of witness, that at time of automobile collision plaintiff was intoxicated, and of defendant, that he had made effort to secure evidence thereof and could not, with reasonable effort, secure testimony of witness at time of trial and requesting new trial for newly discovered evidence, held insufficient to authorize granting of new trial therefor.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Robert F. Snyder against Oscar Reeg. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Abe Darlington and Henry S. Lyon, both of Placerville, for appellant.

E. Fitzgerald, of Placerville, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff had judgment in an action to recover damages to an automobile owned by him, suffered by collision with an automobile owned and driven by the defendant. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

In support of his appeal the appellant alleges that the finding of fact that the plaintiff was traveling at a rate of speed less than 15 miles per hour is contrary to the evidence, and also that appellant’s motion for a new trial should have been granted. The particular findings of fact complained of are not set forth in the appellant’s brief. An examination of the record, however, shows findings, in substance, that the plaintiff was traveling at a speed not in excess of 15 miles per hour. At the time of the collision referred to the plaintiff was driving westerly on Main street, in the city of Placerville, and the defendant was driving in an easterly direction on the same street. At a point or place on said street where an intersecting street crosses Main street between two points known as Formi’s Corner and the Bell Tower, the defendant attempted a left-turn, and in so doing came in contact with the automobile then and there being driven by the plaintiff. No personal injuries appear to have been suffered by either of the parties, and the judgment awarded compensation for the damages inflicted upon the plaintiff’s automobile.

[1] Before referring to the testimony which to us seems to support the judgment of the trial court, we may dispose of the contention that the defendant gave a proper signal indicating his intention to make a left-hand turn. His testimony is as follows: “I threw my hand out.” There is nothing in the record showing that the signal required to be given by the third paragraph of subdivision (a) of section 130 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1925, p. 412) was given by the defendant. The paragraph to which we have referred reads as follows:

“The signal herein required to be given before turning to the right or left, whether given by means of the hand and arm or by means of an approved mechanical or electric device, shall be given continuously during the last 50 feet traveled by the vehicle before turning."

The record discloses nothing which would indicate that this provision of the Motor Vehicle Law was complied with by the defendant. The mere extending of one's hand prior to making a turn does not comply with the law. The requirement is that the arm shall be extended during the last 50 feet preceding the turn about to be made. The evident purpose of keeping the arm out is that drivers coming from an opposite direction may have a reasonable time within which to observe the signal being given by an approaching driver. And unless the arm, after being extended, is maintained in that position, the signal required by law is not given. So far as this case is concerned, there is nothing to show that the defendant did not attempt a left-hand turn and come in collision with plaintiff's car without having given the signal required by law.

[2] As to the rate of speed at which plaintiff was driving his car, the record shows the following testimony. Gertrude Springer, a witness called by the plaintiff, testified:

"I drive a car.

"Q. I will ask you if you can tell about how fast the plaintiff's car was going down the street? A. Not exactly, but about 15 miles."

On cross-examination:

"Q. About how fast would you say the car was going when it passed you? A. About 15 miles. That is my judgment; it was not going faster. In my estimation it was going exactly 15 miles."

The witness Boccocini, called by the plaintiff, testified:

"I was riding with the plaintiff. When we got in front of the courthouse, we were driving about 15 miles an hour. I looked at the speedometer at the courthouse. We did not seem to go any faster after that."

Markham Welsh, a witness called by the plaintiff, testified that in his opinion the defendant was under the influence of intoxicating liquor. The plaintiff testified that he was driving around about 15 miles an hour. Might have been a little more, might have been a little less. At the time of the collision the plaintiff testified that he was going about 15 miles an hour. There was also testimony in the record to the effect that the plaintiff was driving somewhat faster than 15 miles an hour across the intersection where the collision took place, but the foregoing testimony is sufficient to sustain the finding of the court. The finding of the court relative to the speed of the plaintiff was significant on account of the allegation of the appellant that the plaintiff was traveling at an unlawful rate of speed, and therefore was guilty of contributory negligence, barring his right to recovery. The testimony to which we have referred, however, supports the judgment of the trial court and disposes of appellant's first alleged error.

[3] The second ground of alleged error is based upon the refusal of the trial court to grant a new trial. Plaintiff founded his motion upon two affidavits, one by George Besse, and one by himself. The setting forth of these affidavits shows their absolute insufficiency. George Besse deposed as follows:

"I am well acquainted with the plaintiff, Robert F. Snyder, and saw him at the Eagle's dance on the night of the collision between Snyder's automobile and the automobile of Oscar Reeg, and, in the opinion of affiant, Robert F. Snyder was under the influence of intoxicating liquor."

Oscar Reeg made affidavit as follows:

"That he is the defendant in the above-entitled action. That he made every diligent effort to secure evidence regarding the intoxication of the plaintiff at the time of the collision, and could not, with reasonable effort, secure the testimony of George Besse at the time of the trial of the issues in the above-entitled matter, and respectfully requests the court for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence."

Comment as to the insufficiency of the foregoing affidavits to justify the granting of a new trial is unnecessary.

Finding nothing in the record justifying any interference with the conclusions of the trial court, the judgment in this cause is affirmed.

FLEUTI v. APPLIEDORN. (Civ. 6002.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 21, 1927.

1. Contracts $\S$ 309(1)—When parties agree on cause sufficient to excuse performance, possibility of performance will be tested by it.

When the parties to a contract agree on a cause sufficient to excuse it, possibility of performance will be tested by such cause.

2. Evidence $\S$ 455—Admitting evidence of surrounding circumstances to aid in determining meaning of "circumstances beyond control" excusing lessor's breach of contract held proper.

Under lease providing that, if "circumstances beyond control" should arise so that lessor would not be able to deliver premises, money deposited should be returned, it was proper to admit evidence of surrounding circumstances to aid in determination of meaning of term "circumstances beyond control," which has no definite or settled meaning.

3. Landlord and tenant — 128(1)—Delivery of premises held conditioned on option in prior lease and "circumstances beyond control" which might arise to prevent delivery referred thereto.

Purpose of parties under lease providing that lessor, if circumstances beyond his control should arise, making delivery of premises impossible, would return all money deposited, was, in view of evidence of surrounding circumstances, to condition delivery of demised premises on option in prior lease, and term "circumstances beyond control" was intended to refer exclusively thereto.

4. Landlord and tenant — 184(2)—Lessor obligated to return money in full, if circumstances beyond control prevented delivery of premises, must only return lessee's deposit on failure to perform.

Under lease providing, if delivery of premises was prevented by circumstances beyond lessor's control, then all money deposited should be returned in full to lessee, lessor, on failure to deliver premises because former lessee exercised option to renew lease, was required only to return deposit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by A. J. Fleuti against C. A. Appledorn. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hayes, Oliphant & Dukette and David D. Oliphant, Jr., all of Oakland, for appellant. McKee, Tasheira & Wahrhaftig, of Oakland, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. Appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant in an action wherein plaintiff sought damages resulting to him by reason of defendant's failure to place said plaintiff in possession of certain premises.

There is little dispute regarding the facts of the case, and an outline thereof follows:

Defendant, Appledorn, on January 16, 1920, executed a three-year lease to certain parties named Lundquist and Chester (not parties to this action). By its terms this lease was to expire on January 15, 1923. The lease contained a provision giving Lundquist and Chester the right or option to extend it for an additional two years, and this option could be exercised at any time before the expiration of the term. On November 22, 1922, and while the Lundquist and Chester lease was still in force Appledorn executed to the plaintiff and appellant herein, Fleuti, a lease upon the same premises for a term of five years, commencing on January 16, 1923. The lessees under the first lease elected to exercise the option of extension, and in pursuance thereof remained in possession, and the plaintiff, Fleuti, lessee under the second lease, was refused possession and was never let into the premises to him demised.

At the trial of this action it was stipulated between the parties in open court that the reasonable rental value of the premises covered by the lease was $50 per month in excess of the rental provided for in the lease, and that, if defendant were liable, the judgment should be for the sum of $3,000. It may be noted in passing that this sum stipulated as damages represents the entire damage to plaintiff, and does not include any elements, save difference between amount of rent and actual value of the premises. There is no showing or claim of damages accruing by reason of loss of business, expense of moving, or damage to merchandise.

The lease to plaintiff, Fleuti, was in the general form and no point is made as to its sufficiency. This lease, however, contained a paragraph around which centers the present controversy, and that paragraph is as follows:

"It is further agreed by the party of the first part and the party of the second part, if circumstances beyond the control of party of the first part should arise that the party of the first part should not be able to deliver the hereinabove specified premises on the date agreed, all money deposited to the party of the first part should be returned in full to the party of the second part."

Perhaps, unnecessarily, it may be stated that party of the first part described the lessor, Appledorn, the defendant herein.

The plaintiff testified that he personally took no part in the negotiations preceding the execution of the lease to him, and that he had no conversation with the defendant prior to the signing of the lease. The plaintiff further testified that he did all of the business with his agent, a Mr. Poney. It was also in evidence on the part of plaintiff that on November 8, 1922, a few days prior to the execution of the lease, the plaintiff made a deposit of $50 to bind the agreement and received from defendant a written acknowledgment of receipt thereof. In this acknowledgment appears the clause: "If circumstances beyond the control of the owner should arise, the money deposited should be returned."

The defendant, over the objection of plaintiff, was permitted to show, and did offer testimony showing, that at the time of and before the execution of the lease all of his negotiations were with one Mr. Poney, agent of plaintiff. The trial court permitted defendant to show that the premises were subject to the lease and option of Lundquist and Chester, and that at the time of the negotiations with plaintiff's agent Poney this fact was divulged and the said Poney well knew the situation then existing. Defendant, Appledorn, testified, over objection of plaintiff, that many times before November 8th the prior lessees, Lundquist and Chester, had advised him orally that they would not take advantage of their option, but would vacate on January 15, 1923. The first time he was so notified was in August, 1922, and the assurance was repeated on each succeeding month at the time of rent collection. On January 10, 1923, the said lessees, however, advised the owner of their intention to remain.

The trial court found upon sufficient evidence that the existence of the Lundquist and Chester lease and the option of renewal therein contained was known to plaintiff at the time of the execution of the lease to him, and that defendant notified plaintiff of the existence of said option and stated that he was willing to lease the premises to plaintiff subject to the exercise of said option, and that plaintiff was willing to accept a lease subject to the exercise of said option, and that, in order to make said lease subject to the option, the provision hereinabove set forth was inserted.

The court further found that it was the intent of said provision in the lease here involved, and so understood by plaintiff and defendant, that, in the event said Lundquist and Chester should exercise the option in the lease executed to them, the exercise of which option was a circumstance beyond the control of defendant herein, then and in that event said defendant should be released from all liability arising out of the execution of the lease to plaintiff, and said lease last referred to should be at an end, and both parties thereto should be released from any liability thereunder.

Appellant here contends that upon the facts as admitted and upon the stipulation as to damages the trial court erred in not entering judgment in his favor for the amount stipulated as damages, namely, $3,000. Appellant strenuously urges that the provision in the lease as to failure to deliver possession is plain, clear, and unambiguous, and does not require the aid of extrinsic evidence to determine its meaning.

Without detailing separately each of appellant's points urged, it will suffice to state that it is his claim that, even if we find the court below properly admitted oral testimony to aid in construing the contract, nevertheless, the testimony adduced was insufficient to support the judgment rendered. It is urged that the facts here shown are not sufficient to be deemed "circumstances beyond the control" of the lessor to deliver possession, and then he further urges that, even if it be found that defendant was unable to deliver possession by circumstances beyond his control, yet he was not freed from further liability, but could still be called upon to respond to plaintiff for whatever damage followed his failure, even after the return of the deposit or other moneys received.

The old rule of restricting the admission of parol testimony to vary the terms of a written contract is invoked. This rule, however, has its limitations. Conceding its force, nevertheless, it is correlated with many other rules of construction, and its force somewhat diminished in cases where manifest injustice would result from a too rigorous adherence thereto. However, accepting the rule of law prohibiting the admission of oral testimony to vary or alter the terms of a written contract, we have still the rule permitting, if not compelling, the admission of testimony that will explain and interpret the meaning of doubtful terms in a written contract, and also the rule which commands an examination into all of the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties and the subject-matter to illustrate the true intent and application of words or phrases of ordinarily common meaning.

[1] In the instant case all parties knew of the existence of the prior lease and that the exercise of the option given therein would leave the premises beyond the control of the lessor, Appledorn, and the evidence shows that at the time of negotiating for the lease under discussion here the defendant, Appledorn, informed plaintiff of this impediment to his contractual capacity with reference to the premises. Plaintiff himself prepared the writing and the language employed was his. At the instance of defendant and his demand that the contract cover the question of the option of the prior lessees and provide against the event of its exercise plaintiff inserted the paragraph here involved. We are not dealing with a case where it is claimed that performance became impossible after execution due to something extraneous. Here the situation was fully disclosed, and the purpose of the provision was to limit rights and liabilities of the parties in the event of the exercise of the option of the prior lessees. The term "circumstances beyond control" has no definite or settled meaning either in the law of contracts or elsewhere. True many authorities may be found to establish what facts or circumstances will or will not excuse performance; but none will be found to hold that, when the parties to a contract themselves agree upon a cause sufficient to excuse it, the possibility of performance will be tested by those authorities.

[2] In the brief of appellant herein we find him contending for this principle of law, viz.:

"If a certain intention was sought to be expressed, the contract should be so construed so long as the language used may fairly include it," citing Balfour v. Fresno Canal & Irrigation Co., 109 Cal. 221, 41 P. 876.

We think it follows that under the circumstances shown to have existed the trial court was clearly right in admitting evidence of the surrounding circumstances to aid it in determining just what was sought to be expressed, and the admission of this evidence was essential and necessary before it could be determined whether or not the language used might fairly include it.

It is quite unnecessary to go beyond the decisions of our own courts for ample light to guide us. In the early case of Walsh v. Hill, 38 Cal. 481, the court says:

"The only rule of much value—one which is frequently shadowed forth, but seldom, if ever, expressly stated in the books—is to place ourselves as near as possible in the seats which were occupied by the parties at the time the instrument was executed; then, taking it by its four corners, read it."

Again, in Eastman v. Piper, 68 Cal. App. 554, 229 P. 1002, this language is found:

"A grant is to be interpreted in the same manner as any other contract, * * * so as to give effect to the intention of the parties if that intention can be ascertained. [Civ. Code, §§ 1066, 1636.] * * * The intention is to be gathered from the four corners of the instrument. But the rule that the intention * * * is to be ascertained from the writing alone, where the contract is reduced to writing, is subject to other rules of law for the interpretation of contracts. One of these is that 'a contract may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made and the matter to which it relates.' [Section 1647, Civ. Code.] Another rule is that the contract should be read in the light of the general intent of the parties and the object sought to be attained by them."

[3, 4] From the language of the lease here involved and with particular reference to the surrounding circumstances under which it was executed, we think it clear that the underlying purpose of the parties and their main intention was to condition delivery of the demised premises upon the option in the prior lease, and that the term "circumstances beyond the control of the party of the first part" was intended to refer exclusively to this prior option. Therefore, with this construction, we come to the next clause, dealing with the liability of the lessor in the event of this happening. The language of the instrument is that, if delivery was thus prevented by circumstances beyond the control of the lessor, then all money deposited to the party of the first part should be returned in full to the party of the second part. Likewise, in the original receipt for deposit appears the clause: "If circumstances beyond the control of the owner should arise, the money deposited should be returned."

Appellant's position is that, if we find that delivery was beyond the control of the owner, and even if we find that delivery is excused, nevertheless, the lessor is still bound to the lessee for all legal claims of damage in addition to his return of moneys paid. Appellant contends that the wording of the contract is clear and unambiguous to the effect that it sets forth but one thing, namely, the return of the money, but that in all other respects the rights and liabilities of the parties remain unaffected.

In the first place, applying such rules as have been hereinbefore referred to, we do not feel that the term "in full" is in itself so definite and certain as to foreclose all inquiry into its meaning or the use in which it was employed. It is obvious that a mere return of the money could have been assured without specifying "in full." The money deposited was everything of value that the lessor received; and, if the lessee demanded anything further from him upon his inability to perform, it was his duty to specify the same in his contract. Obviously the contract is subject to explanation and is indefinite and uncertain on its face as to what liabilities follow a failure of delivery of the premises, unless, forsooth, the return of the moneys as therein provided ended the matter. The trial court, therefore, had the alternative of accepting the provision for the return of the moneys in full as being the limit of the lessor's liability, or else receiving testimony to determine the intent of the parties on this point. The court did take testimony, and on sufficient evidence found that the return of the moneys in full satisfied all claims of the lessee and discharged the lessor from all further liability. We are content to accept this finding.

Appellant also complains that it was beyond the power of the court to order a judgment in his favor for the return of the moneys deposited, the pleadings being framed solely on the issue of damages. However, from the record before us we understand that plaintiff has since accepted this money on an agreement that this acceptance shall not affect the merits of his appeal. We have not considered this acceptance by plaintiff for any purpose at all save to preclude discussion of the question raised on the form of judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

86 Cal. App. 193

INMAN v. SCHECHER et al. (Civ. 5535.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 20, 1927.

1. Husband and wife ⇨265½—Defendant in action for forfeiture of lease could not claim premises to be community property, where lease provided that M. signed merely as husband of lessor.

Defendant in action for forfeiture of lease could not claim leased premises to be community property, where clause of lease to which he subscribed provided that it was admitted that husband of lessor had no interest in property.

2. Husband and wife ⇨196—Defendant in action for forfeiture of lease could not claim notice of forfeiture was insufficient because not signed by husband, where lease stated husband had no interest in property.

Defendant in action for forfeiture of lease could not claim that notice of forfeiture was insufficient because it was not signed by husband of lessor, where lease to which defendant subscribed admitted husband had no interest in property, and that he was signing lease as husband of lessor.

3. Trial ⇨139(1)—Defendant's motion for nonsuit held properly denied where plaintiff had introduced substantial evidence on all points raised by motion.

Defendant's motion for nonsuit held properly denied where plaintiff had introduced substantial evidence in her behalf on all points raised by motion.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨112(2)—Lessor, by continuing to receive rent, waived breach of lessee's agreement to construct building within 30 days.

Lessor by accepting payment of rent for period of 2 years and 9 months waived breach of clause of lease providing that lessee should commence construction of building within 30 days from date of execution of lease.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨112(2)—Where lessor waived breach of one clause but after breach of another clause in lease refused to accept rent, there was no waiver of second breach.

Where lessor waived lessee's breach of clause relating to constructing building and accepted rent, but, upon lessee's failure to pay assessment for street improvement, refused to accept any rent and gave notices of forfeiture of lease, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, there was no waiver as to breach of clause regarding assessments.

6. Eminent domain ⇨155—Under lease providing for payment of proceeds of condemned land to lessee, lessee was not entitled to proceeds of judgment in proceeding condemning land excepted by terms of lease from premises demised.

Under lease providing that, in event any portion of property leased was condemned for state or other purposes, money received therefrom should be immediately paid to lessee, lessee was not entitled to proceeds of judgment in proceedings condemning parcel which was by very terms of lease excepted from premises demised to lessee, and lessee could not claim that assessment, which he was under obligation to pay, had been paid by offsetting it against judgment.

7. Landlord and tenant ⇨290(3)—Lessor's breach of covenant relating to proceeds of condemned property could not be defense to unlawful detainer suit for violation of covenant to pay assessments.

Lessor's breach of covenant, providing that if any portion of property leased was condemned money received therefrom should be paid over to lessee, could not be defense to an unlawful detainer suit for violation of covenant to pay taxes and assessments.

8. Landlord and tenant ⇨290(5)—Lessee's defense, for money only, could not be interposed in unlawful detainer case.

Lessee's defense, that assessment for street improvement due under lease had been paid by being forfeited against judgment in condemnation proceedings, the proceeds of which lessee claimed under lease, being for money only, for which suit at law would lie, was not one of class of equitable defenses which could be interposed in unlawful detainer case.

9. Set-off and counterclaim ⇨15—Set-off or counterclaim is not permissible in unlawful detainer action.

Set-off or counterclaim is not permissible in an action for unlawful detainer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Nana K. Inman against John L. Schecher and others for forfeiture of lease. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

R. C. W. Friday, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harry L. Person and George D. Rodgers, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

COLLIER, Justice pro tem. On December 15, 1922, respondent, in writing, demised to appellant two parcels of land situate in the city of Los Angeles, described therein as follows:

"Parcel 1. The west 147 feet of lot A, and the west 147 feet of the north 10 feet of lot B, of the Davis and Figueroa street tract, in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, as per map recorded in Book 5, page 102 of Maps, in the office of the county recorder of said county;

"Excepting therefrom an easement for street purposes over the west 20 feet condemned for the widening of Figueroa street by final decree of condemnation had in case No. 75183, superior court of Los Angeles county, a certified copy thereof being recorded in Book 5533, page 179 of Deeds; also the north 20 feet of the east 127 feet of lot A, as per case pending in the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles to condemn the same for street purposes, being case No. B-92381.

"Parcel 2. The north 5 feet of the west 147 feet of lot C, and the south 40 feet of the west 147 feet of lot B, both in the Davis and Figueroa street tract, in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, as per map recorded in Book 5, page 102 of Maps, in the office of the county recorder of said county;

"Excepting therefrom an easement for street purposes over the west 20 feet thereof condemned for the widening of Figueroa street by final decree of condemnation had in case No. 75183, superior court of Los Angeles county, a certified copy thereof being recorded in Book 5533, page 179 of Deeds." (Italics ours.)

Attention is called to that portion of the paragraph in the description of parcel 1 commencing in italics, and particularly the italicized portion, commencing "also the north 20 feet," etc. This was the strip taken for the widening of Florence avenue, for which an assessment was levied and which is mentioned and discussed hereafter.

The tenancy commenced December 15, 1922.

Said lease contained several further provisions which are material here and for ready reference we will designate them as clauses 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, respectively, and they are as follows:

Clause 1. "The lessee further agrees to pay all assessments of every kind and nature that may be levied against said property for improvements of any kind and all taxes levied during the entire term of this lease, including the last half of taxes for 1922, 1923."

Clause 2. "The lessee further agrees to commence the construction of a class A fireproof building within 30 days from the date of the execution of this lease, and all buildings erected upon said property during the term thereof shall be and remain thereon and become a part of the realty, and he and belong to the lessors at the expiration of this lease."

Clause 3. "It is further agreed that in the event any portion of the property hereby leased is condemned for street or other purposes, that the money received therefrom shall be immediately paid over to the lessee."

Clause 4. "In the event of the failure of the lessee to pay the rent herein specified at the times and in the amounts herein provided, the lessors may enter and retake possession of said premises, and if default shall be made after 30 days in the payment of the same, this lease may be determined at the option of the lessors."

Clause 5. "It is admitted that M. M. Inman, husband of Nana K. Inman, has no interest in said property, and is signing this lease as the husband of said Nana K. Inman, lessor." (Italics ours.)

By clause 2 appellant covenanted to construct on said premises a class A fireproof building within 30 days. This was never done, and in spite of his covenant appellant subleased a portion of said premises to the Shell Oil Company of California, who conducted a filling station thereon up to the commencement of this action. Respondent "protested" to appellant because of his failure to build said class A building, and his leasing to the Shell Oil Company.

In December, 1925, respondent served on appellant a notice declaring a forfeiture of said lease on account of said default.

On August 17, 1925, an assessment was levied on said premises by the city of Los Angeles for the opening and widening of Florence avenue. This assessment amounted to $1,823.87, and became due August 1, 1925, and if not then paid became a lien on said premises and rendered the same subject to sale.

Appellant was notified of said assessment before it became delinquent, but failed to pay the same, and respondent paid it on October 3, 1925. Appellant has never reimbursed respondent therefor.

In December, 1925, respondent served a demand upon appellant to pay him, respondent, the amount of said assessment or deliver possession of the premises to respondent.

Respondent accepted rent from appellant from the commencement of the term, December 15, 1922, until September 15, 1925, but respondent has refused to accept any rent from appellant since that date, although appellant duly tendered same to him.

The case was tried before the court with a jury and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff upon the first two counts.

[1] Appellant in his answer claims such premises to be the community property of M. M. and Nana K. Inman, but is foreclosed from that contention by clause 5 of the lease to which he subscribed; hence, that controversy ends there.

[2] For the same reason appellant's contention, that the notice of forfeiture is insufficient because it was not signed by M. M. Inman, is not tenable. By clause 4 it was "admitted" by both respondent and appellant that M. M. Inman had no interest in said property, and that he signed the lease merely as husband of Nana K. Inman; and our attention has not been called to any evidence to the contrary. In any event, there is abundant evidence in the record to show that the property was the separate property of Nana K. Inman.

As an alleged defense made to all of respondent's claims, and by way of "counterclaim and set-off" appellant sets forth the following:

"That, within 2 years last past, aforesaid plaintiff Nana K. Inman, and said Nana K. Inman jointly with her aforesaid husband, M. M. Inman, for a valuable consideration, jointly and severally became indebted to this defendant John L. Schecher, for and on account of detriment suffered by said John L. Schecher, and moneys paid by said John L. Schecher, at the special instance and request of said M. M. Inman and Nana K. Inman, husband and wife aforesaid, to and for the use and benefit of said M. M. Inman and Nana K. Inman, in the full sum of $4,384.60, and which sum the said M. M. Inman and said Nana K. Inman jointly and severally promised and agreed to pay this defendant John L. Schecher.

"That demand has been made by this defendant for the payment to him of the last-named aforesaid sum, in and by virtue of further agreement in said Exhibit A further set out, to wit, in words and figures set out as follows:

"It is further agreed that, in event any portion of the property hereby leased is condemned for street or other purposes, the money received therefrom shall be immediately paid over to the lessee."

[3] Appellant's motion for nonsuit was properly denied as respondent had introduced substantial evidence in her behalf on all points raised by said motion. Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 147, 155 P. 631.

The demurrer of appellant to plaintiff's complaint was properly overruled.

We come now to the question of waiver, if any, presented by respondent's acceptance of rent from the inception of the lease to September 15, 1925—a period of 2 years and 9 months. Such acceptance would only effect a violation of clause 2, as that was the only breach complained of up to that time.

[4] We are of the opinion that such acceptance was a waiver of that breach. Respondent claims to have "protested" against said breach, but nevertheless continued to receive the rent. In other words, as was said in Miller v. Reidy (Cal. App.) 260 P. 358:

"This was a clear attempt to eat the cake and still keep it. His actions belie his words. Waiver is a question of intention [citing cases]. For the lessors month after month to accept rent specified in the lease, and at the same time declare that there was a forfeiture, results in an irreconcilable inconsistency."

Therefore, in that particular, the verdict of the jury and the judgment thereon are supported, and are erroneous.

[5] This is immaterial, as we think the verdict on respondent's first cause of action must nevertheless be affirmed. The failure of appellant to pay the assessment for widening and improving Florence avenue was a special and independent breach of another and independent covenant of the lease. Since that breach respondent has steadily refused to accept any rent, and hence in that regard there has been no waiver. No other waiver is either alleged nor proved. Section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides for a forfeiture of a lease under such circumstances, and notices in proper form were served thereunder.

We will now take up appellant's second defense. Appellant's contention is based upon said clause 3:

"It is further agreed that, in event any portion of the property hereby leased is condemned for street or other purposes, the money received therefrom shall be immediately paid over to the lessee."

From the evidence it appears that one Frase was the owner of the property in question next preceding Mrs. Inman. In said Florence avenue condemnation case Frase was awarded a judgment against the city of Los Angeles for $7,980, which was subsequently assigned to respondent herein.

In the proceedings that followed an assessment was levied against the leased premises in the sum of $1,823.87. Under the lease the assessment should have been paid by appellant. It was not so paid, because delinquent, and respondent paid the same by offsetting it against said judgment, and received the net balance of the award from the city of Los Angeles. This amounted to $4,384.60. Appellant claims that in effect he has paid said assessment in that by clause 3 he was entitled to the proceeds of such judgment, from which the assessment was paid; that respondent having collected the same and paid therefrom said assessment, said payment should be treated as having been made by appellant and the said net balance belonged to appellant. The net balance of $4,384.60 is the basis of appellant's second defense by way of counterclaim or set-off.

[6-9] There are four answers to appellant's contention. (1) None of the property leased to appellant has been condemned. The parcel condemned and which was the basis of the award was by the very terms of the lease excepted from the premises demised to appellant. This seems too plain for any argument. (2) Appellant's alleged demand arises out of the failure of respondent to turn over to appellant the proceeds of said judgment. Even assuming appellant was entitled thereto under the clause 3 (which we deny), clause 3 is entirely independent of the covenant to pay rent or to pay taxes or assessments; hence no breach by respondent of clause 3 would be a defense to an unlawful detainer suit for a violation of the covenant to pay taxes and assessments. Arnold v. Krigbaum, 169 Cal. 143, 146 P. 423, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 370. (3) The defense urged by appellant is not one of the class of equitable defenses which may be interposed in an unlawful detainer case, it being for money only, for which a suit at law will lie. (4) A set-off or counterclaim is not permissible in an action for unlawful detainer. Arnold v. Krigbaum, supra; Schubert v. Lowe, 193 Cal. 291, 223 P. 550.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

TUPPER v. LITTLE et al. (Civ. 5751.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 19, 1927.

1. Appeal and error §882(9)—Defendants, eliciting testimony by cross-examination, might not complain on appeal that testimony was conclusion.

Where defendants elicited testimony that note was given in payment of debt by their cross-examination, and no objection was made to the testimony, they might not complain in the appellate court that testimony was mere conclusion of law.

2. Sales §39—Finding that note for interest under contract was separate transaction, not connected with modification of contract, held sustained by evidence.

In action on note, evidence held to sustain finding that note was given as absolute payment of balance of interest due under contract of sale, that it was an entire and separate transaction not connected with an agreement made at time of execution modifying the contract; and that it was not discharged by cancellation of contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action on a promissory note by W. C. Tupper against W. G. Little and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Shepard & Shepard, of Selma, for appellants.

Everts, Ewing, Wild & Everts, of Fresno, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued as assignee of a promissory note in the sum of $775 executed by the defendants to W. H. Say on January 16, 1924. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants have appealed on a typewritten record.

On January 16, 1923, the defendants had agreed in writing to buy certain land from Say, a portion of the agreed purchase price being paid at the time, and the remainder to be paid in fixed installments. At the close of the year the defendants, being unable to pay the interest and the installments then due, executed a modification of this agreement with Say whereby the time for payment of all installments on the principal under the contract was continued from the due dates fixed in the contract. At the same time the promissory note in suit was executed covering the amount of interest then due. On June 19, 1924, the parties executed in writing a cancellation and abandonment of the contract of purchase and a release of "any other or further obligations or liabilities" under it. Thereafter the note in suit was assigned to the plaintiff, and this action was commenced on the theory that the note was given for a pre-existing debt—the interest due under the contract.

The trial court found that the note was given as an absolute payment of the balance of the interest due upon the contract of sale, and that it was an entire and separate transaction not connected with the modification agreement, and expressly exempted from the releases mentioned in the abandonment agreement of June, 1924. On this appeal the appellants state that there is but one question involved, and that is whether there is any support in the evidence for this finding of the trial court.

[1, 2] One of the appellants testified that it was at the express request of the appellants that no mention of interest was made in the modification agreement of January, 1924, but that at that time a portion of the interest due was paid in cash, and the note was given with the understanding that it should have no connection with the modification contract. The witness Say testified that the note was "given in payment of a debt, the interest." One of the appellants testified that the note was not given in payment of interest, but was merely further evidence of interest due. Appellants now insist that the testimony of the witness Say was merely an expression of a conclusion of law, but, even so, it was brought out by appellants on their cross-examination of the witness, and no objection was made to it.

In addition to the direct evidence, the fact that no mention was made of the note or the interest in the modification agreement of January, 1924, or in the release of June, 1924, would in itself support an inference that the note was a separate and complete transaction. The conceded fact that the note covered the amount of interest due, taken with this direct evidence of the intention of the parties, fully supports the findings of the trial court.

Judgment affirmed.

GRIGSBY v. KING et al. (S. F. 11578.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 20, 1927.

1. Constitutional law ⌘265(5), 238(1)—Schools and school districts ⌘133—Statutes ⌘72, 96(1)—Act relative to teacher's tenure held not unconstitutional as discriminatory class legislation (Pol. Code, § 1609; Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21; art. 4, § 25; Const. U. S. Amend. 14).

Pol. Code, § 1609, known as "Teacher's Tenure Act," was not, prior to amendment, violative of Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21, article 4, § 25, and Const. U. S. Amend. 14, as legislation discriminating within a class.

2. Schools and school districts ⌘55—Board of school trustees, being neither natural nor artificial person, does not enjoy same constitutional rights as are accorded persons.

A board of school trustees, being neither a natural nor an artificial person, does not enjoy the same natural privileges and constitutional rights as do natural and artificial persons.

3. Constitutional law ⌘42—Where only powers possessed by board were statutory, it could not attack as unconstitutional the limitations thereon (Pol. Code, § 1609).

Where the only powers possessed by a board of school trustees were granted by Pol. Code, § 1609, such board could not attack, as being unconstitutional, limitations placed thereon by the Legislature.

4. Schools and school districts ⌘133—Power to employ teachers implies power to fix term and so end employment.

Power to employ teachers necessarily implies the power to fix the term and so end the employment.

5. Schools and school districts ⌘133—Power to employ teachers in classes implies power to classify.

Power to employ teachers in classes necessarily implies the power to classify.

6. Constitutional law ☞205(5), 238(1)—Schools and school districts ☞133—Statutes ☞72, 96(1)—That only teachers holding certain kind of certificates could be employed held to be limitation upon boards' power, and not unconstitutional extension of privilege to certain teachers (Pol. Code, § 1609; Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21; art. 4, § 25; Const. U. S. Amend. 14).

Pol. Code, § 1609, authorizing employment as teachers of only persons holding a certain kind of a certificate, held a limitation upon the power of boards of trustees in the hiring of teachers, and not an extension of privilege to a certain class of teachers so as to render the act violative of Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21, article 4, § 25, and Const. U. S. Amend. 14.

7. Constitutional law ☞205(7), 213—Schools and school districts ☞46—Statutes ☞73 (2), 93(6)—Statutory classification of boards of school trustees according to size of districts held not unconstitutional as discriminatory class legislation (Pol. Code, § 1609; Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21; art. 4, § 25; Const. U. S. Amend. 14).

The classification, under Pol. Code, § 1609, of boards of school trustees into two classes according to the size of their districts, held not unreasonable nor unconstitutional under Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21, article 4, § 25, and Const. U. S. Amend. 14, as being discriminatory class legislation.

8. Schools and school districts ☞133—Statutes ☞96(1)—Unusual benefit or detriment enjoyed or suffered by individual teacher under Tenure Act does not invalidate statute (Pol. Code, § 1609).

Any unusual benefit or detriment enjoyed or suffered by an individual teacher, under the Teacher's Tenure Act (Pol. Code, § 1609), does not invalidate said statute, since such benefit or detriment is merely incidental to the main purpose of the statute.

9. Constitutional law ☞205(5), 238(1)—Schools and school districts ☞133—Statutes ☞72, 96(1)—Since statute restricting school trustees' power applies only to an impersonal administrative agency, constitutional guaranties of personal rights had no application on question of constitutionality (Pol. Code, § 1609; Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21; art. 4, § 25; Const. U. S. Amend. 14).

Since statute (Pol. Code, § 1609) restricting school trustees' power relative to employment and tenure of teachers applies only to an impersonal administrative agency, the question of constitutional guaranties of personal rights, under Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21, article 4, § 25, and Const. U. S. Amend. 14, had no application upon the matter of the constitutionality of such statute.

10. Schools and school districts ☞133—Under statute, board must classify teacher as permanent after 2 years' successful employment, regardless of contract (Pol. Code, § 1609).

Under Pol. Code, § 1609, relative to school trustees classifying teachers, the board is required to classify a teacher as permanent upon a showing by her of 2 years' successful work, regardless of a contract.

11. Injunction ☞78—Injunction held proper remedy for teacher, where board was wrongfully attempting to deprive her of position as permanent teacher (Pol. Code, § 1609).

Where a board of trustees was attempting, under Pol. Code, § 1609, wrongfully to deprive a teacher of her position as a permanent teacher in the schools, held proceeding for injunction was the proper form of relief as against claim that injunction would not lie for breach of contract for personal services.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Isadore Grigsby against Mrs. P. S. King and others, as Trustees of the Napa School District. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. L. Webber, of Napa, for appellant.

Leo A. Murasky, of San Francisco, for California Council of Education, Frank L. Fenton, of San Francisco, for San Francisco Teachers' Ass'n, William A. Alderson, of Los Angeles, and Henry F. Marshall, of Mill Valley, amici curiæ.

Thomas C. Anglim, Dist. Atty., and L. E. Johnston, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Napa, for respondents.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, and J. H. O'Connor, Asst. County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against her in an action brought to restrain the members of a board of school trustees "from attempting to deprive plaintiff of her position as a permanent teacher in the schools of the city of Napa."

The trial court denied relief upon three grounds: (1) Injunction will not lie for a breach of contract for the performance of personal services; (2) section 1609, article 7 of the Political Code, known as the "Teacher's Tenure Act," if interpreted to give plaintiff the standing of a permanent teacher under the facts of this case, is unconstitutional as denying the right to employer and employee of contracting for a definite, specific period of time; and (3) said section of the Political Code is unconstitutional because it is an unjust discrimination against a class of schools and of teachers.

It is to be observed that the last session of the Legislature amended this section so as to obviate all question of an objection thereupon the last ground above stated. Prior to such amendment, the sections involved in our inquiry were as follows:

"Sec. 1609. Boards of school trustees * * * shall have power and it shall be their duty: * * *

"Second—To employ the teachers, as provided in part fifth * * * teachers may be elected on or after May second for the next ensuing school year and each teacher so elected shall be deemed re-elected from year to year, except as hereinafter specified. * * *

"Fifth—To employ, as teachers, only persons who hold legal certificates for teaching * * * to serve as substitutes, probationary or permanent teachers. * * *

"(c) To classify as substitute teachers those persons employed as teachers from day to day for less than one school year. * * *

"(d) To classify as probationary teachers those persons employed as teachers for the school year, and who have not been classified as permanent teachers, * * * such classification to be made at the time of employment, and thereafter in the month of July of each school year.

"(e) To classify as permanent teachers all persons who shall have been successfully employed as teachers by the district for two consecutive school years at the time of classification; provided, also, that the two years of successful service shall have been performed in a district employing at least eight teachers under a principal who shall devote at least two hours per day to supervision in the school or schools under his control. Such classification shall be made at the end of the two years of such employment. * * *

"(h) To dismiss substitute teachers at any time. * * *

"(i) To dismiss probationary teachers during the school year for cause only, as in the case of permanent teachers, except that on or before the tenth day of June in any year the governing board may give notice in writing to a probationary teacher that his services will not be required for the ensuing school year. * * *

"(j) To dismiss permanent teachers, principals, or supervisors of special subjects, * * * only for one or more of the following causes, after a fair and impartial public hearing. Causes for dismissal are. * * *

"It is hereby provided, however, that whenever it becomes necessary to decrease the number of permanent teachers employed by a school district * * * on account of the discontinuance of a particular kind of teaching service * * * the governing board may dismiss such teacher or teachers at the close of the school year. * * * The teacher or teachers so dismissed shall be the teacher or teachers engaged in the type of teaching work so discontinued."

The defendants are trustees of a school district employing at least 8 teachers under a principal devoting more than 2 hours per day to supervision in the school or schools under his control. The plaintiff had been successfully employed as a regular teacher in said district for three consecutive years. Toward the end of the third year defendant board attempted to dismiss her by letter without holding any hearing or making any charges against her. The complaint set forth these facts and prayed for injunctive and general relief.

[1] In holding this section violative of state constitutional provisions contained in article 4, § 25, and article 1, § 11, and also in article 1, § 21, and the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the trial court proceeded upon the theory that teachers as a class were the subjects of legislation, and that a discrimination within that class was apparent. We think that in the section of the Political Code under construction the Legislature was plainly dealing with boards of trustees as a class, investing them with powers not otherwise possessed, and providing the limitations and restrictions to be attached to the exercise of such powers.

[2, 3] Furthermore, a board of school trustees, being neither a natural nor an artificial person, does not enjoy the same natural privileges and constitutional rights as do such persons. Such a board is merely an administrative agency created by statute and invested only with the powers expressly conferred, subject to the limitations thereto attached by the Legislature. As aptly stated by counsel, it is anomalous that the board of trustees should claim powers granted to it by statute and only by statute and attack as unconstitutional the limitations imposed upon those powers by the same statute.

Title III of the Political Code is entitled "Education," and chapter III thereof bears the caption "Public Schools." This chapter is divided into 21 articles, each with its appropriate subtitle. Article 7 is entitled "Boards of Trustees of School Districts and City Boards of Education" and is divided into 23 sections. Section 1603 deals with boards of trustees with respect to membership; the following section deals with new districts, and the following section deals with vacancies. The succeeding sections prescribe the powers and duties of said boards with respect to various matters, section 1609, the subject of our particular examination, dealing with the power of said boards with reference to employees and with particular reference to teachers.

[4, 5] Part second of the section, above quoted, empowers the board to employ teachers as provided in part fifth. Part fifth empowers the board to employ persons to serve as substitutes, probationary, or permanent teachers. The power to employ imports the power to fix the term of and so end the employment. The power to employ in classes necessarily implies the power to determine who shall be employed in each class, i. e., to classify. If this were the entire content of the enactment, the board would then have plenary power in three particulars—to employ, to classify, and to dismiss teachers. But further provisions appear in the act which modify and limit the power conferred by imposing a duty with respect to its exercise.

[6] The otherwise plenary power of the board to employ teachers is limited by the provisions of subdivision (2) that they may employ as teachers "only persons holding legal teaching certificates then on file with the county superintendent." We think this:

is to be construed as a limitation upon the power of the board to employ, and not the extension of a privilege to those having certificates on file.

Likewise, the plenary power of the board to dismiss is modified and limited by the provisions of subdivisions (h), (i), and (j). These subdivisions provide that, unless for cause, the board shall not have power to dismiss probationary teachers at all, except at the end of the school year; that, unless for cause, the board shall not have power to dismiss permanent teachers at all, except on discontinuance of special teaching service or diminution in number of pupils, and these limitations are expressly withdrawn in the case of substitutes who may be dismissed by the board at any time.

Similarly, the plenary power of the board to classify is modified and limited by the provisions of subdivisions (c), (d), and (e). It is therein provided that the board shall classify as substitutes only "persons employed for less than a school year to take the places of absent regular teachers"; that the board shall classify as probationary teachers only "those persons employed for the school year and who have not been classified as permanent." And subdivision (e), under attack here (read without the proviso), compels the board—all boards in all districts—to classify as permanent all successful, 2-year teachers, and to make its decision as to whether or not the teacher is a successful one at the end of a 2-year period. It limits the power of the board to act otherwise. But by the proviso, the Legislature exempts boards of trustees in small districts from this duty.

The distinction, then, is among boards of trustees—those in small districts having larger powers with reference to dismissal of teachers than those in larger districts, where the discretion in this matter is limited.

[7] In legal effect, the proviso divides the boards of trustees into two classes, according to the size of their districts. This seems a proper classification, based upon many reasons which are readily apparent. "There is no constitutional objection to the classification of school districts any more than of cities." In re Sugar Notch Borough, 192 Pa. 349, 43 A. 985. There would seem to be no reason why school districts may not be classified according to population for purposes of administration and government as well as municipalities. People v. Lodi High School District, 124 Cal. 699, 57 P. 660. The proviso prescribes the service which shall render operative the mandate of the section toward the trustees. It must be performed in a "district employing at least 8 teachers under a principal, etc." But smaller districts are exempted from the purview of the section. This results in the formation of two classes of school trustees—those of large districts and those of small districts, the one subject to the mandate of the section, and the other exempt. And this classification, while apparently based upon the number of teachers employed, is, in the last analysis, based upon the population of the districts and within the scope of the decisions hereinbefore quoted, for under the law, the number of teachers employed depends upon the number of pupils, and that, of course, upon the population of the district.

There is no discrimination against the boards of trustees in small districts; the classification is based upon a substantial difference, pertinent to the distinction. In a large district, employing a supervising principal, the board, having the benefit of this expert service and counsel, may reasonably arrive at a decision as to the propriety of granting permanent tenure to a teacher within a definite period of time, while the board of a smaller district, with no special means of measuring the fitness of a teacher, is not in the same position as the board which has available the services and advice of its expert supervisor, who spends at least 2 hours each day directly observing, checking and supervising the work of the teachers under his charge.

Long prior to the enactment of the Teacher's Tenure Act, the Legislature had made a classification of school districts practically identical in character with the classification we are considering, for it had, in effect, said to school districts that those having 8 teachers or more might employ a nonteaching superintendent to supervise the work of such teachers.

[8] There is nothing in the law to prevent any teacher from serving in any school district which she may select. Any unusual benefit or detriment enjoyed or suffered by an individual teacher is merely incidental to the main purpose of the statute and does not invalidate it. "The restrictions of the Constitution upon legislation apply to direct legislation, not to the incidental operation of statutes constitutional in themselves upon other subjects than those with which they directly deal." In re Sugar Notch Borough, 192 Pa. 349, 43 A. 985; Commonwealth v. Gilligan, 195 Pa. 504, 46 A. 124.

[9] As to the other reason urged by respondents for holding the law in question unconstitutional, we think it is clear that constitutional guaranties of personal rights are inapplicable to an impersonal, administrative agency exercising special and limited powers. Boards of trustees have no existence, except by legislative enactment. They possess no natural rights; they exercise no functions except those specially granted to them. "A public office is a mere public agency created by the people for the purpose of the administration of the necessary functions of organized society." In re Carter, 141 Cal. 316, 74 P. 997.

[10, 11] It is also urged in support of the judgment that plaintiff failed to bring herself within the provisions of section 1609, because her contracts showed employment for a fixed, definite term. It was stipulated that there were written contracts for the first and second years' service, and that the third year's service was rendered pursuant to re-election by the board at the end of the second year. The law requires nothing more. The showing of two years' successful work brings plaintiff within the statute, and it was the duty of the board at that time to classify her as a permanent teacher, and any other action on its part was beyond its power and of no avail.

The view we have taken disposes of the objection to the form of relief asked, for the action becomes, in effect, not one to enforce a contract for personal services, but to restrain action by the board of trustees in excess of its power to the detriment and damage of plaintiff.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

McMAHON v. HAMILTON. (S. F. 12354.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 24, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨648—Trial court cannot amend record to be used on appeal more than six months after it has been certified as correct (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 473, a trial court is without power to amend a record to be used on appeal more than six months after the same has been certified as a correct transcript of the proceedings had and taken in such court.

2. Appeal and error ⇨653(1)—Appellate court cannot change record authenticated by trial court.

A record authenticated by the trial court cannot be changed by an appellate court.

3. Appeal and error ⇨653(1)—Appellate court has inherent power to order corrections in record before it.

Appellate court has inherent power to order court to amend and correct record before it on appeal, so that the record shall speak the truth.

4. Courts ⇨78—Court rules are subservient to statutes.

Rules of court are subservient to statutory mandate.

5. Appeal and error ⇨653(1)—Appellate court may at any time pending determination of appeal have record corrected (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 473, 953; Supreme Court rule 14).

An appellate court may have a record amended, so that it will be correct, at any time pending determination of the appeal, without regard to Code Civ. Proc. § 473, in view of section 953, and Supreme Court rule 14, indicating no limitation on inherent appellate power to have record on appeal corrected.

6. Appeal and error ⇨653(1)—Record on appeal will be corrected when necessary, unless rights of adverse party would be injured thereby.

Technical objections to amending record on appeal are not favored, and a record will be corrected when necessary, unless a right of the adverse party would be injuriously affected thereby.

7. Appeal and error ⇨653(1)—Supreme Court favors amendment to record which will enable review of all facts before lower court.

Supreme Court favors an amendment to record on appeal, the effect of which is to enable review of all facts which trial court had before it when it made its decision.

8. Appeal and error ⇨657(1)—Supreme Court can permit withdrawal of transcript on appeal, more than six months after it has been certified as correct, for amendment and correction of bill of exceptions settled after appeal was taken (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 473, 953; Supreme Court rule 14).

Supreme Court held to have power to permit withdrawal of transcript on appeal, more than six months after it has been certified as correct, for amendment and correction of bill of exceptions settled after appeal was taken, and in view of court rule 14, and Code Civ. Proc. § 953; six months' limitation provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 473, being inapplicable.

In Bank.

Action for damages for personal injuries by Joseph T. McMahon, by Rose Surryhne, his guardian ad litem, against Fred Hamilton. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appealed. Defendant's motion for an order authorizing withdrawal of transcript on appeal to permit its amendment was granted. Plaintiff moves to set aside the order authorizing withdrawal. Motion denied.

J. A. Tracy, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Louis V. Crowley and Joe Ryan, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiff and appellant herein presents a motion that this court vacate and set aside an order heretofore made which said order authorized the withdrawal of the transcript in this cause from the files of this court for the purpose of correcting and amending the same. The action was instituted to recover damages for injuries suffered by the plaintiff as a result of the defendant's alleged negligence. After trial, the jury returned a verdict for the defendant and judgment was accordingly entered. From the judgment so entered the plaintiff prosecuted this appeal. The transcript filed herein consists of the judgment roll, notice of appeal, and what purports to be a bill of exceptions certified to by the trial judge on October 25, 1926. Thereafter the respondent noticed a motion for the July calendar of this court, which motion suggested diminution of the record herein in order that the same might include the proposed and allowed amendments of respondent to the bill of exceptions submitted by appellant. In support of said motion for diminution the respondent filed, among others, an affidavit of the trial judge, wherein the affiant states that:

"On April 22, 1926, defendant filed herein his proposed amendments to plaintiff's proposed bill of exceptions. Thereafter, and on the 10th day of June, 1926, the matter of the settlement of plaintiff's proposed bill of exceptions and defendant's proposed amendments thereto came on regularly for hearing before affiant, and on said date affiant settled said bill of exceptions and allowed all of the proposed amendments of the defendant.

"At no time was said bill of exceptions engrossed and the plaintiff did not at any time incorporate the or any of the said amendments of the defendant, settled and allowed as aforesaid.

"Thereafter, and on the 25th day of October, 1926, the plaintiff, by his attorney, presented to affiant, as the judge of said court, an instrument in writing which affiant believed to be an engrossed bill of exceptions allowed as aforesaid, and so believing affiant as such judge, allowed, settled, and approved the same. Said instrument in writing so presented to and signed by affiant, as such judge, contains only the plaintiff's proposed bill of exceptions and does not contain the proposed and allowed amendments of the defendant, as affiant is informed and believes, and said instrument was and is not an engrossed bill of exceptions. Affiant, as such judge, would not have signed said instrument, if affiant knew the same was not an engrossed bill of exceptions, and if affiant knew that there was not contained therein the proposed and allowed amendments of the defendant."

It may be remarked in passing that the appellant filed his opposition to said motion for diminution accompanying the same with an affidavit of counsel which, in several material particulars, contradicts the affidavit of the trial judge. Upon the hearing of said motion this court made its order, now sought to be vacated, authorizing the withdrawal of the transcript to permit of its amendment so as to include in the bill of exceptions contained therein the proposed and allowed amendments offered by respondent. The appellant thereupon noticed the motion now under consideration for the October calendar of this court and seeks thereby to have this court vacate and annul the order just above referred to.

In the main, the appellant contends, in support of his motion to vacate, that both this court and the trial court are without jurisdiction and power to amend or cause to be amended what purports to be the bill of exceptions settled herein. The appellant in advancing this argument relies upon the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the case of Merced Bank v. Price, 152 Cal. 697, 700, 93 P. 866.

Before launching into a discussion of the issues so presented we pause to say that, in our opinion, the case of Merced Bank v. Price, supra, is without persuasive force and not in point for the reason that the trial court in that case had attempted to amend a bill of exceptions which had been prepared and settled prior to the taking of the appeal from an order denying a new trial. In the instant case the bill of exceptions was prepared and settled after appeal taken. That there is a clear line of demarcation between those cases in which the bill of exceptions is settled prior to the appeal and those in which settlement occurs subsequent to the prosecution of the appeal is now definitely settled. This distinction is considered in the case of Baker v. Borello, 131 Cal. 615, 617, 63 P. 914, where it is stated that:

"We have no doubt that a bill of exceptions, or statement which has been settled after appeal taken, may be corrected by a proper proceeding under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, commenced, as this was, within six months after the settlement, for in such cases the superior court is empowered to settle the bill or statement—i. e., to complete the record—after and for the purposes of the appeal. * * * But a bill of exceptions, prepared and settled beforehand to be used in support of a motion for a new trial, after the denial of the motion and an appeal therefrom, presents a different question. We are of the opinion that in such case the record cannot be amended, and this for reasons which, though technical, are nevertheless conclusive. The appeal deprives the superior court of jurisdiction to set aside its order denying the new trial, and while that order is in force the record upon which it is based cannot be changed, and this court must review the order upon the same record upon which it was made. * * *

The opinion in Merced Bank v. Price, supra, is based upon this very distinction and cites Baker v. Borello, supra, in support thereof. It would appear, therefore, that the second ground of decision in Merced Bank v. Price, supra, from which appellant seeks to derive comfort, while correctly stating the law, is purely dicta. Moreover, the case of Merced Bank v. Price, supra, would appear to be distinguishable from the instant case for the reason that this court was there called upon to determine whether the trial court had jurisdiction and power to amend the bill of exceptions as therein attempted. The issue here for solution is whether this court, or any appellate tribunal, may, under the circumstances here presented, properly direct the lower court to amend a bill of exceptions or transcript even though the six months' period provided for in section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, has elapsed.

[1, 2] We have concluded that our order of July 11, 1927, authorizing the withdrawal and amendment of the transcript herein in the particulars above referred to, was a proper exercise of our appellate jurisdiction. In so concluding we are not unmindful of the numerous authorities, many of which are relied upon by the appellant and moving party, which declare, and correctly so, that a trial court is without power to and may not amend a record to be used upon appeal more than six months after the same has been certified as a correct transcript of the proceedings had and taken in such court. Fountain Water Co. v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. 648, 73 P. 590; Baker v. Borello, supra; Sprigg v. Barber, 118 Cal. 591, 50 P. 682. It is also well settled that a record authenticated by the trial court cannot be changed by an appellate court. Mendocino County v. Peters, 2 Cal. App. 24, 27, 82 P. 1122, and authorities there cited.

[3] Our research has failed to disclose, however, any authoritative expression which would preclude this or any appellate court having jurisdiction over a record regularly on file, from authorizing the temporary withdrawal thereof at any time during the pendency of the appeal, so that the same might be corrected and amended in conformity to the direction of the appellate court. In such a case we are not confronted with a want of power or jurisdiction in the trial court, assuming the six months' period to have expired, but rather with the inherent power of an appellate court to cause the amendment of a record before it so that the same might speak the truth. The trial court in such a case receives its power to act in the premises from the order of the appellate court. That an appellate court may have a record before it amended so as to speak the truth has long since been the subject of judicial decision. Valentine v. Stewart, 15 Cal. 387, 396. In that case this court adopted with approval the following declaration from Johnson v. Whitlock, 13 N. Y. 344, 349:

"If this statement has been imperfectly made, we have no doubt of the power of the Supreme Court to direct a resettlement, and to reform the proceedings in any manner not inconsistent with the actual finding of the judge or referee upon the facts. The facts, as found, cannot be changed and found differently, nor can leave be had to insert exceptions never in fact taken, but within these limitations it will always be proper to move in the Supreme Court, not to turn the case into a bill of exceptions—a proceeding which has no existence under the Code—nor into a special verdict, but so to amend the case itself as to fitly present the questions which are to be examined in this court."

[4, 5] We have failed in our examination of the authorities to uncover any statutory period of limitation upon this inherent appellate power. The absence of such limitation tends strongly to indicate that an appellate court may, in its discretion, permit of amendments to a record before it and should in this respect be liberal so as to secure a hearing on the merits. Perri v. Beaumont, 88 Cal. 108, 109, 25 P. 1109. Rule 14 of this court provides for the correction of a record upon a suggestion of diminution thereof. This rule is singularly free of any limitation of time within which a record may be corrected. It is true, of course, that rules of court are subservient to statutory mandate. Brooks v. Union Trust Co., 146 Cal. 134, 138, 79 P. 843; People v. Walker, 76 Cal. App. 192, 244 P. 94. But, as indicated above, we have not succeeded in finding any statutory period of limitation upon this power of an appellate court to cause the correction of a record. Section 953 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides in part:

"If it appear that there is any paper or record in the custody of the clerk of the trial court which was before the trial court but which is not included in the record on appeal, and an examination of such paper or record will assist in a determination of the appeal on its merits, the court in which the appeal is pending may, on motion of either party, or on its own motion, require the production of a certified copy of such paper or record, and the same shall thereupon be deemed a part of the record on appeal."

This section likewise is without limitation and again is indicative of the conclusion we have announced herein, viz. that an appellate court may, at any time pending determination of the appeal, have a record amended so as to speak the truth, thus insuring disposition of causes upon their substantial merits.

[6, 7] It has repeatedly been held by this court that technical objections are not favored and that a record may and will, when necessary, be corrected unless a right of the adverse party is injuriously affected thereby. Cal. Wine Assoc. v. Commercial, etc., Co., 159 Cal. 49, 53, 112 P. 858; Perri v. Beaumont, supra. Moreover, this court looks with favor upon an amendment the effect of which "is simply to enable this court to review the decision of the lower court, in view of all the facts which that court had before it when it made such decision." In re Lamb, 95 Cal. 397, 408, 30 P. 568, 571.

[8] As indicated at the commencement of this opinion, the trial judge authenticated what appears in the transcript on file herein to be a bill of exceptions under the erroneous impression and belief that it was an engrossed bill of exceptions presented by the appellant and containing the previously allowed amendments suggested by the respondent. The affidavits on file disclose that the bill, as certified by the judge, is not the bill of exceptions theretofore settled by him. To hold under these circumstances that this court may not direct the correction of such misprision would result, in many instances, in the disposition of causes upon technical grounds and without regard to their substantial merits. In the absence of statutory mandate or authoritative expression to the contrary, we feel constrained to conclude, as already stated, that an appellate court in the exercise of its jurisdiction may direct and cause the correction of a record before it at any time during the pendency of the appeal; and, this without reference to the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The appellant's motion to vacate the order heretofore made herein is denied.

AGNIFILI v. LAGNA et al. (Civ. 4598.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 14, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 12, 1927.

Judgment ¶717—Judgment In action for breach of contract to erect buildings held res judicata of action to foreclose mechanic's lien.

Judgment for defendant in action for breach of contract to erect bungalows and for depreciation of materials left on the ground by plaintiff held res judicata of plaintiff's suit to foreclose mechanics' liens, where every issue involved in the mechanic's lien suit was covered by findings for defendant in action for breach of contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by C. F. Agnifili against Antonio Lagna and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Culver & Nourse, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ernest M. Torchia and Charles Matthews both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PEAIRS, Justice pro tem. This case, commenced for the purpose of foreclosing a mechanic's lien, arose over a contract entered into between one J. J. Rue and one A. Lagna, which contract was duly assigned with the consent of defendants herein to C. F. Agnifili, plaintiff herein, by which it was agreed that four bungalows should be erected on lots 4, 5, 6, and 7, block 5, Floristan Heights Addition, Eagle Rock City, Cal., and it is alleged by the plaintiff that he built one of the bungalows on lot 5 and commenced the erection of another on lot 6. The contract price was to be $2,400 each, according to certain plans and specifications, on which payments were to be made as follows: $300 when each bungalow was ready for plastering, and $300 when outside was finished, and $1,800 when completed, credit of $140 to be given for painting, tinting, and paperhanging by the owner on each of the bungalows. Plaintiff alleges that after completing the first bungalow and beginning the second defendants failed and refused to make payments due to the plaintiff under the terms of said contract, and that plaintiff was compelled to discontinue said work by reason thereof, and that plaintiff elected to treat the failure and refusal of defendants to make such payments as a breach of the contract on the part of the defendants; and plaintiff further alleges that about the 15th day of February, 1922, the defendants without just cause forbade plaintiff to proceed with the work under the terms of said contract, and in an action other than this, to which we shall refer hereafter as action No. 103798, on or about March 14, 1922, plaintiff sued defendants for damages to the amount of what would have been the profit of the plaintiff if he had been permitted to complete the contract and build the other two houses on lots 4 and 7, alleging that the amount of the profit on said two houses would have been $650, and further sued for depreciation in the value of materials placed upon the ground for the second house to the extent of $49.13.

Defendants, answering, denied that they forbade the plaintiff for any cause to finish the contract, and defendants further alleged that they had not sufficient information to determine what profit would have been made upon said houses, had they been built, nor to inform them as to whether the plaintiff had ordered or delivered upon the ground lumber or material for the purpose of constructing another house or houses on said tract, and denied further that the lumber or material, if so delivered, had depreciated in value in the sum of $200 or any other sum or sums at all, and further denied that the plaintiff had always been ready, able, or willing to build said houses on said lots, and denied that defendant had without just cause or any cause refused to allow plaintiff to do so, and, after an amended complaint by plaintiff in which, among other things in paragraph 3 thereof, plaintiff alleged that on or about the 15th day of February, 1922, the defendants failed and refused to make payments due to plaintiff under the terms of said contract, that plaintiff by reason thereof was compelled to discontinue said work, a stipulation was entered into between the attorneys for plaintiff and defendants on the 19th day of September, 1922, that the amended complaint should be filed and deemed denied by the defendants.

This case (No. 103798) then came on for trial in October, 1922, in the superior court of Los Angeles county, in department 22 thereof. After the trial the court found that the contract as set out had been entered into and duly assigned; that it was not true that on or about the 15th day of February, 1922, or any other time, that the defendants forbade plaintiff to proceed with the work under the contract, but that the plaintiff without sufficient notice to defendants abandoned said work and failed to comply with the terms thereof; that it was true that two of the houses called for by said contract had not been constructed; that it was not true that the plaintiff had always been ready, able, and willing to construct the two additional houses; that it was not true that the plaintiff had ordered or delivered on the ground lumber and material for the erection of houses on lots 6 and 7; that it was not true that said lumber and material had depreciated to the extent of $49.13 or any other sum; that it was not true that the defendants had failed or refused to make payments due to plaintiff under the terms of said contract; that it was not true that defendants did on or about the 15th day of February, 1922, breach said contract.

As conclusions of law the court found that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover damages in the sum of $699.13 or any other sum or sums whatsoever either by reason of the nonconstruction of the two houses or depreciation in value of materials; that plaintiff was not entitled to recover any money or moneys from the defendants; and that the defendants should have judgment against the plaintiff for their costs. Judgment was entered accordingly.

On or about the 20th day of March, 1922, the plaintiff filed a mechanic's lien against the defendants for the value of labor and materials used in the construction of house No. 1 on lot 5, less deductions, to the amount of $2,260, and also for the value of labor and material on the house on lot 6, to the extent of $1,493, or a total claim of $3,753, less payment of $801, leaving an unpaid balance of $2,952; and on the 13th day of June, 1922, the plaintiff filed suit against the said defendants to foreclose said liens, in action No. 107330, which is the present one.

In this case the defendants answered that they had paid all of the sums due for the construction of the first house on lot 5 with the exception of $10, and that they had paid $300 toward the construction of house No. 2 on lot 6, and further answering alleged that the plaintiff had, without cause or excuse, failed to erect the house on lot 6, and upon information and belief denied that there had been any labor or material furnished for the construction of the house on lot 6. This action came on for trial, and the defendants were allowed to file, as a further defense in answer to said suit, a plea of former adjudication of the same matter, and the court, after considering the presentation to it of the pleadings, findings, and judgment in the case No. 103798, found that the contract alleged to have been broken by defendants under action No. 103798 was the same contract which is set out in action No. 107330, and between the same parties as in action No. 103798. That the court in action No. 103798 had found that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover any money or moneys from defendants by reason of breach of said contract, and that no appeal had been taken by the plaintiff in said action, therefore the judgment in said action has become final; that as a conclusion of law the action before the court in this case is res adjudicata. In the case of People v. Bailey, 30 Cal. App. 581, 589, 158 P. 1036, 1039, it is said:

"In Russell v. Place, 94 U. S. 606, 24 L. Ed. 214, it is said: 'It is undoubtedly settled law that a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction upon a question directly involved in one suit, is conclusive as to that question in another suit between the same parties. * * *'"

And in the case of Green v. Thornton, 130 Cal. 482, 484, 62 P. 750, 751, the court says:

"In Southern Pac. R. Co. v. United States, 168 U. S. 1, 18 S. Ct. 18, 42 L. Ed. 355, it is said: 'The general principle announced in numerous cases in this court is that the right, question, or fact, definitely put in issue, and directly determined by the court of competent jurisdiction as a ground of recovery, cannot be contested in a subsequent dispute between the same parties or their privies; and, even if the second suit is for a different cause of action, the right, question, or fact once so determined must, as between the same parties or their privies, be taken as conclusively established, so long as the judgment in the first remains unmodified. * * *'"

The contract sued on in this case is what is known as a severable contract (see Pacific Wharf & Storage Co. v. Standard American Dredging Co., 184 Cal. 21, 25, 192 P. 847), and the plaintiff under certain conditions might have sued for damages or for loss of profits and sued separately for the actual cost of labor and material. The election, however, by plaintiff to declare the alleged failure to make payments a breach of the contract did not warrant a suit for profits, but might warrant a suit for labor and material such as was instituted under the mechanic's lien in case No. 107330. Cox v. McLaughlin, 52 Cal. 596; Id., 54 Cal. 605, 610.

The plaintiff's manner of setting out his causes of action in the first suit (No. 103798) was such that, whether all of the matter set out in the second suit was in the same form or not, the allegations were so related that apparently all of the evidence necessary for the second action was presented in the first and ruled upon by the court and made a part of the record without objection from the plaintiff, and therefore the findings of the trial court in case No. 103798 would be necessary and in accordance with the pleadings and evidence therein.

Taking into consideration the findings of the court in case No. 103798, referred to by the court in this action, it would seem that every issue involved was covered by the findings in that case. It was alleged in plaintiff's complaint that defendants failed to make payment in accordance with the contract, and the court in case No. 103798 found that it was not true that the defendants failed or refused to make the payments due, and, in regard to the allegation of breach of contract, the court found that it was not true that the defendants did, on or about the 15th day of February, 1922, breach said contract. It further found that the defendants did not forbid or refuse to allow the plaintiff to erect said houses; it also found that the plaintiff did not deliver lumber or other materials for the purpose of erecting said houses, and it found that the houses, if constructed, would have cost more than the contract price called for. The court further found that plaintiff, without sufficient notice to defendants, abandoned the work and failed to comply with the terms of said contract.

We therefore feel that everything that could have been decided in case No. 107330 had already been decided in action No. 103798. Therefore the action before the court in case No. 107330 is res adjudicata. Judgment affirmed.

YOUNG v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.★
CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. MORRIS et al.
(Civ. 5525, 5526.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 11, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 8, 1927.

1. Courts ⇨37(1,3)—Lack of jurisdiction of particular case may be waived by failure to object, and submission to jurisdiction may raise estoppel to deny.

Though absolute want of jurisdiction or subject-matter or cause of action cannot be waived, nor can estoppel be invoked to confer jurisdiction on tribunal having no jurisdiction of subject-matter, where court has general jurisdiction of subject-matter, lack of jurisdiction of particular case may be waived by failure to object, or submission to jurisdiction may raise an estoppel to deny it.

2. Evidence ⇨10(3)—Court will judicially notice that corner of Fifth street and Grand avenue in city of Los Angeles is in business district and is congested with traffic at certain times during each day.

Court of Appeals will take judicial notice that a certain street intersection in the city of Los Angeles, known as the corner of Fifth street and Grand avenue, is in the business district; that Fifth street, east of Grand avenue, is a business thoroughfare; and that at certain times during each day it is congested with pedestrians and vehicular traffic of all kinds.

3. Evidence ⇨10(3)—Court will judicially notice that Fifth street in city of Los Angeles proceeds westward from principal part of business district.

Court of Appeals will take judicial notice that Fifth street in city of Los Angeles proceeds westward from principal part of business district of city to its intersection with Grand avenue, and that intersection is but three or four blocks distant from such part of business district of city.

4. Courts ⇨37(2)—Method by which jurisdiction of particular case is obtained may be waived, unless seasonable objection is made.

Jurisdiction of subject-matter cannot be waived, but method by which jurisdiction of particular case within general class of cases is obtained may be waived, unless seasonable objection is made.

5. Courts ⇨37(2)—Landowner, after several years, held to have waived objection to jurisdiction of subject-matter in condemnation proceedings (Street Opening Act 1903, as variously amended [Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act No. 8198]).

Where city of Los Angeles, pursuant to Street Opening Act (St. 1903, p. 376), as variously amended (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act No. 8198), condemned property for extension of street and interlocutory decree of condemnation was entered, which was affirmed by appellate court, held, that landowner, after several years, acceptance of condemnation award and expenditure of large sums by city, and in view of congested traffic conditions which street extension sought to relieve, has waived and is estopped to deny court's jurisdiction of condemnation proceedings.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Action by the City of Los Angeles against Dan Morris and others, to condemn real property for street purposes. An interlocutory decree of condemnation was entered, and Annie F. Young moved to set aside and vacate such decree and the final decree and for an order dismissing the action. This motion was denied. After the decree in the condemnation action, Annie F. Young brought suit against the City of Los Angeles and others to quiet title. From judgment for defendant in the last-mentioned action, and from the order denying her motion in the condemnation action, Annie F. Young appeals. Judgment and order both affirmed.

Hyams & Himrod and Meserve, Mumper, Hughes & Robertson, all of Los Angeles (Timon E. Owens, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Herman Mohr and Donald M. Keith, Dep. City Attys., all of Los Angeles (John A. Rush, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

WORKS, P. J. The second cause above, entitled City of Los Angeles v. Morris, No. 5526, in the files of this court, is an action for the condemnation of real property for street purposes. It was commenced pursuant to the provisions of an act of the Legislature commonly known as the act of 1903 (Stats. 1903, p. 376, and, as variously amended, Act 8198, Deering's Gen. Laws 1923), and such proceedings were had that an interlocutory decree of condemnation was entered in the action. From this decree the defendant Annie F. Young, appellant here, in due time prosecuted an appeal and the interlocutory decree was affirmed. City of Los Angeles v. Morris, 74 Cal. App. 473, 241 P. 409. Six months after the filing of the affirming opinion the Supreme Court rendered a decision, in which it is now contended that questions of law were settled which strike at the very foundation of the proceedings involved in City of Los Angeles v. Morris. This decision of the Supreme Court was pronounced in O. T. Johnson Corporation v. City of Los Angeles, 198 Cal. 308, 245 P. 164. Thereafter defendant Young made her motion in the trial court in City of Los Angeles v. Morris, pursuant to notice filed about May 18, 1926, for an order setting aside and vacating the interlocutory decree of condemnation, and also the final decree, which theretofore had been entered therein, and for an order dismissing the action. The motion was denied and the defendant Young now prosecutes her appeal from the order denying it. Mrs. Young also, after the decision in O. T. Johnson Corporation v. City of Los Angeles, and on May 4, 1926, commenced the action which is above, entitled Young v. City of Los Angeles, No. 5525, in the files of this court. The purpose of the action was to quiet her title to the property attempted to be taken under the decree in City of Los Angeles v. Morris. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint as amended in this new action, it was sustained without leave to amend, and judgment was accordingly rendered against the plaintiff. From this judgment Mrs. Young also appeals.

The two appeals are argued together in a single set of briefs, and it is conceded that the questions of law presented by them are identical. We may, then, look to the complaint as amended in the action to quiet title for the facts upon which a determination of the legal questions is to depend, for the pleading alleges specifically matters not to be found in an ordinary complaint in such an action. The allegations of the complaint as amended are, in part and in effect, as follows, taking them in the order in which they are presented in the pleading:

In City of Los Angeles v. Morris, which for convenience will hereafter be referred to as the first action, the "city of Los Angeles sought to condemn and have condemned, and now claims that it did condemn and have condemned, for street purposes, the property" of appellant and of the other defendants in the action. The city now claims the right to use for street purposes the property which it so claims to have condemned, and makes such claim of right to use because of such condemnation. The complaint in the first action was filed June 29, 1921, and the answer of appellant therein was filed September 29, 1921. When the first action "was brought and tried, the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California held and was the owner of a mortgage indebtedness on" the property of appellant which was sought to be condemned in the suit "and because thereof was made a defendant in said action." This mortgage "indebtedness since the entry of the final judgment in said action was voluntarily paid by some person other than" appellant "and without her consent, authority, request, or confirmation." The first action was tried by jury as to appellant and the insurance company upon their demand in that behalf, and a verdict was rendered April 26, 1923. On April 27, 1923, "an interlocutory judgment or decree on said verdict of said jury was entered in said action as to the property of" appellant "and as to said mortgage in favor of" the insurance company. Appellant took her appeal from the interlocutory decree on July 11, 1923, and thereafter the decree was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal. At "the end of 60 days thereafter the remittitur in said action * * * was sent down and thereafter filed." After that event the trial court "purported and attempted to make, give, and enter a final decree or judgment in said action, wherein and whereby said court recited that it was adjudged and decreed that" appellant's "property was condemned to the city of Los Angeles" for the street purposes alleged in the complaint in the first action. Under the various ordinances leading up to the first action "and by virtue of said interlocutory judgment or decree and said final judgment or decree * * * the defendants now assert and claim that" appellant's property is part of "a public street of the city of Los Angeles" and "now claim and assert that said city is the owner, for street purposes, of the right to use" appellant's property "and for such purposes to pave and otherwise improve, and to maintain and use the same." After the affirmance of the interlocutory decree in the first action, after the sending down of the remittitur pursuant thereto, and after the entry of the final decree, "and believing and having good cause to believe that said judgment was valid and binding" and that the trial court had jurisdiction to render it, appellant "received from the county treasurer of the county of Los Angeles the sum of" $38,205.44, "which said sum had been paid to said treasurer by the county clerk of said county, to whom the same had been paid with other money in satisfaction of said judgment * * * and who therefor satisfied said judgment." At that time "there was an assessment against the remainder of" appellant's "property for the proposed improvement then amounting to the sum of" $8,897.56 "and which amount plaintiff, on the day she received said money, * * * paid to the authorities of the city of Los Angeles in satisfaction and discharge of such assessment, leaving the sum of" $29,307.88 "as the net amount which" appellant "thus received on said judgment and because thereof. * * * Whatever other moneys if any may have been paid on account of or in satisfaction of said judgment to any other person or corporation were paid without" appellant's "authority, knowledge, request, or confirmation."

It is of course obvious from this statement of facts that appellant, in her present situation, is remediless, unless the legal questions settled and declared in O. T. Johnson Corporation v. City of Los Angeles, supra, have an application under the facts of the first action. Notwithstanding this patent truth, we find it unnecessary to decide the question whether those points do apply here. It will be understood, therefore, that in nothing we say in this opinion do we intimate that the points determined in O. T. Johnson Corporation v. City of Los Angeles either would or would not have had an application to the first action if they had been presented upon the appeal from the interlocutory decree therein.

[1] Respondents contend that appellant has waived the points decided in the Johnson Corporation Case, and is estopped to urge them—is estopped, therefore, to contend for a dismissal of the first action or to maintain her action to quiet title. It is said in a standard cyclopædic publication:

"An absolute want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter or cause of action cannot be waived, nor can the doctrine of equitable estoppel be invoked to confer jurisdiction on a tribunal which has not jurisdiction of the subject-matter. But where the court has general jurisdiction of the subject-matter a lack of jurisdiction of the particular case may be waived by failure to take timely and specific objections, or an invocation of or submission to the jurisdiction may raise an estoppel to deny such jurisdiction." 15 C. J. 844.

It is pertinent now to remark that the point decided in O. T. Johnson Corporation v. City of Los Angeles, and upon which appellant relies, involved a question of jurisdiction of the subject-matter. The point did not, however, relate to the general jurisdiction of the trial court over suits for the condemnation of real property for street purposes, but only to jurisdiction over a particular case. That the general jurisdiction exists is true as a matter of course.

Before we cite other authority bearing upon the interesting and important question which is here presented, let us assemble briefly the facts upon which the claims of waiver and of estoppel are based. Because of the decision in the Johnson Corporation Case appellant was spurred to a renewed activity in May, 1926, for it was then that the steps were initiated which resulted in the order and judgment from which the present appeals were taken. As the element of time is material to be considered in determining whether the claimed estoppel exists, it is of interest to note what period has elapsed since appellant first had the opportunity to present the point for which she now contends and what were the occurrences of the interim. We state a chronology of the events which have transpired in the first action. The cause was commenced a month less than 5 years before appellant took the first steps toward a realization of the hope inspired in her by the decision of the Supreme Court in the Johnson Corporation Case. The answer of appellant was filed 4 years and 8 months before she presented the new point. The interlocutory decree had been on file a little more than 4 years. The appeal from that decree was taken two months less than 4 years before the new steps were taken, and the decision affirming it was filed 8 months before that time. The remittitur went down, of course, 60 days after the decision. Thereafter, and before appellant made her motion in the first action and commenced her action to quiet title, but after the filing of the final decree in the first action, appellant accepted the money allowed her under the interlocutory decree and paid the assessment due on the property remaining to her. There is in her complaint to quiet title enough to show, also, that the mortgage on her property, held by the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company, was paid as a result of the condemnation decree and out of moneys provided by the decree for that purpose. During all these times appellant never suggested the point which she now contends is determinative of the first action.

[2, 3] We take judicial notice of the fact that a certain street intersection in the city of Los Angeles, known as the "corner" of Fifth street and Grand avenue, is in a business district (Varcoe v. Lee, 180 Cal. 338, 181 P. 223); that Fifth street, east of Grand avenue, is a business thoroughfare; and that at certain times during each day it is "congested with pedestrians and vehicular travel of all kinds" (Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 208 P. 125). We think, upon the reasoning and authority of the two cases just cited, we also take judicial notice that Fifth street proceeds westward from a principal part of the business district of Los Angeles to its intersection with Grand avenue, and that the intersection is but three or four blocks distant from such part of the business district of the city. A copy of a map which is attached to the complaint in the first action, as well as the allegations of the pleading itself, shows us that the project of which the first action was an outcome contemplates the extension of Fifth street in a westerly direction beyond Grand avenue. A copy of the same map is also made part of the complaint in the action to quiet title. This plat shows us that the easterly line of the lands of appellant which are purported to have been taken by the decree in the first action as a part of the proposed extension of Fifth street is but 829.04 feet from the westerly line of Grand avenue. From these facts we cannot but perceive that the proposed extension of Fifth street through appellant's lands, which are a full block in extent, is a most important improvement. If the question decided in O. T. Johnson Corporation v. City of Los Angeles were held to be applicable to the first action, and appellant were to be allowed to urge it therein and in the suit to quiet title, two possibilities would arise. This is the first: If the defendants in the first action other than appellant are satisfied with the results flowing from the decree therein and never present the point for which appellant now contends, then the extension of Fifth street is finally accomplished as far as Flower street, which the maps already mentioned show is an existing cross street upon which the property of appellant abuts at its easterly line. In the event above imagined the traffic which moves westward along Fifth street from the busy center of the city must of necessity turn either north or south at Flower street. This is the second possibility: If the point made by appellant is good as to her in the first action, it is also good as to the other defendants therein. If the latter shall elect to avail themselves of the question by steps similar to those which appellant has attempted to take, or by others, if others may be imagined, then the traffic conditions at the intersection of Fifth street and Grand avenue must remain as they now are and large portions of the heavy traffic westward along Fifth street must turn at Grand avenue, either to the north or to the south.

The bringing of either of these possibilities into being as an actual condition of affairs, as we are bound judicially to know, is fraught with danger to the future welfare of the city of Los Angeles. The proposed extension of Fifth street, under the scheme which brought the first action into existence, as we are informed by the pleadings and by the maps in the two records before us, was to run from a line 575 feet westerly from Grand avenue, to which line there was before the first action was commenced a cul-de-sac extension of Fifth street, to a point in another west-going street some four or five blocks to the westward, which point is outside the business district of the city. If the west-going traffic on Fifth street, or such portion of it as it is desirable to move to the westerly parts of the city, instead of proceeding the length of the proposed extension of Fifth street, is forced to turn either to the north or south, particularly toward the south, either at Grand avenue or Flower street, injurious consequences to the handling of the traffic of the city will result. A diversion of west-bound traffic along Fifth street for but one block south, either along Grand avenue or along Flower street, will bring it to Sixth street, an important thoroughfare which at those points and for some distance westward is in the business district of the city. Of this condition we take judicial notice under the cases already cited. Such a diversion of traffic not only will impede the progress of that traffic itself, but it, in turn, will impede the traffic into which it is diverted, either in Sixth street or to the southward of it, in which direction the business district extends. In connection with the length of time during which appellant has failed to present the point for which she now contends, these circumstances, we think, aid materially in determining whether she is estopped to urge the question. All the matters mentioned in this paragraph were within the knowledge of appellant, either actual or presumed.

A determination of the point for which appellant now contends, and in her favor, will compel the city of Los Angeles, if it shall adhere to its determination to extend Fifth street, a thing naturally to be expected under the circumstances to which we have adverted, to institute new proceedings for the effectuation of the plan, with the long delay necessarily incident to such a course.

We are bound to assume that the city has expended large sums of money in the prosecution of its plan for the extension of Fifth street, up to the point which has now been reached in its consummation. The consequence of an upholding of the point for which appellant now contends would be that the expenditure of these funds would result in a waste of the entire amount which has been expended in pursuit of the plan, whatever the amount may be, and whether the city should determine to put the plan into final effect or to desert it.

At the point at which we have now arrived in the preparation of this opinion it is not difficult to perceive the dire consequences to result from appellant's failure to present, in due time, the point for which she now so vigorously contends, if it were determined that it were applicable under the facts of the first case and if she were permitted to avail herself of it. The equities of the situation are plainly against appellant. The city has surely been misled to its grievous injury by the long-continued silence of appellant, and by her long submission to the jurisdiction of the courts, if she shall now be permitted to overturn the extension proceedings. Under such circumstances we are naturally diligent in an endeavor to ascertain such a state of the law as will thwart her attempt at this late day to press the point. The public welfare demands that there should be an end to the litigation.

[4] One court has stated a general principle which may serve as an introduction to authorities dealing more specifically with the question here under examination, and the statement is quoted for that limited purpose, without a recital of the facts upon which the court based it:

"The general rule as applied to courts is that jurisdiction of the subject-matter—which means jurisdiction of the class of cases to which the particular case belongs and not jurisdiction of a case within such a class—cannot be waived. The method by which jurisdiction of a particular case within the general class of cases is obtained, and any defects or irregularities in respect thereto, may be waived, and are waived unless seasonable objection is made in accordance with the established practice." Taylor Coal Co. v. Industrial Commission, 301 Ill. 381, 134 N. E. 169.

See, also, People v. Penn, 302 Ill. 488, 135 N. E. 92.

Let us now proceed to a consideration of cases that seem, on the facts, to present situations which nearly approximate the condition evident in the present litigation, if, indeed, some of them do not exactly fit it. In a case in which a similar question to that here presented was considered the action, which was local in character, was commenced in a county other than that in which the property involved was situated. After decree it was attempted by certain of the parties to question the jurisdiction of the tribunal, but the court decided that:

"Having submitted to the adjudication without questioning the jurisdiction and having received the benefits of the decree, they cannot now claim that the Huerfano district court had no jurisdiction." Field v. Kincaid, 67 Colo. 20, 184 P. 832.

A somewhat similar condition of affairs is presented by several condemnation cases. In one of these the city of New York had condemned certain property for street purposes. Many years afterward an action in ejectment was commenced for the purpose of recovering the property. In ruling that the action could not be maintained, the court said on appeal:

"It is insisted by the counsel for the appellant that the laws under which this improvement was made, so far as they authorize the taking of private property for private purposes, are unconstitutional and void. This is undoubtedly true, when the power is exercised in opposition to the consent of the owner; but, when that consent is given, it is a waiver of the objection and removes the difficulty. A party may renounce a constitutional provision made for his benefit, and, when the law which provides for a transfer of property does not require the consent to be in writing, it may be manifested by parol acts and declarations, so as to effect a transfer of the title to real estate, notwithstanding the statute of frauds. Bassen v. Brennan, 6 Hill, 47 [40 Am. Dec. 387]; Embury v. Conner, 3 Const. [3 N. Y.] 511 [53 Am. Dec. 325]. The receipt of the money operates as an estoppel, and the damages paid have the same effect as a conveyance, and vest the title in the corporation. The consent of the plaintiff is apparent from his conduct in the matter. He evidently appeared and interposed objections to the first report made by the commissioners, and probably induced them to make the award of $1,500. He had a right to object to the confirmation of the report, upon the ground that the land was taken without his consent, and, had he done so, the report would have been set aside. Matter of John v. Cherry St. [In re John & Cherry Sts.] 19 Wend. 659. This he failed to do, and consented to receive the money without objection. The corporation was not bound to pay the money, except upon a waiver of all objections as to the title conferred, and his receipt of the money was a waiver of the objection, and a sufficient consideration for his affirmation of the title in the corporation. He received the money after he had inclosed the land; never offered to return it; remained quiet without asserting his claim, long after the possession was surrendered to the grantee of the corporation, who paid a valuable consideration for a conveyance; allowed him to improve it, without making any claim, and left it for the plaintiff, a purchaser upon an execution sale under an old judgment, 16 years after the land was appropriated under the corporation ordinance to bring an action for its recovery." Sherman v. McKeon, 38 N. Y. 266.

The opinion in another condemnation case is largely valuable because of the authorities which the court cites:

"A payment into the clerk's office, or a tender of the damages assessed, would not conclude a defendant; for, unless he accepted the same, there would be no acquiescence on his part, and he might properly appeal, or contest the right of the plaintiff in any other manner known to the law. Hartshorn v. Potroff, 89 Ill. 509. But the voluntary acceptance by the defendant of the damages assessed and awarded to him by the judgment, with a knowledge of all the facts, precludes him from afterwards controverting the rights of the plaintiff as established by the judgment. Nor is it material in such case that the judgment may have been erroneous, or even void. In Kile v. Town of Yellowhead, 80 Ill. 208, which was a prosecution for obstructing a highway, it was contended that the proceedings for establishing the highway were void, for the reason that they did not conform to the statute. The court said: 'After the road was ordered to be opened, appellant was paid and accepted $75, as the amount of damages awarded him by the commissioner of highways for the location and opening of the highway. This estops him from alleging that the proceedings were void.' To the same effect are Town v. Town of Blackberry, 29 Ill. 137; Rees v. City of Chicago, 38 Ill. 322; Hartshorn v. Potroff, supra; Karber v. Nellis, 22 Wis. 215; Felch v. Gilman, 22 Vt. 38; Hawley v. Harrell [Harrall], 19 Conn. 142. In Sherman v. McKeon, 38 N. Y. 266, it was held that where real estate had been condemned and taken by the city of New York for the purpose of widening a street, and the owner accepted the damages awarded, the receipt of the money by him was an expression of consent to the taking of the property by the city, and estopped him, and those claiming title under him, from alleging an unconstitutional taking of the property for private purposes. The same doctrine was laid down in Embury v. Conner, 3 N. Y. 511 [53 Am. Dec. 325]. In Whittlesey v. Hartford, etc., R. Co., 23 Conn. 421, and Hitchcock v. Danbury, etc., R. Co., 25 Conn. 516, it was held that where real property had been appropriated by a railroad company, and had been taken possession of and used for railroad purposes, the owner could not, after having received the damages assessed in his favor, question the regularity of the proceedings which resulted in the condemnation and assessment. In Burns v. Milwaukee, etc., R. Co., 9 Wis. 450, it was held that where condemnation proceedings had been had for the appropriation of two full lots belonging to the plaintiff, although more land was taken than the statutory right of way, the owner could not, after accepting the damages awarded for the entire property, question the legality of the proceedings or of the appropriation. The court said: 'We think the respondent stands in no better position than as though he had conveyed the lots to the company by deed and received his pay, and then sought to reclaim them by this proceeding.' Test v. Larsh, 76 Ind. 452.

In a later case the view expressed in the language just quoted was adhered to by the same court in a part of its opinion which is obiter, but in which additional authority is cited upon the subject. The action was in trespass for breaking down certain fences. The defendants answered that the act charged was committed by a town marshal because of rights claimed to have accrued to the town under a decree of condemnation of the property involved for street purposes. The court said:

"It is a general rule that, where benefits are awarded to the owner of land in proceedings to condemn, an acceptance of the sum awarded will preclude the owner from prosecuting an appeal. Elliott, App. Proc. § 150; People v. Mills, 109 N. Y. 69, 15 N. E. 886; Felch v. Gilman, 22 Vt. 38; Hawley v. Harrall, 19 Conn. 142; Elliott, Roads & S. 277. Judge Elliott says, in his Appellate Procedure (section 151): 'It will be observed that in the cases in which it has been held that an estoppel exists the act necessarily affirmed the validity of the judgment. Thus, where a party accepts money or property awarded him by a judgment, he concedes the validity of the judgment, since it is by virtue of the judgment that he obtains the money or property.' These principles have been applied by this court in proceedings similar to those involved in the present case. Test v. Larsh, 76 Ind. 452; Railroad Co. v. Johnson, 84 Ind. 420; Newman v. Kiser, 128 Ind. 258, 26 N. E. 1006. In Byer v. Town of New Castle, 124 Ind. 86, 24 N. E. 578, the doctrine that one may estop himself to deny the validity of condemnation proceedings was recognized. That he may estop himself, by the receipt of the money awarded in condemnation proceedings, to deny the validity of the proceedings, was held in a full and satisfactory opinion and citation of authority in Test v. Larsh, supra. We can conceive no good reason why he should, in good conscience, be permitted to receive all the benefits of the proceeding, and, while holding them, deny that the proceeding is effectual to create the burdens corresponding to such benefits." Holland v. Spell, 144 Ind. 561, 42 N. E. 1014.

On appeal from a decree of condemnation the opinion of the court of last resort of another state reads, in full:

"Yell county was entitled to the condemnation of a portion of the lands of Brooks, Neely & Co., for a certain public highway over the same. The land was condemned for that purpose, and the damages caused thereby were assessed, and a county warrant was issued to them therefor, and was received and collected by them. They cannot now contest the right of the county to the land so condemned. The warrant was issued in payment of such damages, and they were not entitled to hold it to satisfy damages that might thereafter be assessed in another proceeding to condemn other lands of theirs for the same highway. Having received and collected it, they accepted it for the purpose for which it was issued, and are estopped from claiming the land appropriated for the highway, and cannot, without the consent of the county, restore their rights by the return of the money received on the warrant." Brooks, Neely & Co. v. Yell County, 76 Ark. 67, 88 S. W. 590.

A case decided in another state is in a few of its features somewhat like the one now before us. A bridge company, by proceedings under the law of eminent domain, procured a decree for the condemnation of certain lands upon payment into court of the sum of $10,000. The defendant in the action thereupon appealed to the Supreme Court of the state and the decree was affirmed. An appeal was then taken to the Supreme Court of the United States and an affirmance again resulted. A successor in interest to the original defendant then, according to an opinion from which further quotation will be made below, "took and received from the clerk of the circuit court of Dunklin county the said $10,000 in satisfaction of said judgment for and as compensation for said strip. In the meantime * * * the plaintiff in said condemnation proceeding, after depositing said $10,000 with the clerk of the circuit court, proceeded to and did take possession of said strip of land and built and constructed its piers, approaches, and tracks to connect its * * * bridge with the Scott county terminus of said bridge, and graded and laid its terminal tracks on said strip, and has ever since and is now occupying and asserting its right to the possession thereof under and by virtue of its said condemnation proceedings. * * *" Thereafter the successor to the defendant in the condemnation suit commenced an action in ejectment for a recovery of a part of the lands taken by the decree, and judgment was therein entered in favor of the bridge company. Upon an appeal from this latter judgment the Supreme Court of the state said that the appellant contended for nothing that had not been settled in the condemnation litigation and that the court might well rest its decision upon what was determined in the earlier case, but that "it may be as well to add that two pertinent reasons suggest themselves in addition to what was said" in the earlier decision, as grounds for a ruling in favor of the bridge company. The court then said, in part:

"When the plaintiff in this cause, after the affirmance of the judgment of this court in 194 Mo. 175, 92 S. W. 475, by the Supreme Court of the United States in 206 U. S. 267, 27 S. Ct. 615, 51 L. Ed. 1057, accepted and took down the damages awarded to it by the judgment of the circuit court of Dunklin county as damages and compensation for this very strip of land, it foreclosed forever its claim to the possession of this strip. * * * If the plaintiff * * * had accepted the $10,000 damages adjudged to it by the circuit court before its appeal had been determined, it is obvious, under the decisions of this court, said appeal would have been dismissed by this court upon the evidence of satisfaction being shown to this court. Robards v. Lamb, 76 Mo. 192. In that case Judge Norton, speaking for this court, said: 'Can a party appeal from a judgment in his favor after having accepted the fruit of the judgment and satisfaction of it?' The answer was in the negative. * * * So in this case, when plaintiff sought and obtained an order from the circuit court directing the clerk not to pay the damages, the $10,000, to [the original defendants in the condemnation case], but to pay it to them, and afterwards received said money from the clerk, it became estopped by that action, irrespective of any error in the condemnation proceedings, from further claiming the land in suit, or questioning the validity thereof, and that estoppel is just as effective against assailing said condemnation proceeding collaterally as if the estoppel had been invoked in the direct proceeding to appropriate the land in suit." Cape Girardeau & T. B. T. R. Co. v. Southern Illinois & M. Bridge Co., 215 Mo. 286, 114 S. W. 1084.

We note, of course, that no question of jurisdiction was involved in this action.

[5] It must be conceded that most of the cases above cited turned upon the fact that the parties who sought to reopen or overturn judgments and decrees had accepted the benefits arising from them. There is slight language in some of the opinions indicating that a lapse of time, with attendant circumstances, will aid to a determination that those are estopped who would attempt to nullify the solemn judgments and decrees of courts after they have become, in the ordinary sense, final. If, however, there were to be found no authority even remotely touching the particular subject, we should not hesitate to declare such a rule, under a state of facts like that which is apparent in the present litigation. We think the general principles underlying the cases we have cited—which are no more nor no less than the principles of the law of estoppel itself—find a ready application to the situation in which appellant now finds herself and in which at this late day she seeks to embroil the city of Los Angeles. As we have already remarked, she by her silence—if the point she now seeks to present were good and if she were permitted to urge it—has enticed the municipality into a veritable pitfall. Valuable time, under such a state of affairs, will have been wasted, the public funds will have been expended without beneficial result, and troublesome traffic conditions which there was an attempt to cure will remain as before. As a consequence grave injury will have been entailed upon the inhabitants of the city. Under such circumstances we are not sure—although naturally we do not assume to decide the point—whether an estoppel would not have operated against appellant even if, after final decree against her in the first action, an occult prescience had prompted her to refrain from taking the money provided for her by the decree in the hope that some fortuitous circumstance, like the decision in O. T. Johnson Corporation v. City of Los Angeles, supra, might supervene to open a rift in the clouds which surrounded her. Her mere submission to the jurisdiction for so long a time, under the circumstances shown by the record, drags a salient principle of the law of estoppel into the case.

When we come to consider the nature of the point which it is claimed that appellant is estopped to assert—one relating to jurisdiction of the subject-matter—much comfort is to be found in the cases which we have cited. It is decided in one of them that a party may be estopped to question the jurisdiction of a court in a particular county to pronounce judgment in an action which in strictness could have been maintained only in another county. It has been determined, also, that one may waive or be estopped to assert constitutional questions against the validity of a judgment. Decisions to the effect that a right of appeal may be waived are most important, for such a waiver necessarily precludes the presentation of any kind of question which might be urged upon the appeal. It is remarked in several of the quoted opinions that one may be estopped to question a judgment which is void.

Under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure regulating the exercise of the right of eminent domain, a defendant who would collect the amount awarded to him by a judgment must execute a satisfaction of judgment before he can obtain it. Code Civ. Proc. § 1254. Appellant contends, granting that a waiver or an estoppel would result where the fruits of a judgment were taken under such circumstances, that such a consequence does not follow from the collection of the amount of a judgment awarded in an action maintained under the provisions of the act of 1903, already mentioned. Under this act (section 31) no satisfaction of judgment is required to be filed before the amount awarded by a decree may be realized. If there is any difference between the two situations, as bearing upon the questions of waiver and estoppel, which we do not decide, it is not so material as to affect those questions. Certainly the satisfaction of judgment under section 1254 is executed under the compulsion of the statute. If a defendant in an action controlled by the section is not desirous of collecting his money, he may refrain from executing the satisfaction. If a defendant in an action maintained under the act of 1903 is in a similar mood, he simply refrains from collecting. In each instance the affair is in his own hands.

We have already seen that appellant's mortgage to the defendant Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company was paid out of the money provided by the decree in the first action. She is accordingly discharged of liability upon the debt which the mortgage was given to secure. In her complaint in the action to quiet title she makes tender of the money she herself collected under the decree, although the tender is claimed by respondent to be insufficient, but she does not tender the amount paid to the insurance company. This circumstance, to our minds, has a material bearing upon the questions of waiver and estoppel which are here presented. It may be that appellant was not required, as a mere matter of pleading, to make tender of the amount paid to the company, for it was not received by her but by the corporation as a separate defendant. That question will therefore be laid aside. But if appellant should now be allowed to urge, against the sanctity of the judgment in the first action, the main point for which she contends, and should wage the battle over it successfully, how is the city to be reimbursed for the amount paid to the insurance company? Could the city succeed in an action to force the reimbursement? How could appellant, if reimbursement were possible, be restored to her position as a debtor of the insurance company? Surely this matter of the collection made by the company, of the amount of the judgment rendered in its favor, leads to most interesting ramifications.

On the whole, we are abundantly satisfied that the waiver and estoppel claimed by respondent are available to halt appellant's attempt against the judgment in the first action.

The judgment in Civil No. 5525 is affirmed. The order in Civil No. 5526 is affirmed.

FRELIGH v. McGREW et al. (Civ. 5860.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 20, 1927.

Appeal and error — 64—Appellate court had jurisdiction of appeal from superior court judgment reversing judgment of municipal court in action to recover $1,000 (Const. art. 6, § 4).

Since, under Const. art. 6, § 4, the District Court of Appeal has appellate jurisdiction over superior court's judgments, where demand amounts to more than $300, and not to exceed $2,000, the superior court did not have final jurisdiction on appeal from judgment of municipal court in action to recover $1,000, and hence motion to dismiss appeal was properly denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Henry M. Willis, Judge.

Action by Stella M. Freligh against Susan B. McGrew and others. Judgment for plaintiff in the municipal court was reversed on appeal to the superior court, and plaintiff appeals. Motion to dismiss appeal denied.

Arsen Yeretzian, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Stephen Monteleone, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. The plaintiff brought this suit in the municipal court of Los Angeles city. The action was one for money had and received, to recover $1,000 and costs.

After trial, judgment was rendered as prayed, the defendants appealed to the superior court, where a trial was had, and judgment rendered reversing that given in the municipal court. From the judgment so rendered by the superior court an appeal was taken by the plaintiff to this court, which appeal the defendant now moves to dismiss on the ground that the judgment of the superior court was final. In support of the motion we are cited to Raisch v. Sausalito Land & Ferry Co., 131 Cal. 215, 63 P. 346. The plaintiff and appellant in resisting the motion relies upon Scott v. Larson (Cal. App.) 255 P. 248. These decisions construe separate and differently worded provisions of the Constitution. In the former appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court was involved. That jurisdiction is declared in section 4 of article 6 of the Constitution, from which it is apparent, as stated in the court's opinion, that "the appellate jurisdiction of this court over the judgments of the superior court is limited to the cases in which that court is entitled to exercise original jurisdiction, and does not extend to a review of its action in which it exercises only an appellate jurisdiction."

However, Scott v. Larson called for the construction of another part of the same section, to wit, that providing for jurisdiction of the District Courts of Appeal, and the particular language in that behalf is:

"The District Courts of Appeal shall have appellate jurisdiction on appeal from the superior courts in all cases at law in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to three hundred dollars, and does not amount to two thousand dollars. * * *

It was held that this provision conferred jurisdiction upon the District Court of Appeal to pass upon certain appeals from judgments rendered by the superior court in cases appealed from the municipal courts. We think this conclusion is inevitable, for in the provision under consideration in that case and in the instant one no exception is made, but jurisdiction is conferred upon the District Courts of Appeal "in all cases at law in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to three hundred dollars, and does not amount to two thousand dollars." Here the judgment exceeds $300, and is less than $2,000.

The motion is denied.

PEOPLE v. WASHINGTON. (Cr. 1478.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 15, 1927.

Criminal law — § 1158(1)—Where conflicts in evidence are disclosed by record, reviewing court will not disturb order granting defendant new trial.

Where the record discloses conflicts in the evidence, the reviewing court will not disturb the order of the trial court granting the defendant a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Tena B. Washington was convicted of maintaining a public nuisance. From an order granting a new trial the people appeal. Order affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and George H. Johnson, Dist. Atty., and C. O. Thompson, Chief Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Bernardino, for the People.

Trent Penland and Frank T. Bates, both of San Bernardino, for respondent.

YORK, J. The people are appealing, not from the judgment in this case, but only from the order of the court granting the defendant a new trial.

A careful perusal of the evidence shows, even from the cold record, several reasons why the order granting a new trial was made. Conflicts in the evidence appear, even conflicts in statements of a witness on direct and cross examination, and the evidence casts doubt as to the sobriety of a witness at the time of the happening of the incidents to which he was testifying. Where conflicts are disclosed by the record, we will not disturb the order of the trial court, as the trial court had before it at the time of the hearing the witnesses themselves, and was in better position to pass upon the questions involved on the motion for a new trial than this court could possibly be.

As to the difference between the rule laid down for the trial court in acting on a motion for a new trial and the rule on appeals from such orders, the question is very clearly discussed in the opinion and the citations therein contained in the case of People v. White et al. (Cal. App.) 259 P. 76.

In People v. Canfield, 173 Cal. 309, 159 P. 1046, cited in the foregoing case, the court states:

"The judge who presided at the trial of the cause, who heard the testimony, who observed the jurors and had an opportunity also of testing the truth of the defendant's statements by noticing his demeanor, was in a peculiarly favorable position for determining justly the question whether or not the defendant had been accorded a fair trial. * * * We can hardly manufacture in fancy a hypothetical situation in which a reviewing court would be justified in questioning the discretion of a trial court who should grant a new trial in a case involving a criminal charge." (Italics ours.)

The case at bar was tried before two different judges, Hon. Charles L. Allison and Hon. Benjamin F. Warmer, both judges of the superior court of San Bernardino county. However, a considerable portion of the evidence was heard in the presence of Judge Warmer, and the motion for a new trial was granted by Judge Warmer. This fact is the principal difference between the case at bar and the case of People v. Canfield, supra.

We may assume that the acquittal of the defendant on the charge that she did willfully and unlawfully sell intoxicating liquor, etc., was not necessarily an acquittal on the second cause of action, that of maintaining a common nuisance. But an inspection of the record discloses the apparent fact that the jury, in order to have found defendant not guilty of the sale charge, must have disbelieved the principal witness for the state, even though he was strongly corroborated by other witnesses as to some facts. If they did so disbelieve, there remained no basis for a verdict of guilty on the second count.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

REAL SILK HOSIERY MILLS, Inc., v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 5853.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 20, 1927.

Master and servant ⇐375(1)—Injury to saleswoman, soliciting orders, before reporting for duty, held to arise "out of and in course of employment."

Where employer's manager expressly approved and assented to employee's habit of soliciting sales of merchandise before reporting for duty at 8 a. m., injury sustained by her while soliciting sales before reporting for work held to arise "out of and in course of employment."

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Claire Mueller, claimant, opposed by the Real Silk Hosiery Mills, Incorporated, the employer. To review and annul an order of the Industrial Accident Commission allowing compensation, the employer brings certiorari. Writ denied.

Rohe & Freston and Clyde F. Murphy, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

HOUSER, J. This is an application for a writ of review. It appears that a young woman was employed by the applicant herein as a saleswoman or solicitor for the sale of merchandise. She performed her duties on foot. Her regular hours of employment were from 8 o'clock a. m. to 5 o'clock p. m., and she was assigned to a restricted territory within which to perform her work. Instead of receiving a stated salary, her compensation was on a commission basis. At 8 o'clock each morning she was required to report to the manager of her employer for instructions, etc. At various times preceding the date of the injury sustained by the employee, and which was the basis for the present proceeding, the employee had visited prospective customers at an hour earlier than 8 o'clock a. m., which fact was well known to her employer, and for which act the manager of the employer had publicly commended the employee and held up her action in that regard as an example to be followed by other fellow saleswomen in the employ of the common employer. The employee lived in the general neighborhood of the district in which she worked and in which was located the office of the employer. On the morning of the day on which the employee was injured, she started from her home at an hour earlier than 8 o'clock a. m., and walked, not toward the office of her employer, but in an opposite direction, for the sole purpose of visiting a regular customer within her district, to whom she had previously sold merchandise, and to whom she expected to make another sale of merchandise on that day. While she was walking on the opposite side of the street which formed the boundary line of one of the sides of the district in which she was assigned to work, an automobile ran up on the sidewalk on which the employee was walking and caused the injury of which the employee subsequently complained.

The applicant herein contends that the case falls within the rule that an employee cannot recover for injuries sustained by him while going to or from his work, and cites authorities which in general uphold such doctrine. But the facts in this case do not exactly fit with those authorities. At any rate, other authorities are to the effect that where the workman is acting about his master's business, the fact that he receives an injury while traversing the highway will not preclude a recovery; but, if it be shown that the injury arose out of and in the course of the employment, the employee is entitled to compensation for the injury received by him.

In the instant matter, it appearing that the manager of the employer having expressed his approval and assent to the habit of the employee in soliciting sales of merchandise before actually reporting for duty at 8 o'clock a. m., it would follow that at the time the injury was sustained the employee was engaged in attending to business of the employer, which arose out of and in the course of her employment.

The petition should be and it is denied.

FREEMAN v. SULLIVAN. (Civ. 3308.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 20, 1927.

1. Partnership ⇐53—Evidence held to sustain finding that partnership was not created, but, under agreement, plaintiff was to bear losses (Civ. Code, § 2404).

Evidence held to sustain trial court's finding that relation of partnership was not created between parties, but, under agreement under which defendant bought and sold beans for joint account, plaintiff was to bear all losses, so that Civ. Code, § 2404, providing that agreement to divide profits implied agreement for division of losses, was inapplicable.

2. Partnership ⇐9(1)—That defendant was to have one-half profits for buying and selling beans as compensation held insufficient to show partnership.

Fact that defendant was to have as compensation one-half of the profits, if any, for buying and selling beans for joint account of himself and plaintiff held, under evidence, insufficient to show a partnership.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by William Freeman against L. L. Sullivan. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles A. Wetmore, Jr., of San Francisco, and Crofton & Wetmore, of Marysville, for appellant.

Sooy & Heywood, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action by the plaintiff for an accounting and to charge defendant with one-half of losses incurred. The defendant had judgment, and the plaintiff appeals.

The complaint filed herein sets forth two alleged causes of action, one based upon an allegation that the plaintiff and defendant formed a partnership and conducted a partnership for the purpose of buying and selling beans. The second cause of action sets forth that the plaintiff and defendant engaged in a joint adventure, the purpose of which was to buy and sell beans. The second cause of action set forth in the complaint was dismissed upon the trial. The answer of the defendant denies the partnership.

The transcript shows that the plaintiff and defendant, in the year 1917, entered into an oral agreement for the purpose of buying and selling beans. The plaintiff was to furnish the money; the defendant was to buy and sell the beans. The profits, if any, were to be divided. The testimony of the plaintiff was to the effect that the losses and gains were to be shared equally. The testimony of the defendant was to the effect that the plaintiff advanced all money; he, the defendant, was to do the buying and selling; that the plaintiff was to bear the losses, if any, and the profits, if any, were to be shared equally.

The court found that the relation of partnership was never created between the parties; that under the terms of the agreement entered into between the parties the plaintiff was to bear all the losses. The business carried on did result in a loss of several thousand dollars. The transcript further shows that the plaintiff was a man possessed of considerable means, having at his command a considerable sum of ready cash; that the defendant was a young man, 24 years of age, engaged as the driver of a creamery wagon, and had had some slight experience in buying and selling beans.

Upon this appeal the appellant sets forth five reasons why the judgment of the trial court should be reversed. First, that the court erred in failing to rule upon and grant plaintiff's motion to strike out a portion of defendant's answer. Second, that the court erred in granting defendant permission to file an amended answer. Third, that the court erred in overruling the plaintiff's objection to the introduction in evidence of defendant's exhibit number one, being copy of a complaint. Fourth, that the court erred in denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. And, fifth, insufficiency of evidence to justify the findings of fact. While the foregoing alleged errors have been assigned, only one, that is the fifth, has been seriously argued, and the only one to be considered in this opinion for the simple reason that it is the only one that touches the matter of substance affecting the merits of this action.

The agreement between the parties, as we have stated, was oral. The plaintiff testified to all the facts and circumstances necessary to show a partnership or joint adventure, and if the court, upon the testimony introduced by the plaintiff, had found the existence of a partnership, there would be no question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain such finding of the court. On the other hand, the defendant testified to a diametrically opposite state of facts; and the question presented to us is not whether there is a preponderance of evidence one way or the other, but whether there is sufficient evidence to sustain the findings of the court. The defendant testified as follows:

"I had some transactions with Mr. Freeman in regard to buying and selling beans. The contract between us was an oral contract; nothing was in writing. The agreement was made in 1917. The conversation took place on Fifth street, at the corner of Fifth and D, in Marysville, at Rock & Young's Tire Shop. That was the only conversation I ever had with Mr. Freeman in regard to the contract. Mr. Freeman asked me what I was doing, and I told him I was buying beans, and he asked me who I was buying for, and I told him for Rosenberg Bros., and some for Walter Lewis of the J. R. Garrett Company. He asked me if I ever came across what you call 'snap buys,' and I told him a few. Freeman said, 'I have considerable money lying in bank. If you care to go in and buy and sell the beans we will make some money,' and I told him I was not in very good shape because I had no money. He said, 'You don't have to worry about money because you won't lose on this deal. I will advance the money, and you buy and sell the beans, and we'll split the profits.' At that time I spoke about who would name the buying price and who would name the selling price of the beans, and I said it was to be understood that I would buy and sell the beans, and he said, 'that's just what I want you to do. I don't want to have anything to do with the beans whatever and I will advance the money.' At the time I spoke to Mr. Freeman I said, 'Mr. Freeman, I have no money to lose at all. I have been working down at the creamery, and I can't take a chance on losing any money.' And Mr. Freeman said, 'I have got lots of money in the bank and I will speculate on these beans. I will put up the money and stand the loss.' I was twenty-four years old at that time."

Appellant, in his argument, refers to certain insurance policies said to have been taken out upon the beans. The transcript shows the following:

"The respective policies of insurance were then admitted in evidence by the court and marked Plaintiff's Exhibit A, B, C, and D, respectively. In said policies of insurance Freeman and Sullivan were insured."

The respective policies are not set out in the transcript, and nothing further appears in relation thereto save and except what we have just stated. The transcript also shows that a certain complaint was admitted in evidence in which Freeman and Sullivan were plaintiffs, in an action begun to collect damages alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiffs. The complaint is not set out in the transcript, and nothing therefore appears as to its contents. The same is true with reference to a contract with the United States government for the sale of certain beans, being beans handled under the oral agreement referred to. The only record evidence which appears in the transcript is a letter written by L. L. Sullivan to the Rideout Bank authorizing the sale of certain beans. The letter is as follows:

"Marysville, Cal., March 26, 1921. Rideout Bank, Marysville, Cal.—Gentlemen: Mr. William Freeman has authorized you to sell, without notice to him, any and all beans which you are holding as collateral security for his note to you for $13,372.89, given August 16, 1919. As I am interested with Mr. Freeman in the beans pledged as collateral, I hereby consent to the said authorization and to any sale which may be made by you. Yours very truly, L. L. Sullivan."

[1] Even though the writings just referred to had been set out in the transcript, and assuming that their contents would tend to show the relation of partnership existing between the plaintiff and defendant in relation to the buying and selling of the beans, yet the trial court had before it the testimony of the defendant which we have just set forth, and if the trial court believed that to be a correct version of the transaction, then and in that case the record shows sufficient testimony to uphold the findings of the trial court.

We do not need to review the cases contained in the appellant's brief showing what constitutes a partnership and what constitutes a joint adventure, as the findings of fact in this case upon the testimony which we have set forth render all of them inapplicable. Accepting the testimony of the defendant as true, which the trial court had a right to accept, then the last clause found in section 2404, Civil Code, is applicable. That section reads:

"An agreement to divide the profits of a business implies an agreement for a corresponding division of its losses, unless it is otherwise expressly stipulated."

From this it follows that all of the cases having to do with an agreement where the parties enter into a relation involving a division of the profits without any express stipulation as to the losses, are not in point. The court in this case has accepted the defendant's version that the plaintiff was to contribute the money; the defendant was to contribute his labor; the defendant was to have as his compensation one-half the profits, if any; that the plaintiff was the one who was speculating and taking the chances of losing by the venture. The plaintiff was putting up the principal with the hope of obtaining a profit thereon, and taking the chances of losing a portion of the principal. The defendant was giving his labor with the hope of obtaining a reward therefor, and a chance of receiving no compensation.

[2] The mere fact that the defendant was to have one-half of the profits, if any, as his compensation, is not sufficient to show a partnership. A somewhat similar question was passed upon in the case of Fee v. McPhee Co., 31 Cal. App. 295, 160 P. 397. The court there, among other things, said:

"Plaintiff had no interest in the profits as property; he was simply employed under an arrangement by which he was to receive for his services a given sum out of, or a proportion of, the profits. Berthold v. Goldsmith, 24 How. 536 (16 L. Ed. 762): 'The general rule is,' as was stated in Jernee v. Simonson, 58 N. J. Eq. 282 (43 A. 370), 'if there is no community of interest in the property of a business, that there is no partnership inter sese by mere participation in the profits.'"

A somewhat similar case is that of Jones v. Guaranty Co., 178 Cal. 375, 173 P. 586, where it was held that such a venture did not constitute a partnership. Likewise, in the case of Vanderhurst v. De Witt, 95 Cal. 57, 30 P. 94, 20 L. R. A. 595, where it is said:

"The fact that appellant was to receive one-half of the net profits of the farming and threshing business would not make him a partner therein, if the understanding and agreement between the parties was, that he was to receive the same only as a compensation for the use of certain personal property let by him to George De Witt, to be used by said George De Witt in the prosecution of that business," etc.

Many cases might be cited where one of the partners was to receive a certain proportion of the profits as his compensation and a partnership relation held not to be thereby created. See Lyden v. Spohn-Patrick Co., 155 Cal. 177, 100 P. 236; Martin v. Sharp & Fellows Co., 34 Cal. App. 584, 168 P. 373; Hanna v. Flint, 14 Cal. 73. See, also, Whitcom v. Converse, 119 Mass. 38, 20 Am. Rep. 311; Meadows v. Mocquot, 110 Ky. 220, 61 S. W. 28. Other cases might be cited showing that where there is no community of interest in the property, there is no partnership, but, as this case comes squarely under the exception clause of section 2404 of the Civil Code, citation of authorities is unnecessary.

The evidence which we have set forth appearing to have been accepted by the trial court at its face value, the objection that the findings are not properly supported is untenable, and a discussion of the law relative to partnerships and joint adventures would seem to be wholly unnecessary.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed. We concur: HART, Acting P. J.; WEY-AND, Justice pro tem.

1. Fraud ☞58(1)—Sales ☞441(3)—Evidence held to sustain findings of false representations and breach of warranty, in buyer's action against seller, based on defective condition of boiler sold.

In buyer's action against seller for damages resulting from defective condition of boiler which buyer resold, evidence held to sustain findings for plaintiff on counts for false representations and breach of warranty.

2. Sales ☞442(6, 7)—Measure of damages for sale of worthless boiler purchased to be resold held difference between actual value and resale price, plus expense of attempted repairs and loss incurred in buying substitute boiler (Civ. Code, § 3333).

Where boiler which seller warranted and sold buyer for purpose of resale proved worthless, buyer in action against seller for damages was entitled, under Civ. Code, § 3333, to recover difference between actual value and resale price, plus buyer's expenditures in attempt to put boiler in good condition, and in addition loss incurred by buyer in purchasing substitute boiler for person to whom resale was made, without regard to sections 3313, 3314.

3. Damages ☞62(4)—Buyer must so act as to minimize damages on seller's breach of warranty.

On seller's breach of warranty as to condition of thing sold, buyer is bound to so act as to minimize damages.

4. Sales ☞442(10)—Buyer recovering damages for defective boiler sold held not entitled to interest on purchase price paid.

Where boiler which buyer purchased for purpose of resale proved worthless, buyer in action against seller for damages, based on misrepresentation and breach of warranty, was not entitled to interest on purchase price originally paid.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by L. D. Armstrong, doing business under the name and style of the L. D. Armstrong Company, against the Lassen Lumber & Box Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order made after trial and entry of judgment allowing plaintiff to amend the second amended complaint, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

On rehearing. For former opinion, see 257 P. 214.

Cushing & Cushing and Walter Slack, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Horace M. Street, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. "Defendant appeals from a judgment against it for $2,113.29 and interest on $800 of this amount from March 24, 1922, and from an order allowing plaintiff to amend its second amended complaint made after trial of the action and entry of judgment.

"The action arises out of a sale of a used 80 horse power return tubular boiler and certain fittings thereof, claimed to have been made to plaintiff by defendant on March 24, 1922. The material facts in the case are: During the times involved in the action and prior thereto plaintiff was engaged in the business of buying and selling steam boilers at San Francisco, Cal., and defendant was operating a sawmill and box factory at Susanville, Cal. At the beginning of 1922 plaintiff ascertained that the Leal & Sons Lumber Company, who were conducting a sawmill business at Brownsville, Cal., desired to purchase an 80 horse power return tubular boiler good for 140 pounds per square inch pressure and in good condition, and requested an employee, one S. W. Smith, to find and secure such boiler. Smith at this time, having a memorandum in his office showing that defendant had some boilers for sale, visited Mr. R. D. Baker, president of defendant, and told him he was seeking an 80 horse power return tubular boiler good for 140 pounds pressure; that he wanted the boiler for resale purposes; that he would pay cash; and that his purchaser would buy on time. Baker showed Smith a list that had on it 2 boilers for sale described on the list thus: '2—60" x 16' boilers 140 pound pressure, including breeching, stack, front, water column, each $900.' Baker told Smith other parties had an option for these boilers, and that if this was not exercised he would be glad to negotiate with Smith. After the option expired further verbal negotiations were had between Smith and Baker, resulting in an offer from Baker to sell one of the boilers for $800 cash. In these conversations no mention was made by Smith that the boiler was being purchased for either the L. D. Armstrong Company or the Leal & Sons Lumber Company. This fact was first brought to defendant's notice in a letter left at defendant's office on March 22, 1922, addressed to defendant, which stated, 'Pursuant to your offer for the sale of one boiler 60" x 16', good for 140 pounds working pressure, and including breeching, stack, front, grates and fittings, all in good order, f. o. b. cars Susanville, Cal., I have this day delivered at your office in the Monadnock Building, San Francisco, Cal., a check for the agreed price of $800, signed by L. D. Armstrong Company, together with a bill of sale to be signed by your company in favor of the said L. D. Armstrong Company.

"To avoid any further delay I wish you would make immediate shipment of the above, as follows, viz.:

"From—L. D. Armstrong Co.

"To—Leal and Sons Lumber Co., Oroville, Cal.

"Via—Southern Pacific Co., as carload shipment.

"Please mail the B/L to me as soon as possible and oblige.

"Very truly yours, S. W. Smith."

"The descriptive part of the bill of sale referred to in this letter is as follows:

"One butt-strap boiler 60" in diameter by 16' long for 140 pounds working pressure complete with breechings, stack, front, grates, and full complement of fittings.

"Boiler now located at our plant at Susanville, Cal. Above consideration includes delivery of boiler on cars in good condition at Susanville."

"Inclosed with this letter was plaintiff's check made payable to defendant's order in the sum of $800. To this defendant replied with a letter addressed to S. W. Smith stating, 'We have your letter 22d, and as arranged with you this morning, we have telegraphed our people at Susanville to make shipment of the boiler and parts quick as possible, shipping same as from L. D. Armstrong Company to Leal & Sons Lumber Company, Oroville, Cal., via Southern Pacific as a carload shipment, and on receipt of the bill of lading will forward same to you without delay.

"As explained and arranged, this boiler includes breeching, stack, half arch front, water column, and safety valve, but no grate bars or other fittings, and we have issued a bill of sale accordingly to L. D. Armstrong Company, and we wish to acknowledge receipt also of their check for $800 in payment of same f. o. b. cars Susanville."

"Inclosed with the same was a bill of sale reading as follows: 'For value received, we hereby sell, assign, and transfer to the L. D. Armstrong Co. the following described personal property, viz.:

"One butt-strap boiler 60" in diameter by 16' long for 140 pounds working pressure with breeching, stack, half arch front, and safety valve.

"This equipment is now located at our plant as Susanville, California. Above consideration includes delivery on car in good condition at Susanville.

"In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hand this 24th day of March, A. D. 1922. Lassen Lumber & Box Co.,

"R. D. Baker, President.

"[Corporate Seal.]

"Defendant then loaded the boiler on a freight car at Susanville and caused the same to be shipped to Leal & Sons Lumber Company consigned to Oroville, Cal. There being no railroad from Oroville to Browns-ville, Leal & Sons Lumber Company had the same diverted from Oroville to Honcut, and from there it was hauled to their plant at Brownsville with trucks, a distance of some 20 miles. There the Leal & Sons Lumber Company examined the boiler for the first time, and, finding a number of defects, notified plaintiff of the same and demanded another boiler from plaintiff. Plaintiff sent a boiler maker and helper, a boiler inspector of one of the companies that insure boilers, and one of the members of the State Industrial Accident Commission to inspect the boiler. The boiler workers were attempting to repair the boiler when the inspectors came and stopped the work because of the defects found, these being what is termed a bag in the boiler, a lamination in one of its plates, some burnt off rivets, and injured left-hand sheet. It is not claimed that the defect styled a "lamination" was known to the defendant prior to the sale of the boiler, but it is urged that the other defects, the bag in its bottom, twelve burnt off rivets at its rear seam, and supporting lugs driven into its left-hand sheet, were known to defendant prior to its making the sale, and justified the refusal of the Leal & Sons Lumber Company to accept the boiler shipped it by defendant. Plaintiff expended $180.11 in attempting to repair the boiler sold by defendant. On discovering that further efforts in that line would be futile, it searched available markets for a suitable return tubular boiler to deliver under its contract, but without success. It then induced Leal & Sons Lumber Company to accept a boiler of different type, styled a water tube boiler. This necessitated the erection of the boiler by plaintiff, such work requiring experienced hands, which is not necessary for installing a return tubular boiler. The cost of the water tube boiler and its erection was $1,933.18. The cheapest secondhand return tubular boiler plaintiff could discover with which to supply the Leal & Sons Lumber Company, after it declined that shipped them by defendant, was at a price at $2,100. The evidence shows that a new return tubular boiler of the class sold by defendant would have cost at San Francisco in April, 1922, from $2,300 to $2,400. The price which Leal & Sons Lumber Company agreed to pay plaintiff for the boiler procured from defendant was $1,575. The trial court found that the boiler furnished by defendant was of no value, fixed the damages at $2,113.29, being $1,933.18 costs of the water tube boiler and its erection, and $180.11 for plaintiff's expense in endeavoring to repair defendant's boiler at Brownsville. The judgment also awarded plaintiff interest at 7 per cent. per annum on $800 from March 24, 1922, and costs, and ordered and adjudged that upon payment of the judgment defendant might retake his boiler.

"During the trial plaintiff asked leave to amend his second amended complaint to conform to the evidence and permission to so amend was granted, but through neglect and inadvertence the formal amendment was not engrossed and made part of the record in the case until after this appeal was taken. This was done under an order of the trial court on motion of plaintiff and after a hearing thereon, and defendant has appealed from this order, which appeal has been heard with the appeal from the judgment.

"The amendment allowed to plaintiff's second amended complaint, and filed after the judgment was appealed from, sets forth the facts concerning the installation of the used water tube boiler for the Leal & Sons Lumber Company in place of the defendant's return tubular boiler, the reasons for this action, the costs of doing the same, and is in conformity with the evidence admitted at the trial.

"Appellant does not question the right of amending pleadings to conform to the proofs in proper cases, but contends that the only time this can be done is prior to judgment. The precise point presented by this case does not appear to have been heretofore passed upon by the appellate courts of this state. A liberal allowance of amendments by trial courts in order that pleadings should conform to the proofs has been generally sustained on appeals from such orders. In Koch v. Wilcoxon, 30 Cal. App. 517, 158 P. 1048, it is said: 'An amendment to conform to the proof may always be made provided the cause of action is not thereby changed.' Hancock v. Board of Education, 140 Cal. 554, 74 P. 44; Henry v. Phillips, 163 Cal. 135, 124 P. 837, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 39; Wardrobe v. Miller, 53 Cal. App. 370, are to the same effect. The trial court in this case has done on motion an act similar to that which the Supreme Court directed the trial court to do in the case of Alameda County v. Crocker, 125 Cal. 101, 57 P. 766, where the court below was ordered to amend the complaint as of a date prior to the judgment, by inserting the true names of defendants sued under fictitious names. The decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Norton v. Larney, 266 U. S. 511, 45 S. Ct. 145, 69 L. Ed. 413, is an interesting one regarding allowing of necessary amendments in trial courts where it is said, 'Where the amendment must necessarily be allowed by the trial court, it would be mere ceremony to reverse the decree and remit the purely formal making of the amendment to the lower court. We shall, therefore, consider the bill as amended to conform to the facts of record.'

"Under all the circumstances, if any error was committed by the trial court in allowing the filing of the amendment in question after appeal, so as to make the pleadings conform to the proof, it must be held an error that has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice after an examination of the entire case and the evidence.

"The second amended complaint, on which the action was tried, is in two counts, the first being based on deceit, and the second on breach of warranty. The trial court found that plaintiff bought the defendant's boiler in reliance on defendant's representation that the boiler was in good condition and good for 140 pounds pressure; that plaintiff entered into his contract with Leal & Sons Lumber Company in reliance on defendant's representations; that on the arrival of the boiler at Brownsville plaintiff in good faith made an effort to repair the boiler with competent workmen; that the boiler was not in good condition; that defendant knew this when it sold the boiler to plaintiff; and that the boiler was of no value either when placed on the cars at Susanville or at any time thereafter. These findings have ample support in the evidence introduced and the only substantial question to determine is whether or not the trial court has correctly determined the amount of damage recoverable by plaintiff. At the inception of the transaction defendant was informed that the boiler was being purchased for purposes of resale, and that the boiler required was one of 80 horse power in good condition and good for 140 pounds working pressure.

"The description in its bill of sale of March 24, 1922, describing the property sold as 'one butt-strap boiler 60" in diameter by 16' long for 140 pounds working pressure, with breeching, stock, half arch front, and safety valve,' and stating that this equipment was located at defendant's plant at Susanville, and that the consideration received included delivery on car in good condition at Susanville, cannot be construed as other than a warranty on defendant's part that the boiler sold was in good condition and capable of being used with safety under a steam pressure of 140 pounds.

"That the boiler was bagged and a number of its rivets burnt out when it was placed on the car at Susanville is shown by the evidence, and that because of these defects it was not at that time good for 140 pounds pressure, cannot be questioned. That the boiler was bagged and had a defective rear seam had been called to the attention of defendant in a report of the Hartford Steam Boiler Inspection Company on an inspection made on the 16th and 17th of April, 1920.

"Defendant, when it represented the boiler to be in good condition, made a positive assertion not warranted by its information of that which was not true, even though it may have believed it to be true. Such statement if made by defendant with intent to induce plaintiff to enter into the contract of purchase would be an actual fraud on plaintiff and would justify a recovery of damages for such fraud. Subdivision 2, § 1572, Civ. Code."

The foregoing opinion is a copy of the opinion rendered by Judge Bartlett sitting as a justice pro tempore in this court. Thereafter a petition for rehearing was filed, and therein the appellant contended that this court had erred in the rule of damage. That the contention might receive further consideration, the court granted a rehearing, heard counsel reargue the question, and has examined many additional authorities. After having done so, the court is of the opinion that the conclusion reached in the former opinion is correct.

[1] As state above, the plaintiff pleaded his claim in two counts. He pleaded a cause of action (1) as for false representations, and (2) he pleaded a cause of action as for the breach of the warranty. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff on both counts. The defendant earnestly challenges both findings. The challenge cannot be sustained. There is evidence in the record which sustains each finding.

[2, 3] The defendants also challenge the measure of damage adopted by the trial court. They argue that the facts are such that the rule stated in section 3314 of the Civil Code does not apply, and that the damages allowed exceeded the rule stated in Civil Code, section 3313. But, in the presence of the finding on the issue of fraud, these matters become academic discussions. The trial court found in favor of the plaintiff on the issue of fraud. In this same connection it found that the boiler as delivered had no value. The plaintiff pleaded and proved, and the trial court found, that the plaintiff paid the defendant $800 for the worthless boiler; that the plaintiff had contracted a bona fide sale thereof to Leal & Sons Lumber Company for $1,575; that is, at a profit of $775; that the plaintiff expended $180.11 in good faith in an attempt to use the boiler; and that he expended $1,933.18 to purchase a boiler to make good his contract to Leal & Sons Lumber Company. The detriment suffered by the plaintiff included: (1) The difference between $1,575, the value of the boiler if it had been what it was represented to be, and zero, which was the actual value as found by the court (Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 390, 92 P. 1011), that one item included his outlay, $800, and "the benefit of the bargain," $775, but both were elements of his detriment as decided in the case cited; (2) his expenditures made in good faith in an attempt to use the boiler, that is $180.11; and, (3) the sum of $358.18, that is the loss incurred by the plaintiff in buying the substitute boiler. Each of these items was a direct consequence and therefore a proximate result of the wrong of the defendant. 1 Sedgwick on Damages, § 121b. Each item mentioned was an element of the detriment suffered by the plaintiff and therefore recoverable. Civ. Code, § 3333. Merguire v. O'Donnell, 103 Cal. 50, 36 P. 1033, is authority sustaining the recovery of the first and third items. Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 510, 143 P. 729, is authority sustaining the first, second, and third items. And under well-settled rules, the plaintiff was bound to so act as to minimize the damages. In doing so, he incurred a loss of $358.18 in purchasing the substitute boiler. Therefore he was entitled to recover that item. These conclusions are supported by numerous authorities. 4 Sutherland, Damages, §§ 1171-1174, and cases cited.

[4] The plaintiff did not rescind. He affirmed the contract and sued for damages. At the time the defendant received the $800 in payment it was entitled to receive it and thereafter to retain it. The defendant was not therefore liable for interest on the $800 so received and retained.

That portion of the judgment which awarded interest on the $800 is stricken out. As so modified, the judgment is affirmed. The plaintiff will recover his costs on appeal.

VEGETABLE OIL CORPORATION v.
TWOHY. (Civ. 6039.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 28, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 27, 1927.

1. Evidence — § 80(1)—Law of state in which plaintiff corporation was organized and existing is presumed to be same as law of California, where foreign laws were not alleged.

Where complaint by corporation, organized and existing under laws of Delaware, to recover stock subscription contained no allegation as to effect of laws of Delaware, laws of such state, in absence of allegation to contrary, must be presumed to be same as law of California.

2. Corporations — § 89(1)—Code provisions for making calls and assessments become part of contract for stock subscription, where contract is silent thereon (Civ. Code, § 331 et seq.).

Where subscription contract to stock of corporation is silent as to time of payment, provisions of Civ. Code, § 331 et seq., with respect to manner of making calls and assessments, enter into and become part of contract.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

3. Corporations $\Leftrightarrow$ 90(1)—Corporation cannot maintain suit to collect unpaid assessments without first exhausting statutory procedure (Civ. Code, § 331 et seq.).

Suits for collection of unpaid calls or assessments cannot be maintained until corporation has followed and exhausted procedure laid down in Civ. Code, § 331 et seq.

4. Corporations $\Leftrightarrow$ 90(5)—Allegation that corporation, suing for stock subscription, duly performed all terms on its part failed to allege that statutory procedure for collecting unpaid assessments had been exhausted (Civ. Code, § 331 et seq.).

In suit by corporation to recover stock subscription under contract fixing no time of payments, allegation that corporation has duly performed all terms and conditions on its part was not sufficient to allege that procedure required by Civ. Code, § 331 et seq., for collection of unpaid calls or assessments had been exhausted.

5. Corporations $\Leftrightarrow$ 90(5)—Facts creating personal liability under statute for assessment by corporation must be alleged to maintain action for assessment (Civ. Code, § 331 et seq.).

In order to maintain an action to collect a call or assessment by corporation, facts which create personal liability therefor, under Civ. Code, § 331 et seq., must be alleged.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by the Vegetable Oil Corporation against John Twohy. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. S. Gray, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Sanborn & Roehl and De Lancey C. Smith, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. The plaintiff is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Delaware, and the action was brought, to recover an amount subscribed by the defendant for certain shares of the capital stock of the corporation. A general demurrer to an amended complaint was sustained, and, the plaintiff having declined to further amend, a judgment—from which the appeal was taken—was entered for the defendant.

The subscription alleged was for preferred stock, the averments of the complaint with respect to the terms of the contract being as follows:

"That on or about the 28th day of January, 1918, plaintiff's directors at a regular meeting thereof duly opened books of subscription to fill up the plaintiff's capital stock; that on or about the 20th day of March, 1920, the defendant duly subscribed in writing and agreed to take 300 fully paid and nonassessable shares of the said preferred stock of the plaintiff at the price of $110 a share, or a total price amounting to $33,000; that no definite date of payment of said subscription was stated therein, and the reasonable time for performance (without demand) by defendant in the premises expired long before but within 4 years preceding the commencement of this action."

It was further alleged that pursuant to an agreement of the parties that the defendant might solicit subscriptions from others, and that such subscriptions should be applied to the subscription by him, he procured from one Frank Marten a subscription for 50 shares of the stock of the corporation at $110 per share, amounting to $5,500, which sum was paid and credited to the account of the defendant; that no further payments were made thereon and "the plaintiff has fully performed all the terms and conditions on its part, and has always been ready, able, and willing to issue and deliver to defendant upon payment therefor by him stock certificates representing the shares of its preferred stock in accordance with said subscription."

[1-3] The complaint contained no allegation as to the effect of the laws of Delaware, and, in the absence of allegations to the contrary, the laws of that state must be presumed to be the same as our own. Norris v. Harris, 15 Cal. 226; Peck v. Noe, 154 Cal. 351, 97 P. 865. It is the rule in California that where a subscription contract is silent as to the time of payment the provisions of the Code with respect to the manner of making calls and assessments enter into and become a part of the contract, Los Angeles Athletic Club v. Spires, 166 Cal. 173, 135 P. 298; and that suits for the collection of unpaid calls or assessments cannot be maintained until the corporation has followed and exhausted the procedure laid down in sections 331 et seq. of the Civil Code. Bell Development Co. v. Marshall, 35 Cal. App. 324, 169 P. 717.

[4, 5] In the present case the contract fixed no time of payment; and, other than the averment "that the plaintiff has duly performed all the terms and conditions on its part, * * *" it was not alleged that the prescribed procedure had been followed. It is contended by plaintiff that this allegation sufficiently shows that the statutory provisions in this respect were complied with, but, as held in the following cases, it is essential in order to maintain an action to collect a call or assessment that the facts which create a personal liability therefor under the provisions of the statute be alleged. Shively v. Eureka, etc., Co., 129 Cal. 293, 61 P. 939; Los Angeles Athletic Club v. Spires, supra; Bell Development Co. v. Marshall, supra; Bottle Mining & Milling Co. v. Kern, 9 Cal. App. 527, 532, 99 P. 994.

In view of the above rule, the complaint was insufficient and the demurrer was properly sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

86 Cal. App. 284

RICKS v. ADORNI. (Civ. 3320.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 24, 1927.

1. Landlord and tenant — 230(1)—Complaint alleging indebtedness, tenant's agreement to pay, and named amount was due and unpaid held to state cause of action for rent.

Complaint alleging tenant became indebted to landlord in named sum for rent of premises at named monthly rental, that he agreed to pay rental at named rate, that he had not paid rental or any part thereof, and that named sum was due and unpaid held sufficient to state cause of action for rent.

2. Appeal and error — 989—Question on appeal is whether evidence substantially supports judgment.

Question on appeal is not whether there is sufficient evidence to warrant judgment for appellant, but whether judgment rendered is substantially supported by evidence.

3. Landlord and tenant — 231(8)—Evidence held to sustain finding that defendant conducted business in rented premises on his own account and for his individual benefit.

In action for rent of restaurant, evidence that defendant as creditor of former tenant took over restaurant business held sufficient to sustain finding that he conducted restaurant on his own account and for his individual benefit.

4. Landlord and tenant — 110(1)—Tenant abandoning premises would be estopped from asserting any right of possession under lease.

Where written lease under which restaurant proprietor held premises was not canceled in writing or terminated formally, but tenant abandoned premises and landlord took possession thereof through creditor of tenant as her tenant, the original tenant would be estopped from asserting any right of possession.

5. Landlord and tenant — 110(1)—Landlord, taking possession of premises on abandonment thereof by tenant, could lease them to defendant, who was creditor of tenant.

Where former tenant abandoned leased premises, and landlord took possession thereof through defendant, as creditor of tenant, as her tenant, former tenant being estopped from asserting any right of possession, landlord could lease premises to defendant.

6. Appeal and error — 692(1)—No part of account books appearing in record, reviewing court cannot determine whether sustaining objection to their introduction was erroneous.

Where court sustained objection to introduction of account books in evidence, reviewing court cannot determine whether ruling thereon was erroneous or prejudicial, where no part of account books appears in record.

7. Landlord and tenant — 200(1)—Whether tenant paid at rate provided or reasonable rental value was immaterial, where reasonable value was same as rate provided.

Where first tenant abandoned premises and landlord took possession thereof through tenant's creditor as her tenant, in action for rent it was immaterial whether defendant was liable for rent at rate named in the lease or for reasonable value, where testimony showed reasonable rental value was at same rate as rate named.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action by Eva L. Ricks against Joseph Adorni. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Metzler & Mitchell, of Eureka, for appellant.

P. H. Ryan, of Eureka, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. [1] Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount demanded in the complaint, and the defendant has appealed therefrom. The complaint alleges:

"That defendant became indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $1,000 as and for the rent of those certain premises Nos. 211 Fourth street and 514 Second street, in the city of Eureka, county of Humboldt, state of California, for the period of 8 months commencing on the 1st day of June, 1925, at the monthly rental of $125.00, payable monthly in advance on the first day of each and every month, and that defendant promised and agreed to pay said rental at said rate; that defendant has not paid said indebtedness nor any part thereof, and that said sum of $1,000 is now due, owing, and unpaid from defendant to plaintiff."

Appellant contends that the complaint does not state a cause of action. Complaints in substantially the same form have been so often held sufficient in this state that discussion of the question is deemed unnecessary.

[2] In appellant's brief it is said:

"We hesitate to set forth all of the evidence given in the case, but will set forth that testimony which we believe establishes the facts of the case by the great preponderance."

The evidence which is most favorable to the appellant is then quoted. This method of presenting an appellant's case is ordinarily futile. The question on appeal is not whether there is sufficient evidence to warrant a judgment for the appellant, but whether the judgment rendered is substantially supported by the evidence.

[3] It substantially appears from the evidence that Ted Regos held, under a lease from the plaintiff, certain rooms in a building on the premises described in the complaint, in which he conducted a restaurant known as the Liberty Café; that he became heavily indebted to various persons, of whom the defendant was the largest creditor; and that in the spring of 1925 Regos, the defendant, and the agent of the plaintiff held a consultation relative to such restaurant business.

Plaintiff's agent, P. H. Ryan, who is her attorney in this action, testified:

"By appointment, Mr. Adorni and Mr. Ted Regos met with me in my office and it was explained to me in the presence of all three of us that Mr. Regos was financially upon the rocks and he was leaving here, * * * and that he desired and was going to turn the whole business over to Mr. Adorni, who had a large mortgage * * * upon the fixtures and equipment of the Liberty Café. And he stated in substance and effect that he was abandoning the place to Adorni; * * * and he wanted to know, and Mr. Adorni wanted to know from me as Mrs. Rick's attorney and agent, if it would be satisfactory to her and to me for him, Adorni, to take over the place, and I asked Adorni if he would accept an assignment of the lease so as to obligate himself for all the rents under the lease, and he refused to do it, said in substance, or the idea he gave me was he was not willing to bind himself for all the rent that might accrue under the lease until it expired. Then I told him that that was all right with me to go in there, and he could take the place provided he paid the rent, and he answered that he would pay the rent. He stated that he thought he could operate the place and build the business up and sell it or dispose of it, and thus get enough money out of it to pay his own claim, and possibly enough out of it to settle the debts of the other creditors. * * * Regos left. * * * He abandoned the leased premises, stated in effect and in substance that he was turning them over to Joe Adorni, and in his presence and the presence of Adorni, I gave Adorni to understand that he must pay the rent if he kept the place. * * * He stated in substance and effect that he would pay the rent as long as he occupied it. * * * Several times I telephoned and dunned him for the rent * * * and he repeatedly asked me for a reduction of the rent."

The plaintiff testified that the defendant stated to her that he would pay the rent; that in July, 1925, he paid her back rent due from Regos in the sum of $300 and said that "he would pay the future rent"; that he said, "I will pay it while I am there and have full charge;" that "he had taken over the business and was going to handle it, try to pull it out;" that "he owned the fixtures and that he was going to manage it;" that "he owned everything in there, and he was going to fix it up and sell it;" that "Regos was out of it entirely." Admittedly the defendant was in possession of the premises and conducting the business in question in some capacity during the whole period for which the plaintiff claims rent. In his answer the defendant alleges:

"That said defendant had nothing whatsoever to do with said premises except to act in the capacity of a trustee for the creditors of said Ted Regos, among said creditors of whom was said plaintiff."

Some testimony was introduced in support of this allegation, but the evidence quoted herein is amply sufficient to support a finding to the contrary and to the effect that the defendant conducted the business on his own account and for his individual benefit alone.

[4, 5] The written lease under which Regos held the premises was not canceled by an instrument in writing or terminated in any other formal manner, but Regos abandoned the premises, and the plaintiff took possession thereof through the defendant as her tenant. Under the circumstances shown by the evidence, Regos would be estopped from asserting any right of possession under the lease. "On a tenant's abandonment of the premises, the landlord may re-enter, and take unqualified possession, for his own benefit, in which case the tenancy is at an end." 15 Cal. Jur. 797. The lease being so terminated, the plaintiff had the right to lease the premises to the defendant.

[6] The defendant offered in evidence the account books of the Liberty Café kept under his direction during the time he had charge of the business. The court sustained the plaintiff's objection to the introduction of such evidence. No part of such account books appears in the record, and therefore it cannot be determined whether or not the ruling was erroneous or prejudicial. 2 Cal. Jur. 275.

[7] The lease under which Regos held the premises provided for payment of rent at the rate of $125 a month. The plaintiff testified that the reasonable rental value of the premises was $125 a month. Whether the defendant was bound to pay at the rate provided in the lease, therefore, or the reasonable rental value, the result is the same.

The judgment is affirmed.

McNEECE v. WOOD et al. (Civ. 5514.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 21, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 19, 1927.

1. Landlord and tenant §134(2)—Use of room for registering bets on horse races held unlawful use within lease prohibiting any improper or unlawful use (Pen. Code, § 337a).

Use of room in rented premises for registering bets on horse races in violation of Pen. Code, § 337a, held unlawful use within terms of lease prohibiting lessee from using premises for any improper or unlawful purpose.

2. Appeal and error §931(5)—Appellate court presumes that trial court followed testimony of witness sought to be impeached which was favorable to respondent.

Under rule that decision of trial court is final on questions of fact, where there is conflicting testimony, appellate court must presume that trial court followed witness' testimony which was favorable to respondent, though appellant sought to impeach witness' testimony.

3. Landlord and tenant ⚡37—Lease should be strictly construed when sought to be forfeited.

Where forfeiture of lease is in issue, lease should be strictly construed.

4. Landlord and tenant ⚡105—Lease prohibiting "any" improper use, and providing that "any" such improper use shall forfeit lease, requires only single improper use for forfeiture (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 16, 1875; Civ. Code, § 1644).

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 16, 1875, and Civ. Code, § 1644, providing for construction of words in ordinary sense and that courts take judicial notice of true significance of words, lease prohibiting lessee from using premises for "any" improper purpose and "any" such improper use shall forfeit lease, may be construed to mean prohibition of single improper purpose, and that one violation would forfeit lease.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Any.]

5. Landlord and tenant ⚡105—Violation by subtenant forfeiting lease was violation by lessee, whether he knew it or not.

Under lease providing that any improper use shall work forfeiture of lease, violation of such provision by subtenant forfeiting lease was violation by lessee, whether lessee knew it or not, since lessee is responsible for acts of sublessees, whether known to him or not.

6. Landlord and tenant ⚡105—National Prohibition Act, forfeiting lease for violation of act by lessee, is written into lease executed subsequent to its enactment and gives landlord cumulative remedy (Wright Act; National Prohibition Act, tit. 2, § 23, subd. 4 [27 USCA § 37]).

Where lease providing for forfeiture on lessee's using premises for any unlawful use was executed after National Prohibition Act (27 USCA) and Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79) went into effect, National Prohibition Act, tit. 2, § 23, subd. 4 (27 USCA § 37) providing that violation of act shall at option of lessor work forfeiture of lease, gave landlord cumulative remedy and was written into lease.

7. Landlord and tenant ⚡105—Clause forfeiting lease on single unlawful use of premises held not dependent on subsequent clause giving landlord option to forfeit on lessee's failure to comply with covenants for 30 days.

Clause in lease providing for forfeiture on lessee's committing single improper use of premises, violation of which eo instante worked forfeiture, held not dependent on subsequent clause giving lessor option to forfeit lease on lessee's failure to keep covenants for period of 30 days; such clauses being independent of each other.

8. Landlord and tenant ⚡44(2)—Covenant in lease against unlawful use of premises runs with land and is binding on assignees and subtenants of original lessee.

Covenant in lease prohibiting lessee from using premises in any improper or unlawful manner is a covenant running with the land, binding on all assignees and subtenants of original lessee.

9. Landlord and tenant ⚡105—Use of premises for registering bets on horse races and in violation of Prohibition Act held substantial breach, justifying forfeiture of lease prohibiting any unlawful use of premises (Pen. Code, § 337a).

Under lease prohibiting any unlawful or improper use of premises, use of premises for registering bets on horses, in violation of Pen. Code, § 337a, and for sale of liquor, in violation of Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79) and National Prohibition Act (27 USCA), was substantial breach justifying forfeiture of lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by James R. McNeece against George W. Wood and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Luce & Swing, of San Diego, for appellant.
A. Haines and John H. McCorkle, both of San Diego, for respondent.

COLLIER, Justice pro tem. Facts: McNeece, in writing, leased to Wood certain real property in the city of San Diego. The lease contained only two clauses which are material here. They are as follows:

Clause 1. "It is further agreed and understood that said lessee shall not use or permit to be used said premises for any improper or unlawful purpose, and any such improper or unlawful use shall work a forfeiture of this lease." (Italics ours.) Clause 2. "It is further hereby agreed that if the lessee shall at any time refuse or fail to pay the rent as herein provided to be paid by him, or shall refuse or fail to keep any of the covenants and agreements herein contained and such conditions shall continue for a period of 30 days, then, and in that event, the lessor may, at his option, declare this lease forfeited and may retake possession of said premises without process of law."

[1] Wood sublet the upper floors of said premises to Jennie H. Hipwell, one of the defendants (not appearing in this appeal), who operated the same through her agent, Mrs. Geohegan. On or about November 20, 1925, Mrs. Geohegan leased room 438 in said premises to Bradley and O'Brien, alias O'Hara, who immediately commenced to operate therein a "bookmaking" joint. Mrs. Geohegan testified at the trial that said room was rented for the purpose of bookmaking. This was noticed by a Mr. Logan, who occupied the dual position of elevator man and janitor for Mrs. Hipwell and Mrs. Geohegan, and watchman for Wood. Logan notified Mrs. Geohegan of his suspicions and tried twice to notify Wood, but without avail. Logan then notified the police department. Room 438 was raided by the police on December 1, 1925. It was stipulated by all parties during the trial that the room was being used by Bradley and O'Brien for "registering bets on horse races and they had with them the paraphernalia for that purpose." This was clearly a violation of section 337a of the Penal Code, and an "unlawful" use within the terms of the lease. Thereupon McNeece served notices declaring said lease forfeited, whereupon this action was commenced.

On June 19, 1926, one England was operating a lunch counter on the ground floor of the building under a sublease from Wood. On that date one Shepherd, England's employee, who was in charge of the lunch counter during the night shift, was arrested for violation of the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79). The evidence disclosed that the arresting officers found two pints of moonshine whisky behind the counter, one pint in Shepherd's coat and one pint in each of a pair of the latter's shoes. The coat and shoes were in a locker in the rear of the restaurant, the door of the locker being open. McNeece again served notices upon Wood, charging the above as an additional violation of the lease. Plaintiff's complaint was amended to cover the same. Thereafter a trial was had, and the court found that both of said matters were violations of the "unlawful purpose" clause, forfeited the lease, and awarded damages to plaintiff.

[2] There was no evidence showing that Wood had any actual knowledge of either of said matters until after they had happened. But in addition to the testimony of Logan, epitomized above, Mrs. Geohegan, the agent of the sublessee, Mrs. Hipwell, testified, in substance, that she alone managed the upper floors of said premises, and that on November 20, 1925, she rented room 438 to Bradley and O'Brien for the purpose of "bookmaking." Appellant sought to impeach this evidence, but, in view of the familiar rule that the decision of the trial court is final on questions of fact where there is conflicting testimony, we must presume that the court followed her testimony, which was favorable to the respondent.

The case largely turns upon the interpretation to be placed upon the words in the lease, "said lessee shall not use or permit to be used said premises for any improper or unlawful purpose"—in view of the fact that the evidence shows that Wood did not at any time have actual notice or knowledge of either or any of said unlawful acts, except as he may have received the same, as a matter of law, by reason of the notice or knowledge of his watchman, Logan.

Appellant contends that Wood did not "permit" said violations, therefore the lease could not be forfeited. He also contends that clause 2 modifies clause 1, so that granting, for the sake of argument only, that clause

1 was violated, still such violations must continue for 30 days before the lease could be forfeited, and that there was no showing of any violation continuing for that period of time. The other contentions of appellant which we deem material will be noticed in due course. If, within the decisions, Wood did not "permit" the said violations, then the judgment of the trial court must be reversed. Hence we shall first consider that point.

[3] Respondent seeks to forfeit appellant's lease. At the outset we are confronted with the rule of strict construction where such a forfeiture is the issue. This rule is clearly epitomized by Justice Works in Stratford v. Continental, etc., Co., 74 Cal. App. 551, 555, 241 P. 429, 430, as follows:

"The courts tenaciously cling 'to the rule that forfeiture of estates and restraints upon alienation should not be enforced except when the terms of the conditions are so plain as to be beyond the province of construction' [citing cases]."

[4] Attention is first called to clause 1, and particularly to the words italicized, as follows:

"* * * said lessee shall not use or permit to be used said premises for any improper or unlawful purpose, and any such improper or unlawful use shall work a forfeiture of this lease." (Italics ours.)

It seems to us that the "terms and conditions are so plain as to be beyond the province of construction." The Standard Dictionary defines "any" as "a, an, one; said of a single person, thing or part of whatever kind, degree or quantity from among a number, class or total." Webster defines "any" as "one," indefinitely out of a number; one indiscriminately of whatever kind or quantity." "Words and phrases are construed according to the context and the approved usage of the language. * * *" Section 16, Code Civ. Proc. "The words of a contract are to be understood in their ordinary and popular sense, rather than according to their strict legal meaning; unless used by the parties in a technical sense, or unless a special meaning is given to them by usage, in which case the latter must be followed." Section 1644, Civ. Code. "Courts take judicial notice of the following facts: 1. The true signification of all English words and phrases, and of all legal expressions." Section 1875, Code Civ. Proc.

In the light of the foregoing, clause 1 may be paraphrased as follows:

"* * * The lessee shall not use or permit to be used said premises for a single improper or unlawful purpose, and one such improper or unlawful use shall work a forfeiture of the lease."

Therefore, leaving out of the discussion for the time being the knowledge or lack of knowledge of the appellant, "any," or a "single," violation of clause 1 would be sufficient to work a forfeiture of the lease. This position is sustained by Burke v. Bryant, 283 Pa. 117, 128 A. 822, where it is said:

"The owners of a building and land in Wilkes-Barre leased the premises to Bryant and Bell 'for the purpose of garage and storage' for a term of 10 years. The lease provides, the 'premises shall not be used for any purposes contrary to this agreement, and in case of violating this agreement the lessors may, at their option, declare the term of this lease at an end.' The lessees sublet the premises, as they were privileged to do, to Harry Bloom. The clauses governing subletting give to the lessors or their assignees the same rights and powers against subtenants as against original lessees. The lessor owners assigned the lease, with all its terms and conditions, to Berry and Cohen, who subsequently assigned to the present use plaintiffs.

"As the result of a police raid on May 28, 1923, a large still, with the necessary equipment for distillation of medicated alcohol, was discovered thereon in full operation, and was confiscated. The plaintiffs, on learning of this use of the property, proceeded to regain possession by confession of judgment in ejectment against the original lessees by virtue of a warrant of attorney contained in the lease, declaring a forfeiture, in their affidavit of default, because of a violation of the terms of the lease, and because of the provisions of the Volstead Act. U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½ et seq. (27 USCA). Bloom denied any connection with the still, charging another who had the privilege of occupying for a short time a small boarded off portion of the building as responsible. The court below, on petition, opened the judgment thus entered, and, at the trial subsequently held, the jury found the premises were used for purposes contrary to the lease and the law, with Bloom's knowledge and connivance. Judgment was entered on the verdict.

"This appeal raises some very interesting and important questions which we must consider: First, whether the doing of things which constitute a violation of the Volstead Act may, under section 23 of title 2 of that act (section 10138½ [27 USCA §§ 35-37]) work, at the lessor's option, a forfeiture of the lease, and if so, whether the impairment of the obligation of a contract or the taking of property without due process of law would result. * * *

"The last clause of section 23 of title 2 of the Volstead Act reads: 'Any violation of this title upon any leased premises by the lessee or occupant thereof shall, at the option of the lessor, work a forfeiture of the lease.' Act October 28, 1919, c. 85, 41 Stat. 305, 314.

"* * * The forfeiture of leases, where the premises have been used in violation of the liquor laws, is a valid exercise of the police power as being an aid to prohibition. It has a direct effect on the enforcement of the law.

If violators of the law were permitted to remain in possession, enforcement would be rendered increasingly difficult, whereas if the premises are returned the maintenance of public morality is secured. It is very important that a lawless occupant should be completely ejected by a law-abiding lessor. Forfeitures under this section of the Volstead Act have been upheld. Grossman v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 280 F. 683; U. S. v. Boynton (D. C.) 297 F. 261; Farrelly v. Wells, 115 Misc. Rep. 632, 189 N. Y. S. 34.

There is no denial of due process because the forfeiture was to be effected as in other cases.

* * * The language of the act is:

"Any violation of this title upon any leased premises by the lessee or occupant thereof shall at the option of the lessor work a forfeiture."

"The cause of forfeiture arises when the unlawful relation is shown to exist. * * * The consequences of the act, so far as the public is concerned, may result in fine and imprisonment, but, as it relates to the owner of the premises, his protection lies in forfeiture. It is a separate, distinct, and independent redress, different from the government's right to convict or resort to padlock proceedings. See Commonwealth v. Allen, 70 Pa. 465, 471. A decree abating a nuisance and canceling a lease for violation of section 23 of the Volstead Act was sustained in Grossman v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 280 F. 683. * * *

"It is urged that a single violation of the Volstead Act would not be sufficient to declare a forfeiture. The acts do not so state. * * * The tenant was responsible for any violation of the covenants of the lease by the subtenant, and it is not material whether he knew of such violation or not. Goenner v. Glumicich, 81 Pa. Super. Ct. 521. Where a subtenant offends against a provision prohibiting the occupation of the premises for dwelling houses or any unlawful purpose, the restriction on the manner of use runs with the land, and is binding on the estate in the hands of subtenants. Wheeler v. Earle, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 31, 51 Am. Dec. 41." (Italics ours.)

See, also, Poulos v. Toledo, etc., Co., 22 Ohio App. 426, 154 N. E. 57, where a sale of cocaine brought about the forfeiture.

[5] Appellant claims that the lease was not forfeited because he had no knowledge of the violations until afterwards, and hence did not "permit" them. With this contention we cannot agree. We hold that a violation of clause 1 by a subtenant was a violation by the lessee whether the lessee knew it or not. The following language of the court in People ex rel. Jay v. Bennett, 14 Hun (N. Y.) 63, 65, is illuminating on this question. Here the court was considering this clause in a lease:

"It being clearly and distinctly understood, however, that at no time shall it be allowed to sell intoxicating liquor on the premises."

The court said:

"The covenant between the relator and the lessees was broken when liquor was sold. It extended to all successors of her lessees. It related to the premises and subjected all occupants to its control, no matter from what source they derived their right of possession under it. [Italics ours.] The covenant indeed, construed in the light of the existing laws, was that if liquor was sold upon the premises without license, and therefore in violation of the statute of 1857 (Laws of 1857, c. 628), regulating the sale of intoxicating drinks, the lease should become ipso facto void at the option of the relator, and she could employ the same process to enforce that result which she could resort to if the tenants or lessees had held over after the expiration of their lease. * * * [Italics ours.]

"It then seems to be beyond all dispute that if the premises or any part of them was used or occupied for any illegal trade, the relator was eo instante invested with the right to declare that the lease was void, and to insist upon her right to possession. The sale of intoxicating liquors without a license, whether as an entire business or as an incident to one, is an illegal trade under the statute of 1857, supra. The sale is a criminal offense and punishable as such. It is a misdemeanor, and prohibited as a crime. * * * The relator proved the use of a part of the demised premises for the sale of liquors without a license, as an incident of the business carried on by the seller. Having done this, she established the facts required by law to authorize the remedy she sought."

Perhaps the leading case on this branch of the question is Wheeler v. Earle, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 31, 51 Am. Dec. 41. In this case evidence was introduced tending to show that a subtenant of a part of the premises, under the tenant, had occupied the same for the unlawful purpose of selling liquor without a license. The court ruled that the evidence established such a use as constituted a breach of the lessee's covenant, that a breach thereof gave a right of re-entry, and that the tenant must be presumed to have known of the unlawful use by his subtenant. The court in its opinion said:

"Does the clause in this lease, authorizing a re-entry by the lessor, to repossess himself of the premises, apply to the breach of the covenant, 'that the lessee will not occupy, or in any manner suffer the buildings now on the premises, or which may hereafter be erected thereon, to be occupied, for dwelling houses, or for any unlawful purposes whatever'?"

"This, of course, depends upon the construction to be given to the indenture. The language is very broad; the lessee stipulates, 'if he shall neglect or fail to perform and observe any or either of the covenants herein contained, which on his part are to be performed,' then the lessor may lawfully enter, etc. Although the conditions upon which the lessee took his lease may be such as materially to affect the value of his leasehold interest, and subject it to the contingency of an early termination, yet if such are its plain and obvious terms, the lessee must abide by the stipulations of the lease. * * *

"This restriction upon the manner of using the premises runs with the land, and is binding upon the estate in the hands of subtenants. They take only the title of the lessee, and with the like limitations and restrictions. Such use by a subtenant holding under the original lessee, for an unlawful purpose, would equally forfeit the estate. This principle seems very clear, and hence, in the treatises upon the relation of landlord and tenant, it is said that when an estate is held subject to forfeiture, for breaches of numerous covenants or stipulations, some of which may be likely to be violated, it is expedient always to take from the sublessee good security against all such violations of the various stipulations in the original lease, as may subject the original lessee to lose his whole estate. By creating subtenants, the original lessee puts them in possession of the premises, and being thus in under him, their acts, if in violation of the conditions of the lease, will cause a forfeiture.

"In the view we have taken of this case, it is unnecessary to consider particularly, whether the ruling that the defendant was presumed in law to know that the buildings were used for unlawful purposes, if the fact was so, was entirely correct in the form stated. The legal consequence will be much the same under the different forms in which I have stated the consequences of a violation of the lease by a subtenant of the lessee." (Italics ours.)

In Miller v. Prescott, 163 Mass. 12, 39 N. E. 409, 47 Am. St. Rep. 434, the court said:

"The plaintiff's testator, who was the lessee of the real estate described in the writ, entered into a covenant not to 'make or suffer any waste, or any unlawful, improper, or offensive use of said premises.' By the terms of the report the verdict is to stand, unless there was error in one of the two following rulings: First, 'that unlawful use of the premises by a subtenant was a breach of the covenants and conditions of the lease, whether known by the plaintiff, or her testator or not.' * * * The covenant referred to is a covenant concerning land, and affecting the mode of enjoyment of it. * * * It is intended for the protection of the lessor, and he may enforce it directly against the original lessee, or against an assignee of the lease. If there is no assignment of the lease, but a subletting of the whole or a part of the premises for a time less than the remainder of the term, so that no privity of estate is created between the lessor and the subtenant, the covenant would be ineffectual for the lessor's protection, if he could not proceed on the ground that it applies as well to an unlawful use by a subtenant as by the original lessee. We are of opinion that the agreement not 'to make or suffer' an unlawful use of the premises must be interpreted as a stipulation that there shall be no unlawful use by the original lessee, or by any person who is occupying under him. It is easy for the lessee to control the use of the property, and to protect the interests of the lessor and of himself in this particular. With this interpretation, effect is given to the word 'suffer.' It may not be reasonable to hold that the covenant makes the lessee liable for an unlawful use of the property by trespassers, but he may well be held to 'suffer' unlawful use of the property if he does not take effectual measures to prevent such a use by those who occupy by his authority." (Italics ours.)

To the same effect are Haymarket Realty Co. v. Sullivan, 249 Mass. 262, 143 N. E. 907; Sullivan v. Vorenberg, 241 Mass. 319, 135 N. E. 165; Arado v. Maharis, 232 Ill. App. 282; United States v. Gaffney (C. C. A.) 10 F.(2d) 694; Crowe v. Riley, 63 Ohio St. 1, 57 N. E. 956; Shepard v. Dye, 137 Wash. 180, 242 P. 381, 49 A. L. R. 824; and Burke v. Bryant, supra.

[6] Appellant claims that section 10138½ of the National Prohibition Act, "Any violation of this title upon any leased premises by the lessee or occupant thereof shall, at the option of the lessor, work a forfeiture of the lease," does not apply in this case. We think this position untenable. The instant lease was executed after the National Prohibition Act and the Wright Act went into effect, and the National Prohibition Law was written into the lease. See United States v. Gaffney, supra, where the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit says:

"Entirely apart from the specific covenants of both Mantell's and Gaffney's leases, each of them impliedly contained a covenant to obey the National Prohibition Law. When that covenant was broken by the tenant, all right to maintain the lease as against the landlord was gone; and it was assuredly within the power of the nation to aid the landlord to recover his premises, by a method well known to the law, and not created by the amendment."

To the same effect see Burke v. Bryant, supra. Furthermore, the National Prohibition Act and similar enactments give the landlord a cumulative remedy. Haymarket Realty Co. v. Sullivan, supra; Burke v. Bryant, supra.

[7] We now come to the question, Does clause 2 control clause 1? Appellant contends that:

"Considering the two clauses of the lease which provide for a forfeiture and applying the proper rules of construction to those two clauses, a breach of the condition not to use or permit the use of the premises for unlawful purposes must continue 30 days before a forfeiture may be exacted."

This we cannot accept. As we have seen, clause 1 provides that:

"Any [one, a single] improper or unlawful use shall work a forfeiture of this lease."

Furthermore, it seems clear to us that the two clauses are not dependent the one on the other. Clause 1 refers solely to the use of said premises. Clause 2 refers only to the covenants given as consideration for the use. Clause 1 refers to the positive mandate of the law; clause 2 refers to the contract of the parties. A violation of clause 1 ipso facto and eo instante works a forfeiture of the lease, whereas a violation of clause 2 merely gives the landlord an option to terminate the lease. Finally, it seems to us that to say that clause 2 modifies clause 1, to the effect that a violation of clause 1 must continue 30 days, would be to hold that there was a contractual obligation on the part of the lessee to permit any illegal use of the premises for 30 days, which would be clearly against public policy and void. Therefore we hold that clause 2 does not modify clause 1—that the two clauses are independent of each other.

Appellant as his next contention quotes the following from 36 C. J. 92, § 726:

"A covenant restricting particular acts upon the premises may be such as to hold the tenant responsible for the acts of third persons. Upon a positive covenant by the lessee not to use or permit the use of the premises in a particular manner, the lessee may be liable for acts of a sublessee. Where there is a covenant not to do or permit to be done a particular thing, a lessee who grants an underlease and authorizes that particular thing to be done commits a breach of the covenant. But where the sublease contains the same restriction as the original lease, which is violated by the sublessee, it is held that the lessee is not liable on his covenant not to do or suffer the acts in question, and it is held that a covenant on the part of the tenant for himself and his assigns does not render him liable for acts of a sublessee." (Italics ours.)

[8] That portion of the text commencing with the italicized words is claimed to be supported by two English cases, and no others; but these cases support the text only in part and they are contrary to the great weight of American authority, as shown by the cases already cited. The American cases, almost without exception, treat such a covenant as one running with the land and binding upon all assignees and subtenants of the original lessee. See Wheeler v. Earle, Burke v. Bryant, and other cases, supra.

[9] Appellant next urges that a breach of the lease must be substantial before a forfeiture is justified, and claims that the violations in question are insubstantial, if not trivial. We cannot sustain him. The penalties to which the lessor may be liable under both the National Prohibition Act and section 337a of our Penal Code are neither of them to be desired or lightly suffered. The Supreme Court of Minnesota has well said, in Zotalis v. Cannelos, 138 Minn. 179, 164 N. W. 807, L. R. A. 1918A, 1066, where shaking dice for cigars was a violation of a covenant against gambling which was under consideration:

"The violation of a condition in the lease cannot be said to be trivial when the violation is of such a character that the lessor may be subjected to a criminal prosecution on account thereof."

Furthermore, the action of the lessor, when a violation of the National Prohibition Act occurs, may well have a distinct bearing on the attitude toward him of those in charge of enforcing that legislation, including the courts. In Grossman v. United States, 280 F. 683, 685, Justice Evans, speaking for the Circuit Court of Appeals, very aptly said:

"The court might not conclude to dispossess the landlord, if it appeared that he was innocent of the uses to which his property was being put by the tenant and manifested a desire to co-operate in abating the nuisance. Of course, the landlord cannot close his eyes to the obvious and still plead innocence. He may be chargeable with knowledge concerning the character of, and the uses to which, the premises are put, if the facts reasonably warrant such a conclusion, notwithstanding he professes his ignorance of such uses. His attitude toward the tenant, after being informed of the latter's misconduct, might, and probably would, be determinative of the state of his mind and his knowledge of the tenant's wrongdoing; for it is hardly conceivable that a law-respecting landlord would not avail himself of the above-quoted provision of the National Prohibition Act and seek to oust the tenant, upon discovering that his premises were being maintained as a nuisance by such tenant. On the other hand, the landlord who repudiates the tenant's action immediately upon learning of the facts, and who at the first opportunity avails himself of a remedy open to him to oust the tenant from the premises, necessarily places himself in a position of vantage when it comes to the terms of the decree finally entered." (Italics ours.)

Enough has already been quoted to show that the courts have readily forfeited leases of the character we are considering, where violations have occurred. Only decisions dealing with violations similar to the case at bar have been cited, and they have been numerous. Therefore, construing the forfeiture clause most strictly against the landlord, for whose benefit it was created, we find the intention of the parties to be clearly set forth in the very terms of the instrument; that the breach was a substantial one, which equity will not relieve against; that the covenant in question runs with the land and was and is binding on all lessees and subtenants; that the original lessee is responsible for the acts of his sublessees, whether known to him or not; that clause 2 does not impair or modify clause 1 each of them being independent covenants; and that the lease has been breached by appellant through those for whom he was responsible, and has therefore been forfeited.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FLORES. (Cr. 1401.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 22, 1927.

1. Criminal law §24—Specific intent as element of offense is not presumed from unlawful act, but must be proved as fact, except in murder cases.

Except in cases of murder, whenever specific intent is an element of offense, existence of intent must be proved as a fact and is not presumed from commission of an unlawful act.

2. Burglary §46(2)—Instructions in burglary prosecution held sufficient to require proof beyond reasonable doubt that defendant entered dwelling with intent to commit larceny, to convict.

In prosecution for burglary of dwelling house, instructions that every one is presumed to intend that which he does and all natural and probable consequences of own acts, that intent and act must exist to constitute offense, that all presumptions are in favor of innocence, and that conviction requires showing that defendant entered dwelling house with intent to commit larceny, to be proved beyond reasonable doubt, held sufficient to require proof of entry and intent to commit larceny beyond reasonable doubt, to convict.

3. Criminal law §829(6)—Instruction that intoxication does not lessen criminal act, but may be considered in determining intent, covered requested instruction and was proper.

In prosecution for burglary, instruction that no act committed by person while intoxicated is less criminal by reason thereof, but may be considered in determining intent which is necessary element of crime, fully covered requested instruction on question of effect of intoxication on intent and was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Joe Flores was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Gallagher & Jertberg, of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CASHIN, J. The defendant was charged by an information filed in the superior court of the county of Fresno with the offense of burglary and was convicted. An appeal was taken from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

It is contended that the court misdirected the jury on matters of law, erred in its refusal to give an instruction requested by the defendant, and that a statement of the law by the prosecuting attorney in the course of his argument to the jury was prejudicially erroneous.

The evidence adduced shows that the dwelling house of P. Bandoni, situated in the town of Firebaugh, in Fresno county, was on the night of December 5, 1926, between the hours of 7:30 and 10 o'clock p. m., entered and a watch and a sum of money consisting of silver and copper coins taken therefrom. The crime was committed during the absence of Bandoni and his family, and it appears that an entrance was effected through one of the windows in a bedroom of the dwelling. Upon the return of the owner and his family, the screen over the window was found to have been cut and removed, and one of the panes of glass nearest to the window lock was broken. Bloodstains were discovered near the window and also upon a bed in the bedroom and in other parts of the house.

At about 10:30 o'clock on the same night defendant was arrested in a hotel near the scene of the crime. At the time of his arrest he was wearing a bandage on his right hand, and there was found upon his person the stolen watch and a small sum of money in silver and copper coins. The defendant denied all knowledge of the crime, and the witnesses agree that at the time of his arrest he appeared to be intoxicated. It was further shown that the thumb of defendant's right hand and his forefinger had been recently cut. The cuts, according to his testimony and that of others—who testified that they were in his company during the day and evening of the crime—were received in a scuffle at the hotel. The defendant was unable to account for his possession of the watch, and denied any recollection of his movements during the evening preceding the crime.

The instruction of which the defendant complains was as follows:

"Every one is presumed to intend to do that which he in fact does, and also is presumed to intend all the natural and probable consequences of his own acts."

The jury was also instructed that in every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent; that all presumptions of law independent of evidence are in favor of innocence; that before they might convict they must believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant entered the dwelling house with the intent to commit larceny; that the burden was upon the prosecution to show such intent beyond a reasonable doubt; and that this burden never shifted, but remained upon the prosecution throughout the whole case.

[1] It is the rule except in cases of murder, in which a contrary rule is established by statute, that whenever a specific intent is an element of an offense the existence of the intent must be proved as a fact, and is not presumed from the commission of an unlawful act. People v. Landman, 103 Cal. 577, 37 P. 518; People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 39 P. 622; People v. Maciel, 71 Cal. App. 213, 234 P. 877. In People v. Richardson, 161 Cal. 552, 120 P. 20, the defendant was charged with having procured a pregnant woman to take a certain drug with intent thereby to cause a miscarriage, intent being the gist of the offense. It was held with respect to an instruction similar to the one in question that, although it was a correct statement of the law in ordinary cases, the instruction was not applicable to a case where intent was the gist of the offense, but, the jury having been fully instructed that the specific intent with which the act was done was the gist of the offense, and that unless they were satisfied from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the act was done with the intent to procure a miscarriage they must acquit, it was clear from the charge as a whole that the instruction complained of was not meant, nor could have been understood by the jury, as requiring or authorizing them to find such intent in the absence of evidence establishing it beyond a reasonable doubt.

[2] In the present case the clear purport of the two instructions given was that, in order to convict, it must be proved as a fact beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant entered the dwelling house with the intent to commit larceny, and we are satisfied that the charge was so understood by the jury.

[3] The defendant offered and the court refused the following instruction:

"You are instructed that in the crime of burglary one essential element constituting such crime is that the defendant must have entered the house, room, apartment, with the intent to commit larceny or any felony. Therefore you are instructed that if you believe the defendant was intoxicated at the time of the alleged burglary you must take into consideration such facts in determining whether or not defendant was capable of entertaining the intent to commit grand or petit larceny or any felony at the time it was alleged in the information he entered the building alleged in the information."

In other parts of its charge the court instructed that intent was an essential element of the offense of burglary and must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, and, with respect to the purpose for which evidence of intoxication might be considered, instructed as follows:

"You are instructed that no act committed by a person while in a state of voluntary intoxication is less criminal by reason of his having been in such condition; but whenever the actual existence of any particular purpose, motive, or intent is a necessary element to constitute any particular species or degree of crime the jury may take into consideration the fact that the defendant was intoxicated at the time in determining the purpose, motive, or intent with which he committed the act."

The foregoing instruction stated the law and fully covered all that was contained in the offered instruction, and the refusal of the latter was not error.

We find no merit in the further contention that the statements of the district attorney of which appellant complains were erroneous or prejudicial; and after an examination of the entire record, including the evidence, we are satisfied that the verdict is fully supported, and that no error is shown which may reasonably be said to have been prejudicial or to have resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

GORDON et al. v. BEASORE et al.
(Civ. 3301.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 25, 1927.

1. Appeal and error  612(2)—Where record is made up under alternative method, clerk may certify only judgment roll and notice of appeal (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, where record on appeal is made up under alternative method, the only portion of the transcript on appeal to which the clerk may certify is the judgment roll and notice of appeal.

2. Appeal and error  612(2)—Where applications for orders, orders made, minutes, and affidavit were certified to by clerk, but not by judge, record made up under alternative method held insufficient for review (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, record made up under alternative method held insufficient for purposes of review, where applications for orders, orders made, court minutes, and affidavit which were necessary to a determination of questions presented by appeal were certified to by the clerk, but not by the judge.

3. Appeal and error  641—Where record is insufficient for review because not properly authenticated, proper procedure is to affirm judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Where record made up under alternative method is insufficient for review under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, because certain essential portions are certified to by clerk, but not by judge, but appellate court acquired jurisdiction by filing proper notice of appeal, proper procedure is to affirm judgment rather than to dismiss appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by Virgel L. Gordon and others against Tom Beasore, Thomas Jones, and another. From orders granting and refusing to vacate injunction pendente lite, defendants named appeal. Affirmed.

Peckinpah & Carter, of Fresno, and William H. Metson, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Barcroft & Barcroft, and John J. Coghlan, all of Madera, for respondents.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem. The defendants Beasore and Jones have appealed from three orders of the superior court of Madera county and they are all presented upon the same record. One of said orders granted the plaintiffs an injunction pendente lite, and the other two are orders refusing to vacate and set aside the above order for injunction.

The plaintiffs have made a motion in this court to dismiss all of the appeals because the record is not certified by the judge as required by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure; the appeals having been taken under the so-called alternative method. The transcript on appeal contains a copy of what purports to be the pleadings, the orders appealed from, the minutes of the court on the hearing of the application for said orders, and certain other documents, together with the notice of appeal from the orders. These are all certified by the clerk of the court as constituting the transcript on appeal and being true and correct. There is also included in the record the reporter's transcript of the testimony taken on the original hearing of the application for the said injunction. Attached to this reporter's transcript is the certificate of the judge as required by section 953a, supra. Section 953a provides that:

"Any person desiring to appeal from any judgment, order or decree of the superior court to the Supreme Court or any of the District Courts of Appeal, may, in lieu of preparing and settling a bill of exceptions pursuant to the provisions of section 650 of this Code, or for the purpose of presenting a record on appeal from any appealable judgment or order, or for the purpose of having reviewed any matter or order reviewable on appeal from final judgment, file with the clerk of the court from whose judgment, order or decree said appeal is taken, or to be taken, a notice stating that he desires or intends to appeal, or has appealed therefrom, and requesting that a transcript of the testimony offered or taken, evidence offered or received, and all rulings, instructions, acts or statements of the court, also all objections or exceptions of counsel, and all matters to which the same relate, be made up and prepared."

It is further provided in said section that:

"If the judgment, order or decree appealed from be not included in a judgment roll, the party desiring to appeal shall on the filing of said notice, specify therein such of the pleadings, papers, records and files in said cause as he desires to have incorporated in said transcript in addition to the matters hereinbefore required and the same shall be included."

[1] Provision is then made in said section for the preparation of the transcript, the filing of the same with the clerk, and giving of notice to counsel of the time when the court would settle said transcript, and upon the settlement of the same by the judge he shall attach thereto his certificate certifying to the truth and correctness of the same, and it then becomes a portion of the judgment roll, and may be considered on appeal.

The foregoing portions of said section have been construed by the court many times, and the rule of procedure plainly pointed out that the only portion of the transcript on appeal to which the clerk may certify is the judgment roll and notice of appeal.

In Richmond v. Julian Consolidated Mining Co., 176 Cal. 600, 169 P. 356, it is said:

"The transcript contains copies of certain notices of motion, affidavits, and orders bearing on this matter. But it is settled by our decisions that, where a record is made up under the alternative method, all that may be authenticated by the clerk is the judgment roll, together with the notice of appeal. In the absence of a certificate of the trial judge, other papers are not a part of the record on appeal, and they cannot be considered."

In Bell v. Brigrance, 194 Cal. 445, 229 P. 27, it is held that, upon the certification by the trial judge of the truth and correctness of a reporter's transcript being made, the transcript becomes a part of the record on appeal, and in no other way can it become such.

Knox v. Schrag, 18 Cal. App. 220, 122 P. 969, was an appeal from an order granting a change of the place of trial. The transcript filed was authenticated by the clerk of the court, who certified that it "contains full and true copies of the bill of exceptions and notice of appeal from order, and all papers used in motion for change of venue, now on file in said court and cause." No bill of exceptions was ever certified by the judge. The court held:

"A record so authenticated is wholly insufficient as a basis for this court to review the order appealed from."

In Barnabee v. Hunstock, 42 Cal. App. 659, 183 P. 951, it is held that where the order appealed from arises on a record outside the judgment roll. It is not for the clerk, but for the judge who determined the motion, to certify the papers and proceedings on which the order appealed from was made.

In Martin v. Pacific Gas & Electric Company, 195 Cal. 544, 234 P. 321, it was held that, under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, the only record the clerk of the court may certify for use on appeal is the judgment roll and notice of appeal, and that all other matters or documents must be inserted in the reporter's transcript and settled by the judge.

[2] In the case at bar the only matter certified to by the judge is the evidence taken on the hearing for the injunction pendente lite. The applications for the orders, the orders made, the minutes of the court, and the affidavit filed, are all necessary to a determination of the questions presented by this appeal, but, being certified to by the clerk and not by the judge, the record is wholly insufficient for us to review the action of the trial court.

[3] Counsel for respondents has made a motion to dismiss the appeals, but it is held in Knox v. Schrag, supra, Barnabee v. Hunstock, supra, and Hibernia Savings & Loan Society v. Doran, 161 Cal. 118, 118 P. 526, that the proper order to be made in this character of cases is to affirm the judgment. In the case last cited it is said:

"Jurisdiction over the appeal having been vested * * * by the notice of appeal given by appellant * * *, the proper order would be one of affirmance of the order upon appeal for lack of record showing error."

In this case, this court having acquired jurisdiction by the filing of the notice of appeal and its proper certification by the clerk to this court, but there being no proper record before the court upon which it may examine into the merits of the orders appealed from, they, and each one of them, must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 25, 1927. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 22, 1927.

1. Robbery ☞20—Conviction for robbery in first degree under indictment for robbery by force from person held not objectionable, because statute does not define first degree robbery (Pen. Code, §§ 211, 211a).

Where indictment for robbery alleged that defendant willfully and feloniously took from person of another certain money without consent and against the will of such person by means of force, and putting in fear without specifying degree of robbery, conviction of first degree robbery was not objectionable on ground that Pen. Code, § 211a, declares robbery as defined by section 211 to be that of second degree, but does not embrace elements necessary to constitute first degree robbery.

2. Robbery ☞24(1)—Evidence showing robbery at point of revolver supported conviction for first degree robbery.

In prosecution for robbery, evidence showing offense was committed at point of revolver supported conviction for first degree robbery.

3. Criminal law ☞763, 764(13)—Instruction that law does not distinguish between circumstantial and direct evidence required for conviction held not objectionable as comment on evidence.

In prosecution for robbery, instruction that law makes no distinction between circumstantial and direct evidence in degree of proof required for conviction was not objectionable as invasion of province of jury by comment on evidence or weight of testimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Joe Wysong was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

James E. Fenton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellant and three other men were charged by indictment with robbery. In one count it was alleged that on or about the 11th day of April, 1927, at and in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, the defendants did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously take from the person, possession, and immediate presence of one Clifford Shaw $3,090, the personal property of the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, without the consent and against the will of Shaw, and which said taking was accomplished by means of force, and by then and there putting the said Clifford Shaw in fear. Appellant was tried alone, and was convicted of robbery in the first degree. A motion for new trial was presented, which was denied, and he appealed from the judgment and from the ruling upon said motion. The indictment contained a second count, but it was dismissed.

[1] The principal ground of appeal consists in the assertion that section 211a of the Penal Code declares robbery as defined by section 211 of the Penal Code to be that of the second degree, but does not embrace the elements necessary to constitute robbery in the first degree, and that, since the indictment in this case merely charged appellant with the crime of robbery, without specifying the degree, he was convicted of a crime with which he was not charged.

Appellant refers to In re Colford, 68 Cal. App. 308, 229 P. 63, and People v. Howard, 3 Cal. App. 36, 84 P. 462, holding to the contrary, but argues that the reasoning therein is "specious, but unsound." These decisions have been followed by People v. North (Cal. App.) 252 P. 1063, and People v. Tognola (Cal. App.) 256 P. 455, the two last-named cases also holding that robbery is sufficiently charged, if the information or indictment follows the language of section 211 of the Penal Code.

[2] In the instant case the offense was shown to have been committed at the point of revolver, and the evidence amply supports the jury's verdict, placing the offense clearly within the definition of robbery of the first degree.

With one exception, other points presented are based upon the contention just mentioned, and are therefore governed by the cases above cited.

[3] The court instructed the jury that "the law makes no distinction between circumstantial and direct evidence in the degree of proof required for a conviction." It is said that by this instruction the court invaded the province of the jury and commented upon the evidence. It seems quite obvious that this criticism is without merit. The language used is plain, and clearly means that as a matter of law the jurors are not required to regard either class of evidence, circumstantial or direct, as being of greater weight than the other. There is no semblance of a suggestion of the court's idea as to the weight of the testimony of any witness or of any evidence that was before the jury for consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Robbery ☞11—Whether instrument is dangerous or deadly weapon within definition of first degree robbery depends on circumstances (Pen. Code, § 211a).

Whether given instrument is dangerous or deadly weapon within definition of first degree robbery in Pen. Code, § 211a, depends primarily on attendant circumstances as well as use which has been made, or is proposed to be made, of the particular instrument.

2. Criminal law ☞304(2)—It is common knowledge that in committing robbery pistols are frequently used as bludgeons.

It is matter of common knowledge that in committing robbery pistols are frequently used as bludgeons rather than as firearms.

3. Robbery ☞11—Unloaded pistol carried by person committing robbery held "dangerous weapon" within statute defining first degree robbery (Pen. Code, § 211a).

That person perpetrating crime of robbery is armed with pistol is enough to justify conclusion that it is "dangerous weapon" within Pen. Code, § 211a, defining first degree robbery, even though it be not loaded, since it is common knowledge that in committing robbery pistols are frequently used as bludgeons.

Owen Freeman and others were convicted of robbery, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. T. Aggeler, Public Defender, and Carl A. Davis, Deputy Public Defender, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Warner I. Praul, for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendants pleaded guilty to a charge of robbery. On a hearing had for the purpose of fixing the degree of the crime, the evidence showed that in the commission of the offense one of the defendants used a large unloaded revolver, although no oral threats were made by either of the defendants, nor was any attempt made by either of them to shoot with such weapon or to strike the victim of the robbery with it. At the time the robbery occurred another of the defendants had a matchbox made of metal in the shape of a pistol, which he flourished about, and the third defendant had nothing whatsoever in his possession which represented a weapon of any sort. In such circumstances, and in accordance with the provisions of section 1192 of the Penal Code, the trial court determined that the degree of the crime committed by the defendants constituted robbery in the first degree. From the judgment of the court pronounced in pursuance of such determination the defendants appeal to this court.

Section 211a of the Penal Code provides that:

"All robbery which is perpetrated by torture or by a person being armed with a dangerous or deadly weapon is robbery in the first degree. All other kinds of robbery are of the second degree."

It is the contention of appellants that, because the record herein fails to show that any attempt was made by the defendants, or by either of them, to use the unloaded pistol in the possession of one of them in an aggressive or offensive manner, thereby indicating an attempt to injure the victim of the robbery, it cannot be said that the unloaded pistol was either a dangerous or a deadly weapon, and consequently, that the determination by the trial court to the effect that the defendants were guilty of robbery in the first degree was prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendants, for which error a reversal of the judgment should result.

[1] The question as to whether a given instrument is a dangerous or a deadly weapon depends for its solution primarily upon the attendant circumstances, as well as upon the use which has been made, or is proposed to be made, of the particular instrument. Notwithstanding the general prevailing opinion, at least among those unfamiliar with, or unaccustomed to, the use of firearms, that a gun "without lock, stock, or barrel" is dangerous, it is patent that ordinarily, and without the aid of some animate agency, a gun in itself, either loaded or unloaded, possesses no qualities either dangerous or deadly. In other words, it is only by its use, whether arising from human or other manipulation, that it assumes a deadly character, or one dangerous to life or limb; and just so, only in a lesser degree, is any other invention, device, or instrument. According to the authorities, an ax (People v. Guidice, 73 Cal. 226, 15 P. 44), a hatchet (Stanton v. State, 68 Tex. Cr. R. 602, 151 S. W. 808), a chisel (Commonwealth v. Branham, 8 Bush. [71 Ky.] 387), a pick handle (People v. Fuqua, 58 Cal. 245), a rock (Cosby v. Commonwealth, 115 Ky. 221, 72 S. W. 1089), a stone (Acers v. United States, 164 U. S. 388, 17 S. Ct. 91, 41 L. Ed. 481), a brickbat (People v. Fahey, 64 Cal. 342, 30 P. 1030), a stocking filled with salt and plaster (People v. Valliere, 123 Cal.

576, 56 P. 433), or even a pin (State v. Norwood, 115 N. C. 789, 20 S. E. 712, 44 Am. St. Rep. 498), may, in appropriate circumstances become a deadly weapon. As is said in State v. Huntley, 91 N. C. 617, 620:

"* * * A small pocket knife, a walking cane, a switch of the size of a woman's finger, if strong and tough, may be made a deadly weapon if the aggressor shall use such instrument with great or furious violence, and especially, if the party assailed should have comparatively less power than the assailant, or be helpless and feeble. * * * It is the use of such instrument that gives consequence to the offense."

It is manifest that a heavy club or a piece of gas pipe in the hands of a child of tender years, and proposed by it to be used as against a large and powerful man of mature years, could scarcely be considered either as a deadly or a dangerous weapon; but, reversing the situation as to parties, it is clear that the weapon might be not only dangerous, but deadly. Notwithstanding the fact that ordinarily and in and of itself the instrumentality may be in fact comparatively harmless, if, considering the attendant circumstances, together with the present ability of its possessor, the instrument is capable of being used in a deadly or dangerous manner, for the purpose of the particular occasion only, the character of the instrument may be established.

[2, 3] In the instant case it is apparent that, although the defendant who had possession of the unloaded pistol at the time the robbery occurred was 10 or 12 feet distant from the victim, it was possible for such defendant within a very short space of time to have used the pistol as a bludgeon or club; thus rendering it a most "dangerous" weapon within the meaning of the statute. So far as this state is concerned, the point seems to be settled in each of the cases of People v. Egan (Cal. App.) 246 P. 337, and People v. Shaffer, (Cal. App.) 254 P. 666. In the first of such cases, in considering the point urged by appellant, the court said in part:

"* * * It is a matter of common knowledge that in committing robbery pistols are frequently used as bludgeons rather than as firearms. The fact, therefore, that a person perpetrating such crime is armed with a pistol is enough to justify the conclusion that the pistol used by him is a 'dangerous' weapon within the meaning of said section 211a of the Penal Code, even though it be not loaded."

And in the Shaffer Case it was directly held that an unloaded revolver is a "dangerous" weapon, within the meaning of section 211a of the Penal Code.

It must therefore be concluded that in the premises no error was committed by the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action for damages for personal injuries by Anna D. Atkins against J. B. Bouchet and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court; LANGDON, J., voting for a hearing.

Wm. M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon and J. E. Reardon, all of San Francisco, for appellants. Ostrander & Carey, of Oakland, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff brought an action to recover damages for personal injuries. The defendants answered, and a trial was had in the trial court. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. From a judgment based thereon the defendants have appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.This is the second appeal. 65 Cal. App. 94, 223 P. 87. The facts are so fully stated in the reported case that we need not restate them. On the second trial the plaintiff testified, and also demonstrated, that she did not pause at the corner "one or two minutes" of 60 seconds each. She showed that she barely paused. The defendants claim the new record is substantially the same as the first, and that the decision on the first appeal has become the law of the case, and that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover. McClenahan v. Keyes, 65 Cal. App. 467, 224 P. 241.

If we assume, as the defendants contend, that, in view of the facts which we have recited, and the decision on the former appeal, the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, the case is not yet determined, because the plaintiff did, on the second trial, rely on the doctrine of the last clear chance, and now vigorously presents the point. She introduced evidence to support that theory, and she presented an instruction on the subject which was given by the trial court. The defendants' answer is that the "plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence which continued clear down to the moment of the impact, and was a concurring, contemporaneous, and proximate cause of the injuries and damages complained of." The defendants rely on Sego v. Southern Pacific Co., 137 Cal. 405, 70 P. 279; Everett v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 105, 43 P. 207, 46 P. 889, 34 L. R. A. 350; and Mayer v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 740, 173 P. 174. The plaintiff replies that the rule contended for does not apply when the injured party was at the time wholly unaware that she was in a situation of danger. In this connection she cites Palmer v. Tschudy, 191 Cal. 696, 700, 218 P. 36, and 19 Cal. Jur. p. 651. Those authorities are further supported by what is said in Arnold v. San Francisco-Oakland T. Rys., 175 Cal. 1, at page 4, 164 P. 798, 800:

"This doctrine applies where the injured party by his own negligence has placed himself in a position of danger from which he cannot extricate himself, or of which he is obviously unconscious, and the defendant, seeing or knowing his peril or seeing or knowing facts from which a reasonable man would believe him to be in peril, and being able by the use of ordinary care to avoid injuring the plaintiff in his perilous position, fails to use such care and thereby causes the injury."

And Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 140 Cal. 514, at page 526, 74 P. 15, 19 (63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85), speaking on the point now before us, the court placed its remarks in italics, and said:

"In such a case he who knows of the danger and can avoid it, as against one who does not in fact know thereof, has the last clear opportunity to avoid the accident. If a motorman should discover a man asleep on the track in front, and knowing him to be asleep, should proceed, regardless of his position and condition, and run over him with his car while still asleep, there would be very little question that the motorman had the last clear opportunity, and that his negligence was the proximate cause of the injury."

The plaintiff called as a witness J. H. Meiss, the driver of the automobile, and examined him in detail regarding the facts pertinent to the application to this case of the doctrine of the last clear chance. She also took the stand and testified in her own behalf on the same subject. She testified to the same facts as on the first trial, except as noted above. Meiss testified that, as he approached from the east, driving westerly, he saw the plaintiff when he was a half block away, and continued to watch her; that he saw her standing at the corner of the sidewalk facing south; that from appearances she was about to cross East Fourteenth street; that she had an umbrella down over her head; and that it was inclined over her left shoulder, pointing toward the east, and thus obscured her head and face from him; that he did not see her look toward him at any time; that the street was not occupied by passing vehicles which obstructed his view of the plaintiff; that he nevertheless proceeded to cross Eighth avenue at a speed of 10 or 12 miles an hour until he was about 15 feet from the corner where the plaintiff stood, and at the time that he saw her start across the street. He also testified that he could stop his machine within 10 feet. An expert testified that the machine could have been stopped in 10 feet if it was being driven at 15 miles an hour, and, if it was being driven at 10 or 12 miles an hour, it could have been stopped in 6 or 8 feet; that there was no cause for the car to skid at the time and place; and that stopping the car under the existing circumstances would not cause skidding. We think it may not be held that the doctrine of the last clear chance is not applicable to the facts of this case. See, also, Kramm v. Stockton Electric R. R. Co., 3 Cal. App. 606, 86 P. 738, 903.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

JAMES L. McLAUGHLIN CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. No. 5903.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 28, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 27, 1927.

1. Master and servant ⇨398—Corporation, represented by attorney at hearing in compensation proceeding brought against officer, held to have waived formal notice of application.

Where compensation case was, by mistake, brought against corporation's president and the insurance carrier, who appeared as defendants, and the corporation which was the real employer was made a party on rehearing, and had been represented by an attorney throughout the proceedings, and both president and attorney had full knowledge of the actual facts of the case, which they failed to disclose to the commission, corporation held to have waived formal notice of application for compensation.

2. Master and servant ⇨398—Award against corporation made party to compensation proceeding, brought against officer, held valid without formal notice.

Where compensation proceedings were, by mistake, brought against the president of the corporation which employed claimant, and against the insurance carrier, and they appeared as defendants, when corporation was made party to the proceeding on rehearing after having been afforded full opportunity to be heard at every stage of the proceedings, Industrial Accident Commission held to have jurisdiction to make an award against the corporation, although it had not been given formal notice.

3. Master and servant ⇨398—Compensation proceedings, brought against corporate officer, held not barred as to corporation (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11).

Compensation proceedings, brought by mistake against president of corporation employing claimant and against the insurance carrier, who appeared as defendants, held not barred as to corporation by Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11 (St. 1917, p. 841), limiting time for bringing compensation proceedings, where corporation, while not a formal party to proceedings, was such in effect.

4. Master and servant ⇨398—Where employer was made party to compensation proceedings within six months after last compensation payment, employee's recovery held not barred by limitations (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11).

Where compensation proceedings were, by mistake, brought against the president of the corporation, which employed claimant, and against the insurance carrier, and they appeared as defendants, but the corporate employer was made a party to the proceedings within six months after the last compensation payment, Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11 (St. 1917, p. 841), limiting time for bringing compensation proceedings, did not bar claimant's recovery.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by George Heine, claimant, opposed by James H. McLaughlin (James L. McLaughlin), employer, and the New Amsterdam Casualty Company, insurance carrier, in which the James L. McLaughlin Company, employer, was made a party. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation, the employer applies for certiorari. Award affirmed.

Barry J. Colding, Theodore Hale, and Thacher & Wright, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. A proceeding in certiorari to review an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission.

On December 7, 1926, George Heine filed an application with the commission for the adjustment of a claim for compensation, the defendants named in the application being James H. McLaughlin (whose true name was James L. McLaughlin), who was alleged therein to be the employer of the applicant, and the New Amsterdam Casualty Company, the alleged insurance carrier. The defendants named appeared in the proceeding, and McLaughlin testified at the hearing. The commission, on January 29, 1927, made an award for normal compensation against McLaughlin, who, according to the findings, was the employer, and the New Amsterdam Casualty Company, found to be the insurance carrier, and awarded the applicant a further sum based upon the serious and willful misconduct of the employer in failing to comply with the safety orders of the commission.

After the award was made, defendant McLaughlin filed a petition for a rehearing, alleging that the applicant, at the time of the injury, was employed by the James L. McLaughlin Company, a corporation, of which the defendant was president. A rehearing was granted, and on April 6, 1927, the time fixed therefor, the corporation was formally made a party to the proceeding; the order providing that the case should be open for an answer to be filed within three weeks.

At this hearing it appeared from the testimony of McLaughlin and the statement made by the counsel representing the Casualty Company that both understood and believed that the original proceeding was against the James L. McLaughlin Company, and that they were not apprised that this corporation was not named in the application as the employer until after the award was entered. It further appears from the attorney's statement that at the hearings preceding the award he was representing the James L. McLaughlin Company as well as the insurance carrier, and that the latter carried insurance only for the corporation. At the time of the rehearing the attorney mentioned entered, on behalf of the James L. McLaughlin Company, an oral plea, alleging that more than six months had elapsed between the date of the injury and the date when the corporation was made a party to the proceeding, and that the claim for compensation based upon the alleged misconduct of the employer was barred by the provisions of section 11 of the Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 841).

Further evidence was taken, and, on May 28, 1927, the decision on rehearing was filed in which the commission found that, at the time the injury occurred, the applicant was employed by James L. McLaughlin Company, and an award was made against the latter and the insurance carrier for the same amounts previously awarded against the insurance carrier and James L. McLaughlin.

In the present proceeding the petitioner, James L. McLaughlin Company, contends that the second award should be annulled, for the reason that the corporation was not served with notice of the filing of the application for compensation; that it was not afforded an opportunity to adduce evidence in defense of the claim; and that the portion of the claim for compensation based upon misconduct by the employer was barred by the provisions of the statute.

As stated, petitioner, through its attorney, orally interposed the plea of the statute of limitations to the application, and, as appears from the record, filed a written answer thereto. The attorney also represented petitioner at each of the hearings, and cross-examined the witnesses, including the applicant, and both its president and attorney had full knowledge of the actual facts of the case which through inadvertence they failed to disclose to the applicant or to the commission. Furthermore, at the close of the last hearing, the attorney was asked by the referee whether he wished further notice or a further hearing on behalf of petitioner, to which inquiry, as may be reasonably inferred from his statements, he replied in the negative.

[1, 2] It is clear from the foregoing that formal notice was waived by petitioner; that it was afforded a full opportunity to be heard at every stage of the proceeding, and, as held under similar circumstances in Pruitt v. Industrial Accident Commission, 189 Cal. 459, 209 P. 31, the commission was not without jurisdiction to make the award.

[3, 4] With respect to the bar of the statute, while petitioner was not a formal party to the proceeding previous to April 6, 1927, it was such in effect. Moreover, the evidence shows that, after the injury, the applicant was paid compensation; the last payment, as may reasonably be inferred from the testimony of the applicant, having been made on October 7, 1926. As provided by section 11 of the act the above payment had the effect of extending for six months the time within which proceedings for the collection of compensation might be commenced, and this period expired on April 7, 1927.

We find no ground for the contention that the commission was without jurisdiction, and its award, being fully supported by the evidence, is affirmed.

CAMPODONICO v. SANTA MARIA BEAN & GRAIN CO. (Civ. 4436.) *

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 25, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 22, 1927.

1. Chattel mortgages ⇨ 136—Generally, lien of mortgage on growing crop is lost by removal of crop from land.

Generally, lien of mortgage on growing crop is lost by removal of crop from land to which it was attached.

2. Chattel mortgages ⇨ 136—Lien of mortgage on growing crop is not lost by tortious removal.

Exception to general rule that lien of mortgage on growing crop is lost by removal of crop from land to which it was attached is when crop is tortiously removed.

3. Chattel mortgages ⇨ 136—Mortgagee of growing oats held not to have lost lien, where mortgagor breached agreement to store in warehouse in mortgagee's name.

Mortgagee of growing crop of oats did not lose lien thereon by removal of oats from land, where mortgagor agreed to convey threshed grain to named warehouse, and store it there in mortgagee's name, and instead tortiously stored it in his own name, took warehouse receipts, and absconded, and warehouse, having notice of existence of mortgagee's lien, took the crop subject to it.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; T. A. Norton, Judge.

Action by E. M. Campodonico against the Santa Maria Bean & Grain Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Preisker, Preisker & Goble, of Santa Maria, for appellant.

Fred A. Shaeffer, of Santa Maria, for respondent.

WORKS, P. J. The plaintiff in this action was the holder of a mortgage on a growing crop of oats which was the property of the mortgagor, one Sutton. While the latter was engaged in threshing the oats, on his own land, it was agreed between him and plaintiff that he (Sutton) would convey the threshed grain to a certain warehouse, and would there store it in plaintiffs' name. Sutton hauled the grain to the warehouse, but stored it in his own name; that is, he took warehouse receipts showing a storage by himself instead of by plaintiff. Later he sold and conveyed the oats to defendant by indorsing to it the warehouse receipts. Sutton failed to pay the mortgage debt, and decamped with the proceeds of the sale of the grain. Defendant had both actual and constructive notice of the fact that Sutton's crop was under mortgage to plaintiff. This action was commenced for the purpose of procuring judgment for the amount due on the promissory note for the payment of which the mortgage was security. Judgment was rendered accordingly, and defendant appeals.

Appellant contends that the complaint failed to state a cause of action; that certain findings of the trial court were not sustained by the evidence; and that the evidence failed to support the judgment. All of these points depend for solution upon the single general question whether defendant was liable to plaintiff upon the facts above stated.

[1, 2] It is undoubtedly the general rule that the lien of a mortgage on a growing crop is lost by a removal of the crop from the land to which it was attached (Horgan v. Zanetta, 107 Cal. 27, 40 P. 22), but the rule has its notable exceptions. One of these exceptions, for instance, operates in those cases in which the removal of the crop is tortious (Chittenden v. Pratt, 89 Cal. 178, 26 P. 626; Bank of Woodland v. Duncan, 117 Cal. 412, 49 P. 414), when, under certain circumstances, the lien of the mortgage is superior to asserted rights of third persons. Closely akin to such cases are those in which the removal, although not actually tortious, is followed by such acts as those committed by Sutton in the present instance.

In the first case in which the exact question here presented was mentioned, the mortgagor, indeed, was guilty of no wrongful act. He, (one Pullen) had mortgaged a crop of hay to one McDermott. The latter, when the hay was grown, directed Pullen to convey it to a warehouse not on Pullen's land. This the latter did, and he thereafter executed a bill of sale of the hay to McDermott. The property was then attached by a creditor of Pullen, and was taken into custody of the sheriff. McDermott thereafter sold the hay to one Byrnes, who then brought suit against the sheriff to recover possession of it. The plaintiff's title was upheld because of the bill of sale from Pullen to McDermott, but in its opinion on appeal the court employed this language:

"The testimony tended to show that the hay was hauled to the warehouse by Pullen, at the request of and as the agent for McDermott, and this being so, we are not prepared to say that McDermott did not have a lien on the hay after it was placed in the warehouse for the full amount of money represented by his note and mortgage." Byrnes v. Hatch, 77 Cal. 241, 19 P. 482.

If these expressions, obiter as they are, indicate the true state of the law, then the plaintiff here preserved the lien of the crop mortgage, or created a new lien equivalent to it, through her agreement with Sutton for a removal of the oats to a warehouse and for a storage there in plaintiff's name. Under the agreement, then, Sutton was a mere agent for the purpose of warehousing the oats for plaintiff.

In a later case the Supreme Court determined the law to be as hinted in Byrnes v. Hatch, although, again, there was no wrongful act upon the part of the mortgagor. One Dodge had mortgaged a growing crop to one Campodonico. When the crop was grown, the latter requested Dodge to store it in a warehouse as the property of Campodonico. The crop was taken to the warehouse accordingly, and the warehouseman was asked to issue a receipt in the name of Campodonico. This he did not do, but issued it in the name of Dodge, over the protest of the latter. These facts were later reported by Dodge to Campodonico, but in the meanwhile the crop had been attached by a creditor of Dodge. After the attachment, the property, without the knowledge or consent of Campodonico, was transported outside the county and to a distant part of the state. Campodonico then brought suit against the warehouseman for damages as upon a conversion of the crop. In affirming a judgment for the plaintiff the Supreme Court said:

"The lien of respondent's mortgage was not lost by his permitting the mortgagor, Dodge, to haul the mortgaged property from the land on which it was grown, and its storage in defendant's warehouse, under the circumstances disclosed in the findings. Byrnes v. Hatch, 77 Cal. 244 [19 P. 482]. The neglect or refusal of defendant's agent to issue a receipt showing that the property was stored in the warehouse for the plaintiff did not change the effect of the agreement, made between plaintiff and his mortgagor, Dodge, as to the way in which it should be stored, so as to destroy the mortgage lien. * * * Campodonico v. Oregon Improvement Co., 87 Cal. 566, 25 P. 763.

[3] We think the present case is stronger than the two which we have cited, for the reason that Sutton violated his agreement with respondent, and endeavored wrongfully to vest in himself a paper title to the oats. The case is therefore, as between Sutton and respondent, at least somewhat like those in which mortgaged crops are tortiously removed from the land to which they are attached. Sutton surely held the warehouse receipt for respondent, and he could not profit by his wrong to the exclusion of the rights of respondent in the crop of oats. We think that respondent's lien was preserved under these circumstances, and that appellant, having had actual and constructive notice of the existence of the lien, although the latter kind of notice would be enough, took the crop subject to it. In addition to the cases already cited, we think this conclusion finds support in Crosby v. Fresno Fruit Growers' Co., 30 Cal. App. 308, 158 P. 1070.

EVANS v. BAXTER. (Civ. 5948.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 28, 1927.

1. Judgment $\S$ 17—Where no issue of damages was raised in pleadings, court erred, on plaintiff's default, in awarding defendant damages.

Where, in an action to recover the purchase price of real property, plaintiff was in default for nonappearance for trial, and court awarded damages to the defendant, court thereby committed error, where the issue of damages was not raised in the pleadings.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 858—Judgment awarding defendant more relief than prayed for held reviewable on appeal, such being direct attack.

Judgment awarding defendant damages on plaintiff's default by nonappearance at trial, although the pleadings raised no issue of damages, held reviewable on appeal, such attack by appeal being by direct, and not by collateral, proceedings.

3. Process $\S$ 166—That codefendant was not properly served with process did not, in absence of objection, prevent trial as to parties served.

Where, in an action against three persons for the purchase price of land, one of the codefendants was not properly served with process, such fact did not, in the absence of an objection, prevent a trial as to the parties served.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Esther L. Evans against A. H. Baxter and others. Judgment was entered in favor of named defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Judgment modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Goode & McCreery, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Edgar I. Thompson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued the three defendants jointly for money claimed to be due upon the purchase price of certain real property. The defendant Baxter alone answered. The cause was regularly set for trial, and, the appellant failing to appear at the time set, her default was taken, and judgment was entered against her and in favor of defendant Baxter alone. In due time she moved to set aside the judgment, which motion was denied. The appeal is from the judgment and from the order refusing to set it aside.

The complaint was in the ordinary form for money. The answer denied that the property described in the complaint was purchased from plaintiff, and alleged in detail the transaction between Baxter and his codefendant Seddon whereby the property came to Baxter in exchange for other properties transferred to Seddon, who, it was alleged, was at all times acting in co-operation with plaintiff. The answer closed with a prayer that plaintiff take nothing from Baxter, and that he have judgment for his costs.

The trial court entered judgment in favor of Baxter and against the plaintiff in the sum of $500 "for his damages in said action." In moving to set aside the judgment, this award was attacked as beyond the issues raised by the pleadings. The further grounds of this motion were that, because publication of summons was being made as to defendant Seddon, the cause was not ready for trial, and that appellant's counsel was engaged in other litigation at the time, and should have been excused for his neglect to appear at the trial.

[1, 2] These three grounds are now urged on the appeals. As to the first, the trial court was plainly in error in awarding any damages to respondent. No issue of damages was raised in the pleadings, and, the appellant being in default, no question of waiver of pleading or proof arises. Respondent does not defend this portion of the judgment, but insists that it cannot be reviewed on this appeal because of the rule that "a judgment for more relief than is prayed for is not void as to such, and cannot be attacked in collateral proceedings." The appeal, of course, is a direct, and not a collateral, attack upon the judgment, and it is not confined to the question whether the judgment is void for want of jurisdiction.

[3] The fact that one of the codefendants had not been properly served with process did not prevent a trial as to the parties served, in the absence of an objection. Appellant having consented to the trial date, and not having brought to the attention of the court the fact that one of the defendants had not been served, she should certainly be precluded from raising that objection after the judgment has been entered.

On two separate occasions the trial court found that the excuses for appellant's failure to appear at the trial were insufficient, and we are satisfied that there was no abuse of discretion in the order refusing to set aside the judgment.

Because of the error in the award of damages, the judgment must be modified by striking therefrom the sum of $500, and, as so modified, it is affirmed, with costs to appellant.

THOMAS v. SPITZER. (Cty. 4980.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 31, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 29, 1927.

Vendor and purchaser ⇨ 133—Purchaser held entitled to stop payment on check where vendor tendered Torrens certificate and title insurance instead of title guaranty as contracted.

Where vendor did not deliver nor offer to deliver to purchaser a guaranty of title issued by a responsible title company as required by land contract, but instead offered a Torrens title certificate and a policy of title insurance, there was a failure of consideration which entitled vendor to stop payment on check given for first payment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by E. J. Thomas against H. Spitzer. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles Schusterman, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought to recover the sum of $400, for which amount the defendant gave plaintiff his check and on which defendant stopped payment. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment rendered for defendant.

Plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement for the purchase and sale of real estate, wherein defendant gave to plaintiff his check for $400 as first payment and agreed to pay the balance into escrow. The agreement contained a provision that the evidence of title was to be in the form of a guaranteed title to be issued by a responsible title company. It was further agreed that in the event the purchaser failed to pay the balance of the purchase price, the amounts paid thereon should, at the option of the seller, be retained as liquidated damages. It was agreed that in the event the title should not prove to be merchantable and the seller should not be able to perfect the same within a reasonable time, the purchaser should have the option of receiving back his deposit and be released from all obligations. It appears that at the time of making this agreement the land in question had been brought under the Torrens title system, of which the defendant purchaser testified he had no knowledge. The plaintiff testified that the defendant called his attention to the fact that he had a Torrens title, but that defendant did not demand a guaranteed title and said that he (the defendant) would go through with the deal. Plaintiff further testified that he was ready and willing to close the deal, but that he had not arranged with the title company to issue a policy of insurance, which he would have done had the defendant not stopped payment on the check. The defendant testified that after signing the contract he met the plaintiff at the escrow office of the Title Insurance & Trust Company, where he was informed in the presence of the plaintiff that the title company could not issue a guaranty, but would issue a policy of insurance; that he then demanded that plaintiff return his check, and upon plaintiff's failure to do so, he stopped payment on the check.

It appears from the evidence that plaintiff could not and did not deliver nor offer to deliver to defendant that which the parties contracted for, to wit, a guaranty of title issued by a responsible title company. Appellant argues that a certificate of title under the Torrens system is a guaranteed title, as that term is used in the agreement between the parties, particularly if it be accompanied by a policy of insurance issued by a responsible title company. We cannot agree with plaintiff's argument. It may or may not be, as argued by the plaintiff, that the security afforded by a Torrens title, accompanied by an insurance policy issued by a title company, is greater than that under a guaranteed certificate of title issued by a responsible title company; yet the fact remains that a contract to do one thing cannot be performed by an offer to do another thing equally as good or better than that agreed upon. The doing of anything else or different from that designated in the contract will not suffice. Merkley v. Fisk, 179 Cal. 748, 756, 178 P. 945. In our opinion, there was a failure of consideration, and defendant was justified in stopping payment of the check.

The judgment is affirmed.

Where, under contract for conditional sale of automobile, mere failure of buyer to pay installments as prescribed did not ipso facto operate to terminate his rights under contract or right to possession of automobile, but contract simply provided for certain remedies which seller might take upon his election, mere notification by assignee of seller to hold car for it, to sheriff holding possession of car under attachment issued against buyer, did not operate as a forfeiture of buyer's rights under the contract for nonpayment of certain installments.

2. Trial ☞397(4)—Trial court need not make finding on particular subject, where not warranted by testimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Ross Campbell, Judge.

Action in claim and delivery for automobile by W. T. Kinsey against John M. Boyes, as Sheriff, etc., and the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, the last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Bradford M. Melvin, of San Francisco, and Ward Sullivan, of San Jose, for appellant. E. J. Dole, of Petaluma, for respondent.

HART, J. This action is in claim and delivery, and is for the specific recovery of the possession of a certain Nash touring car, or, in case possession thereof cannot be had, to recover the sum of $700, the alleged value thereof, together with the sum of $400 as damages for the alleged wrongful detention and use of said car. Judgment passed for the plaintiff in accord with the prayer of the complaint, as just indicated, and for the sum of $676 as damages for the unlawful detention and use of said car; the sum in excess of the sum specifically alleged in the complaint for such damage being for damage alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff for such detention and use by the defendants subsequent to the time of the filing of the complaint. The defendant Fidelity & Deposit Company made a motion for a new trial, which motion was denied.

The appeal is by the defendant corporation from said judgment upon a record prepared in pursuance of the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

This case has previously been before and decided by this court; the judgment having been reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. Kinsey v. Ryan et al., 74 Cal. App. 567, 241 P. 282. The opinion in that case, written by Justice Plummer, contains a full and clear statement of the facts and the issues presented and determined, and it will subserve the purposes of the present appeal to adopt herein such statement, which is as follows:

"On the 20th day of January, 1923, the plaintiff and one J. H. Madison entered into a conditional contract of sale whereby the said J. H. Madison conditionally sold to the plaintiff a certain Nash automobile for the sum of $900, $360 payable in cash, and the remainder thereof as follows: $108 on February 15, 1923; $108 on March 15, 1923; $108 on April 15, 1923; $108 on May 15, 1923; and $108 on June 15, 1923. Possession of the automobile was then and there delivered to the plaintiff. The conditional contract of sale provided, first, that, if the monthly payments were not made as provided therein, they should bear interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month until paid. It was also further conditioned that the purchaser should keep the property insured and take other precautions for its safety, and keep it within the territorial limits of the state of California. It was then provided that, if the purchaser failed to make the payments as stipulated, the party of the first part might, at his option, retake possession of said automobile, including all new parts added thereto by the buyer, and that the rights of the purchaser should thereupon terminate, and action might be begun for the collection of the remaining installments set forth in the contract and then remaining unpaid, or might waive the conditions of the contract, consider the sale absolute, and sue for the balance due, or take possession of the automobile, sell the same, apply the proceeds toward the payment of the balance due, and, in case of deficiency, proceed against the buyer for the amount due thereon, or that the seller might avail himself of any and all rights, privileges, or elections which are or may be granted to a seller by operation of law. On the 23d day of January, 1923, said J. H. Madison for the purpose, as shown by the testimony, of giving collateral security for general advances to be made to him by the Sonoma County National Bank assigned his interest in said contract to the Sonoma County National Bank by a written assignment in the following words:

"For value received J. H. Madison hereby transfers, assigns, and sets over all its right, title, and interest in and to the within contract, and in and to the property therein described, and to all of the moneys payable thereunder to Sonoma County National Bank, and hereby guarantees the payment of all moneys due, or to become due, under the said contract, and also the full performance by the second party therein named of all the second party's promises and covenants, and it hereby consents that the time of payment of any of the said installments therein provided may be extended at the request of the second party, notice of which is hereby waived.

"Dated the 23d day of January, 1923.

"J. H. Madison."

"Thereafter, and on the 13th day of April, 1923, in an action instituted by the Sterling Lumber company against the said W. T. Kinsey wherein an attachment was levied, the defendant John M. Boyes, as sheriff of the county of Sonoma, levied upon the automobile herein mentioned. Thereupon, and on the 20th day of April, 1923, the seller mentioned in the conditional contract herein referred to filed his third-party claim as owner of said automobile in the following words and figures, to wit:

"(Title of court and cause.)

"Notice of Claim Under Conditional Sale Contract.

"State of California, County of Sonoma ss.:

"J. H. Madison, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

"That he is the owner of that certain Nash automobile engine No. 13856, state license No. 121,680 taken under attachment issued in the above-entitled cause from the defendant W. T. Kinsey; that said W. T. Kinsey is in possession of said automobile under a conditional sale contract dated Petaluma, Cal., January 20, 1923, for the total sum or price of $900; that there is now due affiant from defendant the installment due on the 15th day of April, 1923, amounting to $108, together with interest from the date of the contract at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum; that there will accrue on the 15th day of May and the 15th day of June, 1923, respectively installments of $108, together with like interest; that affiant hereby demands of the sheriff either the possession of said car, or that said sheriff shall pay to affiant the above installments now due and to accrue in full in cash within five days from the receipt of this notice and affidavit.

"This notice and affidavit is given in accordance with sections 689, 689a, and 689b of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California and affiant hereby claims and demands all of the right accorded to him under said provisions of the law. J. H. Madison.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this 18th day of April, 1923.

"[Seal] E. J. Dole,

"Notary Public in and for the County of Sonoma, State of California.

"Indorsed: 'Received in the sheriff's office of Sonoma Co. Cal. Apr. 20, 1923 at 35 min. past 9 o'clock a. m.'

"Following the filing of this claim a representative of the Sterling Lumber Company went with said Madison and the sheriff to the place of business of the Sonoma County National Bank, where the said representative of the Sterling Lumber Company paid to the Sonoma County National Bank the unpaid portion on said contract, then amounting to the sum of $324, and received from said Sonoma County National Bank said contract with the following indorsements thereon:

"For value received, we hereby transfer, assign, and set over all our right, title, and interest in and to the within contract and in and to the property therein described and to all of the moneys payable thereunder to the Sterling Lumber Company.

"The Sonoma County National Bank,
"By A. P. Behrens, Cashier.

"In pencil:

"W. T. Kinsey made the following payments:

February 15, 23.....	$108 00
Mar. 15, 23.....	108 00
Sterling Lumber Company paid the balance,
April 23-23.....	324 00
	$540 00'

"The sheriff then stored the automobile, and retained possession thereof up to the time of the trial of this action.

"The Sterling Lumber Company was unsuccessful in its attachment suit; judgment being entered in favor of the said W. T. Kinsey, the defendant in that action and the plaintiff in this. After the rendition of judgment in favor of the defendant in the attachment suit, the plaintiff in this action, demand was made upon the sheriff for the return of the attached automobile. This demand not being complied with by the sheriff, this action was begun for its recovery, or for the value thereof. The complaint is in the usual form of claim and delivery for personal property. The defendants in this action, admitting the attachment of the property, set up in their answer the conditional contract of sale; to which we have referred, and, among other things, alleged as follows:

"That on or about the 23d day of January, 1923, said J. H. Madison assigned, transferred, and set over said contract to the Sonoma County National Bank, a corporation.

"That after defendant sheriff had levied on said automobile, to wit, on the 20th day of April, 1923, a third party claim was filed with defendant sheriff claiming title to said automobile under and by virtue of said contract of conditional sale with J. H. Madison and Sonoma County National Bank; that thereupon said Sterling Lumber Company, in pursuance of law, paid the amount unpaid under said conditional sale contract, and said contract of conditional sale was assigned and transferred by said Sonoma County National Bank to said Sterling Lumber Company; that said Sterling Lumber Company is now the owner and holder thereof."

"It is further pleaded by defendants that the said W. T. Kinsey, the plaintiff herein, did not make the three payments provided to be made on the 15th day of April, 15th day of May, and 15th day of June, respectively, and that the whole of said sums remained unpaid, and that, pursuant to the terms of the contract of conditional sale, the Sterling Lumber Company had declared all rights of said W. T. Kinsey in and to said automobile to be at an end.

"There is no testimony in the record showing that such payments have not been made by the plaintiff, nor is there any testimony in the record showing that the Sterling Lumber Company has exercised any election whatever in the matter of the forfeiture of the plaintiff's ownership or right to the automobile in question, or has taken any proceedings whatever under and by virtue of the terms of the conditional sale contract herein referred to. It may be here stated that, the conditional sale contract does not provide by any of its terms that, upon failure of the buyer to make payments as therein provided, the buyer's rights in and to the automobile shall ipso facto terminate, and thereafter be considered as ended. It provides simply, as we have hereinbefore stated, for certain remedies which the seller may take upon his election. The court, in its findings, found that the defendant sheriff is in possession of the automobile in question; that he had refused to deliver the same to the plaintiff; that his withholding thereof is not unlawful, and then the execution of the conditional contract of sale, as we have stated. The court also made the following findings:

"That on or about the 23d day of January, 1923, said J. H. Madison assigned, transferred, and set over said contract to the Sonoma County National Bank, a corporation.

"That, after defendant sheriff had levied on said automobile, to wit, on the 20th day of April, 1923, a third party claim was filed with defendant sheriff claiming title to said automobile under and by virtue of said contract of conditional sale with J. H. Madison and Sonoma County National Bank; that thereupon said Sterling Lumber Company paid the amount unpaid under said conditional sale contract, and said contract of conditional sale was assigned and transferred by said Sonoma County National Bank to said Sterling Lumber Company; that said Sterling Lumber Company is now the owner and holder thereof."

The grounds upon which the case was reversed on the former appeal were substantially these: (1) That, so far as the evidence disclosed, the title to the automobile, by virtue of the terms of the conditional sale contract, still remained in Madison, the seller, and that, the assignment of the contract to the bank by Madison having been made merely as collateral security for general advances made and to be made by the bank to Madison, therefore the assignment of the contract by the bank to the Sterling Lumber Company had the effect of transferring, not the title to the automobile, but only such interest in the contract as the bank had under the assignment thereof to it by Madison; (2) that the record contained or disclosed no evidence showing that Kinsey, the purchaser, failed to make payments on the purchase price of the automobile, as required and prescribed by the contract; (3) that there was no evidence in the record showing, or tending to show, that the Sterling Lumber Company, assuming that it acquired ownership of the contract and all the rights of Madison thereunder, ever exercised its election, as authorized by the contract, to declare all the rights of the plaintiff in the automobile forfeited.

The findings made by the trial court in the trial of the action resulting in the present appeal are substantially the same as those made in the former trial of the action, as indicated in the above extract from Justice Plummer's opinion, save in a few particulars, one of which exceptions is that in the trial with which this appeal is concerned there is not, as there was at the former trial, any finding that the plaintiff had failed to make the installment payments on the purchase price of the automobile as required by the contract, and that thereupon the Sterling Lumber Company, as the successor in interest in the contract of Madison, had exercised its election to declare all the rights of the plaintiff in and to the automobile forfeited and terminated.

[1] At the second trial of the action, the appealing defendant introduced testimony to the effect that Kinsey defaulted in the payment of the installments which had fallen due under the terms of the contract. Said defendant also introduced at the second trial testimony showing that the Sterling Lumber Company paid to the bank, to be paid by it to Madison, in response to his third party claim, the installments on the purchase price of the automobile then remaining unpaid. Thus the appellant, at the retrial of the action—the trial of which this appeal is the culmination—supplied proof sufficient to uphold a finding that the plaintiff had not paid the installments as required by the contract, and also presented testimony sufficient to show that Madison in effect transferred to the bank all his interests or rights in the contract before the bank assigned it to the lumber company, or, at least, that his acceptance from the bank of payment of all that was due and to become due under the contract was sufficient, at least, as between him and the bank and its assignee, to estop him from claiming or asserting that the title to the automobile was still in him. But, while this is all true, it does not follow that the judgment must be reversed. The attachment levied upon the automobile by the sheriff in the action by the lumber company was dissolved and became functus officio upon the entry of judgment in the attachment suit in favor of Kinsey, defendant in that suit, and against the lumber company, plaintiff therein. Upon the dissolution of said attachment, Kinsey was entitled to an immediate return by the sheriff of the automobile to his (Kinsey's) possession. As to this, we may properly at this point set forth what the record discloses. On April 13, 1923, the sheriff took possession of the automobile from Kinsey under the writ of attachment issued in the action by the lumber company against Kinsey previously filed. On October 22, 1923, judgment in favor of defendant was entered.

in the attachment suit. On January 21, 1924, Kinsey made a demand in writing on the sheriff for the release and return to him of the automobile. The sheriff refused to comply with the demand, and still retained possession of the car. It will be observed that, so far as this record discloses, the sheriff was without any authority to retain possession of the automobile between the time that the writ of attachment was dissolved upon the entry of judgment in the attachment suit in favor of Kinsey and the time at which the present action was commenced, which was on February 4, 1924, unless it may properly be held that a certain notification by the lumber company to the sheriff to retain in his possession the automobile under an alleged forfeiture by said company of the rights of Kinsey under the contract was of legal force. As to this notification, the testimony of the secretary of the lumber company is: That in the month of January, 1924—the particular day not stated—he called on the sheriff, and orally notified him that the lumber company had declared the contract and all of Kinsey's interests thereunder forfeited; that he (the sheriff) should hold the car for it; and that it would "hold him (the sheriff) responsible for the car and the delivery of the possession of the same to it." The fact of such notification by the lumber company to the sheriff, after the discharge of the writ of attachment, which followed from the entry of judgment in favor of Kinsey in the attachment suit, implies that the company assumed, and thus indeed conceded, that the car, at the time of such notification, was in the rightful possession of the sheriff. So far as anything to the contrary appears, that assumption or concession was well founded as against the lumber company, but not as against Kinsey. It is further to be observed that, from the time the present action was begun to the present time all parties apparently treated the possession of the car by the sheriff as being by virtue of this action, and that such possession was lawful. But, however that all may be, it is plainly manifest from the record that the alleged notification to the sheriff by the lumber company to hold the car was of no legal force. In other words, it is clear that the mere notification to the sheriff by the lumber company to hold the car for it did not amount to the exercise by the company of any of the several remedies prescribed by the contract, whereby, upon default by Kinsey in the payment of the installments on the purchase price as required by the contract, the seller or his assignee might take possession of the car, or otherwise, as prescribed by the contract, have enforced payment of the moneys then due. As stated in our opinion handed down on the former appeal, under the terms of the contract the mere failure on the part of the buyer to pay the installments as prescribed by said contract did not, ipso facto, operate to terminate the buyer's rights thereunder or his right to the possession of the automobile. The contract, as likewise stated, "simply provides for certain remedies which the seller may take upon his election." Therefore, to have effectively exercised its privilege under the contract to forfeit, and so put at an end the rights of Kinsey thereunder because of the nonpayment of certain installments, it was necessary for the lumber company to have taken possession of the car, or, if the sheriff refused to deliver possession, to have taken the necessary legal steps to recover the possession of the same from that officer. No such an attempt was made by the lumber company, and its mere notice to the sheriff that he keep possession of the car for the company, or that it would hold him responsible therefor, amounted only to a mere unexecuted mental process or a mental gesture, which, as in effect above suggested, possessed absolutely no legal force as in the exercise of the remedies available to the seller or his assignee (the lumber company) by virtue of the terms of the contract to secure possession of the car or payment of the delinquent installments. Indeed, it was tantamount only to a mere declaration by the lumber company to the sheriff—not to Kinsey—that it was the owner of the car. There is absolutely no testimony in this record showing that the lumber company proceeded in any other way or further than as above explained. Nor is there a particle of evidence tending to show that Kinsey knew anything about the purported notification by the lumber company to the sheriff to hold the car for it, or that the company had declared that it claimed a right to its possession.

[2] As we have heretofore stated, the court made no finding upon the question whether the lumber company had exercised its privilege as prescribed by the contract of taking possession of the car and declaring forfeited all of the rights of Kinsey thereunder. Since, however, there is no testimony in the record which would support such a finding, it was not necessary for the court to make one upon that subject. It follows that, upon the findings as made, together with the fact that there is no testimony that would support any finding as to the alleged forfeiture of the rights of Kinsey under the contract, the judgment must be sustained.

It should be stated that the discussion in the briefs on the present appeal of the proposition that, under section 689b of the Code of Civil Procedure, the Sterling Lumber Company became the absolute owner of the automobile upon its payment of all that was due from the buyer under the conditional contract is without pertinency to the disposition of the appeal now before us. The same proposition was urged by the Sterling Lumber Company on the former appeal, and fully discussed in the briefs. As seen, in the case as it was formerly presented to this court, the only interest that the evidence showed that the bank had in the contract was that of collateral security for advances made and to be made to Madison, and, as shown above in the extract from the opinion delivered on the former appeal, it was, with obvious propriety, held that the assignment by the bank to the lumber company carried with it only such interest in the contract as the bank had, and that, therefore, the lumber company did not by said assignment acquire title to the automobile; hence section 689b of the Code of Civil Procedure had no application in that case. As has been shown, the Sterling Lumber Company lost its attachment suit against the plaintiff here, who was defendant in said suit, and, consequently as stated, the sheriff lost his right to retain possession of the automobile, so far as was concerned the writ of attachment. But the discussion as to the effect of said section of the Code on the situation presented here is academic rather than pertinent to the present consideration, for, as must be manifest, we have considered the case upon the assumption that the evidence in this record sufficiently shows that the Sterling Lumber Company became the absolute owner of the automobile by virtue of the assignment by the bank to it of the conditional sale contract and all the rights that the seller of the car had thereunder. What we hold here is that the lumber company, as to the contract, stands in the shoes of Madison, the seller; that Madison's remedial rights prior to the assignment, as is true of the lumber company as assignee of all of Madison's rights under the contract, are prescribed by the contract itself; that, therefore, in order properly to exercise any of those rights for securing the payment of the unpaid installments, the company should have proceeded, at least substantially, as the contract provides; and that, as we hold, is not what it did in the present case.

For the reasons above stated, the judgment is affirmed.

PEREZ v. WILSON et al. (Civ. 6012.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 25, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1060(1)—Argument in negligence case that plaintiff abandoned case against certain defendants because he would not take roof from over heads of their children, if error, held harmless.

Argument to jury, in negligence action for personal injuries, that plaintiff abandoned case against certain defendants because he would not take the roof from over the heads of their three small children, if error, held harmless, though such arguments should be avoided.

2. Trial ⇨125(4)—In negligence case, counsel should avoid arguments bringing before jury facts concerning parties' ability to respond in damages.

In negligence cases, counsel, in argument, should avoid bringing before a jury anything concerning the wealth or poverty or ability of the parties to respond in compensatory damages.

3. Trial ⇨127—In negligence case, it is error to get before jury that defendant is insured against loss.

In negligence case, it is error for counsel to either directly or indirectly get before the jury any fact which conveys the information that defendant is insured against loss in case of a recovery against him.

4. Trial ⇨133(6)—Striking, or instructing jury to disregard, evidence in negligence case that defendant is insured against loss, will not cure error.

Striking evidence in negligence case, or instructing jury to disregard evidence that the defendant is insured against loss in case of a recovery against him, will not cure error of having such fact directly or indirectly brought before the jury.

5. Pleading ⇨46—Parties to action and their liabilities must be determined by the pleadings.

The parties to an action, and their liabilities, can only be determined by the pleadings.

6. Judgment ⇨248—Party, injecting into action, issues, and parties not covered by pleadings, does so at peril of any judgment he may obtain.

When parties and issues not covered by pleadings are injected into an action, the one so injecting does so at the peril of any judgment he may obtain.

7. Trial ⇨114—Whether arguments in negligence case are improper depends on issues and atmosphere of trial.

Whether arguments of counsel in negligence case are improper depends on the issues, the parties, and the general atmosphere of the case.

8. Appeal and error ⇨1060(4)—Argument in automobile injury case implying defendant carried liability insurance held not to require reversal in view of verdict.

Argument in automobile injury case, which by some remote inference could be given the idea that defendant carried liability insurance, held not to require reversal, where there was no other intimation that defendant was insured, evidence supported verdict, and it was not claimed damages awarded were excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action for damages for personal injuries by Fred Perez against Joseph Wilson, Orman Crocker, and others. Judgment for plaintiff as against defendant Crocker, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Sloss & Ackerman, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Vincent W. Hallinan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. In this action plaintiff sought to recover damages from defendants for personal injuries sustained by him as the result of defendants' negligence.

The defendants Joseph Wilson and Claire Wilson, though testifying at the trial, made no appearance in the action and plaintiff did not ask for judgment against them.

The case was tried before a jury, and a verdict returned against defendant Orman Crocker in the sum of $7,000. From the judgment entered on this verdict and from the court's order denying his motion for a new trial the defendant Crocker prosecutes this appeal.

It is conceded that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict, and no errors in the admission or rejection of testimony are noted or urged. Nor is the court's action in the giving or refusal to give instructions complained of here. The sole point before this court and the point upon which appellant asks for a reversal of the judgment is misconduct of counsel for plaintiff, as a result of which defendant was precluded from a fair trial of his cause on the merits.

The alleged misconduct arises from the following state of facts:

During the closing argument of plaintiff's counsel to the jury these proceedings were had:

"Mr. Hallinan (counsel for plaintiff): Counsel for the defendant criticizes my conduct in abandoning the suit as to defendants Claire Wilson and her husband. We would not take the roof from over the heads of the three small children of the Wilsons."

To this statement of counsel no objection was made by defendant appellant, nor was the same called to the attention of the court in any manner. Then later in the argument the following took place:

"Mr. Hallinan (plaintiff's attorney): Some time ago I saw a cartoon by Tad in the Call representing a number of men and women sitting in an insurance office. The cartoon was called 'The Fifteen Mile an Hour Club,' and all of those persons in that office were represented as saying they were not driving over 15 miles an hour.

"Mr. Ackerman (counsel for defendant Crocker): I assign that statement as error on the part of counsel, and ask that the jury be instructed to disregard the statement.

"The Court: Yes, that is not in evidence.

"Mr. Hallinan: I was not bringing in the insurance company. That was not the purpose at all.

"The Court: I will ask the jury to disregard any insinuations along that line. The courts have been very strict about the references you may make in that regard. The rule is a strict one.

"Mr. Ackerman: There is no insurance company in this case, and I ask that the jury be instructed regarding the impropriety of Mr. Hallinan's reference to an insurance company.

"The Court: If any reference has been made, I ask the jury to disregard it entirely, because, as I say, the rule laid down by our courts is very strict in that matter. You are not to take into consideration at all whether the defendant is or is not represented by an insurance company.

"Mr. Hallinan: I am sorry if I conveyed any such impression. That was not my purpose at all."

[1, 2] With reference to the first statement of counsel concerning the failure of plaintiff to urge any claim against the Wilsons, it seems that more was said on this subject than is embraced in the foregoing. While the transcript of the proceedings before us shows that in the engrossed bill of exceptions nothing further appears, yet, in the affidavits filed on the motion for a new trial in the court below and in the brief of appellant here, it is conceded that counsel for plaintiff said that it was his conclusion that the Wilsons were not liable to plaintiff, nor were they in any way to blame for the accident, and that the sole responsibility rested on the defendant Crocker, appellant here. He said further that he would sooner have plaintiff recover nothing than to unjustly take the roof from over the heads of the Wilsons and their three children either by compelling them to defend an unjust claim against them or by collecting upon a judgment unjustly obtained.

To appreciate this last contention it should be stated that in this action the plaintiff was injured while he was standing on the sidewalk, presumably in a place of safety, and that nowhere was it contended that the negligence of plaintiff in any way contributed to his injuries. The injuries to him were caused through the acts of the defendants Wilson and the appellant Crocker, whether negligent or otherwise, and in the situation presented there could have been many theories left to plaintiff's election. He could have claimed that his injuries resulted from the concurring negligence of the defendants or from the negligence of either of them. While he chose to fasten the liability upon appellant he thereby in no way restricted appellant's right to show himself entirely free from negligence and fasten the blame, if any, on the codefendants Wilson. In fact, it was the defense of appellant that the accident and its unfortunate results followed the negligence of the defendants Wilson.

Appellant concedes that the statement of counsel regarding his failure to proceed against the Wilsons might not of itself be sufficient to upset the judgment herein. We affirm his conjecture in this regard, at the same time taking now the opportunity of suggesting to counsel in all cases that this class of argument should be avoided, and that we do not approve the general idea of bringing before a jury in cases of this sort anything concerning the wealth or poverty or ability of the parties to respond in compensatory damages.

Appellant insists that the statements of counsel as to the "Fifteen Mile an Hour Club" demand a new trial and the reversal of the order of the court below.

We have given his contention fullest consideration, and are not prepared to go to the length demanded. Counsel for appellant in their closing brief use these words:

"Counsel who conduct the trial for defendant are in an awkward and difficult position. If they object to the statement assigned as misconduct, and request the admonition of the court, they emphasize the point, and involuntarily assist in impressing it upon the minds of the jurors."

It seems to us that this is exactly what was done in the instant case. Appellant has taken up the remarks under scrutiny here, and has twisted each sentence into a direct reference to the fact that defendant Crocker was being defended by an insurance company, and that any verdict returned by the jury would come out of the pocket of the company. We fail to see it, or how the words employed can be so construed.

We can accept without question all of the authorities of this and other states cited by appellant, and yet find nothing in the record to which they may be applied to the extent of requiring a reversal of the judgment and order here. All the reviewing courts of this state are in accord upon the proposition that unfair and unwarranted means of winning a lawsuit cannot be commended nor receive recognition and indorsement of the courts, instituted and maintained, as they are, on the principle of administering justice. We are not out of harmony with the principle announced in Dameron v. Ansbro, 39 Cal. App. 289, 298, 178 P. 874, 879, wherein it is said:

"It is altogether probable that the jury would be more inclined to find a verdict against appellant if it were believed that he was indem-nified than if it were understood that he was to bear the burden alone."

[3, 4] Without abundant citation of authority we may here reaffirm it to be the law of this jurisdiction that it is improper to either directly or indirectly get before the jury any fact which conveys the information that defendant is insured against loss in case of a recovery against him, and the striking of the answers conveying such information and the instructing of the jury not to consider it will not save the error.

[5, 6] The parties to an action and their liabilities must be determined by the pleadings, and, when other parties and other issues are injected, the one so injecting does so at the peril of any judgment he may obtain. Shay v. Horr, 78 Wash. 667, 139 P. 604.

[7] The profession as a whole should know that the courts of this state are giving more and more scrutiny to the fairness or unfairness of the means employed in presenting issues. The Supreme Court has spoken in no uncertain terms in Keena v. United Railroads, 197 Cal. 148, 239 P. 1061, and this case is still recent enough to require no citation therefrom. However, quoting from the case of Edwards v. Earnest, 206 Ala. 1, 89 So. 729, 22 A. L. R. 1391, the question is whether or not the argument falls within that class of argumentative statements which are grossly improper and highly prejudicial, and whose evil influence and effect cannot be eradicated from the minds of the jury by any admonition from the trial judge. There is no horizontal rule by which we may be governed to determine these qualities, but each case is to be decided on its own merits, much depending upon the issues, the parties, and general atmosphere of the case.

[8] In the instant case the record discloses that throughout the trial there had not been the slightest suggestion, insinuation, or intimation of the claim that defendant was insured. It is conceded that the evidence supports the verdict, and it has not been claimed that the verdict is excessive. To hold that the language employed, which by some remote reference perhaps could have given the idea of a possible insurance, was potentially harmful and prejudicial to the extent of necessitating a new trial, would be going a step too far, and beyond the theory or reason of the rule announced.

Judgment and order affirmed.

TURANO v. BAILEY. (Civ. 3226.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 27, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1002—Verdict on conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed on appeal.

Verdict on conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ⇨616(3)—Instructions not authenticated as provided by statute cannot be reviewed (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Where appeal was taken under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, and instructions were not included in reporter's transcript, certified to by trial judge, but in clerk's transcript, certified by clerk only, alleged error in giving or refusing of instructions cannot be reviewed.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1031(3)—No presumption prevails on appeal that plaintiff was prejudiced by introduction of evidence which does not appear in record.

It cannot be presumed on appeal that plaintiff was prejudiced by introduction of evidence which does not appear in the record, since it may have been favorable to him.

4. Evidence ⇨378(5)—Testimony that plaintiff stated he needed no contract, that telegrams were enough, held sufficient foundation for admission of telegrams on question of defendant's agency.

In action for value of grapes, where defendant filed cross-complaint, alleging plaintiff's indebtedness for moneys advanced and denying sale, and alleging he was plaintiff's agent to sell grapes, defendant's evidence that he had drawn up a contract, and that plaintiff had seen telegrams of negotiations between defendant and prospective purchasers of plaintiff's grapes, and that plaintiff said they needed no contract, those telegrams were enough, held sufficient foundation for admission of telegrams in evidence on question of defendant's agency.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by Angelo Turano against Lansing B. Bailey, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for defendant on his cross-complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gumpert & Mazzer, of Stockton, for appellant.

Glenn West, of Lodi, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. In appellant's opening brief it is said:

"Plaintiff * * * sued defendant * * * for the sum of $557.81, the amount alleged due from respondent on a carload of grapes, No. PFE 14632, alleging it was one of 15 cars which respondent had purchased from appellant and which had not been paid for. Respondent filed a cross-complaint, alleging that plaintiff was indebted to him in the sum of $960.64, moneys advanced by defendant for plaintiff's use and benefit, denying the fact that any sale had been made to defendant. The jury denied plaintiff any relief, and brought in a verdict for the defendant in the sum of $960.64. Plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and now appeals from the judgment of the court. The sole issue to be determined is whether or not the transaction in the sale of the 15 cars, of which No. PFE 14632 was one, constituted a sale from appellant to respondent, or whether the respondent was merely acting throughout as appellant's agent."

[1] The evidence is substantially conflicting upon the issue stated, and therefore the implied finding of the jury in favor of defendant is conclusive on appeal. The defendant testified positively that he did not purchase the grapes in question, but that he sold them for the plaintiff pursuant to an agreement between the parties to the effect that he should do so. Appellant argues at considerable length that such testimony of defendant is discredited and overcome by other evidence. The argument goes to the weight of the evidence, and defendant's credibility as a witness, rather than to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict.

The jury, in returning a verdict for the defendant, and the trial court, in denying a new trial, impliedly found against appellant's contention. The matter being peculiarly within their province, their finding cannot be disturbed by this court.

[2] Exception is taken to the giving and refusing of instructions by the trial court. This appeal was taken pursuant to the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The instructions are not included in the reporter's transcript, certified by the trial judge, but in the clerk's transcript certified by the clerk only. Not being authenticated as provided by law, the instructions cannot be reviewed on this appeal. Tracy Brick etc., Co. v. Wurster, 44 Cal. App. 652, 187 P. 125; Martin v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 195 Cal. 544, 234 P. 321; Finkelstein v. Cosgrave (Cal. App.) 248 P. 704. Notwithstanding the want of power to reverse the judgment on account of errors, if any, in giving or refusing instructions, they have been carefully examined, and the rulings of the court in relation thereto appear to be free from error.

[3] Appellant contends that the court erred in admitting in evidence "18 car files." The following appears in the record:

"Note.—The car files are too voluminous to copy into the transcript."

Appellant has not called attention to anything in the record to indicate the contents of the car files, and nothing in that connection has been discovered. It cannot be presumed on appeal that the appellant has been prejudiced by the introduction of evidence which does not appear in the record. It may have been entirely favorable to him.

[4] Scattered through the record are 15 telegrams, constituting negotiations between the defendant and purchasers or prospective purchasers of the plaintiff's grapes. In appellant's brief it is said:

"Counsel for plaintiff objected to the introduction in evidence of all telegrams which passed between the defendant and third parties, purporting to show that defendant was acting as agent and not as purchaser. * * * All of these telegrams * * * were admitted in evidence, and we submit that that constituted prejudicial error."

Appellant has failed to print in his brief, as required by the provisions of section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, or to call attention to the portions of the record on which he relies to show that the court committed error in admitting the telegrams in evidence. He refers to the page of the record upon which his objection to the evidence appears. In relation to the telegrams referred to in that part of the transcript, the defendant testified:

"On or about October 10th, I said, 'Angelo, I have drawn up this contract covering this 15-car deal,' and he interrupted and said, 'Well, no contract is necessary.' I said, 'Never mind, this is a contract; we had better get down to business on it,' and I proceeded to read the contract to him. He said, 'Oh, we both live in this town; we understand each other; we are reliable citizens; we don't need any contract; these telegrams are enough.' He had seen all the telegrams."

This testimony related to a time before the shipment of the grapes, and was sufficient foundation for the admission of the telegrams in evidence. Appellant does not call attention to the admission of any telegram without the laying of a similar foundation.

The case appears to have been carefully tried, and there is nothing in the record to show that the jury and the trial court arrived at an erroneous conclusion from the conflicting evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte McDONALD. (Cr. 1431.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 26, 1927.

1. Gaming ⚡71—Agreement to pool contributions and divide fund, less deductions, among contributors selecting winning horse held "wager" or "bet" on speed contest, within statute (Pen. Code, § 337a).

Agreement, whereby sums were contributed to a jockey club to be pooled and entire fund contributed, less deductions jockey club was authorized to make, divided among contributors who selected horse winning a designated race, held a "bet" or "wager," within Pen. Code, § 337a, on result of a speed contest.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Bet; Wager—Wagering Contract.]

2. Gaming ⚡88—Complaint pleading offense of betting on speed contest held good, though not averring defendant's contribution to fund was wager (Pen. Code, § 337a).

Complaint pleading offense of betting or wagering on speed contest, as denounced by Pen. Code, § 337a, held good, though it did not aver that defendant's contribution to fund thereof was a bet or wager.

3. Habeas corpus ⚡3—Proceeding in habeas corpus cannot serve office of demurrer.

A proceeding in habeas corpus cannot be made to serve office of a demurrer.

4. Habeas corpus ⚡3—If complaint states offense of which court has jurisdiction, whether facts charged constitute offense cannot be examined on habeas corpus.

Notwithstanding defective statement of facts, if complaint states offense of kind of which court has jurisdiction, whether facts charged are sufficient to constitute offense cannot be examined on habeas corpus.

Original application by James S. McDonald for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the Sheriff of San Mateo County to secure petitioner's release from custody. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Walter H. Linforth, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Franklin Swart, Dist. Atty., and Edmund Scott, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Redwood City, for respondent.

Joseph Edward Connolly, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ.

Clarence A. Linn, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ for Presbytery of San Francisco.

CASHIN, J. Petitioner is held by the sheriff of San Mateo county on a warrant issued by the city court of the city of San Bruno. He seeks to be released on habeas corpus, claiming that the complaint upon which the warrant was issued fails to state a public offense.

The complaint charged a violation of section 337a of the Penal Code, the facts being alleged as follows:

"That on the 22d day of August, A. D. 1927, at Tanforan, in said county, the San Francisco Jockey Club, an association, held a horse race on a race track controlled and operated by it for that purpose at Tanforan, in said county of San Mateo and state of California, to test the speed of horses which might be and which were regularly entered in said race, and invited the owners of horses to enter the same in said race, and offered a purse of not less than $500, and as much more as the judge or judges presiding at said race, after 'the same had been run, should conclude, determine, and fix for the winners in said race, to be distributed as follows, to wit: Seventy per cent. of said purse to the owner of the horse finishing first in said race; 20 per cent. to the owner of the horse finishing second in said race; and 10 per cent. to the owner of the horse finishing third in said race; and that five horses were entered in the race designated on the printed program as "Race No. 1" under the terms and conditions of the written contract of entry made between the owner of each of said horses and said San Francisco Jockey Club, which, among other things, provided as follows, to wit:

"That owner of the above entered horse hereby leases the horse to the said San Francisco Jockey Club for the above-named race under the following conditions, to wit: That should the horse finish first, said San Francisco Jockey Club will pay said owner 70 per cent. of the purse or prize as fixed and determined by the judge or judges presiding at said race, after the running of said race, said purse to be not less than the sum of $500; should the horse finish second, 20 per cent.; and if it finishes third, 10 per cent.

"The owner agrees to deliver the horse to the paddock 15 minutes before the time set for said race in proper racing condition, with racing paraphernalia and a competent rider, and also agrees to hold said San Francisco Jockey Club blameless for any injury in said race." And that said San Francisco Jockey Club published and circulated a printed program which designated the race or contest of speed and the horses entered therein by number, and that one of said horses so entered in said race No. 1 was designated as No. 501 on said official program, and that the above-named defendant, James S. McDonald, at said time and place handed to John H. Gagliardo, then and there an employee of and representing and acting for the said San Francisco Jockey Club, the sum of $10 in lawful money of the United States of America, which said sum was then and there received by said John H. Gagliardo as such employee of said San Francisco Jockey Club, and thereupon the said John Gagliardo, so representing and acting for said San Francisco Jockey Club, did then and there issue and deliver to the said defendant, James S. McDonald, to evidence the terms and conditions upon which said sum of money was delivered to and received by said San Francisco Jockey Club, a receipt in return for said sum, in words and figures as follows, to wit: 'San Francisco Jockey Club. Tanforan, San Mateo county, California. August 22, 1927. (The numbers correspond with the number of the race and entry on the printed program.) Amount $10. Race No. 1, Entry No. 501. (The above sum is received on the conditions printed on the reverse side hereof.)'

Reverse side: "The holder of this receipt has voluntarily contributed the amount indicated on the reverse side hereof to the said San Francisco Jockey Club, which becomes the absolute owner thereof, to defray expenses, provide suitable purses, and induce the entry number indicated on the reverse side hereof and other entries to enter the race indicated by the number on the reverse side hereof. The numbers correspond with the numbers on the official program. If the entry number indicated on the reverse side hereof shall be first in the race, the holder will receive the proportion of 70 per cent. of all that remains, if any, of the entry fees and contributions made to the race after the payment of purses and all expenses incident to or connected with the race that the amount received hereunder bears to the total amount so remaining. If the entry number indicated on the reverse side hereof shall be second in the race, the holder will receive 20 per cent. of the aforesaid amount; if the entry number indicated on the reverse side hereof shall be third in the race, the holder will receive 10 per cent. of the aforesaid amount."

"And that in said race, the same then and there being a trial and contest of the speed of said horse so entered and racing therein, said horse known and designated as No. 501 finished first and was the winner in said race, and that the judge or judges then and there presiding at said race thereupon fixed the sum of $600 as the purse or prize to go to the winner of said race; that under and in accordance with the terms and conditions of the aforesaid contract, under which said horse was entered in said race, said San Francisco Jockey Club paid to the owner of said horse the sum of $420, the same being 70 per cent. of the aforesaid amount so fixed as the purse or prize to go to the winner; and the said San Francisco Jockey Club paid to the owner of said horse which finished second in said race the sum of $120, the same being 20 per cent. of the aforesaid prize or purse; and the said San Francisco Jockey Club paid to the owner of the horse which finished third in said race the sum of $60, the same being 10 per cent. of the amount of said purse or prize; that the said San Francisco Jockey Club paid to the defendant, James S. McDonald, to whom the aforesaid receipt was issued, and from whom the said sum of $10 was received as aforesaid, the sum of $12.50, the same being the proportion of 70 per cent. of the amount of entry fees paid by the owners of horses entered in said race and of all contributions made to the aforesaid race remaining after the payment of the purse aforesaid and all expenses of said race that the sum of $10 bore to the whole amount of the aforesaid entry fees and contributions so remaining, which said sum was accepted, received, and retained by the said defendant, James S. McDonald; and that said San Francisco Jockey Club paid to all others similarly contributing and holding similar receipts the same proportion of said amount so remaining."

Subdivision 6 of section 337a of the Penal Code provides that:

"Every person * * * who lays, makes, offers or accepts any bet or bets, or wager or wagers, upon the result, or purported result, or any trial, or purported trial, or contest, or purported contest, of skill, speed or power of endurance of man or beast, or between man, beasts, or mechanical apparatus, is punishable by imprisonment," etc.

It is held in Hankins v. Ottinger, 115 Cal. 454, 47 P. 254, 40 L. R. A. 76, that the giving of purses or premiums by associations or individuals not themselves competing for the purpose of encouraging trials of speed between horses, though the purse or premium be composed in part of entrance fees, is not contrary to good morals or prohibited, and competing for such premiums whatever be their designation is not competing for a bet or wager. As the court said:

"It is betting or wagering on the event of races which is regarded by the law as immoral, and which it undertakes to discourage."

[1] The transaction described in the complaint was, in effect, an agreement whereby the sums contributed were to be pooled and the entire fund, less such deductions as the Jockey Club was authorized to make, divided among the contributors who selected the winning horse. Had the amount to be deducted been fixed in advance, as is usual, the transaction in brief would have constituted what is commonly known as a "mutual pool," and the contributions mutual bets or wagers (27 Corp. Jur. "Gaming," § 42, p. 976; James v. State, 63 Md. 242, 249); but it is claimed that the element of uncertainty with respect to the action of the fundholder distinguishes the arrangement from the ordinary betting pool, and that the sums contributed were by reason of such uncertainty not bet or wagered.

In support of this contention reliance is placed upon the case of Plottel v. Boyle,¹ decided by the Supreme Court of Missouri on August 1, 1927, in which it appears, however, that a rehearing has been granted. It was there held under a Missouri statute prohibiting the recording or registering of wagers on race horses, but not prohibiting betting thereon, that the essential characteristic of a bet or wager is the certainty that the sum to which all contribute shall become the sole property of one or some of the contributors; and, where it appeared from an agreement similar to the one in the present case that the first claims upon the fund contributed were the purse and expenses of the race and that these claims might consume the whole, there was no certainty that any part thereof would be paid to the contributors, and the sums contributed were not bets or wagers upon the result of the contest.

In Black's Law Dictionary a bet is defined as, "An agreement between two or more persons that a sum of money or other valuable thing shall become the sole property of one or more of them on the happening in the future of an event at present uncertain or according as the question disputed between them is settled one way or the other"; a wager being defined in Bouvier's Law Dictionary as, "A contract by which two parties or more agree that a certain sum of money or other thing shall be paid or delivered to one of them on the happening or not happening of a certain event"; and generally the terms are used as synonymous. 27 Corp. Jur. "Gaming," § 35, p. 974.

It is clear from the above definitions that the question whether such contributions are bets or wagers does not depend upon the certainty that a part of the fund will remain after the claims of the fundholder are satisfied, but rather upon the agreement, express or implied, that the amount remaining, if any, shall become the property of one or some of the contributors to the exclusion of the others upon the happening in the future of an event at present uncertain.

The fact, urged by petitioner as saving the transaction here entered into from characterization as a bet or wager, that there is a possibility that the whole of the sums contributed may be used by the racing association as prizes given to the owners of the winning horses and other related expenses, so that nothing would remain to be distributed to those who contributed to the common fund, is immaterial, since the character of the agreement here entered into must be judged not by what is actually done under it by the fundholder, but by what may be done. Notwithstanding the conclusion reached in the case last cited, we are compelled to hold that in transactions of the kind described in the complaint the sums contributed are bets or wagers on the result of the contest.

[2] While in the present case it was not directly averred that the sum contributed by petitioner was bet or wagered, such, nevertheless, was the effect of the facts alleged, and it was the manifest purpose of the pleading to charge an offense under the above subdivision of the section.

[3, 4] A proceeding in habeas corpus cannot be made to serve the office of a demurrer (Ex parte Williams, 121 Cal. 328, 330, 53 P. 706); and notwithstanding a defective statement of facts, if the complaint purports or attempts to state an offense of a kind of which the court assuming to proceed has jurisdiction, whether the facts charged are sufficient to constitute an offense of that kind cannot be examined on habeas corpus. In the Matter of Ruef, 150 Cal. 665, 89 P. 605; In re Avdalas, 10 Cal. App. 507, 102 P. 674.

The averments of the complaint were sufficient within the above rule to charge a public offense, and the writ is therefore discharged and the petitioner remanded.

GREENE v. GREENE. (Civ. 5428.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 24, 1927.

1. Divorce ⚭245(1)—Granting motion to modify divorce decree with respect to alimony rests in trial court's discretion.

Granting or refusing to grant motions to modify divorce decrees with respect to alimony rests largely in discretion of trial court.

2. Divorce ⚭286—Where no abuse of discretion was shown in denying motion to modify divorce decree by increasing alimony, appellate court could not interfere.

Where it did not clearly and affirmatively appear upon face of record that trial court abused discretion in refusing to modify divorce decree by increasing alimony from $10 to $50 per month, appellate court could not interfere.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Divorce action by Claretta Greene against William E. Greene. Decree for plaintiff. From an order refusing to modify the decree with respect to the alimony, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lawrence Y. Sledge, of Oakland, for appellant.

Thomas D. Johnston, H. M. Bishop, and James F. Hoey, all of Martinez, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Appeal from an order refusing to modify a decree of divorce with reference to alimony. It appears from the record that appellant, Claretta Greene, instituted an action for divorce against respondent, William E. Greene, on December 15, 1923. Prior to the filing of the complaint the parties entered into an agreement settling their property rights. The agreement after providing for a certain property settlement in favor of the wife recited, in substance, that the defendant would pay in addition thereto the sum of $50 per month for a period of 4 months, and no longer. It further provided that defendant by reason of said payments was not relieved from the obligation to make further payments in a reasonable amount for the support of plaintiff after the expiration of the 4 months' period, it being recited that it was the intent and purpose of the parties that, at the expiration of such time, the amount of support to be paid by defendant to plaintiff was to be left to the mutual agreement of the parties, or, in the event that they were unable to agree upon an amount, by a proceeding in a court of competent jurisdiction. Subsequently, and on the 9th day of January, 1924, an interlocutory decree of divorce was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and in said decree it was provided that plaintiff receive as alimony the sum of $50 per month from November 1, 1923, to March 1, 1924, and thereafter the sum of $10 per month, until further order of court. A final decree was entered February 15, 1925. Subsequently, on June 15, 1925, plaintiff filed a notice of motion for increase of alimony from $10 to $50 per month. In her affidavit filed in support thereof she alleged her inability to support herself by reason of sickness due to defendant's cruelty inflicted upon her during the time they lived together as husband and wife. An affidavit was also filed by her physician in support of her motion, which recited that she was suffering from a particular ailment. Defendant denied the allegations contained in plaintiff's affidavit and claimed that if she was suffering from the ailment alleged, such ailment was due to her own misconduct, for which defendant was not responsible. The trial court denied plaintiff's motion, and this is an appeal from such order. Respondent in support of the order insists that there was no showing made that would justify the court in modifying the original decree.

[1, 2] The granting or the refusal to grant such motions is a matter that rests largely in the discretion of the trial court. Before the appellate courts will interfere, it must be made clearly and affirmatively to appear upon the face of the record in the case that this discretion has been abused. No such showing is here made.

The order is affirmed.

FIX et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5914.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 31, 1927.

Mandamus ⚭57(2)—Refusal of superior court judge to hear and determine question of sufficiency of sureties held proper case for issuance of mandate.

Where appeal was taken to Supreme Court from judgment of superior court, and in connection therewith stay-bond with two sureties was filed, and not approved because wives of sureties did not join therein, refusal of judge of superior court to hear evidence to determine question of sufficiency of sureties thereon, and also on bond to maintain attachment in force pending appeal, relating to acts which law especially enjoins as duty resulting from his office, held proper case for issuance of mandate.

Original mandamus by M. J. Fix and another against the Superior court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and another. Peremptory writ granted.

John A. Jorgenson, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, and S. V. O. Prichard, Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. On petition filed, an alternative writ of mandate was issued. Respondents demurred to the petition on the ground that the same does not state facts sufficient to entitle petitioners to the demanded relief. The case is submitted on this demurrer.

The petitioners appealed to the Supreme Court from a judgment entered against them as defendants in an action in the Superior Court of Los Angeles county. In connection with that appeal they filed a stay bond with two sureties. In response to a demand for justification of those sureties, the petitioners, upon notice duly given, appeared before respondent judge with said sureties, for justification of the sureties. The matter being called for hearing, the judge examined the bond, and asked the attorney for petitioners whether the sureties were married. The attorney having replied that they were married, the judge thereupon stated that he would not approve the bond, because it was necessary that the wives of the sureties join in said bond on account of the community property laws in this state. The judge refused to proceed further in said matter, and refused to hear evidence of the qualification of the sureties, and wrote on the back of the bond as follows:

"This bond is not approved on statement of counsel filing same as so sureties being both married and their wives not being on bond.

"Charles S. Burnell, Judge."

Counsel for respondents have not presented any argument or cited any authorities in support of the proposition that a married man cannot, under any circumstances, be accepted as surety on such an undertaking unless his wife joins with him in executing the same. Therefore we make no decision on this question further than that for the purposes of this case we assume that a married man may, without the consent of his wife, be a surety, and a sufficient surety, upon an undertaking like that shown in the instant case.

The point relied upon by respondents is that an appeal from the court's order will furnish a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, if the court erroneously refused to approve the bond. In support of this proposition we are referred to Holt v. James, 10 Cal. App. 360, 101 P. 1065, and Oliver v. Superior Court, 67 Cal. App. 358, 227 P. 647. It does not appear in either of these cases that the respondent court had refused to act upon a matter brought before it for hearing and decision. Each case involved merely an alleged error of the court in the exercise of its jurisdiction. But in the case at bar it appears from the petition (which the demurrer necessarily admits to be true) that the court has refused to hear and determine the question of the sufficiency of the sureties. Such refusal, in this instance, relates to an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from the office of respondent judge. We think that this presents a proper case for the issuance of the writ of mandate.

In connection with said appeal, petitioners also filed an undertaking for the purpose of maintaining in full force, pending appeal, an attachment which they had obtained, on their cross-action against certain property of plaintiffs and cross-defendants in said action. The proceedings in respondent court, concerning this bond, were identical with those described herein with reference to the stay bond. We are of the opinion that the ruling here made is equally applicable to both undertakings.

Let the peremptory writ issue.

DENVIR v. JUDSON FREIGHT FORWARDING CO.

SAME v. BRALEY.

(Civ. 4957.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 26, 1927.

1. New trial $\S$ 95—Plaintiff who failed to exercise ordinary prudence to ascertain testimony of her witness cannot invoke relief on ground of surprise at testimony on cross-examination (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 657).

Where plaintiff, by exercise of ordinary prudence, could have ascertained what testimony of her witness would be, but failed to do so, contrary to Code of Civ. Proc. $\S$ 657, she cannot invoke relief on ground of surprise at such witness' testimony on cross-examination.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 237(2)—One claiming surprise at testimony must ask continuance to preserve point for review.

Party who claimed to have been surprised by evidence given by her witness on cross-examination must move for continuance, or she will not be permitted to avail herself of that point on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Actions by Mrs. John B. Denvir, Jr., against the Judson Freight Forwarding Company, and against Rex E. Braley, doing business under the fictitious name and style of Braley's Garage. From judgments of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

O'Melveny, Millikin, Tuller & Macneil and J. R. Girling, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hahn & Hahn, of Pasadena, and Edward T. Sherer and Welburn Mayock, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff appeals from judgments of nonsuit in the above-entitled actions.

These are actions for damages arising out of the shipment of an automobile from Los Angeles, Cal., to St. Louis, Mo., during the month of October, 1920. The defendant Braley operated a garage in which plaintiff had stored her automobile. Acting upon telegraphic instructions, Braley delivered plaintiff's automobile to the defendant Judson Freight Forwarding Company for shipment to plaintiff in St. Louis, Mo. The automobile at the time of shipment was in perfect order; but, upon arrival in St. Louis, it was found to be in a greatly damaged condition, caused by water freezing in the radiator and water jacket. Plaintiff brought these two actions, which were consolidated for the purposes of trial, to recover the amounts paid by her for repairs to her automobile, necessitated by the damaged condition in which it was received, alleging that the negligence of both defendants in not seeing that the automobile was properly drained before shipment was the cause of the damage. At the trial of the consolidated actions plaintiff called as a witness one Engelman, a former employee of the Judson Freight Forwarding Company, who testified that he had seen the water drained from the automobile in question at the time of its delivery to the Judson Freight Forwarding Company for shipment. The court ordered a nonsuit in favor of both defendants. Plaintiff made a motion for a new trial upon the ground of "accident and surprise which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against." The motion was denied.

In support of plaintiff's motion for a new trial, she filed the affidavit of her attorney, stating, among other matters, that plaintiff was surprised by the testimony of the witness Engelman to the effect that he had seen the water drained from the engine of the automobile in question; that ordinary prudence could not have guarded against such testimony; and that plaintiff is now in possession of newly discovered evidence in the form of a letter from the defendants, in which the fact of the water not having been drained from the said automobile and the resultant damage thereto is admitted, but that such letter could not with reasonable diligence have been produced at the trial. The letter to which the affidavit refers reads:

"St. Louis, U. S. A., January 21, 1921.

"Mrs. Roscoe Parsons, 4950 Lindell Ave., St. Louis, Mo.—Dear Madam: In accordance with conversation with your good self while at our warehouse at the time of taking delivery of this machine, please let us have as early as possible bills covering repairs to the machine and which damage has been brought about due to water being left in the radiator and we will send these papers on to our Los Angeles office to secure adjustment in connection with the garage company there who made delivery of the shipment to us.

"Kindly let us have the claim papers in the matter as promptly as possible, with the assurance on our part that we will exert every effort to secure settlement for you, we beg to remain

"Yours very truly,

"Judson Freight Forwarding Co.,
"Geo. W. Flynn, Agent."

A counter affidavit was filed by the attorney for the defendant Judson Freight Forwarding Company, in which he states that, prior to the trial of these cases, he was approached by an attorney associated with the attorneys of record for the plaintiff herein, "who inquired of affiant if affiant would have present at the trial of said cause the representative of the Judson Freight Forwarding Company, who had received said car from said defendant at the loading station from which the same was shipped; that affiant informed said G. T. Graves that said representative would be present; that the representative of the Judson Freight Forwarding Company, who received said car at the loading station, was one Engelman, then in the employ of said Judson Freight Forwarding Company; that said Engelman resides, and was then residing, in the city of Los Angeles, and could have been interviewed by counsel for plaintiff had he so desired, and thereby could have acquainted himself with the nature of the testimony which said Engelman might be expected to give at the trial of said cause."

[1, 2] Appellant argues that the foregoing letter caused plaintiff to believe that the Judson Freight Forwarding Company knew and acknowledged the fact to be that the automobile had been shipped without the water having been properly drained, and that it could not have been anticipated that the witness Engelman, whom plaintiff called to prove the delivery of the automobile to the Judson Freight Forwarding Company, would or might testify on cross-examination that he saw the water drained from the automobile before shipment. We do not construe the foregoing letter as an absolute admission by one of the defendants that the water was left in the radiator by either of the defendants, but rather as a statement of the forwarding company that it would use every effort to secure an adjustment and settlement from the garage company. If the testimony of Engelman, plaintiff's witness, is to be taken as true, then the water must have been placed in the radiator by some person other than the defendants. Moreover, this letter cannot be regarded as newly discovered evidence, since it bears date of January 21, 1921, and must have been in possession of the appellant after that date and up to the date of the trial on February 27, 1924, a period of over three years. In our opinion, the facts as stated by appellant are insufficient to justify a reversal. Engelman was appellant's own witness. Appellant could not, and should not, anticipate his testimony. Appellant had the means at her command to ascertain before the trial what the witness' testimony would be. Appellant's opening brief shows that the testimony of Hopkins, who drove the car to the forwarding company, was taken, but appellant failed to take the deposition of Engelman, the person to whom it was delivered, though his name was signed to the receipt marked Plaintiff's Exhibit 3. Appellant, we believe, failed to exercise the ordinary prudence to guard against surprise as required by section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Appellant, by the exercise of ordinary prudence, could have ascertained what the testimony of Engelman would be, and, having failed to do so, cannot invoke relief on the ground of surprise. Schellhous v. Ball, 29 Cal. 605. Appellant made no effort to secure a continuance in order to meet this contingency of adverse testimony secured from her own witness on cross-examination. It is the general rule that a party who claims to have been surprised by the evidence adduced by his adversary must move for a continuance, or he will not be permitted to avail himself of that point on appeal. Snodgrass v. Snodgrass (Cal. App.) 253 P. 755; Doyle v. Sturla, 38 Cal. 456; Heath v. Scott, 65 Cal. 548, 4 P. 557; Bailey v. Richardson, 66 Cal. 416, 5 P. 910. In Heath v. Scott, supra, it is said (page 552 [4 P. 560]):

"It is well settled that, if a party claiming to be surprised by the introduction of testimony, fails to apply at the time for a continuance of the cause, or to resort to other testimony, or to ask for any relief to which he might be entitled under the circumstances, his failure is attributable to his own fault, and constitutes no ground of surprise upon which a new trial will be granted. Schellhous v. Ball, 29 Cal. 608; Turner v. Morrison, 11 Cal. 21; Delmas v. Martin, 39 Cal. 555, as modified by Ferrer v. Mutual Insurance Company, 47 Cal. 416."

In Ferrer v. Mutual Insurance Co., 47 Cal. 416, it is said, page 430:

"If the defendant was surprised by this testimony, there should have been a motion to continue the cause in order to procure the deposition of Francis. In such cases the application for relief must be made at the earliest convenient time, and certainly without unreasonable delay. A party should not be allowed to speculate on the chances of a favorable decision, and after he has lost his cause, move for a new trial on the ground that he was surprised by the introduction of certain testimony by his adversary. 'It is better for the purposes of justice and the convenience of courts and litigants, to afford relief at once and on the spot, if it can be done.' Schellhous v. Ball, 29 Cal. 608. The rule was somewhat relaxed in Delmas v. Martin, 39 Cal. 557. But the case was peculiar, and we are not inclined to extend the relaxation beyond the facts of that case."

In view of the foregoing, we are of the opinion that plaintiff should have moved for a continuance, instead of awaiting the decision of the court, and then moving for a new trial, especially in view of the fact that the record shows that the witness had not been questioned before the trial, and there is no evidence of deceit or collusion practiced by the witness. Neither was the testimony offered in the last stage of the trial, as in Delmas v. Martin, 39 Cal. 555, a case relied upon by appellant. So there was ample opportunity to present the motion for a continuance before the motion for nonsuit was made. Appellant concedes in her reply brief that it has always been the rule that a new trial would not be granted on the ground of surprise at the testimony of the adversary's witness. We see no difference in principle between such cases and the present case. Here the witness was adverse, but was not the adversary's witness; instead, he was appellant's own witness, who testified adversely to plaintiff on cross-examination by defendant.

The judgments are ordered affirmed.

CHICK et al. v. WHITTON. (S. F. 11498.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 31, 1927.

Brokers §8(3)—Evidence sustained findings that brokers in negotiating sale of defendant's property were acting for defaulting purchaser and hence not entitled to commissions.

In broker's action for commissions for negotiating sale of real property to person who ultimately purchased through a different brokerage firm after default of first prospect secured, evidence held to sustain findings that plaintiffs in negotiating subsequent sale were acting for purchaser who defaulted, and hence were not entitled to recover commissions of defendant.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Action by Guy Hyde Chick and Frank W. MacMillan, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Guy Hyde Chick Company, against B. F. Whitton. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

B. D. Marx Greene, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Clark, Nichols & Eltse, of Berkeley, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiffs herein, who, as copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Guy Hyde Chick Company, are real estate brokers, commenced this action to recover the sum of $2,000 from the defendant, alleged to be due as commission for the plaintiffs' services in the matter of the sale of certain real estate in the city of Berkeley. The basis of the plaintiffs' claim consisted in a written authorization executed by the defendant on October 2, 1923, addressed to the plaintiffs and reading in part as follows:

"Please sell for me my property situate at No. — Tunnel road on the north side of Tunnel road, known as Cheadle Hall, in the Claremont tract, Berkeley, together with the appurtenances, for the sum of forty-two thousand dollars ($42,000). Should you succeed in selling it, or should I sell it to any one to whom you show the property, I will pay you 5 per cent. on the price obtained."

The plaintiffs in their complaint allege that the defendant is indebted to them in the sum of $2,000 for services rendered as real estate brokers inferentially by reason of the authorization contained in said writing. The defendant in his answer denies said indebtedness or that the same arose out of any services whatever performed for the defendant at his request or otherwise. Upon the submission of the cause the trial court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law, and in so doing found that "no services were performed by the plaintiffs for the defendant, that defendant did not agree to pay plaintiffs $2,000 or any other sum for services performed or to be performed, that nothing is due, owing or unpaid from the defendant to the plaintiffs"; and as a conclusion of law based thereon the court found "that the plaintiffs are not, nor is either of them, entitled to judgment or to the relief prayed for, or any relief; that the defendant is entitled to his costs." From the judgment accordingly entered the plaintiffs prosecute this appeal.

The facts elicited at the trial upon which the foregoing finding of fact and conclusion of law is based may be briefly stated as follows: Shortly after the above authorization of the plaintiffs to procure a purchaser for the defendant's property the plaintiffs succeeded in negotiating a sale thereof to two persons named Brown, husband and wife, who, on October 3, 1923, paid a deposit of $2,000 on account of the purchase price of said property, and thereupon entered into an agreement in writing with the owner for the completion of the purchase thereof upon the terms set forth therein. Subsequently to the execution of said agreement and while the same was apparently in full force and effect, the plaintiffs, without any authorization from the defendant, caused the property in question to be surveyed and subdivided into a number of lots, and, having done so, erected upon the property a large sign showing that it was to be sold in subdivisions by or through the plaintiffs, the name of the owner, however, nowhere appearing upon said sign. They also caused blue prints to be made of the subdivision, which they sent forth to numerous other real estate agents with letters indicating the rates or prices which would be made upon the subdivided portions of the premises. Thereafter and about the 1st of November, one H. T. Ghirardelli saw the aforesaid sign upon the property and that the same was to be subdivided, and thereupon telephoned to one of the plaintiffs and arranged to go and did go to see the property within a day or two thereafter, and thereupon made to the plaintiffs an offer of a trade or exchange of other properties therefor, which offer was not within the scope of the plaintiffs' authorization, and so far as the record shows was never submitted to the owner. During this negotiation the plaintiffs did not reveal the name of the owner of the property to Ghirardelli, nor did the latter know who its owner was; and there is some evidence in the record which tends to show that in thus negotiating with Ghirardelli the plaintiffs were dealing with the property as though it was the property of the Browns or was soon to become so under the latter's agreement of purchase. The plaintiffs had no further dealings with Ghirardelli. The time limit under the Brown contract to purchase the property expired on December 3, 1923. The Browns defaulted, and both the plaintiffs and the defendant treated their default as amounting to a forfeiture of the $2,000 deposit which they had made, and thereafter and during the month of December the defendant paid over to the plaintiffs one-half of said deposit under the provisions of their said agreement, which contained a clause for such division of the deposit in the event of forfeiture. During the month of December, 1923. Ghirardelli came into relation with another real estate firm, namely, Mason-McDuffie Company, which firm was also the holder of an authorization from the defendant to sell his said property, and thereafter and on December 31st a sale of the said property was consummated to said Ghirardelli and through the agency of said last-named firm of brokers. Thereafter the plaintiffs, having learned of such sale, demanded of the defendant the payment to them of a commission in the amount of $2,000, upon the theory, apparently, that they had shown the property to Ghirardelli while acting as the agents of the defendant and were thus, under the terms of the contract, entitled to said commission. The trial court, however, reached the conclusion as the result of its consideration of the foregoing evidentiary facts that whatever the said plaintiffs had done in the way of showing the defendant's property to Ghirardelli had been done after they had apparently accomplished a sale of said property to the Browns, and, having done so, were engaged in an endeavor to achieve a subdivision and resale thereof in the interest of the Browns and not the defendant. It seems entirely clear to us that the inferences which the trial court drew in that regard were fully justified by the evidence before it, and that this being so its findings and conclusions must be held to have been sustained by such evidence.

It follows that the judgment herein must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

DRINKHOUSE et al. v. VAN NESS (PACIFIC SURETY CO., Intervener; two cases).★
(S. F. 3552, 10733.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 31, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 28, 1927.

1. New trial ⇨163(1)—Order granting new trial could not, without proper showing of irregularity, be amended or altered by trial court, hence attempted amendment was nullity (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Where, in a claim and delivery action, the court granted intervener's motion for new trial for intervener and one defendant, but one week afterwards entered a so-called amended order granting new trial only to the intervener, held, that such second order was a nullity, since, in the absence of showing of irregularity of the original order granting a new trial, or by pursuance of Code Civ. Proc. § 473, for relief on ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, first order was conclusive upon the trial court and it could not thereafter amend, revoke, modify, or otherwise disturb its judgment in that regard.

2. Appeal and error ⇨440—New trial ⇨163 (1)—Where order is incorrectly entered court may amend entry, even after appeal, to make it state order as actually made.

If the order entered is not the order actually made, the court may by entry correct it, even after appeal, so that it will state the truth.

3. New trial ⇨111—Surety Intervening in claim and delivery against principal held entitled as collateral to right of appeal to move for new trial as to whole case.

Where the surety on the redelivery bond in a claim and delivery action for the possession of a stallion intervened and judgment was rendered both against him and his principal, the defendant, held, that as collateral to his right of appeal from the judgment such intervener could seek and have granted a motion for new trial as to whole case.

4. New trial ⇨163(2)—Effect of granting Intervener's motion for new trial, notices of which did not limit issues or parties between whom motion would be made, was to reopen all issues.

Where, in claim and delivery action for the possession of a stallion, the intervening surety on the redelivery bond moved, after verdict and judgment and pending reversal on appeal, for a new trial without having placed in his notices of motion any limitation as to the issues upon which, or the parties between whom, the motion would be made, held, that the effect of the order granting such motion was to reopen all issues and place all parties in the position they held before the trial.

5. Parties ⇨56—Allegations of Intervener's petition, where, in effect, but answer to complaint, were deemed controverted (Code Civ. Proc. § 462).

Where, in claim and delivery action for possession of a stallion, the intervener's, surety on the redelivery bond, complaint in intervention was, in effect, but an answer to the complaint of the plaintiffs, it did not constitute the plaintiffs defendants or cross-defendants, hence its allegations were deemed controverted by the plaintiffs, under Code Civ. Proc. § 462.

6. Parties ⇨56—Overruling intervening petitioner's demurrer to plaintiffs' so-called counterclaim and denying nonsuit against plaintiffs on same issue was reversible error, since counterclaim could not exist where intervener's petition was but answer to complaint (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 438, 439).

Where, in claim and delivery action for the possession of a stallion, the surety on the redelivery bond intervened making his petition but an answer to the complaint, held that overruling such intervening petitioner's demurrer to plaintiffs' so-called counterclaim and denying nonsuit against the plaintiffs on the same issue was reversible error because of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 438 and 439, since parties did not bear to each other the relationship of plaintiff and defendant.

7. New trial ⇨24—Where judgment was rendered against surety on redelivery bond together with judgment against principal, new trial held proper where bond was conditioned upon redelivery being "adjudged."

Where, in a claim and delivery action for possession of a stallion, judgment was rendered both against the defendant and the intervening petitioner, surety on the redelivery bond, intervening petitioner's motion for a new trial held properly granted where by the express terms the bond was conditioned upon the redelivery being "adjudged" so that there could be no breach, hence no cause of action against the surety, until a judgment or order was entered for return of the stallion.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Adjudge.]

8. Replevin ⇨11(2)—Demand for possession before suing held unnecessary where answer alleged ownership and right of possession.

Where defendant in a claim and delivery action for the possession of a stallion set up in his answer his ownership and right of possession, such answer rendered proof of demand for possession by plaintiff upon defendant before bringing the action unnecessary.

9. Replevin ⇨72—Evidence held to support finding taking of stallion was wrongful.

In a claim and delivery action for the possession of a stallion, evidence held to support the jury's finding that the taking was wrongful.

10. Replevin ⇨69(1)—Question of accounting of stallion's earnings held not to enter into claim and delivery action.

The question of an accounting of the earnings of a stallion held not to enter into a claim and delivery action for his possession.

11. Replevin ☞106—Plaintiffs held entitled to judgment for stallion's value as of date of detention, where he had died after commencement of action, and to damages for taking and withholding.

Where, in a claim and delivery action for the possession of a stallion, the stallion had died before the verdict and judgment thereon, held that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment for the horse's value as of the date of his taking and detention and to additional damages for the wrongful taking and withholding.

12. Replevin ☞12(1)—That stallion died after action begun held no defense.

In a claim and delivery action for the possession of a stallion, the fact that such animal had died after the action was begun, but before the verdict and judgment, held no defense to the action.

13. Damages ☞142—Special damages depending upon peculiar circumstances of case must be pleaded.

Such damages as do not ordinarily arise from the breach complained of, but depend upon the peculiar circumstances of the case, are special damages which must be pleaded.

14. Appeal and error ☞1039(13)—Error in admitting evidence of racing ability of stallion's progeny, where special damage was not pleaded, held not reversible.

Where, in a claim and delivery action for the possession of a stallion, evidence of the racing ability of the stallion's progeny was admitted even though no special damage was pleaded, such admission of evidence held not reversible error.

15. Appeal and error ☞1039(13)—Admitting evidence of stallion's value for breeding purposes during detention period held not reversible error, although special damage was not pleaded.

Where, in a claim and delivery action for the possession of a stallion, evidence of his value for breeding purposes during the detention period was admitted although no special damage was pleaded, such admission held not reversible error.

16. Replevin ☞71(1)—Admitting evidence of stallion's racing history and that of progeny held proper as basis for determining "peculiar value" (Civ. Code, § 3355).

Where, in a claim and delivery action for the possession of a stallion, evidence of his racing history and that of his progeny was admitted, such admission held proper as a basis for determining the "peculiar value" of the property, as provided by Civ. Code, § 3355.

17. Replevin ☞82—Award of $15,000 in lieu of dead stallion and damages for detention held not improper.

Where, in action for the possession of a stallion, the jury awarded $7,500 in lieu of the stallion which had died after the action was begun and $7,500 as damages for the wrongful taking and detention, such award held not improper.

18. Replevin ☞76—Damages for stallion's detention held not restricted to interest on money value, stallion having usable value in excess thereof.

In an action of claim and delivery for the possession of a stallion, held, that the damages for the wrongful taking and detention were not to be restricted to interest upon the stallion's value where such stallion had a usable value in excess thereof.

19. Replevin ☞80—Where it was probable that general sum awarded included attorney's fees for locating stallion before replevin action, judgment ordered reduced by such amount.

Where, in claim and delivery action for the possession of a stallion, it was probable, because of evidence introduced and instructions by the court relative thereto, that the jury had awarded a certain sum to the plaintiff as a part of the general award, as attorney's fees expended by him in pursuing and locating the horse prior to the commencement of the action, judgment upon appeal ordered reduced by the probable amount so awarded.

20. Release ☞27—Where defendants were not joint tort-feasors, agreement releasing one, not amounting to retraxit, did not release other.

In a claim and delivery action for the possession of a stallion where the evidence showed defendants were not joint tort-feasors, an agreement between the plaintiffs and one defendant releasing such defendant, which agreement did not amount to a retraxit, did not release other defendant.

21. Trial ☞295(10)—Giving instruction assuming wrongful taking held not error, where charges read as whole were correct as to taking.

Where, in a claim and delivery action for the possession of a stallion, certain instructions relative to the wrongful taking of the horse erroneously assumed, to some extent, a wrongful taking, giving such instruction held not error where, as a whole, the charges correctly submitted to the jury the question whether there was a taking, and, if so, whether it was wrongful.

22. Appeal and error ☞1064(1)—Where one defendant in replevin repudiated existence of partnership and evidence would not support partnership finding, improper instruction on burden of proving partnership held harmless.

Where, in a claim and delivery action for a stallion's possession, defense was introduced based upon the existence of a partnership of defendants, but one of the defendants had repudiated the existence of a partnership and the evidence would not support the finding that a partnership existed, held, that an improper instruction on the burden of proving partnership was harmless error.

Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William R. Daingerfield, Judge.

Action by William M. Singerly and another, John A. Drinkhouse, administrator of the estate of William M. Singerly, deceased, being substituted as party plaintiff, against Frank Van Ness and others, in which action the Pacific Surety Company intervened. Judgment for plaintiff, and the intervener, Pacific Surety Company, appeals. From the orders granting a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Original judgment modified, and, as modified, affirmed, and order granting new trial affirmed in part and reversed in part.

Cooley & Gallagher, of San Francisco (Goodfellow, Eells & Orrick, of San Francisco, of counsel), for intervener appellant.

A. E. Shaw, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, C. J. This case holds the record in this jurisdiction for Rip Van Winkle litigation. The action was initiated in the lower court on the 29th day of January, 1896. A complaint in intervention was filed August 31, 1899, and various and amended pleadings were interposed. On the 31st day of May, 1900, a jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs, and judgment was entered against one of the defendants and against the intervener. Notices of appeal from the judgment were filed in July following. In May, 1902, the trial court entered an order and an amended order on motion to vacate judgment and for a new trial. Notices of appeal from these orders were filed in June, 1902. No further proceedings intervened in the lower court or here, other than the preparation and filing of the transcript on appeal on June 15, 1923.

In the "foreword" to their opening brief appellants say:

"Since [the trial] many changes have taken place in California procedure, numerous and large volumes of statutes have been added to our libraries by ambitious legislators, and many decisions have been handed down interpreting our laws, old and new."

With this brief, but accurate, historical review, and a plea for "indulgence" should their brief "run into more than the usual number of pages," appellants launch their attack on the almost forgotten judgment and rulings of the lower court. In justice to the attorneys now representing both appellants and respondent, it must be stated that they are appearing for the first time in the litigation, the breath of life having been infused into the case through a peremptory order of this court directing the parties to appear and show cause why the appeals should not be dismissed for want of prosecution. After a quarter of a century, mainly given over to repose, the cause stands submitted on points and authorities expeditiously prepared by present counsel.

The action is one in claim and delivery, based upon an alleged wrongful taking. It was instituted by William M. Singerly (now deceased and represented by John A. Drinkhouse, his administrator) and Louis Lamertz, as plaintiffs, against Frank Van Ness, James B. Chase, and certain fictitious defendants, to recover possession of a horse named "Morello," alleged to be worth $10,000, together with $10,000 damages for the wrongful taking and detention. Pursuant to proceedings for that purpose, the sheriff took the horse from the possession of the defendant Chase. The defendant Van Ness thereupon gave a redelivery bond in the sum of $20,000, executed by Pacific Surety Company, the intervener, and now an appellant here, and the horse was delivered to Van Ness, in whose possession it remained until its death, which occurred before the case came on for trial. Van Ness answered the complaint, denying all the allegations of the plaintiffs, and alleged himself to be the sole owner of the horse and entitled to its possession. Subsequently the Pacific Surety Company, by permission of the court, filed a complaint in intervention, in which, after reciting the various steps in the litigation, and the death of the horse, it alleged that Van Ness was insolvent, and had abandoned the defense to the action, and that the Surety Company, by reason of its having given the redelivery bond, had an interest in the success of the defendant Van Ness in the action and in the defeat of the plaintiffs. It also alleged, as a further defense, a dismissal of the action as to defendant Chase, and his release and discharge by the plaintiffs from the alleged cause of action set forth in the complaint, and from all claims and demands which the plaintiffs had or claimed against him by reason of the matters alleged in their complaint. The Surety Company did not ask for a judgment or for any relief other than that it might be allowed to intervene in the action and unite and join as a defendant, and be permitted to defend against the plaintiffs. The defendant Van Ness failed to plead to the complaint in intervention, and his default was entered. The plaintiffs answered, denying the various allegations, alleging that the Surety Company was amply indemnified for any liability upon the redelivery bond, and putting in issue the allegation as to the release of Chase. In a "supplemental answer to said complaint in intervention" the plaintiffs sought a judgment against the intervener for such amount as by the verdict and judgment in that action might be found to be due from defendant Van Ness to the plaintiffs, not exceeding the amount specified in the redelivery bond. By a subsequent amendment the plaintiffs alleged that, owing to the death of the horse, it could not be redelivered, and pleaded the matter contained in the "supplemental answer" as and "for a counterclaim against said Pacific Surety Company."

A general and special demurrer of the Surety Company to the answer, challenging the jurisdiction of the court to grant in that action any relief based on the bond, was overruled, and its motions to strike from the files the supplemental answer to the complaint in intervention, and the amendment thereto, were denied. In a second amended complaint, filed by plaintiffs just prior to the trial of the cause in May, 1900, Van Ness was named as the sole defendant, and the death of the plaintiff Singerly and the appointment of John A. Drinkhouse as his administrator were alleged.

Trial was had with a jury. A large amount of evidence was introduced as to the ownership and value of the horse. At the close of the testimony, the intervenor moved for a nonsuit as against the plaintiffs "upon their cross-complaint" against it, and asked for a directed verdict in favor of the defendant Van Ness upon various grounds. Both motions were denied. The issues were thereupon submitted to the jury, which rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs against the defendant Van Ness for the return of the horse, or $7,500, its value, in case delivery could not be made, and for $7,500 damages for the detention. By the same verdict it also found "against the intervenor, the Pacific Surety Company, a corporation, and in favor of the plaintiffs, upon the bond or undertaking set forth in its complaint in intervention herein in the sum of $15,000, being the aggregate sum recovered against defendant Van Ness, it being impossible to deliver or return the stallion Morello, he having died on November 29, 1896, subsequent to the commencement of the action." The judgment entered followed the findings and verdict of the jury.

The Pacific Surety Company thereupon appealed (S. F. No. 10733) from the judgment against itself and from the judgment rendered against the defendant Van Ness. It also gave notice of its intention to move the court to vacate the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the court in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendant Van Ness, and in favor of the plaintiffs and against itself as intervenor, and to grant a new trial upon statutory grounds, specifying more than 150 particular errors in the admission of evidence and in the charge to the jury alleged to have occurred at the trial, and more than 40 particulars in which the evidence is alleged "to be insufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury." Nearly two years afterwards, on May 1, 1902, the trial court entered the following order:

"In this action the motion for a new trial having been heretofore submitted to the court for consideration and decision and the court having fully considered the same, it is ordered that the said motion be and the same is hereby granted. (Opinion filed.)"

One week later, the following "amended order" was entered:

"In this action it is ordered that the order of May 1, 1902, be and the same is hereby amended to read as follows: Motion of defendant Frank Van Ness for new trial be denied, and motion for new trial of intervenor be granted."

Following the entry of these orders, the Pacific Surety Company appealed from the order of May 1, "as amended by the order * * * denying the motion of the defendant Frank Van Ness for a new trial of said action, and from so much of said orders as may, or may be deemed to, deny the motion of said intervenor on behalf of said defendant for a new trial of said action, or to deny any part of the said motion of said intervenor for a new trial." Although the defendant Van Ness did not appeal, the intervenor asserts that it appealed "in his behalf." The plaintiffs appealed (S. F. No. 3552) from the order of May 1 and from that part of the amended order of May 8 granting a new trial to the intervenor, Pacific Surety Company. By stipulation of the parties, and under an order of this court, all appeals are to be heard and determined on the same points and authorities covering all matters before the court for consideration. As the situation of the parties is changed in their relation to the different appeals before the court, it will be less confusing to retain the designations born in the lower court, to wit, "plaintiffs," "defendant," and "intervenor," or to refer to them by name, rather than to use the usual designations, "appellant" and "respondents."

[1] In view of the several appeals taken, it becomes necessary to first determine the effect of the two orders entered by the trial court in its ruling on the motion for a new trial. If valid, the order of May 8 supersedes the order first made, and is the only order of the court upon the motion for a new trial. Garoutte v. Haley, 104 Cal. 497, 500, 38 P. 194. If the order of May 8 were before us on an appeal on the judgment roll alone, the intendments and presumption of regularity, which lend support to judgments and orders of trial courts under review on appeal, would sustain it, but the matter is before us on a bill of exceptions. It is the contention of the intervenor that when the lower court entered the order of May 1 granting a new trial, it exhausted its power to pass on the motion, and could not thereafter amend, revoke, modify, or otherwise disturb its judgment in that regard. The second order, that of May 8, it contends, was a nullity and in no wise affected the status of the case with respect to the first order which, in general terms, granted the motion for a new trial. The contention must be upheld. United Railroads v. Superior Court, 170 Cal. 755, 760, 151 P. 129, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 199; Holtum v. Greif, 144 Cal. 521, 524, 78 P. 11; Odd Fellows Savings Bank v. Deuprey, 66 Cal. 168, 4 P. 1173. When a motion for a new trial has been made in due form, upon a settled statement, and the court has passed on the motion, the order regularly made is conclusive so far as the court making it is concerned. It cannot afterwards even on motion, vacate the order and decide the matter anew. Coombs v. Hibberd, 43 Cal. 452; Dorland v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 484, 6 P. 135. There are, of course, exceptions to the general rule. An order irregularly made is not subject to it, and may be set aside on a proper showing, if application is made therefor. Holtum v. Greif, supra; Morris v. De Celis, 41 Cal. 331. But it should be first made to affirmatively appear that the order was irregularly or improvidently made. Carpenter v. Superior Court, 75 Cal. 596, 19 P. 174. In this case there is nothing in the record, or on the face of the later order, to impeach the correctness of the order of May 1. No application was made by proceedings under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for relief on the ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, or by a proceeding for an entry nunc pro tunc. Consequently the trial court was without power to change the order on any of those grounds. Frost v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 365, 368, 132 P. 442.

[2] The plaintiffs contend that the order of May 1 was not the one actually made on the motion for a new trial, and that the order of May 8 was undoubtedly made to correctly state the fact. If an order entered is not the order made, the records may be corrected to make the entry speak the truth (Whitney v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 536, 541, 82 P. 37), and the right of the court in this respect is not suspended or impeded by an appeal from the order, nor because the record itself does not show that the entry was incorrect (Biaggi v. Ramont, 189 Cal. 675, 209 P. 892). But the trial court has no authority, under the guise of an amendment, to correct a judicial error, or make of record an order that was never made. Kaufman v. Shain, 111 Cal. 16, 19, 43 P. 393, 52 Am. St. Rep. 139. Yet the record indicates that is precisely what was attempted to be done in the present case. The later order does not purport to correct the entry of the first, neither is there anything on its face or in the record from which it may be gathered that such was its purpose. It stands out clearly as an order purporting to "amend," that is, to change, an order previously made.

Plaintiffs assert that, with "two motions" for a new trial before it, the trial court merely "granted the motion," making its order void for uncertainty; that it was impossible to ascertain therefrom which motion was granted; and "it was therefore the duty of the court of its own motion to so amend its order as to definitely dispose of both motions for a new trial rather than leave it in such uncertainty as to be void on its face, for all parties to the litigation were entitled to have it definitely known whether both motions were granted, or if both were not granted, then which one was granted." The fallacy of this contention lies in the fact that there was but one motion for a new trial, that of the intervener. It alone was "submitted to the court for consideration and decision," and the court, "having fully considered the same," "granted" the motion by an order couched in plain, certain, and unambiguous language. For that reason, therefore, the contention of the plaintiffs that, if the amended order of May 8 is void, the "motions for a new trial" have not been determined and are still pending falls of its own weakness. It therefore follows that the order of May 8, purporting to amend the order granting intervener's motion for a new trial, must be held to be a nullity and effective for no purpose.

[3, 4] This conclusion brings us to the consideration of the correctness and effect of the order of May 1 granting a new trial. The interest of the Pacific Surety Company in the success of the defendant Van Ness was apparent, for the judgment, if any, to be rendered against him would fix its liability upon the redelivery bond. Upon being permitted to intervene, it became a party to the action, "uniting with the defendant" in resisting the claims of the plaintiffs. As such party it was entitled to avail itself of all the procedure and remedies to which the defendant would be entitled for the purpose of defeating the action or resisting the claims of the plaintiffs, including the right of appeal from any judgment against the defendant. People ex rel. Fogg v. Perris Irr. Dist., 132 Cal. 289, 290, 64 P. 399, 773; Boskowitz v. Thompson, 144 Cal. 724, 729, 78 P. 290. It was aggrieved, in the first place, by the judgment against Van Ness (Coburn v. Smart, 53 Cal. 742, 745), and, in the second place, by the judgment against itself on the redelivery bond, and appealed from each. Collateral to the appeal, it sought to have the judgments vacated through the medium of a motion for a new trial. In the notices of motion the intervener placed no limitation as to the issues upon which, or the parties between whom, the motion would be made. It gave notice that it would move the court to vacate the "verdict" and the "judgment," "and to grant a new trial of said action." The order of the court granting the motion was in like general terms. Its effect therefore was to vacate and set aside the verdict and the judgment resting thereon, and, pending a reversal on appeal, to reopen all issues in the case for a retrial. The parties were thereby placed in the position they held before any trial had been had. Kent v. Williams, 146 Cal. 3, 7, 79 P. 527.

[5-7] Little need be said in affirming the action of the lower court in granting a new trial to the intervener. Plaintiffs concede that they could not have joined the surety, in an action upon the redelivery bond, with the defendant Van Ness in the action based upon his tort, yet that is what was actually attempted to be done. Although the pleading filed by the intervener was, as is usual, denominated a "complaint in intervention," it was, in effect, but an answer to the complaint of the plaintiffs. It in no sense constituted the plaintiffs defendants or cross-defendants. Its allegations were deemed controverted by the plaintiffs, under section 462 of the Code of Civil Procedure. People ex rel. Fogg v. Perris Irr. Dist., supra. Consequently the plaintiffs were not in position to interpose a "counterclaim" against the intervener, for a counterclaim "must be one existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff." Code Civ. Proc. §§ 438, 439. It must, in some way, qualify or defeat the judgment to which the plaintiff is otherwise entitled. Meyer v. Quiggle, 140 Cal. 495, 499, 74 P. 40. The trial court, therefore erred in overruling the demurrer interposed by the intervener to the so-called "counterclaim" advanced by the plaintiffs, and in denying intervener's motion for nonsuit as against plaintiffs on the same issue, and its error warranted the granting of a new trial. The granting of the motion was justified for another reason. The liability of the intervener on its undertaking was, by the express terms of the bond, conditioned upon such redelivery being "adjudged." There could be no breach of the condition to deliver the property to the plaintiffs, in case return thereof should be awarded, until a judgment or an order was entered for a return. 34 Cyc. 1576; Wells on Replevin, § 430; Cobbey on Replevin, § 1311. See, also, Mitchum v. Stanton, 49 Cal. 302. Therefore, the attempt to recover on the redelivery bond in the action for the recovery of the horse was premature, and no cause of action was stated. Plaintiffs contend that, because the intervener "injected itself into the litigation * * * and the trial court * * * in the exercise of its general jurisdiction, had the power to entertain and decide such a suit [on the redelivery bond] when properly commenced, based on the judgment against Van Ness," it should not be held reversible error "because the court did in this action what it would have been compelled to do if a separate action had been commenced by the plaintiffs against the intervener upon the bond." The contention does not require further consideration.

[8] We are now brought to a consideration of the appeal of the plaintiffs (No. 3552) from the order of May 1 granting a new trial of the action. The intervener, now the respondent, takes the position that the plaintiffs failed to establish their right to institute and maintain the action, for which reason it contends the motion was properly granted. Briefly, its contentions are that the evidence was insufficient to show a wrongful taking; that there was no proof of a demand made on the defendants before suit was begun; and that it was shown that a partnership existed between the plaintiffs and defendant Van Ness for raising, handling, and maintaining the horse, which was a part of the capital of the partnership, of which there had been no dissolution or a final accounting. As to the necessity of proof of a demand for the return of the horse, the evidence clearly indicates that the possession of the defendant Chase was but the possession of the defendant Van Ness. A demand was made on Van Ness by the attorney for the plaintiffs, and on their behalf, before the action was begun. Had that not been done, it would not have availed the defendants. The defendant Van Ness in his answer set up ownership and right of possession in himself, which rendered proof of demand unnecessary. 5 Cal. Jur. 169.

[9, 10] We are of the view that the evidence warranted the finding of the jury and the judgment that the plaintiffs were the owners of Morello, and that no partnership in the horse existed between them and the defendant Van Ness. Taking the documentary evidence and the oral testimony of the parties as a whole, there are some conflicts, but the purport of it is that, in 1892, the horse, then 2 years old, was purchased by or through defendant Van Ness, who immediately transferred a half interest in the animal to plaintiff Singlerly for the sum of $2,250, executing a receipt for the amount as "a bill of sale." At or about the same time, by another bill of sale, he transferred the other one-half interest in the horse to the plaintiff Lammertz for a like amount, "and $250 on said colt's first winnings." The fact is that Van Ness bought the horse with the money of the two plaintiffs, and never had or retained any interest whatever in the animal. Neither Singlerly nor Lammertz knew of the interest of the other in the horse, but each supposed that Van Ness and he owned Morello. Laboring under such misapprehension, the owners permitted Van Ness to train and handle the horse for racing, and later for breeding purposes, on the basis of equally sharing the expenses and dividing the profits. Morello was a success both as a race horse and as a sire of colts, and Van Ness paid to each of the plaintiffs, while he was handling the horse something like $20,000 as his share of the earnings. It appears that Van Ness was able to successfully carry out his deceit concerning the ownership of the horse until the two owners discovered the real facts shortly before the commencement of the replevin suit. There was, it is true, the arrangement between the three parties (its exact details unknown to the owners) for the racing, handling, and maintenance of the horse, but the record is devoid of any evidence to support the contention that any partnership in the ownership of the horse existed. Its earnings actually belonged to the plaintiffs. The expenses were paid out of the earnings. The arrangement was one by which Van Ness was an employee of the plaintiffs, his compensation being one-half of the net proceeds derived from the use of the horse. Under the facts here disclosed, the owners had the undoubted right to terminate the arrangement at will. They were certainly justified in doing so on learning of the true relation they bore to each other and to Van Ness, and in demanding and taking possession. The question of any accounting of the earnings of the horse cannot enter into this action to recover possession. The defendant Van Ness did not claim a partnership existed. His line of defense was that he was the sole owner of the horse, that the interest of the plaintiffs was merely that of lienholders, and that the debt secured by such liens had been paid. The evidence supports the finding of the jury and the judgment as to these contentions, and establishes that the taking was wrongful.

[11] This action being one in replevin, the plaintiffs were entitled to a judgment for the value of the horse, not as damages for its conversion, but as a substitute for and in lieu of the property, and were, in addition, entitled to a judgment for damages for the taking and withholding of the property. Nahhas v. Browning, 181 Cal. 55, 57, 183 P. 442, 6 A. L. R. 476. They introduced much evidence for the purpose of establishing the value of the horse at the time of the wrongful taking, and the court instructed the jury that in case it found for the plaintiffs it must, in fixing damages, find the value at that time and award that amount to the plaintiffs. The jury followed the instructions, and returned a verdict for the plaintiffs and against the defendant Van Ness for the return of the horse, or, if a return could not be had, then for the value at the time of the taking, which value it found to be $7,500. The intervenor contends that the value of the horse should have been assessed as of the time of the trial, and not as of the time of the wrongful taking, citing a number of authorities which support the contention. Phillips v. Sutherland, 2 Cal. Unrep. 241, 2 P. 32; Nelson v. Yonge, 73 Cal. App. 704, 710, 239 P. 67; Gray v. Robinson, 4 Ariz. 24, 33 P. 712; Gardner v. Brown, 22 Nev. 156, 158, 37 P. 240. In Phillips v. Sutherland, supra, the court said:

"If plaintiff recover in such an action [replevin], he is entitled primarily to the very property, and the value which he is to receive, instead of the property, is the value as of the day of trial."

There are decisions from other jurisdictions holding a directly contrary view. See 42 Am. Dig. (Cent. Ed.) p. 2447, § 420 et seq. There is considerable divergence in the decisions as respects the time at which the value of the property should be assessed, and this is due largely to the difference in the statutes. 34 Cyc. 1570. The general rule in replevin is, according to the editors of Ruling Case Law, that the damages will be the value of the property at the time of taking, with interest from that time; "but," they say, "a number of well reasoned cases support the rule that the value to be assessed is the value at the time of the trial." Vol. 23, p. 914. "The proper rule * * * is to assess the value at the date of the wrongful taking. * * * The right of a party in replevin depends upon his right to possession at the time of commencement of the action and damages can only be given for interference with that possession." Cobbey on Replevin, p. 507. But assuming that the general rule in this state is as laid down in Phillips v. Sutherland, supra, and Nelson v. Yonge, supra, it can apply only when the property sought to be recovered is in existence at the time of the trial. If it is not in existence at that time, it is impossible to assess its value as of that date.

[12] In the present case, the horse, the subject of the action, was dead when the cause came on for trial, and, of course, had no value. Notwithstanding that fact, the defendant Van Ness and his surety, the intervenor Pacific Surety Company, are liable to the plaintiffs on the redelivery bond for the value of the horse. Jacobs v. Walker, 90 Okl. 209, 216 P. 935, 31 A. L. R. 1287. The measure of recovery by the plaintiffs was not affected by the death of the property in suit in the hands of the defendant, whether by accident or through the fault of the latter. 34 Cyc. 1567; Wells on Replevin, §§ 600, 601; Hinkson v. Morrison, 47 Iowa, 167. The decided weight of authority appears to be to the effect that neither a plaintiff in replevin who has given a bond and taken property, nor a defendant who, by giving bond, has retained or repossessed himself of the property, is relieved of liability therefor under his bond by its loss or destruction while in his possession pending the action. De Thomas v. Witherby, 61 Cal. 92, 97, 44 Am. Rep. 542; Three States Lumber Co. v. Blank (C. C. A.) 133 F. 479, 69 L. R. A. 283, and note. In De Thomas v. Witherby, supra, this court said (p. 99):

"To permit a defendant who wrongfully takes possession, to claim that he holds it at the risk of the real owner, and not at his own, and claim immunity for accident, would be unjust in the extreme. The wrongful taker of property, when called upon to surrender it to the rightful owner or pay the value, cannot defend himself from judgment by showing his inability to deliver it through death or otherwise."

It was, therefore, proper, in this case, for the court to admit the evidence complained of, and to instruct the jury to assess the value of the horse as of the date of the wrongful detention, in case it should find for the plaintiffs. Its further instruction, that the fact that the horse died after the action was begun was no defense to the action, was also proper.

It was alleged in the complaint that the defendants unlawfully held and detained the horse from the possession of plaintiffs, to their damage in the sum of $10,000, the value of the property, "and the further sum of $10,000 damages for the detention thereof." There are no allegations of special damage. In addition to assessing the value of the horse at $7,500 at the time of the taking, the jury also found for the plaintiffs "for the sum of $7,500 damages for the taking and detention." Over repeated objections of the intervener that the plaintiffs were seeking to introduce evidence outside the issues, the trial court admitted much documentary evidence and oral testimony. A compilation prepared from Goodwin's Turf Guide, devoted to giving the results of horse races, was admitted, from which it appeared that Morello had won more than $80,000 as a race horse, and had sired many colts which, in turn, had won much money on the track. No objection was offered to the compilation instead of the Guide, but the introduction of the evidence was objected to on the ground that it did not tend to prove any issue in the case, "there being no allegation of special damage for money lost by reason of the racing qualities of the horse." Evidence of witnesses as to the character and performance of the various colts was also objected to as not within the issues made by the pleadings, and as calling for an opinion or estimate of the value of the horse for special purposes, and for damages special in their nature and not alleged in the complaint. In connection with this evidence and testimony, the plaintiffs, by way of a stipulation, admitted that at the time of the taking in January, 1896, the horse was not used or useful for race horse purposes because of a defect in one of his hoofs or legs, due to his breaking down on the race track, and was at that time used only for the purpose of siring. It was also admitted that, as the plaintiffs did not own the colts, they did not claim to have been damaged by reason of any money won by the progeny. Over the same objection, that it tended to prove a special element of damage not pleaded, evidence was introduced as to the value of the use of Morello for breeding purposes "at the time of the supposed conversion, or during the supposed period of detention."

[13-15] It is, of course, the rule that such damages as do not ordinarily arise from the breach complained of, but depend upon the peculiar circumstances of the case, are special damages, which must be pleaded. Berry v. Bank of Bakersfield, 177 Cal. 206, 210, 170 P. 415. In Stevenson v. Smith, 28 Cal. 102, 87 Am. Dec. 107, the plaintiff in an action for the recovery of a mare and colt sought, under a general allegation of damage, to recover for the loss arising from the act of the defendants in giving the animals poor pasturage, and the further circumstance that the mare was a brood mare and, by the detention, the breeding season was lost. Commenting on that case, the court in Berry v. Bank of Bakersfield, supra, said:

"It was very properly held that the first of these items did not result from the detention itself, but from the improper conduct of the defendants in keeping the animals, while the second item depended upon the extraordinary value of the animal for a particular purpose. These items, therefore, were not embraced within an allegation of general damage."

While not disputing the force of the rule contended for by the intervener, we are not prepared to say that the admission of the evidence objected to warranted the granting of a new trial. We are of the view that it does not warrant a reversal of the judgment. Since the trial of this case in the court below, and pending the submission of the appeal, the constitutional provision (section 4½, art. 6) has been adopted, greatly extending the powers of this court to consider the evidence in passing on alleged errors relied upon for a reversal of a judgment. After our examination of this entire cause, including the evidence, we are satisfied that the error in the admission of the evidence complained of did not result in a miscarriage of justice. The stipulation or admission of the plaintiffs, that, at the time of the taking of Morello by the defendants, the horse was no longer fit for racing purposes, entirely removed from the consideration of the jurors any possible claim that the horse longer had any value for such purposes. Furthermore, and notwithstanding the previous objection to their introduction, we find that, by stipulation of the parties, the books, "Goodwin's Turf Guide," were admitted in evidence "for all purposes."

[16, 17] Aside from these considerations, the testimony and evidence as to the racing history of Morello and as to the character of the progeny and their racing ability tended to establish the worth of the horse as a sire of colts, the only purpose for which, the admission of the plaintiffs and the intimate knowledge of all those connected with the action showed, the horse was fitted at the time of the taking. It tended to fix the peculiar value of the horse as a sire of valuable racing stock. The horse undoubtedly had such a peculiar value to the plaintiffs, and the defendants had intimate and full knowledge of such fact, for Van Ness had been handling the horse for the very use that gave it that peculiar value. Such value was therefore "deemed to be its value" against the defendants (Civ. Code, § 3355), and the court properly so instructed the jury. This was the theory accepted by the trial court, for, while there was a wide divergence in the testimony as to the value of Morello, varying, according to the estimates of the witnesses, from a few hundreds to many thousands of dollars, the court instructed the jury that it should assess the value "at the reasonable market value of the horse at the time of the taking * * * what the horse could have reasonably been sold for as a stallion for breeding purposes, to a person who wanted him for that purpose, if he was offered for sale in the open market." In view of the evidence and the instruction, we cannot say that the amount arrived at by the jury was not proper.

[18] Ordinarily, in replevin, loss of use and other injuries resulting from the taking and withholding of personal property may be compensated by allowing the successful party to recover interest on the value of the property from the time of the taking to the date of the verdict. However, he is not confined to interest as damages, if he can establish the fact that the value of the use of the property of which he was deprived exceeded the interest. Where the property has such a usable value, he is entitled to recover as damages for the detention the reasonable value of such use during the period he was wrongfully deprived thereof up to the time of the rendition of the judgment. Nabhas v. Browning, supra. The reasons for this rule are clearly stated in California Jurisprudence, Volume 5, p. 208. By depriving the plaintiffs of the possession of Morello, the defendant Van Ness prevented them from obtaining any earnings from him as a sire of colts. Evidence was introduced by both sides as to the physical condition of the horse and his soundness and health at the time of the commencement of the action. While the evidence was contradictory, there is much in the record from which we may conclude that the jury was warranted in finding that, at the time, the horse was in good health and physical condition, and in every way fitted for use as a stud for breeding purposes, and that he was in good condition and in the best of health at the time he was repossessed by Van Ness under the redelivery bond. The stallion was then about 6 years old, and there was testimony that he might reasonably be expected to be good as a sire until he was 18 or 20 years old. The case was tried more than 4 years after the taking, and the evidence was to the effect that the reasonable value of his services during that period would have been from $4,500 to $6,000 per year.

[19] Evidence was admitted, over the objection of intervenor, as to expenses incurred by plaintiffs in pursuit of and for locating the horse prior to the commencement of the action, including $500 for the services of an attorney in that regard. Plaintiffs admit that the admission of the testimony constituted error, but contend that "the items were small, and apparently the jury gave no consideration thereto." The testimony was that such expenses amounted to nearly $1,000, including the services of the attorney. The court instructed the jurors that:

They "must allow the plaintiffs as damages for the taking a fair compensation for the time and money properly expended in the pursuit of the horse."

The award for damages is not segregated as to the items allowed, but is for a lump sum. Therefore, we cannot say in view of the large amount of the special damages fixed by the jury, that the evidence was not considered. It appears to be the practice in this court not to reverse judgments improperly allowing counsel fees incurred for the "pursuit of the property" for such error alone, but to direct a modification of the judgment by deleting therefrom the amount allowed. Hays v. Windsor, 130 Cal. 230, 236, 62 P. 395; Harris v. Smith, 132 Cal. 316, 319, 64 P. 409. In this case the amounts claimed to have been so spent were, no doubt, definitely fixed in the minds of the jurors and, in view of the court's instruction, we may safely assume that they included the entire amount of the $500 attorney's fees in their award of damages. For that reason the judgment against the defendant should be reduced by that amount.

[20] Another contention of the intervenor is that the defendants Van Ness and Chase were joint tort-feasors, and that, by their voluntary dismissal of the defendant Chase, the plaintiffs released the defendant Van Ness as well. The action was dismissed as to Chase "without costs to either plaintiffs or said defendant," pursuant to an agreement between the plaintiffs and Chase, by which the plaintiffs released him "from all claims and demands of whatsoever nature and description," excepting claims for moneys collected by Chase from third parties for the use of the stallion. Chase, in like terms, released the plaintiffs, the consideration of the agreement being the "mutual release of all claims" each to the other. Chase testified that he did not receive anything or pay anything for executing the release; that at the time it was executed he had no claim against the horse; that the plaintiffs had no claim against him; and that the release was executed to relieve him of costs in the suit. The question whether Chase was a joint tort-feasor with Van Ness had not been determined. On the evidence subsequently admitted it would appear that he was not. The plaintiffs received nothing from Chase. Nothing which he did amounted to or was received as a satisfaction of the claim. The plaintiffs were not paid for the loss and injury they had suffered. There was nothing, as we view it, in the transaction between the plaintiffs and Chase, relating to or included in the dismissal, that amounted to a retraxit. Under a proper instruction on the subject, the jury reached the same conclusion.

[21, 22] Complaint is made by the intervenor about certain instructions given to the jury. It is contended that certain portions of the charge assumed a "wrongful taking" of the horse. Read in their severalty they might have that effect, but the charge as a whole correctly submitted to the jury the question whether there was a taking, and, if there was, whether it was wrongful. The instruction that it required proof of the existence of a copartnership between plaintiff Singlerly and defendant Van Ness to the "satisfaction" of the jury "by a preponderance of the evidence" should have been followed by a further instruction defining what is meant by preponderance of the evidence, and that such preponderance would be sufficient to justify a finding in favor of the party having the burden of proof. Boa v. S. F., etc., Terminal Rys., 182 Cal. 93, 187 P. 2; Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Paraffine Paint Co., 188 Cal. 184, 195, 204 P. 1076. But, as the defendant Van Ness himself repudiated any claim of partnership, and as the evidence would not have supported a finding that there was a partnership, the giving of the instruction cannot be held to have been prejudicial error. Other contentions concerning the giving and refusal of instructions are answered by our discussion and conclusion on the matters already considered.

The order of the trial court granting the motion for a new trial is affirmed as to the intervenor Pacific Surety Company and reversed as to the defendant Van Ness.

The trial court is directed to modify the judgment appealed from by reducing the amount of the damage awarded for the wrongful detention of the horse to $7,000, and as thus modified the judgment shall stand affirmed as to the defendant Van Ness, to wit, for the sum of $14,500.

202 Cal. 394

WEHLE v. PRICE et ux. (S. F. 11638.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 31, 1927.

1. Mortgages ☞32(3)—Deed, absolute in form, if intended merely as security for payment of debt, will be held mortgage (Civ. Code, §§ 2924, 2925).

Rule is well settled that deed, absolute in form, if intended as security for payment of debt, is, under Civ. Code, §§ 2924, 2925, merely mortgage.

2. Appeal and error ☞1010(1)—Court's findings, supported by proper evidence on question whether deed, absolute in form, is in fact mortgage, will not be disturbed.

Question whether deed, absolute in form, is in fact mortgage is primarily question of fact upon which findings of trial court, supported by proper evidence, will not be disturbed, even though testimony is conflicting.

3. Mortgages ☞38(1)—Findings that deed, absolute in form, constituted purchase and not mere security for loan, held sustained by evidence in action to quiet title.

In action to quiet title, evidence showing grantor conveyed property by deed, absolute in form, in order to raise money to pay fine, and that grantee executed deed for reconveyance to be held in escrow, held to sustain findings that transaction constituted purchase and not mere security for note, where amount paid was found not disproportionate to value.

4. Mortgages ☞36—Presumption is that deed, absolute in form, constitutes actual conveyance, and burden is upon party claiming instrument is mortgage.

Presumption is that deed, absolute on its face, is what it purports to be, and burden of proof is upon party claiming deed constitutes merely mortgage.

5. Mortgages ☞32(2)—Deed, absolute in form, will not be held mortgage unless it appears that all parties intended it as security.

In order to hold deed, absolute in form, merely mortgage, it must appear to court beyond all reasonable controversy, that all parties to transaction intended deed should be given merely for security.

6. Judgment ☞747(1)—Judgment in ejectment by grantee against grantor held res judicata of question of title in grantor's action to have deed declared mortgage and to quiet title.

In action by grantor to have deed, absolute in form, declared mortgage, and to quiet his title, judgment previously obtained in ejectment action by grantee against grantor barring grantor from all claim to title to premises, held res judicata of question of title.

7. Judgment ☞743(2)—Decision as to title following assertion of right to possession becomes res judicata to extent that determination was essential to judgment.

Where title is alleged by either party as basis of his right to possession, judgment becomes res judicata to extent that adjudication of title was essential to judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Reinhold Wehle against Walter F. Price and wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. Quackenbush, of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

W. F. Cowan and H. W. A. Weske, both of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. Plaintiff and appellant seeks by this action to have a deed executed by him to defendant Walter F. Price declared to be a mortgage, and to quiet his title to the land described therein.

The complaint alleges plaintiff's ownership of certain real property valued at $8,000; that about December 3, 1923, as security for an interest-bearing note of $900, he executed a deed of grant, purporting to convey said property to defendant Price, but that at said time it was understood by both parties that the deed was given as security for a $900 loan, and upon repayment of said sum said defendant should reconvey the premises to plaintiff. It further alleges that about July 11, 1924, defendant commenced an action in ejectment against plaintiff, and on August 22, 1924, secured judgment by default in his favor.

Defendants, answering, deny that said deed constituted a mortgage. By way of separate defense they plead that the judgment in the prior action in ejectment between the same parties constitutes a bar to this action, and by way of cross-complaint they ask that plaintiff be enjoined from asserting any claim to the lands in question and that their title thereto be quieted. From judgment in their favor plaintiff prosecutes this appeal, urging that the facts indicate that the conveyance in question was intended by the parties as a mortgage and that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and judgment.

The facts and circumstances surrounding the execution of the deed appear to be substantially as follows: Plaintiff was endeavoring to raise $700 to pay a fine imposed upon him for violation of the Volstead Act (27 USCA). He consulted defendant Price, who, after securing for him an extension of ten days within which to pay said fine, advised him to secure a loan from the Bank of Italy, where he had already borrowed $2,600, or from some other bank, or from his friends. After expiration of the ten-day period plaintiff again consulted defendant, stating that his efforts to raise money had been unsuccessful, and asking if defendant would not let him have the money and take a second mortgage upon his property. Defendant refused to do this, but finally stated that he would take plaintiff's property for $700, giving him the privilege of buying it back at any time within six months for $900, plaintiff to pay interest on that sum and all interest due the bank. Pursuant to this agreement, an attorney satisfactory to plaintiff prepared a grant, bargain, and sale deed from plaintiff to defendant, which recited a consideration of $900 and was subject to the $2,600 mortgage. Defendant then executed a grant, bargain, and sale deed back to plaintiff as grantee and an escrow agreement reciting the terms and conditions of purchase, which documents, together with escrow instructions, were delivered to the Bank of Italy. Upon verbal agreement of the parties, plaintiff remained in possession of the premises during the period within which he could repurchase the property. Upon his failure to comply with the terms of the escrow agreement, and after due notice, defendant demanded that he vacate the premises, whereupon, after his failure to so vacate, defendant instituted an action in ejectment against him, securing judgment by default. Within two or three weeks after making said deed, plaintiff was again arrested for violation of the Volstead Act, and in order to raise bail placed what purported to be a third mortgage of $1,250 on the property. Both parties claim to have paid and evidently did pay the second installment of taxes for the year 1924.

[1-3] The courts have been watchful against all schemes of money lenders to deprive unfortunate debtors of their lands at less than their true value under the claim that the transaction is a purchase and not a loan, and the rule is well settled that a deed absolute in form, if intended as security for the payment of a debt, is a mortgage. Civ. Code, §§ 2924, 2925; 17 Cal. Jur. § 41, p. 735 et seq. The question is primarily one of fact, upon which the findings of the trial court, if supported by proper evidence, will not be disturbed, notwithstanding conflict in the testimony. 17 Cal. Jur. § 59, p. 758 et seq. Here there is ample evidence to support each and every one of the findings, and we hold them to be binding and conclusive.

[4, 5] It is apparent from the record that the evidence falls far short of those requirements necessary to justify the overthrow of a deed absolute on its face, for the presumption is that such a deed is what it purports to be, and the burden of proof is upon the party claiming that it is only a mortgage. It must appear to the court beyond all reasonable controversy that it was the intention of not only one, but all, of the parties, that the deed should be a mortgage. "A mere secret intention on the part of one of the parties, not disclosed or communicated to the other, will not have the effect of changing the character of the transaction. Still less, of course, will this result where the parties testify to directly contradictory intentions." 41 Corpus Juris, pp. 331, 332, § 96. The evidence must be "something more than that modicum of evidence which appellate courts hold sufficient to warrant a finding where the matter is not so serious as the overthrow of a clearly expressed deed, solemnly executed and delivered. The evidence must be clear, satisfactory and convincing; explicit, unequivocal and indisputable. * * *" 17 Cal. Jur. § 58, p. 756 et seq.

The testimony relative to value of the real estate is in direct conflict. Against a value of from $8,500 to $10,000 placed upon it by plaintiff, defendant estimated that it was worth not to exceed $4,500. Other evidence tends to establish the correctness of the latter figure, for instance, the refusal of the Bank of Italy or other banks to loan more than $3,000 on the property or to take a second mortgage, and the fact that plaintiff for tax assessment purposes during 1923 gave the value of the real estate as $750 and improvements $450, a total of $1,200, which probably represented from 30 to 40 per cent. of its actual value. At any rate, the court found that the lands and premises did not exceed in value the sum of $4,500. This finding is binding upon us and obliterates the contention that the great disparity in value between the property conveyed by plaintiff and the money paid to him establishes the fact that a mortgage and not an actual sale was contemplated by the parties.

Although the complaint alleges that the deed was given by plaintiff as security for an interest-bearing note, no such note was produced, and the court found that as a matter of fact none was ever executed. Furthermore, defendant testified, and his testimony is corroborated by that of the attorney and another witness, that he specifically stated at the time of this transaction that he was no more willing to accept a mortgage than the banks were, and that the only condition upon which he would advance money to plaintiff was that of conditional sale of the land to him, plaintiff having the privilege of repurchase within a specified time. Apparently both plaintiff and his attorney thoroughly understood the situation.

[6] We further hold that plaintiff's action is estopped by the prior judgment in ejectment obtained against him, which established defendant's title to the property. The judgment roll in said action appears in the record as Defendant's Exhibit 2. The complaint alleges plaintiff's (defendant here) ownership of the premises in question, and their wrongful possession by defendant (plaintiff here). The court found that plaintiff was the owner in fee and entitled to possession of the premises and adjudged "(1) that the plaintiff is the owner in fee simple and entitled to the possession of the premises described in the complaint and situate [description] * * * and that he have and recover the possession thereof," and "(3) that the defendant, together with all persons claiming under him, shall be forever barred of a recovery of said premises and all claim of title thereto, and the title to said premises is absolutely vested in the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff be not molested in the possession of said premises by the defendant, or by any person claiming under said defendant."

[7] As said in Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) vol. 2, §§ 866, 867, pp. 1830-1832:

"Primarily an action of ejectment or its equivalent or substitute action under the statute or Code is possessory in its nature. It may, however, and frequently does become the means of trying title, since either party may base his right to possession entirely upon some claim of title. * * * Where title was alleged by either party as the basis of his right to possession the judgment becomes res judicata to the extent that an adjudication of it was essential to the judgment, but not otherwise (citing Lantz v. Cole, 172 Cal. 245, 156 P. 45; Miles v. Ryan, 172 Cal. 205, 157 P. 5; Cassin v. Nicholson, 154 Cal. 497, 98 P. 190; McLean v. Baldwin, 136 Cal. 565, 69 P. 259; Graves v. Hebbron, 125 Cal. 400, 58 P. 12; Breon v. Robrecht, 118 Cal. 469, 50 P. 689, 51 P. 33 [62 Am. St. Rep. 247]; Carpenter v. Natoma Water & Min. Co., 63 Cal. 616; Valentine v. Mahoney, 37 Cal. 389; Simon v. McCoy, 28 Cal. App. 523, 153 P. 406). * * * Where both title and right of possession are in issue and determined, the judgment is conclusive as to both. Title is put in issue by an allegation of ownership in fee simple. * * *

In the case of Avery v. Superior Court, 57 Cal. 247, in an action for mesne profits, after a judgment in ejectment, the court said:

"The title to the land was put in issue in the pleadings, and the judgment in the action of ejectment established Avery's title to the land. * * *

Graves v. Hebbron, 125 Cal. 400, 58 P. 12, was an action to quiet title brought by a patentee of a quarter section of land against a patentee of adjoining land involving the location of the common boundary line. A former judgment in an action of ejectment brought by the defendant against the plaintiff settling the location of said boundary line in favor of defendant was held to be admissible against the plaintiff as a former adjudication of the subject-matter.

In the case of Breon v. Robrecht, 118 Cal. 469, 50 P. 689, 51 P. 33, 62 Am. St. Rep. 247, the court, quoting with approval Marshall v. Shafter, 32 Cal. 177, said:

"If the respective titles of the parties, or their right to the possession of the demanded premises, are put in issue and tried in ejectment, and the plaintiff recovers judgment for possession, the judgment is an estoppel, and the defendant, to avoid the estoppel in a subsequent action to recover the same premises, must show some other right of possession than he had when the judgment was entered.' In Byers v. Neal [43 Cal. 210] supra, it was declared that 'a judgment for plaintiff in ejectment, when the title has been brought directly in issue, concludes the defendant against setting up in a subsequent proceeding any mere legal defense which he might have made in such suit. * * *'"

See, also, Parnell v. Hahn, 61 Cal. 131, Philbrook v. Newman, 148 Cal. 172, 82 P. 772, and Price v. Sixth District (Cal. Sup.) 258 P. 387, to the effect that a judgment is conclusive upon all questions involved in an action and upon matters which, under the issues, might have been litigated and decided in the case.

Judgment affirmed.

WARFIELD v. ANGLO & LONDON PARIS NAT. BANK et al. (S. F. 11641.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 31, 1927.

1. Evidence ⇨18—Court may judicially notice that municipal securities bearing usual rate could not be marketed at par during and after war in large quantities.

Where a taxpayer of a city and county brought suit against the buyers of municipal bonds for additional payment therefor upon the ground that they had been unlawfully sold at too low a price, held that court may judicially notice that municipal securities bearing the usual rate could not be marketed at par during and after the war in large quantities.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨999—Act of officials estopping municipality from asserting right to rescind bond sale held to estop taxpayer.

Where, in a taxpayer's action to recover for the city and county money claimed to be due because of municipal bonds having been purchased by defendant at an unlawfully low price, it was shown that the actions of the mayor, the board of supervisors, and the grand jury were such as to approve, expressly or impliedly, the purchase and sale so that the municipality would have been estopped to assert a right to rescind the contract, held that such facts estopped the taxpayer.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨1000(1)—Municipality's delay of three years without asserting rights relative to bond sales, where purchaser had changed position, held to bar taxpayer's suit.

Where during the three years following the sale by city and county of municipal bonds, neither the city nor county had asserted rights on such sale contract against the buyer so that the buyers had changed position because of such purchase, such delay, being sufficient laches to bar the municipality from suing, held to bar the taxpayer's suit.

4. Municipal corporations ⇨1000(1)—More than ordinary promptness is required of taxpayer seeking to rescind bond sale.

In taxpayer's action, brought three years after a municipality had sold bonds to defendant, relative to the municipality's rights under such transaction, held that more than ordinary promptness is required of one seeking to rescind a contract where the property is of a speculative or fluctuating character.

5. Equity ⇨65(1)—Where, in taxpayer's action to recover from buyer of municipal bonds difference between purchase price and par value, complaint showed buyer's good faith, "clean hands" doctrine held not to defeat defense of laches.

Where, in a taxpayer's action to recover additional money from the buyer of municipal bonds on the ground that the buyer had unlawfully purchased such securities at too low a price, the complaint showed the buyer's good faith, held that to meet the claim of laches raised by the defendants the plaintiff could not avail himself of the "clean hands" doctrine; such doctrine having no application.

6. Municipal corporations ⇨1000(1)—Defense of laches in taxpayer's action to recover from buyer of municipal bonds difference between purchase price and par value held properly raised by demurrer.

In a taxpayer's action brought three years after sale of municipal bonds to recover from the purchaser thereof money which he claimed was owing to the municipality because of such bonds having been purchased at too low a price, defense of laches held properly raised by demurrer.

7. Equity ⇨87(2)—Laches doctrine is not dependent upon a delay sufficient to make statute of limitations operative.

The application of the doctrine of laches is not dependent upon a delay of sufficient duration to call into operation the statute of limitations.

8. Constitutional law ⇨143—Municipal corporations ⇨907—Charter amendment authorizing sale of bonds previously voted at less than par did not impair contract obligation or invade taxpayers' rights (Const. art. 11, § 8; St. 1921, p. 1786).

Where city and county voted bonds by a two-thirds vote as required, and the charter provided that such bonds could not be sold below a certain price, a change in the charter (St. 1921, p. 1786), made by a majority vote as provided by Const. art. 11, § 8, after the bonds were issued, authorizing sale of such bonds at less than par, was not impairment of obligation of contract or invasion of elector's rights.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Taxpayer's action by Henry Warfield, suing as a taxpayer of the city and county of San Francisco, against the Anglo & London Paris National Bank and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. W. Hutton, of San Francisco, for appellant.

McKinstry, Haber & Firebaugh, of San Francisco, for respondent Anglo & London Paris Nat. Bank.

William F. Humphrey and Robert Mack Light, both of San Francisco, for respondent Construction Co. of North America.

Robert M. Searls, Sp. Counsel, and George Lull, City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent City and County of San Francisco.

LANGDON, J. This is an action brought by a taxpayer of the city and county of San Francisco, on behalf of said municipal corporation, to compel the defendants, other than the municipal corporation, to pay into the treasury of the municipality $2,888,537 because of their purchase from the city and county of San Francisco of certain bonds known as "water bonds," of the par value of $21,826,000, for a purchase price of $18,937,463 at a public sale, held on or about August 1, 1921. The contention of appellant is that the sale was illegally made, and that the defendants have converted the bonds and should be liable for their par value. In reaching this conclusion, appellant urges a construction of the law governing the sale of these bonds, which would have prevented their sale at the date named, when the bond market was depressed, and also urges that a charter amendment permitting the sale of the bonds below par was unconstitutional. While the questions raised by these contentions are very interesting and intricate, we are of the opinion that it is unnecessary to determine them upon this appeal, because of our concurrence in the view of the learned trial judge that the complaint shows on its face such a delay in the enforcement of the asserted claim as to amount to laches and bar the right of recovery, if it ever existed.

After alleging that the plaintiff was a citizen, resident, and taxpayer in the city and county of San Francisco, Cal., at the time of the sale of said bonds and, thereafter, until the date of the action, July, 1924, the incorporation of the defendants and the fact that the city and county of San Francisco had refused to join as plaintiff and was made a defendant because of that fact, plaintiff alleged:

"That on the 14th day of January, 1910, the qualified electors of the said city and county of San Francisco, by a vote of more than two-thirds of those voting thereon, voted in the affirmative to issue bonds in amount of $45,000,000 for the purpose of furnishing money to construct a water supply system for the people of said San Francisco, which said system is commonly known as the 'Hetch Hetchy' system, and thereafter such bonds were executed in proper form, and in denominations of $1,000 each, and were designated and known as 'water bonds' and each of said bonds was dated July 1, 1910, the aggregate amount of such bonds of said denomination and value being the said sum of $45,000,000. And upon such execution of said bonds, they were deposited in the treasury of the city and county of San Francisco, to be sold by the Board of Supervisors of said City and County of San Francisco from time to time as money was needed to pay for the work of the construction of said water supply system as such work progressed.

"That during the year 1920, the said city and county of San Francisco determined to construct an adequate part of said water supply system and thereupon it entered into a contract in writing with defendant Construction Company of North America, said contract being numbered 77c, and in and by said contract the said city and county of San Francisco agreed to pay for all of the labor and material performed and used in the work of the construction of said aqueduct, and it hired and employed said defendant Construction Company of North America, to superintend and manage said work of said construction for it, for a percentage of the total cost of said work which was estimated to be the sum of $8,000,000, and there was thereupon set aside by said city and county of San Francisco, from the water bonds hereinbefore mentioned, bonds in amount of $8,000,000 to pay for the said work, and in and by said contract the said Construction Company of North America agreed to purchase sufficient of said bonds at par plus accrued interest at the commencement of each fiscal year while said work was progressing to pay for the work that would be done on said aqueduct during said fiscal year according to the estimate for such work that should be made by the city engineer of said San Francisco prior to the commencement of such fiscal year, and said Construction Company of North America commenced such work of superintendence during the said year 1920, and was in the employ of the said city and county of San Francisco during all of the times hereinafter stated.

"That on or about the 13th day of May, 1921, M. M. O'Shaughnessy, who was then and there the regularly appointed qualified and acting city engineer of the city and county of San Francisco, made an estimate of the amount of said bonds it would be necessary to sell to carry on the work of constructing said Hetch Hetchy water project for the fiscal year 1921, 1922, which estimate was the sum of $4,000,000, and in said estimate computed that the amount of said bonds that it would be necessary to sell to carry on the work of said aqueduct under said contract 77c, was the sum of $2,750,000, and communicated such estimate to the board of supervisors of the said city and county of San Francisco, on or about said date.

"That on the 1st day of July, 1921, the said city and county of San Francisco had in its treasury or in banks for it available for the work of the construction of said water project, including the said aqueduct, all the proceeds of the sale of said water bonds or from income derived from operating parts of said project the sum of about $6,479,677.29, without the sale of any of the bonds so estimated by said city engineer as necessary to be sold, and the expenditures for the whole of said water project, to wit, its construction including the amounts expended under contract 77c for the fiscal year 1921, 1922, was the sum of $6,681,580.04, which was expended in average monthly amounts during said fiscal year, and the purchase of said water bonds in amount $2,750,000 by defendant Construction Company of North America would have left in the treasury of said city and county of San Francisco the sum of $2,548,097.20 or thereabouts available for the construction of said water project on the 1st day of July, 1922.

"That for some two or three years prior to the 1st day of August, 1921, the value of bonds of every description throughout the United States was temporarily depreciated in the selling markets, but it was a matter of common knowledge that such depreciation was but temporary and on or about said 1st day of August, 1921, bonds of all characters throughout the United States began to appreciate in value, and all bonds and the water bonds hereinafter mentioned were salable at par long prior to the time the city and county of San Francisco was required to sell any thereof other than the said amount of $2,750,000 worth under said contract 77c, and it was a matter of common knowledge on said 1st day of August, 1921, that said water bonds could be sold at par prior to the 1st day of July, 1922, to wit, the whole of the said water bonds hereinafter mentioned.

"That on the 1st day of August, 1921, the city and county of San Francisco aforesaid, was the owner of, in possession of and entitled to the possession of 21,826 of said water bonds then unsold of the total par value of $21,826,000, said bonds being of the par value of $1,000 each, which the defendants in the caption hereof named excepting only the city and county of San Francisco, converted to their own use in the manner following, to wit:

"That prior to the 1st day of August, 1921, the board of supervisors of said city and county of San Francisco, advertised for bids for the purchase of said water bonds, which bids were to be received and acted upon by said board of supervisors on the said 1st day of August, 1921, and upon that day the defendant Construction Company of North America tendered a bid for the purchase of 21,826 water bonds at the average price of about $851.78 for each of said $1,000 bonds, and thereupon the said board of supervisors entered into a contract in writing under and by which it agreed to sell the whole of said water bonds to said Construction Company of North America under said contract, it being a single contract, at the said tendered price of $851.78 for each of said bonds, and thereafter the whole of said 21,826 water bonds were delivered to said Construction Company of North America, between the 16th day of August, 1921, and the 17th day of November, 1921, the delivery thereof all being under said contract of sale so made by said supervisors and said board of supervisors and the delivery thereof being made by said city and county of San Francisco at the said Anglo & London Paris National Bank for the said Construction Company of North America, and the whole of said transaction with said city and county of San Francisco was conducted by said the Anglo & London Paris National Bank with said city and county of San Francisco, for said Construction Company of North America, and the said city and county of San Francisco took from the said Anglo & London Paris National Bank and the said Construction Company of North America, United States bonds of the par value of $16,750 for said water bonds and $2,187,468 in money for said water bonds so delivered but neither the whole nor any part of the sum of $2,888,537, the remaining part of the par value of said 21,826 water bonds has been recovered by said city and county of San Francisco, or paid.

"That the bonds aforesaid which the said Construction Company had agreed to buy at par plus accrued interest in the extent of $2,750,000 were included in the 21,826 sold as aforesaid for the price of $851.78 each. That by reason of the premises the said city and county of San Francisco and the taxpayers thereof have been damaged in the sum of $21,826,000 less the sum of $18,937,463 so recovered by it, but neither the whole nor any part of the said remaining sum of $2,888,537 has been paid. That the market price of the bonds so converted during the greater portion of the year 1922 on the bond market in the said city and county of San Francisco, State of California, was in excess of the sum of $1,040 for each of said $1,000 bonds, and at about the close of the year 1922, defendant Anglo & London Paris National Bank offered to resell some of said bonds to the said city and county of San Francisco at the then market price on said bond market, the said price being in excess of the sum of $1,040 for each of said $1,000 bonds.

"That the said city and county of San Francisco cannot be induced to commence or prosecute an action to recover the said sum of money herein sought to be recovered as is shown by the following facts:

"It has neglected to commence any action to recover said sum and no action relating to said bond transaction other than this action has ever been commenced. That about the month of August, 1922, one James B. McSheehy, who was then and there a regularly elected member of the board of supervisors of said city and county of San Francisco, and duly qualified and acting, requested said board of supervisors to investigate said sale of bonds and all matters in connection therewith, and after some months of delay and great difficulty on his part in getting said board of supervisors to act thereon, it finally at about the month of January, 1923, approved said sale, declared it was for the best interests of said San Francisco that it should have been made and that it was a legal and proper sale, and the said board of supervisors now and at the time of the commencement of this action was composed of members more than a majority of which acted as above.

"That James Rolph, Jr., is now and for more than ten years last past has been the regularly elected, qualified and acting mayor of the city and county of San Francisco, and he approved of such sale of said bonds at the time it was made and at the time of the said deliveries thereof, and on or about the 5th day of December, 1922, he publicly stated at a meeting of said board of supervisors, that everything that was done about the sale of said bonds was right and that if he had to do it over again he would favor the sale under the same conditions.

"That the said mayor has at other times and places that plaintiff cannot specify reiterated the same sentiments and neither he nor a majority of the members of said board of supervisors have changed their erroneous opinions on said matter but are still in the same frame of mind.

"That George Lull has been the regularly elected, qualified and acting city attorney of the said city and county of San Francisco, state of California, for more than five years last past, and is now such, and he approved of said bond sale and has taken no action to recover the said sum of money sought to be recovered herein either by suit brought in the name of said city and county or at all, and on the 7th day of March, 1925, plaintiff served a demand on him in this action in the words and figures following, to wit:"

After setting forth the demand, the complaint continues:

"That the said city attorney signed a receipt for said demand, but failed to signify his intention to comply therewith nor has he complied therewith in any particular.

"That during the month of January, 1923, two voluntary unincorporated associations of persons, each being composed of members residing in said city and county of San Francisco, one being named the 'Taxpayers' Association of San Francisco,' and the other being named 'Caravan No. 6, Order of Camels,' requested a grand jury of said city and county of San Francisco, then sitting after having been regularly impaneled, to instruct the district attorney of said city and county of San Francisco to institute suit to recover the money sought to be recovered in this action, but the said grand jury after holding such request for some months refused to so instruct or order said district attorney to institute such action, and no such order has ever been given by any grand jury, and no such action has ever been instituted, the request of such voluntary associations having been made to said grand jury on behalf of said city and county of San Francisco and the taxpayers thereof.

"That the vote of the people of the said city and county of San Francisco, state of California, taken on the 14th day of January, 1910, as hereinbefore mentioned, was taken at a special election held on said day for the purposes of voting on said bond question, and the proposition submitted to the voters at said election was to create a bonded indebtedness to finance said water project, said bonds to bear interest at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum, and the whole of said bonds were executed and deposited in the treasury of said city and county of San Francisco to be sold and issued and on their face expressed that the rate of interest to be paid thereon was 4½ per cent. per annum, and thereafter and on the 2d day of November, 1920, the said board of supervisors of the said city and county of San Francisco, state of California, at a general election held on said date, submitted a proposed amendment to the charter of said city and county of San Francisco, proposing to amend article 12 of said charter by adding thereto a section to be known as section 10b, the said proposed amendment being found in the Statutes of California, for the year 1921, at page 1786, and at said general election 74,652 electors voted in favor of said proposition, and 45,979 of such electors voted against the same, but thereafter and on the 21st day of January, 1921, the Legislature of the state of California approved said proposition, and all of said water bonds that were sold and issued prior to the 1st day of August, 1921, were sold at their par value and to bear a rate of interest of 4½ per cent. per annum, over $20,000,000 of such bonds having been so sold and issued prior to the said 1st day of August, 1921.

"That plaintiff did not discover the facts constituting the foregoing cause of action until about the month of May, 1924, and brings this action for the benefit of himself and all taxpayers of said city and county of San Francisco, and all persons legally interested in the recovery of the money sought to be recovered herein, and further alleges that the said Construction Company of North America entered into said contract of August 1, 1921, to purchase the bonds aforesaid, with the full knowledge, consent, and approval of the defendant the Anglo & London Paris National Bank, and the last named corporation participated in the conversions hereinbefore complained of from the time of the last delivery of said water bonds and the delivery of said United States bonds by said the Anglo & London Paris National Bank, to said San Francisco, each of said deliveries of such United States bonds being a part of the said sale of bonds herein complained of."

[1] There is nothing to indicate in the foregoing allegations that the sale of the bonds was not in entire good faith on both sides, nor does it appear that the city and county of San Francisco could have disposed of the bonds at a higher price. It is a well known fact, of which this court may take judicial notice, that municipal securities during and after the war could not be marketed in large quantities at par unless the usual interest rate thereon was considerably increased. The matters pleaded by plaintiff have all been matters of common knowledge, yet the city authorities and the taxpayers in general have acquiesced in the transaction and the plaintiff himself has acquiesced in it for three years. It is also obvious that the position of the defendants has been altered during this period of delay. If the transaction had been attacked with reasonable promptness and diligence, the bonds might have been returned and the purchase price thereof invested in other bonds which were at that time also greatly depressed in value and which would have appreciated with the rising market as did the bonds which were purchased from the municipality. It appears from the complaint, and the matters judicially noticed, that during the period of delay, which was operating to the disadvantage of the purchaser in the manner before stated, the city and county of San Francisco has been receiving the benefit of the purchase price of the bonds and of the increased value of the United States government bonds taken as a part of such purchase price.

The complaint also reveals additional circumstances which would estop the city and county of San Francisco from asserting a right to rescind this contract at this late date, in its recitals relating to the actions of the mayor and board of supervisors, as well as the grand jury, duly empaneled, all of whom, expressly or impliedly, approved of the purchase and sale and lulled the purchasers into security and thus justified them in proceeding to change their position in reliance upon the validity of the contract.

The delay in this case is particularly inexcusable in view of the speculative elements involved in the transaction. A long period of delay, such as occurred in the instant case, enables a litigant to await changes in the market value of securities, and act only if the change is to his advantage.

[2-4] It is settled that the plaintiff can assert no better cause of action on behalf of the municipality than that corporation could have asserted upon its own behalf. Cathers v. Moores, 78 Neb. 17, 113 N. W. 119, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 302; New Orleans v. New Orleans Waterworks Co., 142 U. S. 79, 93, 12 S. Ct. 142, 35 L. Ed. 943. And we think that the foregoing recitals show an inexcusable delay upon the part of the municipality in asserting any right which it might have had. "If, in the course of an inexcusable delay in the assertion of a right, changes occur in the subject-matter of the transaction in suit or in the relative positions of the parties thereto, as a result of which it is impossible to place the parties in statu quo, and the enforcement of the right would work inequity, relief will be denied because of laches." 21 C. J. 231. "A marked appreciation or depreciation, according to circumstances, in the value of the property involved, where the right might have been asserted before such change, and the granting of relief would in consequence of the change work inequity, is ordinarily fatal to plaintiff's case." 21 C. J. 233. "If the property involved is of a speculative or fluctuating character, more than ordinary promptness is required of a claimant." 21 C. J. 225.

[5] To meet the claim of laches raised by the defendants, the plaintiff and appellant asserts that this equitable doctrine may not be invoked by one who does not come into court with clean hands, and that the defendants are precluded by their conduct from raising this defense. In reply, we repeat, that the complaint contains no allegation of bad faith nor of fraud, but on the contrary, alleges facts from which it appears that both parties to the sale acted in good faith, in view of the conditions existing at the time, and, therefore, the principles contended for by appellant can have no application in a ruling on demurrer.

[6, 7] The defense of laches was properly raised by the demurrer filed to the complaint. Marsh v. Lott, 156 Cal. 643, 105 P. 968; Superior California Co. v. Grossman, 32 Cal. App. 357, 162 P. 1046; 21 C. J. pp. 257, 435. It is well established that equity will not relieve against culpable negligence or inexcusable laches. *Tynan v. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

I concur: CURTIS, J.

SHENK, J. [8] I concur in the foregoing opinion, and I place my concurrence in the judgment on the additional ground that in my opinion the sale of the bonds was lawful, as contended by respondents. The appellant places his chief reliance on the case of Peery v. City of Los Angeles, 187 Cal. 753, 203 P. 992, 19 A. L. R. 1044; but there is, I think, a wide distinction between the situation presented in that case and in the case at bar. In that case the city was proceeding under the provisions of the general state law with reference to the issuance of its municipal bonds. That procedure was authorized by the city charter. The bond issue was voted by the electors of the city under a law which required that the bonds should be sold at not less than par and should bear interest not exceeding 6 per cent. per annum, such rate to be specified in the ordinance calling the election. The rate of interest specified in the ordinance was 5 per cent. and was not to be exceeded in the issuance of the bonds. The bonds remained unsold. The Legislature in 1921 amended the statute so as to provide that municipalities might sell their bonds theretofore duly authorized and remaining unsold at a rate of interest not exceeding 6 per cent. The city authorities were proceeding to sell the bonds specifying a 6 per cent. interest rate, when the action was brought by a taxpayer to enjoin the sale as legally unauthorized. It was held that when the bonds were voted upon the express condition that the rate of interest was to be 5 per cent. a status analogous to a contractual relation was created between the electors of the city and the officials thereof that could not constitutionally be disturbed and that it was incompetent for the Legislature to authorize the city officials to sell the bonds to bear a higher rate than 5 per cent. The sale was declared void, not because there was any constitutional inhibition against the sale generally of municipal bonds bearing 6 per cent. interest, for there was none, but because the Constitution protected one of the parties to the contractual relation, to wit, the electors of the city, against any impairment of that contract right without their consent. There is no provision in our Constitution which directly or indirectly prohibits the sale of bonds of the city and county of San Francisco at less than par. In the present case it appears that the electors of San Francisco had, before the bonds in question were sold, duly signified their assent to a change in the rate from 4½ per cent. to 5½ per cent. and for a sale at less than par. This assent was evidenced in the manner provided by law by an amendment to the city charter approved in 1921. Stats. 1921, p. 1786. By that amendment the electors of San Francisco specifically authorized the board of supervisors to sell certain school bonds, not involved in this case, and the water bonds here in question, for less than par and at a rate of interest not in excess of 5½ per cent. By that charter amendment the principals in the contractual relation, namely, the electors of the city and county of San Francisco, specifically authorized the other parties to the transaction, namely, the officials of the city, who constitute the representatives and agents of the electors, to do what was in fact done pursuant to the authority granted. The issuance and sale of said bonds was peculiarly a municipal affair, which it was entirely competent for the electors of the city and county of San Francisco by charter amendment to control by a proper delegation of power to the board of supervisors. The fact that a two-thirds vote was required to authorize the issuance of the bonds did not militate in the least against the power of the electors to express their assent to a change in the terms of sale by a majority vote on the charter amendment. Section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution provides not only that the original charter but amendments thereto shall be approved by a majority vote. Under this constitutional provision a majority of the electors of the city constitute the legislative or governing unit in amending the charter and in thus controlling matters of local concern. When the majority acts as constitutionally permitted or authorized, all of the electors and taxpayers of the city and the officers of the city are bound to conform. A majority of the electors imposed the original charter condition as to the terms of sale, or at least a majority was all that was necessary to impose the condition. Likewise a majority authorized by charter amendment the change in the terms of sale. When, as in this case, a majority acted within constitutional bounds no question of the impairment of contract rights can arise. It is fundamental that contracting parties, lawfully agreeing in the first instance, may thereafter change or modify such agreement by assent lawfully expressed. This assent was legally accomplished in this case. The Peery Case and other cases of like import can have no application to the situation here presented.

I find no merit in the contention of the appellant that the respondent construction company, under the facts alleged, was an officer or employee of the city and county. The relation was clearly that of a contractor. Nor does the complaint show bad faith or abuse of discretion on the part of the board of supervisors in ordering the sale of the unsold bonds as a whole. The demurrer was properly sustained, and, as the appellant expressly declined to amend his complaint, the judgment was lawfully entered.

PEOPLE v. COOPER. (Cr. 1419.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 31, 1927.

Criminal law §369(2)—In prosecution for pimping, evidence of defendant's living in adultery with prosecuting witness held admissible, since tendency was to prove crime charged (St. 1911, p. 10, § 1, as amended by St. 1921, p. 96).

In prosecution for pimping, as defined in St. 1911, p. 10, § 1, as amended by St. 1921, p. 96, evidence of defendant's having come to the city with the prosecuting witness and having lived with her at a named address held admissible, since a showing of an adulterous relationship had a tendency to prove the crime charged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Leon E. Gray, Judge.

John Cooper was convicted of pimping, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Harold D. Perry, of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The district attorney filed an information against the defendant charging him with committing the offense defined in section 1 of the Statutes of 1911, p. 10, as amended by the Statutes of 1921, p. 96. A trial was had in the trial court before the court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict of guilty. The defendant made a motion for a new trial; the motion was denied; and he appealed from the order denying him a new trial and from the judgment rendered on the verdict. At this time he makes one point, and that is that certain evidence was improperly admitted by the trial court.

The information followed the statute and pleaded that the defendant lived with the prosecuting witness. The defendant took the stand as a witness and testified in his own behalf. On cross-examination he was asked these questions:

"You came to Oakland with Marie Cooper? That was at 716 Market street, and that is where you lived with Marie Cooper?"

To each of those questions the defendant's counsel objected on the ground, among others, that in the information he was charged with the commission of one offense, but that the questions tended to prove that he was also guilty of another offense, to wit adultery. The objections were overruled and the questions were answered in the affirmative. The defendant contends that the rulings were erroneous, and he cites and relies on People v. Lane, 100 Cal. 379, 34 P. 856; People v. Glass, 158 Cal. 650, 112 P. 281; People v. Martin, 13 Cal. App. 96, 108 P. 1034; People

v. Canfield, 173 Cal. 309, 159 P. 1046. The Attorney General replies that the authorities relied upon are not in point and that the rule applicable is stated in People v. Morani, 196 Cal. 154, 236 P. 135. This reply is clearly correct. Commencing at the bottom of page 157 (236 P. 136), the court said:

"It is well settled that a defendant in a criminal case can be tried for no other offense than that charged in the indictment or information, and therefore it is not competent for the prosecution to prove the commission of independent crimes by the defendant, the evidence of which has no tendency to prove some material fact in connection with the particular crime charged. But this rule does not exclude such evidence when it logically tends to prove any fact necessary or pertinent to the proof of the crime for which the defendant is being tried."

We find no error in the record. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HUDSON. (Cr. 1520.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 1, 1927.

1. Criminal law § 369(1)—Evidence of separate offenses, unconnected with crime charged, is inadmissible.

Evidence of defendant's commission of independent offenses, not tending to prove guilt of crime charged, is inadmissible over defendant's objection.

2. Criminal law § 186(4)—In robbery prosecution, evidence respecting other offenses and district attorney's remarks respecting defendant's association with married woman held prejudicial (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In prosecution for robbery, admission in evidence of defendant's commission of other crimes of larceny, not tending to prove crime charged, and the remarks of district attorney in opening statement, respecting alleged fact that defendant had been associating with a married woman, not his wife, held to deprive defendant of a fair and impartial trial requiring reversal, notwithstanding Const. art. 6, § 4½, in view of uncertainty of identification of defendant and of alibi testimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

F. J. Hudson was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Reversed.

A. S. Maloney and Joe Rensch, both of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Warner I. Praul, for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of robbery and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

From the record it appears that the complaining witness was an employee in charge of a gasoline and oil service station located at the town of Upland, in San Bernardino county, and in that connection he had the custody of the cash receipts of the business conducted by him; that at about 8:20 o'clock p. m. on the evening of March 1, 1927, he closed the service station at which he was employed, placed the cash receipts of the day, amounting to the sum of approximately $89, in a leather pouch which he carried in one hand, and started to go up an alley to enter his home from a rear door. At a point in the alley opposite the rear entrance of a garage which abutted on the alley, two masked men proceeded to and did rob the employee of the $89 contained within the leather pouch. In perpetrating the robbery one of the robbers, who had a rifle in his possession, approached the employee from one side; the other robber approached the victim "from behind" and searched the employee, who suddenly threw away the money which he had in the pouch, which was shortly thereafter found by the robber. The employee was then ordered "to beat it down the alley." It further appears that the employee had some acquaintance with the men whom he supposed were the robbers. Immediately after the robbery occurred, the employee reported to the police officers that "one of them was Matthis, and I thought one was Hudson (the defendant)." Three days thereafter the employee received a letter from defendant inclosing a $1 bill in payment of a balance of 90 odd cents which defendant owed to the proprietor of the service station for supplies furnished to defendant. On that dollar bill was a red smear or blot, and by such mark was recognized by the employee as a part of the money of which he had been robbed. A few days later, and after the employee had sworn to a complaint charging defendant with the crime of robbery, defendant visited the home of the employee at about 9:30 o'clock p. m., where he remained approximately 15 minutes. At that time defendant "was nervous"; he stated that "they have arrested Matthis," and with reference thereto inquired of the employee, "Did you know it was him?" and "You are sure, are you?" to both of which questions the employee answered, "Yes." Although the father of the employee was present throughout the time of the visit made by defendant to the employee, no charge or suggestion resembling an accusation was made to defendant by either the employee or the father that defendant was in any way connected with the commission of the crime of robbery in question, nor was any effort made at that time to arrest or detain defendant. Ten or 15 minutes after defendant had concluded such visit, the employee went to the police headquarters at Upland and there told a deputy sheriff "about it." At the trial of the case, on cross-examination the employee stated, in substance, that before the robbery occurred the last time he had seen defendant was on the 6th day of February, which would have antedated the robbery by 23 days. In response to the question as to whether the employee ever saw defendant after the 6th day of February, until he again saw him at the home of the employee as hereinbefore narrated, the employee stated, "Never saw him for sure." The deputy sheriff, to whom the employee reported the fact concerning the receipt by him from defendant of the dollar bill which had upon it a smear or blot, was a witness on the trial of the action. Regarding the identification by the employee of defendant as being one of the robbers, the deputy sheriff testified, in part:

"Q. When did you first receive information and from what source that Hudson [the defendant] and Matthis were claimed to have committed this burglary, robbery? A. The first information in regard to the names was from Upland, and then the next day I talked to Sabin [the employee] himself, and he told who he suspected."

Other questions propounded on cross-examination to the employee, together with his answers thereto, illustrate the lack of certainty in the mind of the employee with reference to his identification of defendant as one of the men who "held him up":

"Q. * * * You kind of guessed that was Floyd Hudson [the defendant] when you told the officer? A. I wasn't certain; I thought it was him, but I wasn't sure.

"Q. And you had known him and talked to him and knew his voice, but you told the officer you were not sure of him? A. No, sir; because he didn't talk that night."

It also appears that the employee only swore to a complaint charging Matthis and defendant with the crime of robbery 4 days after its occurrence; which delay, however, is explained by the employee by the fact that he did so as soon as he was requested so to do by the police officers, following the receipt by the employee from the defendant of the dollar bill with a smear or blot on it.

The defense to the accusation against defendant consisted of evidence to the effect that at the time the crime was committed he was at a place located about 7 miles from the town of Reedley, 280 to 300 miles distant from the city of Upland, the scene of the robbery. One witness, apparently of intelligence and probity, testified positively to the fact that at about the hour of 10 o'clock on the morning preceding the day of the robbery the defendant came to his home (which was located, as aforesaid, 280 to 300 miles distant from the place where the robbery occurred) and there remained until 10 o'clock a. m. the following day, at which latter time defendant left the home of the witness, returning thereto the next day between 1 and 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and that thereafter for a period of several days he did not leave the home of the witness except for the purpose of making short business or social trips to a nearby town. The witness further testified that immediately after defendant was arrested, which occurred 10 days after the robbery took place, from various things that had happened within his knowledge, he was able to accurately determine the date when defendant first came to his home. Another witness testified to the fact that she met defendant at the post office in the city of Madera, which is located approximately 300 miles from the town of Upland where the robbery occurred, at about 2 o'clock on the 1st day of March, 1927, and left him at 9 o'clock in the evening of the same day. The witness further testified that during the time that she was with defendant he had some repairs made on his automobile, and that on that day she gave him $10 and $12 on the day following. From records of the garage where the repairs were made, it appeared that the repairs were made on the 2d day of March, 1927.

Defendant denied his guilt, and accounted for the dollar bill which he sent to the employee of the service station by the statement that he received it from a storekeeper at the town of Herndon, where he mailed the dollar bill to the employee. He also testified that on February 28th, at Madera, he wrote a letter to Mrs. Iva Hooper, who testified to having received such letter on the same day on which it was written, and that the envelope in which the letter was inclosed, and which was produced in court, bore the postmark date, "1927, February 28."

The principal point made by appellant for reversal of the judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial is that, over defendant's objection, the trial court erred in admitting in evidence the testimony given by the arresting officer relating to the commission of another offense by defendant. In making his opening statement to the jury, the district attorney included therein the following remarks:

"I think the evidence will show that this defendant had been living in the vicinity of Upland, and on the night of March 2d he drove into a garage at Merced in company with a Mrs. Iva Hooper, who is a married woman, whose husband lives up in that country, but who had formerly lived in the same house down here in Upland with this defendant, showing that the defendant went from the scene of the robbery, which was about 8:15 or around 8 o'clock on the night of March 1st, directly back up to that country and associating himself with a woman, a married woman, who had prior to that time a short time lived with him or in the same house down here in the city of Upland, where her husband came down and took their little baby two or three or four months of age away, and that she went back up there and corresponded with this defendant. * * * And I think we will show to you that this defendant was using a certain Ford touring automobile which was equipped with stolen parts from other automobiles at the time he committed this burglary; that he and this fellow Matthis had visited from time to time, or called from time to time—"

An objection by defendant having been made to such remarks, particularly regarding the stolen part from other automobiles, the judge of the trial court instructed the jury to "disregard the statement made by counsel with respect to the equipment of the automobile with stolen parts."

In the course of the trial, on the theory that evidence was admissible to show how and in whose car defendant had been traveling from place to place, and what, if anything, on being arrested, defendant had said with reference to the charge preferred against him, the trial court, over defendant's objection, permitted the arresting officer to testify as follows:

"A. What was the question before that?"

"Q. The question before that was who was present and whether there was any promises made, and I told you to relate the conversation. What did he say? A. The main part of the conversation was about the car. I asked whose car it was.

"Mr. Maloney: Objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.

"The Court: Overruled.

"A. He said it belonged to Iva Hooper, but she had transferred it to him. I asked him about the running gear part of it, and he said that was taken from a car stolen from Pomona.

"Mr. Maloney: Objected to as incompetent, wholly irrelevant, and I ask that it be stricken out.

"The Court: Motion denied; overruled.

"A. I asked him if Matthis was with him when he stole this car, and he said, 'No,' Ronald had nothing to do with it, only he helped him change the body from one car to the other. He said he tried to change the engine, but he wasn't mechanic enough to change the numbers on it. I asked if Floyd Sabin had any connection with stealing any of these cars, or accessories, and he said, 'No.' In regard to this robbery on the 1st of March, he told me he left Upland Saturday night prior to that, and had not been back until just before he came down to the Valley. He said 'Had I known you fellows were after me, you would never have found this car. I would have set fire to it and burned it up, and gone on afoot.' * * *

"Q. What was done with that car? A. I turned the body and engine over to his brother, and the chassis and wheels and battery and some accessories over to the man who owned it, Mr. Cappel, of Chino."

[1] The law is well settled by a host of authorities that in circumstances such as are here present the evidence to which defendant objected was inadmissible on a trial of defendant on the charge of robbery. 8 Cal. Jur. § 167, and cases cited. No relationship whatsoever was shown to exist as between the crime of robbery, for which defendant was being tried, and the offense of larceny, which the questioned evidence tended to prove had also been committed by defendant. It had no tendency to prove the commission of the crime for which defendant was placed on trial.

[2] In the instant case the identification of defendant as one of the men who committed the crime in question was not wholly satisfactory. Although on the trial the victim of the robbery unhesitatingly testified at one time that defendant was one of the "parties" that "held him up," it will be remembered that the robbery was committed at about 8:20 o'clock p. m.; that the robber supposed to be defendant was masked, approached the victim "from behind" and that "he didn't talk that night." Further testimony given by the employee shows that immediately after the crime was committed he merely suggested defendant as a person "whom he suspected," and that he "never saw him (defendant) for sure; * * * I wasn't certain; I thought it was him, but I wasn't sure." It is therefore apparent that the identification of defendant as one of the robbers became a certainty in the mind of the victim from some circumstance which occurred subsequent to the robbery, and hence that the identification of defendant arose, not primarily from a sense of sight or of hearing of the employee, but that it was the result of deductive reasoning.

On the other hand, the alibi of defendant, while from his standpoint at least, not all that might have been desired, nevertheless was of that quality which in ordinary circumstances might be expected to create a reasonable doubt in the minds of the members of the jury regarding the guilt of defendant. In such a situation the unchecked, although prejudicial, remarks made by the district attorney on his opening statement to the jury regarding the alleged fact that defendant had been "associating" with a married woman not the wife of defendant, together with the erroneous admission of evidence which tended to establish the commission by defendant of the separate crime of larceny, may have been sufficient to turn the scale against defendant, with the result that he was found guilty of the crime of robbery. This court is not unmindful of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution relating to the duty of the appellate court, notwithstanding error in the course of the trial, to affirm a judgment, "unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." After such examination, including a consideration of the evidence relied upon by the prosecution, this court is of the opinion that the error of which complaint is made by appellant deprived defendant of a fair and impartial trial, which may have resulted in "a miscarriage of justice." While for the stability of the government it is important that the laws should be enforced and that guilty men should be punished for their crimes, it is of much greater importance that justice should be done in that every accused person should have a fair trial on the charge preferred against him. It is most apparent that any substantial departure from such principle would amount to a menace to our institutions.

Although other alleged errors occurring on the trial are suggested by appellant for the consideration of this court, it becomes unnecessary to devote attention to them.

It is ordered that the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial be and they are reversed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; YORK, J.

LITTLE v. KENNEDY et al. (Civ. 4933.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 25, 1927.

1. Vendor and purchaser §335—Where escrow agreement provided for deposit of purchase price before deposit of deed, purchaser not making deposit held in default, though vendor made no tender.

Under escrow agreement providing that purchaser should deposit purchase price ten days before vendor should deposit deed, purchaser, not making deposit, held in default as respects right to recover payments made, whether or not vendor had acquired title to the property and tendered it.

2. Vendor and purchaser §335—Defaulting purchaser cannot recover sums previously paid on contract for sale of land.

A purchaser in default, in the absence of a mutual rescission of a contract for the sale of land, cannot recover sums previously paid on account of the contract.

3. Vendor and purchaser §46—Instructions by purchaser and vendor, signed on same day, and constituting one document, are to be considered together.

Instructions by purchaser and vendor, signed on the same day, and as part of the same transaction, and constituting one document, are to be read and considered together.

4. Frauds, statute of §103(1)—Escrow instructions, requiring deposit of money and deed, and signed by parties, constituted contract in writing for sale of land.

Escrow instructions, one signed by vendor, and the other signed by purchaser of land, wherein one agreed to deposit purchase price, and the other agreed to deposit deed, held to constitute a contract in writing for the sale of land.

5. Vendor and purchaser §341(3)—Evidence, in action for money paid under agreement for purchase of land, held to justify trial court's conclusion that transaction failed due to plaintiff's default.

Evidence, in action for money paid under a verbal agreement for the purchase of land, held to justify trial court's conclusion that consummation of the purchase under a subsequent written contract failed due to plaintiff's default in not paying purchase price, which he was obligated to do before vendor was obligated to deposit deed.

6. Vendor and purchaser §341(3)—Evidence, in action for money paid under agreement for purchase of land, held sufficient to support trial court's conclusion of no rescission by mutual consent.

In action for the money paid under a verbal agreement for the purchase of land, which was followed by a written contract, defendant's denial of plaintiff's testimony as to rescission by mutual consent, or statements that she did not recall circumstances stated by plaintiff, held sufficient to support trial court's conclusion that there was no rescission by mutual consent of the parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Action for money had and received by Olin W. Little against Ruth Kennedy and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. P. Hatch, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment rendered in favor of the defendants in an action brought for money had and received.

Plaintiff and defendants entered into a verbal agreement for the sale of real property whereon plaintiff made a payment of $1,000 to the defendants, which payment was to be applied upon the purchase price of $9,250. Thereafter, on April 9, 1923, the parties went into escrow, and plaintiff signed escrow instructions containing the following language:

"I will hand you $8,250 in 20 days, and will deliver to you any instruments which this escrow requires shall be executed by me, all of which you are instructed to use, provided within 30 days from date the necessary instruments are delivered to you to enable you to have a Guarantee Certificate of Title or a Continuation Certificate of Title made by the T. I. & T. Co. covering the following described property: [Here follows a description of the property.] Showing title vested in O. W. Little and Josephine M. Little his wife, as joint tenants. Free from incumbrance except: 1. All taxes for fiscal year 1923-1924. 2. Conditions, restrictions and reservations of record. [Here follow certain agreements made by the buyer, together with provisions relating to the certificate of title.] In the event that the conditions of this escrow have not been complied with at the expiration of the time provided for herein, you are instructed to complete the same at the earliest possible date thereafter, unless I shall have made written demand upon you for the return of the money or instruments deposited by me.

"[Signed] O. W. Little."

Defendants' escrow instructions were given at the same time, as a part of the same instrument, and contained the following:

"The conditions as above are hereby approved, and I will hand you herewith a deed executed by Blanche McKee and Ruth E. Kennedy in favor of O. W. Little and Josephine M. Little, conveying property above described which you are authorized to deliver provided you hold for my account the sum of $8,250, together with above-mentioned instruments executed as above set out, within the time as above provided. [Here follow provisions relating to payment of fees and an agreement that the property is to be free and clear of incumbrance.] All of the demands of the purchaser of the property, as set forth above are hereby agreed to and the provision for extension of time within which escrow may be closed applies equally to me.

"[Signed] Mrs. E. L. Kennedy."

The sum of $8,250 nor any other sum was ever deposited in escrow by the plaintiff; neither was the deed conveying the property ever deposited in escrow by the defendants.

[1] Appellant contends that plaintiff and appellant was not in default, and was not required to pay his money in advance of receiving title to the property; that defendants and respondents were in no position to demand the money or to declare a forfeiture of the money paid on the purchase price until they had acquired title to the property and tendered it to plaintiff and appellant; that tender of the money by plaintiff was excused, and that the defendants and respondents by their acts, statements, and agreements rescinded the contract, and that therefore plaintiff and appellant is entitled to recover the amount paid on the purchase price. We cannot agree with appellant's claim that appellant was not in default, in view of the express provisions contained in the escrow instructions signed by appellant and dated April 9, 1923. These provisions required the appellant to place in escrow the sum of $8,250 within 20 days, and appellant was clearly in default on April 29, 1923, unless an extension of time was granted by respondents. No evidence was offered showing any such extension; to the contrary, evidence was offered by respondents of three separate demands for the payment of the money into escrow. This is not a case where the obligations of the parties are mutual, concurrent, and dependent, as is held in the cases cited by appellant. As said in Hill v. Grigsby, 35 Cal. 656, 662:

"In contracts of this description the undertakings of the respective parties are always considered dependent unless a contrary intention clearly appears."

[2] But here a contrary intention clearly appears. Appellant agreed to make the deposit in escrow on or before April 29th, and respondents were not bound to tender performance by depositing their deed in escrow until ten days thereafter, nor until appellant had made such deposit. The rule is well settled that a vendee in default, in the absence of a mutual rescission, cannot recover sums previously paid on account of the contract. Tomboy Gold & Copper Co. v. Marks, 185 Cal. 336, 339, 197 P. 94.

[3, 4] As distinguished from Holland v. McCarthy, 173 Cal. 597, 160 P. 1069, the transaction herein was a contract of sale entered into by the parties thereto; while in the Holland Case the parties had no negotiations between themselves and did not enter into any contract of sale, but merely delivered certain writings to an agent which were not construed as a contract of sale, nor as authorizing the agent to make a sale. In the case at bar these instructions having been signed on the same day and as a part of the same transaction, and constituting one document, are to be read and considered together. When so read and considered, the instrument contains all the necessary constituent elements to make a contract, and is to be regarded as a contract in writing between the parties. Thoroman v. David, 199 Cal. 386, 390, 249 P. 513; Neher v. Kauffman, 197 Cal. 674, 683, 242 P. 713; Tuso v. Green, 194 Cal. 574, 581, 229 P. 327.

[5] On the first Sunday in June, 1923, plaintiff presented to defendant Ruth Kennedy a written demand to return the sum of $1,000 paid upon the purchase price of said property, which demand was dated May 31, 1923. It is claimed by appellant that, by reason of the conduct and declarations of the defendants, he was not required to make a tender at that time. The conduct relied upon by the plaintiff is that he was advised by defendants that they had decided to purchase only a portion of the property and had made arrangements to that effect. It is argued by appellant that, because the defendants did not acquire all of the property, plaintiff was under no obligation to tender the balance of the purchase price to defendants, for the reason that defendants were not in a position to convey to plaintiff. According to the evidence submitted by defendants, defendants at all times had sufficient money to complete the entire transaction, if plaintiff paid in the balance due from him; and the parties who had agreed to sell the property to the defendants were willing to make a deed of the entire property when the required amount of money was placed in escrow. Upon plaintiff's failure to make the required deposit of $8,250 defendants were unable to complete the purchase of the entire property, and thereupon made arrangements to purchase a portion thereof. This evidence was sufficient to justify a conclusion on the part of the trial court that the failure of the entire transaction was due to plaintiff's failure to perform under his agreement. We see no merit in appellant's contention that tender on the part of plaintiff was excused.

[6] Rescission by mutual consent of the parties is urged by appellant, and is based upon an alleged course of conduct between the parties indicating an intention to rescind. Appellant relies upon certain statements which he testified were made by respondents to the effect that on June 3d plaintiff demanded the return of his money; that the defendants stated they would tender him a deed the next day; that two days later he was advised by defendants that they had decided to purchase only a portion of the property; and that they had sold 90 feet of it to other parties. Much of plaintiff's testimony was specifically denied by defendant Ruth Kennedy, and other portions she did not recall. In view of this conflict, we conclude that the evidence was sufficient to support the conclusion of the trial court that there was no rescission by mutual consent of the parties.

The judgment is ordered affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by T. L. Crane against M. H. Ballou. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appealed, and upon his death pending appeal Harry Ballou, executor of his last will and testament, was substituted as appellant. Affirmed.

Thomas C. Jordan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Thomas P. Boyd, of San Rafael, and Francis L. Ashe, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action upon a check executed by M. H. Ballou and delivered by him to plaintiff. The check had not been paid by reason of a "stop payment" order. Since the taking of the appeal defendant, M. H. Ballou, has died and his executor has been substituted as appellant herein. The complaint alleged, in substance, that Ballou, on the 12th day of January, 1924, drew the check upon a certain bank in favor of one Thomas P. Boyd in the sum of $6,718.10 and delivered the same to said Boyd. The check was presented to the bank upon which it was drawn, but payment was refused for the reason that Ballou had stopped payment thereon. Boyd thereafter assigned all his rights in the transaction to plaintiff, who brought suit thereon. Judgment was prayed for in the amount stated in the instrument, with interest. The answer alleged lack of consideration, and as a separate defense set up that a change had been made in the name of the payee without the authority or consent of defendant.

[1] It appeared at the trial that on or about the 15th day of August, 1923, M. H. Ballou, a banker, was desirous of assisting his friend, S. P. Brownlee, to obtain certain credit, and with this object in view he joined with him in the execution of a promissory note. Brownlee and several witnesses were called by plaintiff in an attempt to establish the fact that, at the time the note was executed and left defendant's hands, the space for the name of the payee had been left blank. Other witnesses testified that the name of a payee was inserted in the note, but they were unable at the trial to remember just who the payee was. The trial court found that a payee had been named and that the note was delivered to Ballou, in order that the same might be negotiated with the payee named therein. Thereafter, the name of the original payee was erased by some unknown person and Brownlee caused plaintiff's name to be inserted into the note as the payee thereof. This alteration was made without the knowledge of defendant, Ballou. After the alteration was made the note was negotiated by Brownlee to plaintiff, who paid full value therefor and received the note in exchange for the sum paid. At the time Brownlee negotiated the note it had not matured, and plaintiff did not know there had been any change made in the name of the payee, and he was not a party to any such change. After maturity of the note and some time in December, 1923, Thomas P. Boyd, acting as attorney for plaintiff, wrote to Ballou advising him that the note was due and demanded payment. In response thereto Ballou called upon Boyd and promised to make payment in January or March of the following year. At this time Ballou knew that the name of the payee had been changed. On the 12th day of January, 1924, Ballou, in accordance with his promise, delivered to Boyd his check for the amount of his obligation and received in exchange the note as altered with the inscription on its face, "Paid, T. L. Crane, per Thos. P. Boyd." The day following, Sunday, January 13, 1924, Ballou called on Brownlee. At his request Boyd and one Deysher accompanied him, and in the presence of the parties Ballou stated to Brownlee that he had been compelled to pay the note in question and demanded that Brownlee execute a chattel mortgage on certain property to him, the principal amount of which would include certain moneys owed by Brownlee to Ballou, including the amount of the check sued upon. Brownlee, however, refused to execute such an obligation, and defendant, Ballou, thereafter stopped payment on the check he had given to Boyd. Under these facts the trial court found, in substance, among other things, that when defendant delivered his check to Boyd he was aware that the note had been altered after its execution and delivery, by the insertion of a different payee, and that he assented to such alteration, and delivered his check in consideration of receiving the note; that with such full knowledge he thereby ratified the alteration. Judgment followed in favor of plaintiff. It is here claimed that the findings are entirely unsupported by the evidence. We are of a contrary opinion. The evidence of defendant himself is amply sufficient to support the findings.

[2, 3] As to what constitutes ratification of an altered instrument, no general rule can be laid down, as it is a matter that depends entirely upon the facts in each particular case. Where, however, as here, a party with full knowledge of the facts agrees to pay the amount of an altered instrument, such act constitutes a ratification of the alteration which was unauthorized when made. 1 R. C. L. 1033; 2 Corp. Jur. 1257. Here the evidence, as above recited, clearly shows a recognition by Ballou of the validity of the instrument, which amounts to a ratification and estops him from denying his liability. Further discussion upon the subject of ratification would answer no useful purpose. Respondent urges the additional argument in support of the judgment, that plaintiff being an innocent holder of an altered note, in due course, may, under the provisions of section 3205 of the Civil Code, enforce the check given in payment or exchange therefor, because such note could be enforced according to its original tenor, and therefore the surrender of said note was ample and sufficient consideration for the check sued upon. The conclusion we have reached upon the subject of ratification renders a discussion of this question unnecessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

EBERLY v. EGAN et al. (Civ. 6011.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 31, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 29, 1927.

Continuance ⇐22—Refusing continuance held proper where deposition of witness, indisposed at time of trial, was taken under stipulation and read in open court.

Refusing continuance held not error, where record showed that at time of trial witness was present, but, owing to indisposition, unable to testify, and trial by stipulation of parties was continued for 30 days, during which time witness' testimony pursuant to agreement was taken by deposition, which was read in open court and made part of record.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action to quiet title by W. Eberly against Frank J. Egan, also known as F. J. Egan, and others, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint. From the decree, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robert D. Duke and Lawrence A. Cowen, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Bert Schlesinger and S. C. Wright, both of San Francisco, for respondent Egan.

CASHIN, J. An action was brought by appellant against respondent to quiet title to certain real property situate in the city of San Francisco. Respondent filed with his answer a cross-complaint alleging that on May 22, 1922, James C. Peabody, the predecessor in interest of appellant, executed to respondent a deed to the property absolute in form but intended as a mortgage to secure the payment of certain debts incurred by Mrs. Peabody for legal services rendered and moneys advanced and to be advanced by respondent. These sums the respondent asked to have declared a lien on the property, and it was stipulated at the trial that the only issue involved in the action was the amount due respondent. The trial court found this amount to be $9,282.98, and entered its decree accordingly.

Appellant contends that this finding was unsupported, and that the court erred in refusing to continue the trial of the action in order to permit Mrs. Peabody, a witness for appellant, to testify in open court.

The sum found to be due was the aggregate amount of a number of charges for services rendered and moneys advanced. It was shown that services were rendered in connection with litigation which covered a considerable period and in which the interests of Mrs. Peabody were involved; and, while the testimony as to the extent of the services rendered and the amount of the advances was conflicting, the findings of the court in these respects and its conclusion as to the value of the services were supported by the evidence.

We find no merit in the contention that the court erred in refusing a continuance of the trial. The record shows that at the time of the trial Mrs. Peabody, who was present as a witness for appellant, was, owing to an indisposition, unable to testify. Due to this fact the trial was by stipulation of the parties continued for 30 days; it being agreed that in the meantime her testimony should be taken by deposition. Pursuant to the stipulation the deposition was taken and was read in open court and her testimony so given made a part of the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

ALKUS v. DAVIES. (Civ. 6007.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 26, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 22, 1927.

1. Municipal corporations $\S$ 706(8)—Instruction on liability, where negligence of two or more persons contributes to accident, held applicable to automobile collision.

In action for damages for personal injuries sustained in automobile collision, instruction, that where negligence of two or more persons approximately contributes to accident, then all such persons are jointly and severally liable for injuries resulting if person injured was in exercise of ordinary care, and if all persons so guilty of negligence are not sued jointly, verdict must be against person sued, held warranted, under evidence showing that plaintiff had blamed driver of another car for accident and had shifted her claim of her responsibility to defendant.

2. Trial $\S$ 295(1)—Appellate court must consider instructions as whole for error.

In considering error in instructions, appellate court must take instructions as a whole, and, if giving or refusing of certain instruction might seem improper or erroneous, court should consider remaining instructions given in order to determine whether or not harm resulted from court's action.

3. Trial $\S$ 296(3)—Instructions relating to liability, where negligence of two or more persons contributes to accident, held not erroneous as stating that automobile passenger could recover if her driver and defendant jointly caused accident, in view of other instructions.

In action for personal injuries sustained in automobile collision, instruction, that where negligence of two or more persons approximately contributes to accident, then all such persons are jointly and severally liable for injuries resulting if person injured was in exercise of ordinary care, and if all persons so guilty of negligence are not sued jointly, verdict must be against person sued, held not erroneous as stating that automobile passenger could recover if driver and defendant jointly caused accident, where throughout trial it was accepted theory of case that negligence of plaintiff's son, the driver, precluded recovery by plaintiff, and in view of other instructions.

4. Courts $\S$ 91(1)—Where instruction, claimed erroneous, had received approval of Supreme Court, appellate court will not attempt minute analysis of same.

Where instruction as a whole has received approval of Supreme Court, appellate court will not attempt minute analysis of each clause, phrase, or word used to determine if it was erroneous.

5. Witnesses $\S$ 269(2)—Where plaintiff was called only to prove injuries, court rightfully restricted cross-examination to matters testified to on direct examination (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2055).

In action for damages for personal injuries sustained in automobile collision, where plaintiff, as witness in her own behalf, testified that she was injured in accident, that she was sitting on back seat, and that after collision she was still in auto until some one helped her out, and remainder of her testimony covered injuries received, court properly sustained objection to cross-question, "Do you remember a Ford car driving ahead of you as you came south just before the accident?" on ground that it was not cross-examination, since defendant could have called plaintiff, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2055, if he desired to examine her further.

Action for damages for personal injuries by Hattie L. Alkus against Arthur Davies. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Donahue, Hynes & Hamlin, of Oakland, for appellant.

Ford, Johnson, & Bourquin, of San Francisco, and Phillip M. Carey, of Oakland, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered upon a verdict in favor of the respondent in the sum of $5,000.

The action arose out of an automobile accident wherein plaintiff sustained certain injuries as the result of the alleged negligence of defendant. Such facts as may be necessary to a determination of the appeal will appear hereinafter.

The appellant seeks a reversal of the judgment, and his contentions may be divided into two groups, viz., error in instructions given to the jury, and error in rulings on the admission and rejection of testimony. The instructions complained of are three in number. The first one reads as follows:

"I instruct you that if an accident occurs in which a person is injured by reason of the negligence of two or more other persons, and the negligence of each of said other persons proximately contributed to the accident, then all of such persons are jointly and severally liable for any injuries proximately resulting therefrom if the person who was injured was in the exercise of ordinary care, and the degree of negligence which may be attributed to such persons so guilty of negligence is not to be considered by the jury in arriving at a verdict. In other words, the verdict in such case must be against such persons jointly who are thus guilty of negligence, provided all have been sued as defendants, regardless of the degree of culpability, and if all of such persons so guilty of negligence are not sued jointly but only one of such persons is so sued, then the verdict must be against such person."

The appellant does not criticize this instruction as a statement of the law in the abstract. He contends that under the facts of this case the instruction was misleading and tended to give to the jury an erroneous idea of the application of the law to the facts involved. He contends further that the instruction was wholly inapplicable to the facts at bar, and that the giving thereof was highly prejudicial. Here it becomes necessary to set forth sufficient of the facts to illustrate this contention.

At the time of the accident plaintiff was riding in a car driven and operated by her son, Irving Alkus. It was conceded at the trial and the case was tried and argued upon the theory that Irving Alkus, the son, was the servant of plaintiff and under her direct control, and that plaintiff was chargeable with the son's negligence, and that if that negligence contributed proximately to the accident plaintiff could not recover. At the trial plaintiff strenuously maintained that her car was in its proper place on the highway and carefully and skillfully operated. The defendant as vehemently urged his freedom from negligence. There was on the highway at the time and place of the accident another car operated by one Jacob Hebner and referred to as the Ford. Plaintiff claimed her car was behind the Ford, and upon reaching an intersection the Ford made a turn, and at that time the car of defendant veered to the left around the Ford and struck plaintiff's car. Defendant, on the other hand, contended that plaintiff was driving on the wrong side of the street and on the left of the Ford, and that when the latter turned plaintiff's car came in swiftly behind the Ford and crossed the path of defendant's car, causing the accident. Throughout the trial it was attempted to show that plaintiff had blamed the Ford driver, one Jacob Hebner, who was not made a party to the action. The said Hebner was called as a witness for defendant and admitted his hostility to plaintiff and based that hostility on the fact that plaintiff had declared him responsible for the accident.

[1] Thus sufficient appears to warrant the giving of the instruction. Certainly, throughout the case it was at least inferentially urged that plaintiff had for reasons of her own shifted her claim of responsibility from Hebner to defendant, and it was conceded that in the circumstances surrounding the accident the Ford of Hebner was in some way involved. Therefore, the claim of appellant as to the total inapplicability of the instruction is without merit.

[2, 3] Further, the appellant insists more strongly that, even if applicable, under the facts the instruction was so misleading and confusing as to give the jury an absolutely erroneous idea, and this contention is based upon this argument; namely, that the admitted fact of the case is that plaintiff's car was being driven by her son, Irving Alkus, for whose negligence plaintiff conceded liability. Therefore, appellant argues, the jury were practically told, or at least left with an irresistible impression, that if the negligence of the son, Alkus, and the defendant jointly caused the accident, then plaintiff could recover from the defendant notwithstanding.

It is a well-established principle of law in this state, and needs no citation of authority to support it, that in considering error in instructions we must take the instructions as a whole, and, if the giving or refusing of any certain instruction might seem at first blush improper or erroneous, consider the remaining instructions given in order that we may determine whether or not any harm resulted from the action of the court, and also whether any apparent confusion of ideas has been removed or whether the subject had been sufficiently covered.

In this examination in the instant case we find that the jury were instructed as follows:

"When the court in these instructions has used or may use the word 'plaintiff' in connection with her duty to use ordinary care, or with reference to any contributory negligence upon her part, you are to understand that it includes also any negligence or want of ordinary care upon the part of her son in the operation of the automobile as his negligence, if any, is to be imputed to plaintiff."

Also:

"You are instructed that it is an admitted fact in this case that Irving Alkus was driving the automobile in which plaintiff was riding at the time of the accident, and that in so doing he was acting as the agent and servant of the plaintiff. If, therefore, you believe from a preponderance of the evidence that at the time and place of the accident said Irving Alkus was negligent in the manner in which he drove the automobile in which plaintiff was riding, and that said negligence proximately contributed to the injuries complained of by her, then you must return a verdict in favor of defendant regardless of whether you believe that the defendant was also negligent."

As already stated, throughout the trial it was the accepted theory of the case that the negligence of the son precluded the recovery by plaintiff, and this theory was kept constantly before the jury. We find no error in the giving of the instruction.

The next instruction on which appellant predicates prejudicial error is an instruction which was approved almost word for word in the case of Meyers v. Bradford, 54 Cal. App. 157, 201 P. 471, in which case a rehearing was denied by the Supreme Court. The same instruction was subsequently adopted and approved by the Supreme Court in the case of Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066. This will suffice the needs of the instant case. We might add that appellant further urges that the instruction is inapplicable here, which we find without merit.

The third and last instruction objectionable to appellant is the precise instruction approved of by the Supreme Court in the case of Olsen v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 20, 204 P. 393. Appellant directs his criticism to the last sentence in the instruction, with particular reference to that portion referring to the term "satisfactory evidence." Appellant says in his brief:

"But the objection which we level at this instruction was never mentioned in the Olsen Case. We make no point of the correctness of the presumption therein referred to, or of the fact that this presumption is in itself a species of evidence, but we do energetically object to having the jury told that this presumption must be overcome by satisfactory evidence. The vice of the instruction was apparently never raised in the Olsen Case."

[4] However, the instruction as a whole having received the approval of the Supreme Court, we do not feel that it is the function of this court to attempt a minute analysis of each clause, phrase, or word used, or to assume that the Supreme Court has followed other than its usual course of giving due consideration to every phase of the approved instruction.

We might add that in the instant case the jury were fully instructed as to the burden of proof resting on defendant to prove negligence on the part of plaintiff, and the term "preponderance of evidence" properly explained. It is noted with reference to the last two instructions herein referred to that the appeal in this case was taken directly to the Supreme Court and the briefs of appellant directed to that court. In the frequently adopted course the case was by that tribunal referred to this court for determination. This is noted in justice to counsel for appellant merely to indicate that his request for a reconsideration of the disputed instructions was made directly to the Supreme Court, and to negative any inference that counsel is at all unmindful of our judicial system which declares the Supreme Court to be the court of highest authority. In any event, there is still available the opportunity of convincing that court on his contentions.

The remaining points of appellant have to do with the trial court's rulings on the reception of testimony.

[5] The plaintiff, called as a witness in her own behalf, testified on her direct examination that she was injured in the accident; that she was sitting on the back seat; and that after the collision she was still in the auto until some one helped her out. The remainder of her testimony covered the injuries received. On cross-examination she was questioned as to the speed of her car over the objection of her counsel. She was then asked this question:

"Do you remember a Ford car driving ahead of you as you came south just before the accident?"

Plaintiff's counsel interposed an objection on the ground it was not cross-examination, and the objection was sustained by the court on the ground stated.

No useful purpose can be served by an analysis of all of appellant's points. The record here discloses a full inquiry into the facts and the testimony of many witnesses. If appellant desired to examine plaintiff further he could have called her, under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and gone into the case fully. The witness was called for the sole purpose of proving her injuries, and we think that the trial court rightfully restricted her cross-examination to matters testified to on direct examination. The case of People v. Teshara, 141 Cal. 633, 75 P. 338, does not support the appellant in the case at bar. The most that can be conceded under the rule of the Teshara Case would be that possibly a contrary ruling by the trial judge here would not have been prejudicially erroneous. Aside from this the case cited applies the doctrine announced to a state of the case not at all similar to the present.

The witness Jacob Hebner, called by defendant, was the driver of the Ford herein-after mentioned. In the appendix to the brief of appellant he sets forth a portion of the testimony of this witness and certain rulings of the trial court thereon. Nowhere in the briefs is there made any claim of error in this connection, so we assume that appellant has abandoned any point he may have had in mind. However, we have noted the testimony presented and the rulings of the trial court thereon, and find nothing warranting discussion.

Judgment affirmed.

STOCKTON LUMBER CO. v. MULCAHY.
(Civ. 3314.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 1, 1927.

Sales ⚡178(4)—Seller of "grape stakes" could recover price, where buyer made no complaint of quality until year after delivery and use of stakes.

Seller of 2,400 grape stakes held entitled to recover price thereof from buyer claiming that stakes were unfit for purpose, where 700 were seen by buyer at time of purchase, and all of them were delivered within a short time, and 700 were used in the spring of 1925, and the remainder in the spring of 1926, and buyer made no complaint until thereafter.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Action on promissory note and for goods sold by the Stockton Lumber Company against James Mulcahy, who filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant.
Case & Forslund, of Stockton, for respondent.

WEYAND, Justice pro tem. The Stockton Lumber Company, respondent herein, and plaintiff in the lower court, brought suit against the appellant, upon two causes of action; one being upon a promissory note for $389.50 and the second cause of action being upon an account for lumber, to wit, a lot of "grape stakes" sold to appellant, amounting to the sum of $229.36. Judgment was in favor of the plaintiff in that suit for said sums, and for $75 attorney's fees, the note providing for a reasonable attorney fee.

By way of cross-complaint the defendant, appellant here, made claim that the grape stakes so furnished were "unsound, and not good or merchantable, or fit to be used for grape stakes, in this, that it (the lumber) was dry rotted, brittle, worthless, and totally unfit for the purpose." He further alleges that he used the stakes, and that many of them broke, because of their alleged unfit condition, and caused some seven tons of the grapes in appellant's vineyard to fall upon the ground, and thus damaged appellant in the sum of $640, the value of the grapes destroyed, and an additional $200, the value of labor expended in the erection of the grape trellis.

There was no dispute as to the amount of the claims of respondent, the controversy being wholly as to the condition of the grape stakes sold to appellant, and the alleged damage to his grapes.

It fairly appears from the evidence that appellant saw a portion of the stakes in the lumber yard of respondent, at the time he made the purchase. These were delivered to his ranch. Shortly thereafter, on the arrival of more stakes at the lumber company's yard, the full amount of the purchase was delivered to appellant. A total of 2400 stakes were delivered; about 700 thereof having been seen by appellant at the time of the purchase. Both appellant and his farm manager had ample opportunity to examine the stakes after delivery at the ranch; 700 of the stakes were used in the spring of 1925, and 700 were not used until the spring of 1926. During the intervening time the unused stakes were in appellant's barn at his ranch, and during said time no complaint was made in behalf of appellant as to their condition. A number of written requests were made by the lumber company for payment of the account, and it appears that at one time defendant promised to pay the account. There are some very slight contradictions of the above testimony.

The judgment of the trial court should be upheld. It was for the trial court to determine with which side truth coincided. A buyer to whom delivery of goods is made must inspect the same within a reasonable time after delivery, and if, having ample time and opportunity to examine the delivery, such buyer makes use of the goods delivered, he cannot then complain as to their condition. It would seem to be wholly unnecessary to cite authorities to support the judgment of the trial court; nevertheless we will cite 22 Cal. Jur. 983, and 35 Cyc. 229, and the cases in illustration of the text, as fully covering this situation.

The judgment is affirmed.

If on material point testimony is in conflict, it must be assumed on appeal that trial court resolved conflict in favor of prevailing party.

5. Appeal and error $\S$ 1011(1)—Finding of trial court that leased oil property had not been disproven as oil lands, supported by evidence, held conclusive.

Finding of trial court on conflicting evidence that leased property had not been disproven as oil lands, supported by evidence, held conclusive on appeal.

6. Evidence $\S$ 598(1)—Mere number of witnesses is without bearing if plaintiff's one witness convinced court's mind against greater number testifying for defendant (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2061, subd. 2).

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2061, subd. 2, mere number of witnesses on issue whether leased property had been disproven as oil lands has no bearing if plaintiff's one witness convinced court against greater number testifying for defendant.

7. Mines and minerals $\S$ 78(6)—Breach of lease of oil lands held "willful" within statute relieving from forfeiture except for willful breach (Civ. Code, $\S$ 3275).

Breach of lease of oil lands, providing that if lessee fails to commence actual drilling within 90 days following furnishing of certificate of title as guaranty of good faith named sum should be paid to lessors as additional rent unless property is disproven as oil lands, being voluntary, was "willful," within Civ. Code, $\S$ 3275, relieving from forfeiture except in cases of willful breach of duty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by G. R. Taylor and others against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lewis, Fleming & Goodwin and John M. Martin, all of Los Angeles (Clarence E. Fleming, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

McWhinney & Clock, of Long Beach, and H. S. Clewett, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendant, United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, a corporation, from a judgment entered against it in favor of plaintiffs, based upon a bond and undertaking executed by said defendant as surety for the United States Royalties Company, a corporation. The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury.

The facts not in dispute are these: The plaintiffs were the owners of two lots in the Signal Hill oil district at Long Beach, Los Angeles county, Cal., and on February 3, 1923, plaintiffs, as lessors, made and executed an oil and gas lease covering this property to said United States Royalties Company, as lessee. This lease was never recorded but at all times held in escrow by the Long Beach National Bank, to whom it was delivered by the parties thereto with certain written instructions. By the terms of said lease it was provided, among other things, that said lessee would within 90 days following the furnishing of a certificate of title showing the premises vested in the lessors, commence the actual drilling of a well on some portion of the leased property; or, at its option, to be entitled to a further extension of time for a limited period by the payment of certain additional rentals as provided in the lease. It was further provided in said lease as follows:

"As a guaranty of good faith and of the actual drilling of a well under this lease, the lessee shall, within five days after the furnishing of a certificate of title by the lessors, as above provided, likewise place in escrow with some bank or trust company holding said lease, either a cash deposit of $5,000, or a surety company bond in the sum of $5,000, conditioned and with instructions that if the lessee fails to commence the actual drilling of a first well on said premises within the time and in accordance with the provisions of said lease, unless and within said time said property is disproven as oil land and this lease abandoned by lessee and a quitclaim deed delivered to lessors, the said $5,000 cash deposit, or the sum of $5,000 under said bond, shall be paid to parties of the first part and second part (plaintiffs and respondents) share and share alike, as additional rental for said premises hereunder, and with the further provision that upon the actual spudding in of a first well on said premises in accordance with the provisions of this lease, and within the time herein provided, the said cash deposit or said bond, as the case may be, shall be returned to lessee. * * *

Said lessee, United States Royalties Company, in accordance with the above provisions of said lease, elected to, and did, deliver a bond of $5,000, executed by this defendant and appellant, as surety, in lieu of the cash deposit of $5,000. The certificate of title to be furnished by the lessors under the lease was delivered on February 3, 1923, and the 90-day period within which the said United States Royalties Company was to start drilling operations began to run on that date, making the last day of said 90 days fall on May 4, 1923.

The said United States Royalties Company never commenced drilling operations of any kind on the leased property, but on April 28, 1923, notified the Long Beach National Bank, in writing, that it was convinced that the leased property had been "disproven" as oil lands, and requested the bank to return the lease to the lessors and cancel the entire transaction. Said bank in turn notified the lessors of the action of said United States Royalties Company, the lessee. Thereafter, the said United States Royalties Company offered to execute a quitclaim deed to the lessors, surrendering any interest it might have in the leased premises. This offer was not accepted by the lessors, but, on the contrary, they insisted that the property had not been "disproven" as oil land, and demanded of said United States Royalties Company that drilling operations be commenced within the time specified in the lease, or pay the additional rental of $5,000 provided for in said lease and secured by said bond. Neither of these demands was complied with by said United States Royalties Company, and thereafter the lessors, who are the plaintiffs and respondents herein, instituted this action against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company upon said bond.

The trial court, after hearing the testimony of all the witnesses in the case, found that said leased premises had not been "disproven as oil lands prior to May 4, 1923," and gave judgment for plaintiffs for $5,000, the amount of said bond, together with interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum from the 5th day of May, 1923.

Appellant contends that this finding is not supported by the evidence; on the contrary, respondents contend that the evidence is ample to support this finding of the trial court.

[1, 2] The law, of course, is well established that any finding of the trial court upon conflicting evidence is conclusive, and all reasonable inferences are to be indulged in support of such finding. Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 228 P. 25; Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 7, 239 P. 332. The burden is upon appellant, who claims error, to show its existence. Hayne on New Trial and Appeal (Rev. Ed.) p. 1574; Wilbur v. Wilbur, supra.

[3, 4] When appellant contends, as it does in the case at bar, that any particular finding is not supported by the evidence, our power begins and ends with the inquiry whether there is substantial evidence, contradicted or uncontradicted, which in and of itself will support the conclusion reached by the trial court. If upon any material point the testimony is in conflict, it must be assumed that the trial court resolved the conflict in favor of the prevailing party. Gjurich v. Fieg, 164 Cal. 429, 129 P. 464, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 111; Treadwell v. Nickel, supra. Therefore the sole question presented on this appeal is whether there is substantial evidence, contradicted or uncontradicted, which in and of itself will support the conclusion reached by the trial court that the land in question had not been disproven as oil land within 90 days from and after February 3, 1923.

[5] Appellant, while recognizing the above mentioned well-established rules, insists that there is no dispute or conflict in the evidence and that only one conclusion can be drawn from all the evidence, and that conclusion is that the land was disproven as oil land prior to May 4, 1923, and, the trial court having reached a different conclusion, the judgment should be reversed. We cannot agree with this contention. The one disputed question of fact in the case, to wit, the character of the land, whether oil-bearing or nonoil-bearing, was not a fact capable of demonstration prior to May 4, 1923, but was one depending entirely upon the opinion of witnesses and circumstances existing at and prior to that date.

[6] At the trial both sides offered the testimony of experts in the oil industry in support of their respective contentions regarding the oil-bearing character of the land in question. Plaintiffs produced only one witness who testified directly upon this question, while defendant produced four or five, but the mere number of witnesses, of course, has no bearing, if the one witness produced by plaintiffs was sufficient to produce conviction in the court's mind against a greater number testifying on behalf of defendant. Section 2061, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc.

The plaintiff's witness was Mr. Martin Van Couvering, a petroleum engineer. No point was urged whatever as to the qualifications of Mr. Van Couvering as such engineer. He produced, and there was received in evidence, a map prepared by him of a portion of the Signal Hill oil field section, near the land in question, showing the condition of the various wells in that locality on the date in question, and his testimony was that he had done either all or a part of the engineering work on a great many of the wells shown on the map. The wells upon which he had done work were enumerated by the witness, which amounted to more than 30 in number. This witness further testified, positively, as to the condition and depth of a great number of wells on May 4, 1923, which were adjacent to the property in question, and his testimony shows that he had a very accurate knowledge of the exact condition of the wells in the Signal Hill oil field on and prior to May 4, 1923.

The testimony shows that the land in question is located on the northwest corner of Hill and Walnut streets at Signal Hill. Mr. Van Couvering testified that the general trend of the oil structure at Signal Hill is northwest and southeast, and that at the time the lease was made numerous wells were drilling, both to the north and to the east of the land in question, and on the date the lease was executed (February 3, 1923), the extent of the field to the southwest had not yet been determined, and at that time the lands of plaintiffs were potential oil property.

Mr. Van Couvering further testified, among other things, that on May 4, 1923, the Old Colony Trust Company's No. 1, located only 250 feet from the land in question, was drilling at a depth of 1,780 feet. The testimony of all the witnesses was to the effect that the first showings of oil, or as they term it, "top of the oil horizon," was not expected to be found until a depth of 3,500 feet, or more, had been reached. Mr. Van Couvering also testified that the Petroleum Midway Company's Clark No. 1, located about 150 feet north of the Old Colony Trust and the same distance from the lands of the plaintiffs, was likewise, on May 4th, drilling at a depth of 1,780 feet, and that the Harmony Dobyns No. 1, located somewhat farther from plaintiffs' property, had at that time reached a depth of 3,585 feet which, under the evidence, was about where they would expect to pick up the oil sand, but there is nothing in the evidence to show whether any production test had been made at that depth, or any effort made to bring the well in. This same witness also testified concerning specific conditions of numerous other wells in the field, their depth, production, etc., and testified that in his opinion, on May 4, 1923, the land in question had not been disproven as oil land, and that he was still at that time in doubt as to how far to the southwest the oil-bearing horizon might extend.

Under cross-examination, Mr. Van Couvering was questioned as to the meaning of the word "disproven" in a commercial or trade sense, and the answer given was as follows:

"A. Well; to me it means, did I think that it was quite sure that they would not make it pay if they drilled a well there. That is what I think you mean, and I did not know that, at that time—that that was the case.

"The Court: Does it not mean this: That judging from the development of surrounding properties it had not been established to your satisfaction that it was not oil-producing property, is that what you mean? A. Your honor is correct.

"Q. You just used the word 'oil-producing'; you mean 'oil-producing' in paying commercial quantities? A. Yes."

The testimony also shows that subsequent to May 4, 1923, there were a number of cases in which new rigs were erected adjacent to the property in question, particularly the H. C. Noonan No. 1, only 270 feet distant, the California Signal Petroleum Syndicate 4, Horseshoe 2, the Black Star Oil Company 2, and the J. L. Benwell, Inc., well No. 1; and it was also shown on cross-examination of one of the witnesses for defendant that even up to the first part of November, 1923, not a single well in the portion of the field adjacent to the property in question was officially abandoned or a single rig dismantled, while, on the contrary, several new rigs were erected during that period of time.

For appellant, Mr. Templeton, Mr. Swarts, Mr. Shaver, and Mr. Soyster, all qualified experts, testified that in their opinion the property was disproven as oil lands during the latter part of April, 1923, and prior to May 4, 1923, and each of these witnesses explained in detail the reasons for their conclusions. These witnesses were also examined and cross-examined in detail as to the operation, depth, and condition of the various other wells in the immediate vicinity, etc.

Appellant lays great stress upon the fact that in the cross-examination of plaintiffs' witness, Van Couvering, he admitted that all of the wells, about which he had testified, proved to be nonproducing, and that subsequent developments demonstrated that the land in question was nonoil-bearing in commercial quantities, as contended by appellant. In fact, it was stipulated by plaintiffs at the time of the trial, which occurred in November, 1924, that many months after May 4, 1923, it was definitely established that the land in question was nonoil-bearing. These admissions would certainly appear to us to have the effect of seriously impairing the value of Van Couvering's opinion theretofore given to the court that on May 4, 1923, said lands had not been disproven as oil land, but by these admissions alone we cannot say, as contended by appellant, that the entire testimony of the witness Van Couvering is valueless and raised no conflict in the evidence. The weight to be given the entire testimony of Van Couvering, as well as that to be given the testimony of all the other witnesses examined in the case, was a matter solely to be determined by the trial court, and it is obvious, from the conclusion reached by the trial court, that it gave more weight to the opinion of Van Couvering, notwithstanding his admissions that subsequent developments showed that his opinion was erroneous, than it gave to a contrary opinion of all five of the expert witnesses for appellant.

We have not set forth all the evidence adduced at the trial, but have examined the entire record with care, and we are of the opinion that there is a substantial evidence to sustain the findings of the trial court; therefore such findings are conclusive on appeal.

[7] Appellant has argued that the judgment here represents a forfeiture from which it should be relieved. If it is in the nature of a forfeiture, no way is pointed out in which such fact should change the judgment in this case under the record. It cites section 3275 of the Civil Code, to the effect that one may be relieved from a forfeiture, except in case of a grossly negligent, willful, or fraudulent breach of duty. The breach here was spontaneous and voluntary, and therefore willful within the meaning of the interpretation of that section given in Parsons v. Smilie, 97 Cal. 647, 654, 655, 32 P. 702.

Appellant did not by its answer plead any equitable matter, nor ask the court to be relieved as from a forfeiture under Civil Code, § 3275 (Clifford v. Fleshman, 65 Cal. App. 762, 225 P. 45), nor has it offered to pay actual damages nor suggested what admeasurement of actual damages it is possible to apply for its breach of the condition (see Parsons v. Smilie, supra).

We think the judgment of the trial court must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: KOFORD, P. J.; STURTEVANT, J.

PEOPLE v. WESTCOTT. (Cr. 1483; 3086.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 25, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 23, 1927.

1. Witnesses ⇨383—Defendant could not impeach witness on immaterial question as to statements of deceased by proof of witness' contradictory statements.

In murder prosecution, where question whether conversation between deceased and witness occurred while witness was washing wound or afterwards was immaterial, defendant could not impeach witness' testimony by proof of contradictory statements made by him.

2. Witnesses ⇨413—State could not corroborate testimony of witness on immaterial point.

In murder prosecution, where question whether conversation between deceased and witness occurred while witness was washing deceased's wound or afterwards was immaterial, prosecution was not entitled to corroborate witness thereon.

3. Witnesses ⇨413—Permitting testimony of witnesses when recalled, to corroborate testimony after admission of defendant's impeaching testimony on immaterial matter, held error.

In murder prosecution, where defendant's attempt to impeach testimony of state witness as to conversation between him and deceased could have been prevented by proper objection as being immaterial, but was admitted, it was error to permit state to recall witnesses and admit their testimony in corroboration of such immaterial matter.

4. Criminal law ⇨366(3)—Declarations made by deceased after assailant had fled and in response to question held inadmissible as res gestæ (Code Civ. Proc. § 1850).

Where deceased was shot when answering a knock at his front door, declarations made by him after he shut the door and assailant had fled in response to question of witness who arrived after interval, during which deceased was unconscious, and his wife had attempted to get him to speak to her, held not natural and spontaneous outgrowth of murderous assault on him, but narrative of past transaction, and not part of res gestæ, admissible under Code Civ. Proc. § 1850.

5. Homicide ⇨203(3)—Deceased's statement, "I am sick," held not to show realization of dying condition so as to make statement identifying assailant admissible as dying declaration (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 4).

In murder prosecution, where deceased was shot while answering knock at front door, and then shut the door, and fell backward on the floor, and became unconscious, statement by him when regaining consciousness, "I am sick," held insufficient to show knowledge of impending death so as to make his statement of name of his assailant admissible as his dying declaration under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 4.

6. Criminal law ⇨670—Defendant's acquiescence in prosecution's demand that entire evidence at coroner's inquest be read held not abandonment of offer of testimony as impeaching.

In murder prosecution, where state witness testified deceased spoke to him while he was washing his wounds, and defense offered witness' testimony at coroner's inquest to impeach witness, defendant's acquiescence in state's demand that whole sentence of statement that deceased finally mentioned name of assailant be read held not abandonment of offer of testimony as merely impeaching.

7. Witnesses ⇨397—Contradictory statements may be considered only as affecting credibility, and, if timely request therefor is made, jury may be so instructed.

Impeaching evidence of contradictory statements does not establish truth of matter contained therein, but may be considered only as it affects credibility of witness sought to be impeached, and, if timely request therefor is made, party is entitled to have jury so instructed.

8. Criminal law §783(2)—Refusal of defendant's instruction that testimony was admitted to impeach witness held proper, where it was admitted to corroborate him.

In murder prosecution, refusal of defendant's instruction that testimony of witness was admitted for limited purpose of impeaching another witness, and could be considered for that purpose only, was proper, where evidence was admitted to corroborate witness.

9. Criminal law §673(3)—Error in defendant's instruction as to impeachment of witness held insufficient to justify refusal of any instruction on point therein.

In murder prosecution, error in defendant's proposed instruction that evidence as to witness' statement at coroner's inquest could be considered only to impeach witness, and not as proof of guilt or innocence of defendant, held insufficient to justify court's refusal to give any instruction on point thereof under circumstances.

10. Homicide §338(4)—Error in admitting deceased's declaration, identifying assailant, held not cured by instruction to consider it for purpose of impeachment or to disregard it.

In murder prosecution, error in admission of evidence of deceased's declarations that his assailant was defendant, admitted solely for purpose of impeachment of state's witness, held not cured by court's instruction to consider it for purpose of impeachment only or to disregard it altogether.

11. Criminal law §730(7)—Unwarranted argument of state counsel in murder prosecution disregarding court's admonitions held prejudicial.

In murder prosecution, argument of prosecuting attorney as to defendant's appearance at police station after reading in newspaper that he was accused of killing his father, and which showed persistent disregard of directions and admonitions of court, held prejudicial misconduct.

12. Criminal law §186(4)—Error in permitting evidence of deceased's declaration and prejudicial argument of district attorney thereon held reversible (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In prosecution for murder, error in permitting testimony as to declarations of deceased made to witness shortly after assault, and prejudicial argument of district attorney thereon, held reversible; Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing for reversals of conviction only when error affects substantial rights, being inapplicable.

13. Criminal law §829(7)—Refusal of instruction on alibi containing statement, substance of which was included in instruction given, held not error.

In murder prosecution, refusal of defendant's instruction on alibi, substance of which was statement of impossibility for same person being in two different places at same time, and which was included in instruction given, was not error.

14. Criminal law §775(3)—Refusing alibi instruction that defendant could not be in two places simultaneously held not error.

Refusal of instruction on alibi containing commonplace that it is impossible for same person to be in two different places at same time, which would be known to intelligent jury, is not error.

15. Criminal law §784(5)—Instruction on circumstantial evidence referring to standard rule of certainty held vague.

In murder prosecution, it was not error to omit from defendant's instruction on circumstantial evidence that independent circumstances must be such as to generate and justify full belief according to "standard rule of certainty," since such standard would have introduced expression of vague and uncertain meaning.

16. Criminal law §784(4)—Instruction that mere union of independent circumstances would not justify conviction held too favorable to accused.

In murder prosecution, it was not error to omit from defendant's instruction on circumstantial evidence that mere union of limited number of independent circumstances, each of imperfect and inconclusive character, would not justify conviction, since statement thereof was too favorable to defendant.

17. Criminal law §829(15)—Omission from requested instruction on circumstantial evidence held covered by general instruction.

In murder prosecution, omission by court from defendant's instruction on circumstantial evidence was not error, where language omitted was fully covered by general instruction on reasonable doubt.

18. Criminal law §829(1)—Refusal of instructions fully covered by instructions given at defendant's request held not error.

In murder prosecution, refusal of instructions, law of which was fully set forth in instructions given at defendant's request, was not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Carl Westcott was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

M. C. Spicer and H. C. Compton, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John Flynn and James S. Howie, Dep. Attys. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, Justice pro tem. After a trial upon an indictment charging him with the murder of Charles G. Westcott, the appellant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and his punishment was fixed at imprisonment for life. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Charles G. Westcott was the father of appellant, and lived in the city of Los Angeles.

On this appeal it is conceded that he was murdered by some one on October 20, 1927. About 8 o'clock in the evening of that day he was sitting in the living room of his house with his wife. The doorbell rang, and the deceased arose, went to the door, and opened it. After opening it, he said, "Oh," immediately following which two shots were fired from the front porch; then he shut the door, said to his wife, "Call the police," and fell over backward, with a fatal wound in the abdomen. He never arose from this position, but later was lifted into an ambulance, and died on the way to the hospital about one-half hour after he was shot. No witness saw the person by whom the fatal shots were fired. The evidence tending to identify the appellant as the perpetrator of the crime is entirely circumstantial, unless we except from that designation the evidence herein-after considered regarding an alleged dying declaration by the deceased.

A witness named Eldridge heard the shots, and went to the Westcott house, arriving there not more than three minutes later. He got from Mrs. Westcott a towel, and washed some of the blood from the body of deceased. While he was doing so, Westcott said to the witness that he was sick, but made no other statement as to his condition. Eldridge then stated that he asked the witness a question, and received an answer, but did not state the words or purport of either. Upon objection to this conversation, the jury was taken from the courtroom, and in their absence the witness testified for the information of the court as to what happened between him and the deceased. During his testimony in the absence of the jury, Eldridge made the following statement:

"Well, during the—while I was cleaning his wounds, I asked the man—they called him Mr. Westcott, although I didn't know it at the time—who shot him, to which he replied, 'Carl.' I then said, 'Carl who?' But I received no reply to that. * * * Q. By the Court: Now, was this statement made by him after you had washed his wound? A. I think during the washing, and probably once afterwards."

After further testimony regarding the circumstances under which this conversation was had between Eldridge and the deceased, and before the jury was called back into the courtroom, the court sustained the objection of appellant to the conversation on the ground that it was not a part of the res gestæ and could not be admitted as a dying declaration, because not made under a sense of impending death. Thereupon the jury was called back and, after a few questions on unimportant matters in direct examination, the witness was cross-examined by appellant's counsel. Upon the cross-examination the following occurred:

"Q. Until after you had finished bathing or attending the wounded man, dressing the wounds of the deceased—or the injured man—the injured man had not said anything to you or spoken to you, had he? A. He had spoken to me before I had cleaned the wounds, before I had finished cleaning the wounds. Q. Well, now, you testified before the coroner's inquest, didn't you? A. I did."

The witness was then shown a transcript of the testimony taken at the coroner's inquest, and asked to read a certain passage in it, identified in the question by line and page, and, after doing so, said that he so testified. Thereupon the following occurred:

"Mr. Spicer (counsel for appellant): May I read it in evidence, your honor?"

"The Court: Yes."

"Mr. Spicer (reading): 'Q. Did you say anything to him or did he say anything to you? A. Not at that time. I went into the room, and opened his shirt and his undershirt, and asked whom I presume was Mrs. Westcott for a damp cloth. Soon after she brought me a cloth, but, as it looked soiled, I asked her for a cleaner one. As she started to obtain this, I followed her to the linen closet, and obtained myself a clean towel, which I moistened, and then returned to the deceased and cleaned his wounds. Soon after that, I would say approximately one or two minutes after I finished cleaning the wound, I asked the deceased who shot him. At first he mumbled, as he apparently had quite a little trouble in articulating, but finally mentioned'—and so forth."

"Mr. Hill: Oh, no; finish it; you have offered it; 'finally mentioned the name Carl.'"

"Mr. Spicer: 'finally mentioned the name Carl.' Very well. That is all."

Later, Eldridge was recalled by the prosecution, and testified as follows:

"Q. Mr. Eldridge, referring to the time when you were in the Cochran house, 909—the house of Mr. Westcott—and referring to your testimony that you asked the question, 'Who shot you?' what, if any, reply was made by Mr. Westcott?"

"Mr. Spicer: That is objected to as not proper examination; not proper rebuttal; no foundation being laid for its introduction."

"Mr. Hill: We are offering the witness for further examination in chief, if your honor please."

"The Court: It appearing that this particular conversation is the one that you referred to yesterday, I take it?"

"Mr. Hill: Yes, sir."

"Mr. Compton: I object to that as having already been testified to."

"The Court: The objection is overruled, limiting it to only that one conversation."

"Mr. Hill: You may answer."

"A. The answer was 'Carl.'"

"Q. And who made that answer? A. Mr. Westcott."

After the cross-examination of Eldridge the prosecution called as a witness John Wesley Smith, who testified that he accompanied Eldridge to the Westcott house on the night of October 20th, and further testified as follows:

"Q. Did you hear Mr. Eldridge say anything to Mr. Westcott? A. I did."

"Q. What did you hear him say?

"Mr. Spicer: That is objected to as hearsay; no proper foundation having been laid, incompetent, not part of the res gestæ.

"The Court: That objection will be overruled. A. Either 'Who shot you,' or 'Who did it?'

"Q. By Mr. Dennison: Did you hear Mr. Westcott make any reply? A. I did.

"Mr. Compton: Now, if the court please, we object to that—

"The Court: Objection overruled. The answer 'I did' may stand.

"Q. By Mr. Dennison: What did you hear Mr. Westcott say in reply to that question?

"Mr. Spicer: That is objected to on all the grounds heretofore made as to the admissibility as a dying declaration, or admissibility as part of the res gestæ.

"The Court: By reason of the fact that this particular conversation has gone into evidence by way of a recital yesterday afternoon, the people, I take it, have a right to show the truth or falsity of that statement as already in evidence. The objection is now overruled to that one conversation only as to Eldridge.

"Q. By Mr. Dennison: You may answer the question. A. 'Carl.'

"Mr. Spicer: I move that that answer be stricken from the record, for the reason that it is not introduced, nor shown to have been introduced, for the purpose of contradiction, it being the same answer that was shown by the record that was introduced as an impeaching question, and for the further reason it is hearsay, incompetent, no foundation having been laid for its introduction.

"The Court: Motion to strike out denied.

* * *

"Q. Did you see what Mr. Eldridge had been doing just previous to asking the question? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What was Mr. Eldridge doing? A. He was trying to stop the bleeding.

"Q. In what way? A. He had a cloth in his hand."

[1, 2] Appellant complains that the court erred in admitting the testimony of Smith and in refusing to give an instruction requested by appellant as to the purpose for which it was admitted, and also that the district attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct by the use he made in his argument of the testimony given by Eldridge before the coroner's jury.

Had the court, on a proper showing that deceased spoke under a sense of impending death, allowed Eldridge to testify as to the conversation between him and the deceased, the exact time or stage of the transaction at which this conversation occurred might have been material, but, upon the court's refusal to permit this testimony, there was no other phase of the case to which an inquiry as to the time of the conversation could relate. The question whether the conversation occurred while Eldridge was washing the wound or afterwards was therefore immaterial. Consequently appellant was not entitled to impeach any testimony given by Eldridge on this question by proof of contradictory statements made by him. People v. Cole, 127 Cal. 545, 59 P. 984; People v. Smith, 189 Cal. 31, 207 P. 518; 27 Cal. Jur. 107, 152. For the same reason, the prosecution was not entitled to corroborate Eldridge on this point. "It is not permissible to corroborate a witness as to collateral, irrelevant, or immaterial matters." 40 Cyc. 2734, citing cases. This rule, and the reason for it, are stated in Stevens v. Beach, 12 Vt. 585, 36 Am. Dec. 359, where, after plaintiff's witness Steele had testified to an immaterial fact, a witness for the defendant testified to the contrary, and the plaintiff then offered to corroborate Steele by other witnesses. The court said:

"It is no doubt competent for the party to put almost any question, upon cross-examination, which he may consider important to test the accuracy or veracity of the witness. But if the question is in regard to a fact collateral to the issue, he must be content with the answer of the witness, and cannot contradict him by independent proof. If this were allowed, a single issue would branch out into an indefinite number of collateral ones. 1 Stark. Ev. 182 (6th Ed.), and authorities referred to. Hence, if in regard to any of those collateral questions, the witnesses should not agree, it is not, for the reason above stated, competent for either party to adduce evidence in regard to such collateral fact. The question put to Steele, for the purpose of testing his consistency, might be perfectly competent, but the testimony given by the defendant's witnesses upon this point, as it had no tendency to prove the main issue, was not competent, and, had it been objected to, would have been rejected. Hence, as Steele could not legally have been impeached by this collateral proof, neither could he be supported in that manner."

[3] Appellant's attempt to impeach the testimony of Eldridge on this point might therefore have been prevented by a proper objection, but, as none was made, the evidence was allowed. According to the authorities above cited, this would not entitle the prosecution to corroborate him upon this point, and the court therefore erred in ruling that the testimony of Smith and also that of Eldridge, when recalled, was admissible for that purpose. Even if such corroboration had been proper, the ruling would nevertheless have been erroneous. The point, if any, upon which Eldridge was impeached by his testimony given at the coroner's inquest was as to the stage of the proceedings at which he talked with the deceased, and we doubt if he was even impeached on this point to any substantial extent. He had given no testimony before the jury trying this case as to the declaration made to him by the deceased. That was presented to the jury for the first time in the supposed impeaching statement read by appellant's counsel from the testimony at the inquest. Smith, in the testimony to which the objection was made, said nothing about the time at which this declaration of deceased was made, nor did Eldridge when recalled; and, as to the latter, it is difficult to understand how he could corroborate himself. Hence these two items of testimony could not be admitted to corroborate Eldridge.

This conclusion renders it necessary to inquire whether the court was right in its original ruling that no sufficient foundation had been laid for the admission of the declaration of deceased to Eldridge either as a part of the res gestæ or as a dying declaration. If it should have been admitted for either of these reasons, we are not concerned with the fact that the court assigned a wrong reason for its ruling in admitting it.

[4] As to the matter of res gestæ, little need be said. The declaration in question was made by the deceased after he had shut the front door and his assailant had fled, and was in response to a question of Eldridge, who arrived at the scene after an interval during which deceased was unconscious, and his wife had telephoned for the police and a doctor, and had then attempted to get deceased to recognize and speak to her. It was not the natural and spontaneous outgrowth of the murderous assault upon him, but a mere narrative of a past transaction, and hence not a part of the res gestæ. Code Civ. Proc. § 1850; 8 Cal. Jur. 95; People v. Hinshaw, 194 Cal. 1, 227 P. 156; People v. Murphy, 28 Cal. App. 708, 153 P. 732.

[5] We think it must also be held that the statement of deceased was not admissible as a dying declaration. To be admissible as such, a declaration must have been made under a sense of impending death. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 4. It was shown by the surgeon who performed an autopsy on the body of deceased that there were two gunshot wounds, one in the leg and one in the abdomen. The bullet which made the latter wound entered the body in front and passed through the liver, the stomach, and the first lumbar vertebra, grazing the spinal cord, and causing profuse internal hemorrhage. The surgeon testified that such a wound would have caused death in a very few moments, and that, as a rule, there would be unconsciousness or collapse immediately; that there would be paralysis from the hips down, and the brain would be affected almost immediately by shock reaction; that unconsciousness would probably result in ten minutes or less, depending upon the vitality of the victim, but in the meantime he could make a statement with realization of what he was saying and answer questions intelligently. The evidence also showed that, when deceased was shot he at once told his wife to call the police, then shut the door, and fell backward on the floor, from which position he never got up; that, after telephoning for the police and a doctor, his wife came back to him, and found him unconscious, breathing heavily and bleeding profusely, and thought he was dying. She kissed him and spoke to him, but he made no response. This was before Eldridge came in. Eldridge testified that he reached the deceased in from one to three minutes after he heard the shots; that deceased was then moaning, but not loudly; that, just as he finished cleaning the wound, deceased raised himself on his elbow and said: "I am sick," but said nothing more as to his condition; that this occurred both before and after the question and answer as to who shot him; that at the time of these statements he seemed conscious, but his powers of articulation were not of the best, because he would kind of clear his throat from time to time; and that the wound was so located that deceased could not see it very well. Eldridge could not fix the time that elapsed between the shots and his conversation with deceased, but said it was not more than one-half an hour. Consideration of the intervening events indicates that it was considerably less. No other facts were shown which could throw any light on the question whether deceased knew that he was about to die.

The evidence most frequently received to show a sense of impending death is the statement of the declarant himself tending to show such a state of mind on his part. In this case there is nothing of the kind. The only statement made by deceased as to his condition was "I am sick," and this falls far short of showing that he realized his dying condition. No argument has been made on this subject in the briefs; both sides having apparently considered that this appeal could be disposed of without its consideration, but fortunately the record contains a full report of the elaborate argument made on this point by the people in the lower court. It was there ably and elaborately argued that the nature of the wound itself, together with the other facts shown as to the conduct and condition of the deceased, was sufficient to show that he knew he was about to die.

In Greenleaf on Evidence, § 158, the rule is stated as follows:

"It is essential to the admissibility of these declarations, and is a preliminary fact, to be proved by the party offering them in evidence, that they were made under a sense of impending death; but it is not necessary that they should be stated at the time to be so made. It is enough if it satisfactorily appears in any mode, that they were made under that sanction; whether it be directly proved by the express language of the declarant, or be inferred from his evident danger, or the opinions of the medical or other attendants, stated to him, or from his conduct, or other circumstances of the case, all of which are resorted to in order to ascertain the state of the declarant's mind."

This statement has been cited or quoted with approval in many California cases. People v. Ybarra, 17 Cal. 166, 168; People v. Sanchez, 24 Cal. 17, 24; People v. Gray, 61

Cal. 164, 175, 44 Am. Rep. 549; People v. Bemmerly, 87 Cal. 117, 118, 25 P. 266; People v. Taylor, 59 Cal. 640, 646; People v. Yokum, 118 Cal. 440, 50 P. 686. In People v. Hoffman, 195 Cal. 295, 307, 232 P. 974, substantially the same rule is declared. In 2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1442, the author says:

"In ascertaining this consciousness of approaching death, recourse should naturally be had to all the attending circumstances. It has been contended that only the statements of the declarant could be considered for this purpose; or, less broadly, that the nature of the injury alone could not be sufficient, i. e., in effect, that the declarant must have shown in some way by conduct or language that he knew he was going to die. This, however, is without good reason. We may avail ourselves of any means of inferring the existence of such knowledge; and, if in a given case the nature of the wound is such that the declarant must have realized his situation, our object is sufficiently attained. Such is the settled judicial attitude."

In all the California cases above cited there were in fact other circumstances, or statements of the declarant, in addition to the nature of the wound, tending to show that the declarant knew, and realized, his condition. We find no California case in which it is directly held that the nature of the wound alone is sufficient to show that the wounded person believed himself about to die. The court, however said in People v. Ybarra, supra:

"We think the circumstances of the case, as shown by the witnesses, warranted the admission of the testimony. The evident danger of such a wound as that shown, with the immediate effect upon the victim produced by it, even unaccompanied by the other circumstances corroborating the idea of her sense of her true condition, would probably have been sufficient to admit her declarations, but with the other circumstances, they leave no doubt as to the propriety of the admission."

The statement as to the facts is very meager, but it appears that the deceased at the time of making the declarations was lying down, suffering very much from the effects of a mortal gunshot wound received in the abdomen; that she was in great misery all the time, never was easy, and was continually failing, and also that she said she believed she was going to die. Here, of course, we have the express statement of the declarant as to her condition, and it also seems that she must have known the nature and effect of the wound. In People v. Sanchez, supra, the court said:

"The character of his wound, his suffering and pain, the opinion of the surgeon or other attendants as to his condition, if stated to him, his alarm and anxiety, if manifested, his final preparation for death, if any was made, his taking leave of friends, his seeking the consolations of religion and the last offices of the church, if such was the case—are all circumstances which are frequently quite as satisfactory in determining the question of belief as any express statement on the part of the declarant."

The circumstances thus referred to, other than the express statement of the declarant, were all present in that case, and the court held the declarations properly received, but here again the knowledge of the declarant as to his condition clearly appears.

The question as to what facts will justify a finding that the declarant was under a sense of impending death, in the absence of a statement by him to that effect, has received consideration in many cases from other jurisdictions which are collected and reviewed in extensive notes found in 56 L. R. A. 406, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 396, and Ann. Cas. 1912C, 85. An English authority which has been often cited is John's Case, reported in 1 East P. C. 357, where it was held:

"That if a dying person either declare that he knows his danger, or it is reasonably to be inferred from the wound or state of illness that he was sensible of his danger, the declarations are good evidence."

In this case, however, where the wounds were bruises and contusions from blows and kicks, it was held that there was no foundation for supposing that the deceased considered herself in danger.

The cases that most nearly resemble the case at bar in their facts are: Territory v. Eagle, 15 N. M. 609, 110 P. 862, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 391, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 81, and Jones v. State, 130 Ga. 274, 60 S. E. 840. In the New Mexico case it appeared that the deceased did not indicate at any time by word of mouth or otherwise that he realized his condition and had no hope of recovery, and nothing was said to him by any one on this subject. He had been shot, the bullet entering his body from the front, traversing his abdomen, and coming out in the back. There was severe internal hemorrhage. On the next day after he was shot there was a discharge of the intestinal contents from the wound, his abdomen was markedly distended, his temperature subnormal, and his pulse rapid; he was conscious, but in a rather dazed condition, and he could retain nothing in his stomach, but was vomiting blood. The declarations were made after these symptoms appeared, and, although the time intervening between the shooting and the declarations was not stated, it must have been at least several hours. The court quoted from Wigmore on Evidence the language which we have already quoted, and held that the declarations were admissible. In this case it is clear that the declarant had ample opportunity to observe the nature and extent of his wounds and the effect caused on him thereby, and he could hardly have failed so to do. In the Georgia case the deceased was found by his wife a short time after he was shot, and he neither did nor said anything expressly indicating a sense of impending death, but the court said:

"In this case, the fact that when his wife found him the deceased was prostrate on the ground; that he was shot through the heart; that he was unable to get one of his arms to the shoulder or neck of his wife, who was assisting him to his home; that he never spoke again after the words complained of were uttered, and that he died in fifteen or twenty minutes after making the statement, were circumstances from which the jury might infer that when he made the declarations he was in the article of death and conscious of his condition."

It is apparent here that the deceased at least knew of his inability to help himself.

Another somewhat similar case is Anthony v. State, Meigs (Tenn.) 265, 33 Am. Dec. 143, where it appeared that the wound was a large pistol shot entering the navel, and such a wound 99 times in 100 would produce death; that, when the declaration was made, the declarant, was in the opinion of her physician fast sinking, but neither he nor any one else informed her of this fact; that she said she was suffering from great pain, burning heat, and great sickness of the stomach. The court quoted from John's Case, supra, the language we have already stated, and added what we conceive to be the true rule as to the meaning of such statements as that made in John's Case and the one made in the passage we have above quoted from Greenleaf regarding the "evident danger" of the deceased, in the following language:

"It is obvious that this rule or principle, so distinctly stated, does not mean that the inference may be drawn from the mere fact, that the wound, in the opinion of the man of science, was in point of fact mortal; but that the nature of the wound or the state of illness should be such as to affect the knowledge, and control the opinion of the dying person himself, as to the danger to which he stands exposed. * * * In the case before us, the dreadful nature of the wound, the state of illness as proved by the physician and declared by the deceased herself, were such as could not leave her, or any rational being in doubt as to her being in great danger of immediate death."

In the case now before us, the deceased, after being shot, almost immediately fell over backward and became unconscious. There is no ground to suppose that before unconsciousness intervened he became aware of the mortal nature of his wounds. After he revived, his only express indication of his knowledge as to his condition was to moan slightly and say, "I am sick." Since he could not see the wound, he could have gained no knowledge from an inspection of it. He may have had a sense of pain, indicated by his moaning, which told him that he was wounded through the body, but such wounds are not necessarily fatal. In all of the cases which we have found after an extensive investigation, in which it has been held that a sense of impending death might be inferred from the nature of the wounds, it appeared that the wounds were of an obviously mortal character, and that this fact was known or at least was manifestly open to the observation of the declarant; e. g., in some of them it appeared that his throat had been cut from ear to ear, and his windpipe severed. In the present case, we think the court was right in its ruling that the declaration of the deceased was not shown to have been made under a sense of impending death.

[6, 7] It follows that there was no evidence properly before the jury regarding the declaration by the deceased that Carl shot him, unless it be the testimony of Eldridge given at the coroner's inquest that the deceased made such a declaration. This was offered by appellant merely for the purpose of impeaching Eldridge, on the theory that it showed a previous contradictory statement by him. This theory was correct, if at all, only as to the time when the declaration was made, and not as to the fact that it was made, and appellant endeavored to omit the latter fact when reading the testimony, but, upon the insistence of the prosecution that the sentence be finished, the whole was allowed to go in without protest. We think, however, that, by thus acquiescing in the demand of the prosecution that the whole sentence be read, appellant did not abandon his offer of the testimony as mere impeaching testimony, but was entitled to have the whole of it considered on the theory that he offered it for that purpose only. "It is a settled rule that impeaching evidence of contradictory statements does not tend to establish the truth of the matter contained therein, but may be considered only in so far as it tends to affect the credibility of the witness sought to be impeached thereby, and if a timely request therefor is made, a party is entitled to have the jury so instructed." 27 Cal. Jur. 169; 2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1018; Thiele v. Newman, 116 Cal. 571, 48 P. 713; Albert v. McKay & Co., 174 Cal. 451, 456, 163 P. 666; Estate of Relph, 192 Cal. 451, 458, 221 P. 361; People v. Corey, 8 Cal. App. 720, 729, 97 P. 907.

Certain decisions in this state might perhaps at first blush be regarded as holding to the contrary by reason of the fact that this impeaching evidence was offered by appellant, but, on careful consideration, we think they do not. In Sill v. Reese, 47 Cal. 294, 340, the court said:

"We are not prepared to say that counsel is bound by the declaration of a limited purpose, so as to be estopped, after the introduction of evidence, from drawing from it other deductions than that suggested by the terms of the offer. Certainly he should not be, unless injustice has been done to the opposite party by permitting such new inferences; and this cannot be made out by mere assumption or conjecture, unsupported by any fact appearing in the record. Indeed, counsel has no power to limit the effect of evidence; it would hardly be contended that the opposite party cannot use it in any legitimate manner before the jury. The statement of a 'purpose' is only a reason, addressed to the court, why the particular evidence should be admitted; the effect of the evidence is to be limited, in proper cases, in the charge to the jury."

In Sears v. Starbird, 78 Cal. 225, 230, 20 P. 547, 549, the court said, after citing Sill v. Reese, supra:

"In the absence of an express understanding between counsel and the court that evidence is to be limited to a particular matter, the court will be authorized to consider it for any purpose for which it is competent and relevant to the issues."

In Fox v. Harvester, etc., Works, 83 Cal. 333, 342, 23 P. 295, 296, the court said in regard to certain documents:

"We cannot see that because they were read in evidence as a part of the cross-examination of other witnesses, therefore they were not in the case for all purposes for which they were admissible. The papers having been already put in evidence, the court did not err in refusing to allow them to be put in the second time."

All of these cases limit the use that may be made of evidence by the opposing party to that for which it is "legitimate," "competent," or "admissible." According to the authorities already cited, the impeaching evidence produced on the cross-examination of Eldridge was not legitimate, competent, or admissible as proof of the facts therein stated. The prosecution was therefore not entitled to use it for that purpose.

[8] The court refused appellant's request for an instruction, No. 28, to the effect that the above-mentioned testimony of Smith was admitted for the limited purpose of impeaching Eldridge, and could be considered by the jury for no other purpose. This evidence was not admitted to impeach Eldridge, but to corroborate him, and the court was justified in refusing the instruction for that reason. Instruction No. 3 given by the court, apparently of its own motion, informed the jury that the evidence of question and answer passing between Eldridge and the deceased was admitted for consideration only upon the credibility of Eldridge, and directed them to consider it for no other purpose. This instruction sufficiently identified and referred to the testimony of both Smith and Eldridge, and, in effect, told the jury not to consider the declaration of deceased narrated in the testimony as proof of the fact declared by him. Whether the giving of this instruction cured the error in the admission of the testimony so referred to we will consider later.

[9] Appellant also requested an instruction, No. 27, to the effect that the evidence as to Eldridge's statement at the coroner's inquest could be considered by them only for the limited purpose of impeaching Eldridge, and not as any proof of the guilt or innocence of the defendant. This instruction was refused, and no instruction on this point was given, although appellant was entitled to such an instruction. As proposed by him, the instruction was perhaps misleading, for, in the final analysis, evidence which impeaches a witness may have some bearing upon the question of defendant's guilt or innocence. But the error in the proposed instruction, if any, was not sufficient to justify a refusal to give an instruction on the point under the circumstances. The court should have instructed the jury as to the true rule on this matter. People v. Frey, 165 Cal. 140, 147, 131 P. 127.

[10] Appellant complains, not only of the admission of the direct evidence as to the conversation between Eldridge and the deceased, but also of the use made of it, and also of the statement of Eldridge at the inquest, in the closing argument of the prosecution. In this argument the deputy district attorney read at length the record of the impeaching question put to Eldridge, including the statement that deceased said Carl shot him. Before this reading the following occurred:

"Mr. Hill (deputy district attorney): The dying man replied—

"Mr. Spicer (counsel for appellant): Now, your honor, we object to counsel commenting on that, for the reason it is not introduced as evidence in the case.

"Mr. Hill: That part I have stated is absolutely in the evidence in this case so far.

"The Court: The court expects to instruct the jury it is for a limited purpose.

"Mr. Hill: The fact that he spoke?

"The Court: No, not the fact that he spoke.

"Mr. Hill: That is all I have commented on so far, if your honor please."

After reading the testimony the prosecutor commented on this declaration of the deceased and the probability of its being true for nearly three pages of the record, and thereupon the following proceedings occurred (to the proper understanding of which it is necessary to know that appellant on the night of the murder bought a copy of a newspaper, in which there was an account of the murder, and a statement that he was accused of committing it, and that upon seeing this he went to the police station and surrendered):

"What else have we in the evidence in this case? Carl Westcott appears at the police station claiming that he had read in the newspaper that his father had been killed, and that he was accused of having killed him. That is a fact legally established in evidence. What deduction and inference can be drawn from that? It is common knowledge that newspapers are in the business of gathering news. They have trained reporters assigned to get the facts, write them, and report them to their paper for publication. The deduction from the course of business. Why, no newspaper publishes things unless it is warranted by some investigation of theirs and an ascertainment of the facts because no newspaper likes a libel suit. And so you have got it in the evidence here that the dying man did make a dying statement that Carl shot his father; you have got it from the inference and the deduction from the facts from the evidence in this case, and you can't escape it.

"Mr. Spicer: Just a moment. I make this objection, and ask the court to withdraw this from the jury. The remarks of the newspapers, it is not in evidence. There is no testimony as to whether those statements in there were true. It is highly prejudicial. It is known to the district attorney it is prejudicial, and I believe he is making it for that particular purpose.

"The Court: The remarks of the district attorney going outside of the record will be stricken from the argument.

"Mr. Hill: May I, for the guidance of my further remarks, have the court call my attention to what particular remarks you deem objectionable in the argument? There is the evidence that a newspaper was published, and Carl claimed to have seen the paper in which it was stated he was accused of the murder of his father. What was the basis of the accusation? Who was present at the scene of the murder? Who of all persons alone saw the murder? He whose lips are now sealed, Charles G. Westcott, and he alone. We have it in the evidence that he did speak before his immortal soul passed from this life. We have the paper coming out stating that the defendant, the son, was accused of his murder. What is your inference and your deduction from the course of business and the course of nature? From what source possibly could the information be obtained than from the word of mouth of Charles G. Westcott that his son had murdered him? Don't you believe Charles G. Westcott? Don't you believe that of all persons in the world he was the one who knew best the features of his son? Don't you know—

"Mr. Spicer: We object to this, your honor, again, and move the court to admonish the jury.

"The Court: The court will instruct the jury and the deputy district attorney that the means or method and course by which the newspaper—referring to a newspaper which Westcott in his statement stated that he did see on that evening—that that means of information, method, and source is not in evidence, and that anything you may say on that subject is merely your inference.

"Mr. Hill: Exactly so, why, certainly. Everything I have said in my argument is my opinion of the analysis of the evidence, the same as counsel for the defense.

"The Court: Well, I don't think it proper that you should go into the source of the newspapers' information from which they made the publication, however.

"Mr. Hill: All right. I will ask the jury be instructed to disregard that part of it. Westcott testified that he read the newspaper, and from the newspaper alone he had obtained the information, not only of his father's death, but that he (Carl Westcott) was accused of his murder. Put those facts with the other facts in this case, the other inferences and the other deductions in this case, and I say to you that the inference, and the only inference, warranted by this evidence is that Charles Westcott, before he died, spoke, and that counsel recognized that that was in evidence, and couldn't get away from it. Mr. Compton in the closing argument for the defense referred to it, and he tried to laugh it off. He tried to give another construction of it. He gave his inference of it, and what did he say? He said that, if the dying man did speak the word 'Carl,' it wasn't as an accusation of guilt, it wasn't accusing Carl of having murdered him, but that just as life was fluttering from the body his last earthly thought was for his loved son Carl. If that had been the fact, do you think counsel would have fought for two days and a half to keep that out of the evidence?

"Mr. Spicer: We object to that, and move that it be stricken out, and I think that counsel should be instructed by the court that he is not to speak upon those subjects which he knows are not questioned to go before this jury.

"Mr. Hill: This jury is not blind. They have been out of court and in court and out again—

"Mr. Spicer: We take exception to counsel's remark on that, and move the court to instruct the jury.

"The Court: The court will instruct the jury to entirely disregard the personal conversation between counsel. As to this particular evidence that is being referred to now the court expects to and will instruct you it is in for a limited purpose, impeachment, offered for that purpose, and the truth of the statements there made were permitted to be met by the other side going only to the credibility of the witness Eldridge, not for general purposes.

"Mr. Hill: Unquestionably it is before you, ladies and gentlemen, for that limited purpose of showing that, at the time of the coroner's inquest, Mr. Eldridge under oath at that time testified that he asked the question, 'Who shot you?' and the dying man replied, 'Carl.'

"Mr. Spicer: We object to that and take exception to counsel's remarks as prejudicial, intended so by counsel, and made for the purpose of prejudicing the jury.

"The Court: I don't know what counsel intended, but, if he is limiting it to matters of credibility—

"Mr. Hill: Exactly. And you can consider it for the purpose of determining whether or not Mr. Eldridge has been impeached as to the testimony given in this case."

We have thus stated the argument at some length before considering the effect of the court's instructions upon the error in the admission of the declaration of deceased in evidence, because it is apparent from this statement that the two matters must be considered together. Under the circumstances of this case the error in the admission of the evidence could not be rendered harmless by an instruction from the court to consider it for a limited purpose only or to disregard it altogether. The evidence was extremely damaging to appellant. Here is a son charged with the murder of his father, and evidence is allowed to go to the jury that the father, before he died, accused his son of the murder. By the established legal rules governing such matters this evidence was improper. Is it possible that any jury, after hearing such evidence, in such a case, can erase it from their minds, and not be influenced by the accusatory declaration, merely because the court tells them to consider the evidence only in passing on the credibility of a witness, whose credibility was, in fact, not substantially impugned thereby? We unhesitatingly answer "No." In so doing we but follow the established rule in such cases. People v. Oldham, 111 Cal. 648, 654, 44 P. 312; People v. Rodriguez, 134 Cal. 140, 66 P. 174; People v. Anthony, 185 Cal. 152, 159, 196 P. 47; People v. George, 72 Cal. App. 124, 236 P. 934.

[11] Even if there had been a possibility that the jury would forget the evidence of the declaration by deceased, that possibility would have been utterly dissipated by the argument of the prosecuting attorney. That argument was entirely unwarranted by the record in many respects. There was nothing before the jury to indicate where the newspaper got its report that appellant was accused of the murder, and the argument based on that report was an entirely unjustified attempt to present to the jury something which they were not entitled to consider. The argument which we have quoted shows a persistent disregard by the district attorney of the directions and admonitions of the court, and an apparent intent so to impress the matter on the jury that they could not forget it, no matter what the instructions of the court might be. It manifests a complete departure from the spirit of fairness which should animate the conduct of that officer, and must be regarded as prejudicial misconduct. People v. Derwae, 155 Cal. 592, 102 P. 266; People v. Hail, 25 Cal. App. 342, 358, 143 P. 803; People v. Keko, 27 Cal. App. 351, 149 P. 1003; People v. Irby, 67 Cal. [12] There remains for consideration the question whether section 4½, article 6, of the Constitution, prevents a reversal of this case. With this section in mind, we have carefully considered the evidence adduced to identify appellant as the perpetrator of the crime. It is entirely circumstantial, and we see no good object to be accomplished by stating it here. While the combined effect of all the circumstances relied on to show appellant's guilt is such as to support the verdict, without the declaration of deceased, yet each of them taken separately is susceptible of an explanation consistent with appellant's innocence. Appellant attacks the credibility of the testimony by which some of these circumstances were shown, and as to some of them the evidence was conflicting. While these matters are not for this court, yet we are unable to say how the jury regarded them, or that they may not have disbelieved the evidence as to some of the incriminating circumstances, or regarded these circumstances as insufficient, and based their verdict on the declaration of the deceased. In short, we are unable to determine whether appellant would or would not have been convicted had the testimony as to that declaration not been admitted and the argument of the district attorney thereon not been made. In such case section 4½ of article 6 has no application to uphold the judgment. People v. Macphee, 26 Cal. App. 218, 226, 146 P. 522; People v. Irby, 67 Cal. App. 520, 530, 227 P. 920; People v. Degnen, 70 Cal. App. 567, 606, 234 P. 129; People v. Black, 73 Cal. App. 13, 38, 238 P. 374.

[13, 14] In view of the reversal which must be ordered, certain other matters must be considered. Appellant complains of the action of the court in omitting from his requested instruction No. 25 a portion thereof. The part thus omitted and refused by the court is included in parenthesis in the following quotation:

"The defendant in this case has introduced evidence to prove the fact that he was not at the place where the crime was alleged to have been committed at the time charged in the indictment (and if in your deliberations you determine that the defendant was not at the place where the alleged offense is said to have been committed, at the time alleged in the indictment, but was at another place, then, under this state of facts, you must find the defendant not guilty, for it is impossible for the same person to be in two different places at the same time).

"The burden of proof is not upon the defendant to establish an alibi by a preponderance of the evidence, but it is sufficient to entitle the defendant to an acquittal in this case, if the evidence of alibi, considered in connection with all the evidence in this case, raises in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of defendant."

The portion omitted is doubtless correct, and was approved as part of an instruction given in People v. Foster, 198 Cal. 112, 243 P. 667, but we do not think that its refusal can be regarded as error. The meat of the portion omitted was the statement that it is impossible for the same person to be in two different places at the same time, and this was contained in instruction 10, given at the request of the prosecution. Moreover, the language omitted was a mere commonplace, which would be known to any intelligent jury, and the refusal to give it cannot be regarded as error. People v. Machuca, 158 Cal. 62, 109 P. 886; People v. Perrin, 67 Cal. App. 612, 227 P. 924.

[15] Appellant also complains of the action of the court in omitting a part of his instruction No. 3, which was as follows, the part omitted being included in the parenthesis:

"To warrant a conviction on circumstantial evidence each fact necessary to the conclusion sought to be established must be proven by competent evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, and all the facts necessary to such conclusion must be consistent with each other and with the main facts sought to be proved and the circumstances, taken together, must be of conclusive nature, leading, on the whole, to a satisfactory conclusion and producing, in effect, a reasonable and moral certainty beyond a reasonable doubt, that the accused and no other person committed the offense charged. (The mere union of a limited number of independent circumstances, each of an imperfect and inconclusive character, will not justify a conviction. They must be such as to generate and justify full belief according to the standard rule of certainty. It is not sufficient that they coincide with, and render probable, the guilt of the accused, but they must exclude every other reasonable supposition. No other conclusion but that of the guilt of the accused must fairly and reasonably grow out of the evidence, but the facts must be absolutely incompatible with innocence, and incapable of explanation upon any other reasonable supposition than that of guilt.)"

[16] The reference in the language which the court declined to give to the "standard rule of certainty" would have introduced into the instruction an expression of vague and uncertain meaning not heretofore approved as an accurate statement of the law in any case to which our attention has been called. We think, also, that the statement that "the mere union of a limited number of independent circumstances, each of an imperfect and inconclusive character, will not justify a conviction," is too favorable to the appellant. In support of it, appellant refers to People v. Anthony, 56 Cal. 397; but we find no such instruction discussed in that case. In his brief, but in another connection, appellant also refers to People v. Staples, 149 Cal. 405, 425, 86 P. 886, 894, where the court said of circumstantial evidence:

"* * * Where the evidence is of such a character it must be not only consistent with the hypothesis of guilt, but inconsistent with any other rational hypothesis. The deduction to be drawn from these circumstances is ordinarily one for the jury, but where, in a case such as this, every circumstance relied on as incriminating is equally compatible with innocence, there is a failure of proof necessary to sustain a conviction, and the question presented is one of law for the court."

This case has been considered and reviewed in several other cases. In People v. Muhly, 15 Cal. App. 416, 114 P. 1017, the court said regarding it:

"In the case now here the defendant presents in numerical order most, if not all, of the circumstances relied on for conviction, and endeavors to show each of these circumstances to be equally compatible with innocence, and hence there is a failure of proof necessary to sustain a conviction. The principle enunciated in the Staples Case is undoubtedly proper to be given as an instruction to the jury, and it was given by the learned trial court in unmistakable terms. But we do not think it can be accepted, or was intended to be accepted, as a rule of universal application to guide the appellate court in all cases arising out of or dependent upon circumstantial evidence. It rarely happens that circumstances attending the commission of a crime may not, in the opinion of the reviewing court, reasonably be susceptible of an interpretation compatible with the innocence of the person associated with such circumstances; and if one after another of the alleged incriminatory circumstances may be eliminated, they would necessarily cease to have any probative force considered collectively. * * * As we understand the Staples Case, the rule there laid down followed an analysis of the evidence from which the court was authorized to conclude that there was no evidence warranting the verdict. We do not understand that case to hold that where the circumstances are such as to reasonably justify the inference of guilt, the case will be taken from the jury because an inference of innocence might also reasonably have been drawn."

In People v. Strauss, 75 Cal. App. 447, 454, 243 P. 67, the above language was quoted with approval from People v. Muhly, and the rule there established was followed, and in this case a rehearing was denied by the Supreme Court. In People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 315, 328, 184 P. 389, 394, where the evidence was circumstantial, the court said:

"In our opinion the facts which we have indicated could have been found by the jury are sufficient to sustain the verdict. It is the law that neither mere opportunity to commit a crime, nor perjured testimony is sufficient to support a verdict of guilty. Nor are false statements or suspicious circumstances sufficient. It may be conceded that no one of the facts summarized would, if standing alone, be sufficient to uphold the verdict, but when all the circumstances which the jury may have resolved from the evidence are considered together, it cannot be held on appeal that they are not sufficient to warrant an inference of guilt."

[17] The above language which the court excluded from appellant's instruction No. 3 would have required the jury in effect to consider the various circumstances independently, and to exclude from their consideration the joint effect of a number of concurring circumstances where each one alone could be explained in such a manner as to be consistent with defendant's innocence. This they were not required to do. The remaining language omitted by the court from instruction No. 3 was fully covered by the general instruction given by the court on the subject of reasonable doubt.

[18] Appellant also complains of the refusal of the court to give his instructions Nos. 4, 5, 14, and 21. We have carefully considered these instructions, and compared them with the instructions which the court did give, and are satisfied that all the principles of law set forth in the instructions requested by appellant were given in other instructions. The language was not in all cases the same, but the subject was fully covered, and, of course, appellant was not entitled to have the same principle of law given twice, or to insist on his own particular phrasing therefor.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PEOPLE v. McKENZIE. (Cr. 1362.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 29, 1927.

1. Criminal law §115(1)—No error is presented by point that defendant was apprehended in one county and lodged in jail in another unsupported by record.

Point that defendant was apprehended in one county and taken to another and then lodged in jail presents no error where without support in record.

2. Criminal law §114(5)—Where record is silent it will be presumed on appeal that transfer from one to another department of superior court was regularly made.

On appeal from judgment on plea of guilty of subornation of perjury and from orders denying motions to withdraw plea and enter plea of not guilty and for probation, where defendant made no formal assignments of error at trial, but in brief stated that defendant was taken before department of superior court other than that to which his case had been assigned, in view of silence of record on such point, it will be presumed that cause was regularly transferred from one superior court department to another.

3. Criminal law §274—Denial of motion to withdraw plea of guilty as induced by promises of probation held not error, in view of evidence refuting defendant's version of prosecutor's statements.

In prosecution for subornation of perjury, denial of motion to withdraw plea of guilty held not error, in view of evidence that person who promised defendant prosecuting officers would ask judge for probation if he would plead guilty was not prosecuting officer, or that he did not make alleged statement or promise, or, if he did, that such statement was not as defendant testified.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

John W. McKenzie was convicted of subornation of perjury, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Melvin, McClure & Sullivan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel B. Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The grand jury of Alameda county returned an indictment against the defendant and another charging them with subornation of perjury. John W. McKenzie pleaded guilty and applied for probation; the cause was referred to the probation officer, who made an investigation and filed a report; before the hearing on the report was had the defendant moved to withdraw his plea of guilty and to enter a plea of not guilty; the motion was denied; the application for probation was heard and denied, and judgment on the indictment was entered. From the judgment and from the orders denying the two motions, the defendant has appealed.

For the purpose of making clear the facts contained in this record it should be stated that the defendant was by the grand jury, under a separate indictment, accused of the crime of perjury and that the same proceedings were had and the same appeal was taken, and that all of said proceedings were had consecutively.

Both indictments were returned and filed July 7, 1926. Both pleas were entered July 9, 1926. The application for probation was made in each case on the latter date. Proceedings in each case were, on the request of the defendant, or with the consent of the defendant, continued from time to time until August 24, 1926. When the cases were called on that date the attorney for the defendant answered ready. Immediately thereafter the defendant, in person, stated to the court:

"I pleaded guilty to the charge of subornation of perjury to the court, and this was through an understanding with the district attorney's office to convict the other defendants, Marion Scott and George Holmden, and I find I have convicted myself of subornation of perjury, and I desire, under the circumstances, to change my plea to not guilty."

Thereafter the defendant's attorney stated to the court that the defendant had stated to him that the pleas were entered because the prosecuting officers had represented to the defendant that he would be used as the state's witness and would not be sent to prison. On that statement the cases were continued for a hearing on the question as to whether the prosecuting officers had made such statements.

Neither at the time above mentioned, nor at any other time, did the defendant make any formal assignments of error in the trial court. He made such assignments and filed the same with the clerk on the day he took an appeal. In his brief he repeated those assignments, six in number. However, he did not argue any one of those points, he did not cite those parts of the record which he claimed supported him, and he did not cite any authorities; but he then proceeded to state three points.

[1] 1. Defendant in this case was apprehended in the city and county of San Francisco and taken to the county jail of Alameda county where he was lodged. The record is wholly silent on the point. The point, as stated, discloses no error.

[2] 2. The next step in the proceedings was that defendant was taken before a department of the superior court other than that to which his case had been assigned. The record is silent on the point. On this appeal we must presume that the cause was regularly transferred from one department to another department of the superior court. As a part of this point, it is asserted that immediately prior thereto a deputy district attorney of Alameda county had conferred with defendant and had told him the best thing he could do was to plead guilty to both charges and that they would ask for probation from the judge of the court. The record shows that the defendant supported that statement by his oath. It also discloses that the deputy mentioned was Mr. St. Sure, and that the latter testified that he never made such statements to the defendant.

3. Finally, it is contended the defendant did not have an opportunity of conferring with counsel at any time for more than a minute or two prior to the entry of his plea of guilty, which he rushed into relying on the hope held out to him by the deputy district attorney. The latter part of the point we have just discussed. The first part of the point is wholly unsupported by the record.

[3] Notwithstanding no formal motion had been made and although no issue was presented, on August 28, 1926, the trial court heard counsel argue, and allowed witnesses to be sworn and examined on the issue as presented by the informal statement made by the defendant's attorney on August 26, 1926. The defendant testified to certain statements made to him by Oscar Rasmussen, Mr. Hill, P. F. St. Sure, R. P. Tracy, and G. R. Helms, supporting or tending to support his statement theretofore made in open court. He also testified as to the time and place that each statement was made. The prosecution called the persons who, the defendant testified, had made the statements and by such witnesses proved that the person was not a prosecuting officer, or that he did not make the alleged statement or promise to the defendant, or, if he did, that the statement was not as the defendant had testified.

During the examination of the witnesses as above referred to, the attorney for the defendant stated that there was a doubt as to the defendant's sanity. Thereupon the trial judge appointed a commissioner to examine the defendant as to being sane or insane and continued the case for the purpose of having the examination made. Later, Dr. Hamlin, the commissioner, made an examination of the defendant's sanity and thereafter appeared in open court and testified that the defendant was not insane.

The facts recited in the defendant's brief have caused us to make a meticulous examination of the entire record. After making that examination it is clear to us that in the trial court the defendant proceeded most informally; but it is quite clear that in every respect the rights of the defendant were most carefully guarded by the trial court.

We find no error in the record. The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HAACK. (Cr. 995.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 27, 1927.

1. Criminal law §741(5)—Corroboration of accomplice held sufficient to warrant submission of larceny case to jury (Pen. Code, § 1111).

In prosecution for grand larceny, based on testimony of accomplice, corroborating testimony held sufficient to warrant submission of case to jury, under Pen. Code, § 1111.

2. Criminal law §761(15)—Instruction on effect of recent possession of stolen property must be predicated on jury's belief from evidence that defendant had possession.

Instruction that recent possession of stolen property, unless satisfactorily explained, is circumstance tending to show guilt, and must be taken with other evidence to determine defendant's guilt or innocence, must be predicated upon the jury believing from the evidence that defendant had such possession.

3. Criminal law §761(15)—Instruction on effect of possession of recently stolen property held erroneous as instructing that property was recently seen in defendant's possession.

Instruction that, if stolen property "as" seen in the possession of the defendant shortly after being stolen, failure to account therefor was circumstance tending to show guilt, held erroneous, as instructing that stolen property was recently seen in possession of defendant.

4. Larceny $\S$ 64(1)—Possession of recently stolen property is not prima facie evidence of guilt, and does not warrant conviction, but is mere circumstance to be considered, if unexplained.

Evidence that defendant charged with larceny had possession of recently stolen property is not prima facie evidence of guilt, and is not sufficient to warrant conviction, but is mere circumstance to be considered in determining his guilt, if it is not explained.

5. Larceny $\S$ 77(1)—Instruction that possession of recently stolen property is "prima facie evidence" of guilt, and, if unexplained, may warrant conviction, held error; "prima facie case."

Instruction that possession of recently stolen property is prima facie evidence of guilt, and throws on possessor the burden of explaining such possession, and, if unexplained, may be sufficient to warrant conviction, held error, "prima facie case" being defined as that amount of evidence which would counterbalance presumption of innocence and warrant conviction, if not contradicted; and "prima facie evidence," being defined as evidence which, standing alone and unexplained, would maintain proposition, and which would establish a fact, unless rebutted (citing Words and Phrases, "Prima Facie Case," "Prima Facie Evidence").

6. Criminal law $\S$ 512—Testimony of accomplice cannot be given same effect as testimony of nonaccomplice, unless corroborated, though jury be convinced of truth (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1111).

Jury cannot give testimony of accomplice same effect as testimony of one who is not implicated in offense, unless testimony be corroborated by evidence tending to connect defendant with crime separate and apart from accomplice's testimony under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1111, no matter if it is convinced of the truth of the accomplice's testimony.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 780(3)—Instruction that accomplice's uncorroborated testimony would not sustain verdict, but, if convinced of truth, jury might give it same effect as other testimony, held error (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1111).

Instruction that testimony of accomplice is competent evidence, and that his credibility is for jury, and, while testimony of accomplice will not sustain verdict when uncorroborated, if testimony carries conviction, and jury are convinced of its truth, they should give it same effect as would be allowed to witness not implicated in offense, held error as inaccurate and confusing, under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1111.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 1186(4)—Errors in instructions on effect of possession of stolen property and testimony of accomplice held to require reversal (Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½).

Errors in instructions on recent possession of stolen property and uncorroborated testimony of accomplice, when considered together, held to require reversal, and not to be harmless, within Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½, where it could not be said that, without the giving of the erroneous instructions, jury would have brought in a verdict of guilty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Carl Haack was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Clinton Johnson, of Oroville, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. On the 7th day of May, 1927, an indictment was filed in the superior court of Butte county, containing four counts charging the defendant with the offense of grand larceny. The jury returned a verdict of guilty upon counts 1, 2, and 3 contained in said indictment, and a verdict of not guilty upon count 4.

Count 1 charges the defendant with the theft of two calves, the property of one Nettie Frishholz; count 2 charges the defendant with the theft of two calves, the property of William Cordoza; and count 3 charges the defendant with the theft of one calf, the property of John Bettincourt.

The defendant's motion for a new trial having been denied, this appeal is taken therefrom and from the judgment based upon the verdict of the jury finding him guilty in counts 1, 2, and 3.

This appeal presents for our consideration two major reasons why the judgment of the trial court should be reversed, to wit: First, that conviction was had upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice; and, second, alleged error on the part of the trial court in instructing the jury on matters of law.

A careful reading of the testimony set out in the transcript discloses that there is absolutely no corroborating testimony, as required by section 1111 of the Penal Code, in so far as counts 2 and 3 of the indictment are concerned, and no further comment need be made thereon.

[1] As to count No. 1 charging the defendant with the theft of the two calves belonging to Nettie Frishholz, the transcript presents a different state of facts. The corroborating testimony, which we think sufficient to send the case to the jury, will be best understood by our first summarizing the testimony of the accomplice, Mrs. King, who participated with the defendant in the theft of the two calves. The offense mentioned in count 1 is alleged to have been committed on April 1, 1927, which the testimony shows to have been a rainy day. Mrs. King testified that, some time between 9 and 10 o'clock on the evening of April 1st, the defendant met her at an appointed place on the highway, and took her for an automobile ride in a Studebaker car belonging to the defendant; that she looked at the name plate on the car, and saw that it was a Studebaker; that for some time previously the defendant and Mrs. King had been taking automobile rides late at night; that on the night in question they drove out westerly from Gridley on the Gridley-Colusa highway to a place opposite a barn situate in a field, and a short distance from the highway on property belonging to Mrs. Nettie Frishholz; that one or the other of them spoke of going over to the barn and scouting around in search of calves; that the automobile was driven off the paved portion of the highway, and permitted to stand along the side thereof; that the defendant and the witness got over the wire fence, went to the barn, found three young calves tied, two of them with ropes, took them from the barn, and over to the fence adjoining the highway; that about this instant of time the lights of an automobile were seen coming from the west; that thereupon the defendant, leaving the witness and the two calves inside the field, got over the fence into his automobile, and drove up the highway a short distance until after the automobile just mentioned had passed by, and then returned to the place where the calves were lying tied; that the witness and the defendant lifted the calves over the fence, and put them into the defendant's automobile, and drove back to the home of the witness, where the calves were turned loose in a field on property occupied by the witness and her husband; that some days afterwards, when it became evident that the lost calves were being searched for, the husband of the witness took the two calves in question in an automobile over to a field in which was situate the tin barn, and which is mentioned in the testimony as the "tin barn place." The evidence does not disclose who had possession of the premises known as the "tin barn." Mrs. King testified that the defendant came to the home of her husband and herself, mentioned the fact that trouble was likely to follow on account of the calves, and thereupon helped her husband to load the two calves in an automobile, and that her husband took the calves away. Mrs. King's testimony was further to the effect that the larceny of the calves took place about midnight. This, in brief, is the testimony of Mrs. King in relation to the larceny charged in count 1. As we have stated, there being no corroborating testimony relative to counts 2 and 3, it would serve no useful purpose to set forth her testimony in relation thereto.

The following circumstances are relied upon as corroborative of the testimony of the accomplice as tending to connect the defendant with commission of the offense: The Studebaker automobile owned by the defendant and taken from his possession a few days after the alleged larceny, was found to be equipped with three smooth tires and one tire comparatively new. The three smooth tires were on the front wheels of the automobile and on the right rear wheel thereof. The comparatively new tire with the tread thereon still intact was found upon the left rear wheel of the defendant's automobile. As stated herein, rain had fallen on the day preceding the night of the alleged larceny. The automobile tracks alongside the highway in the neighborhood of the Frishholz barn, discovered the morning after the larceny, discloses that they were made by an automobile on which three of the tires were smooth and that the tire on the left rear wheel was comparatively new and the tread was intact. An examination of this tread was made by witnesses familiar with the different makes of tires, and these witnesses testified that the tracks made by the tire on the left rear wheel of the car that was stopped along the Frishholz barn on the night of the larceny were made by a Federal tire, and that the left rear wheel of the defendant's automobile was equipped with a Federal tire having a like tread with the tire that made the marks to which we have just referred. The testimony also showed a number of foot tracks leading from the place where the automobile was stopped to and from the Frishholz barn. These tracks indicated that a man and a woman had participated in the larceny. The man's tracks were large; the woman's tracks were small. Measurements were made of these tracks, and especially of the tracks made by the larger of the two persons participating in the larceny. The length of these tracks were found to be identical with the length of the shoe worn by the defendant at the time of his trial. The width, however, was slightly in excess of the width of the shoes then worn by the defendant. Upon being arrested, the defendant stated to the arresting officer "that, if they were going to send him to the penitentiary, there would be more go with him," and, also, that the calves could be found at the tin barn. The whereabouts of the automobile belonging to the defendant prior to about the hour of 9 or 10 o'clock on the evening of April 21, 1927, is not disclosed by the testimony. The narrative begins with the meeting of Mrs. King and the defendant between the hours of 9 and 10 p. m. of that day, at what appears to have been an understood meeting point between the defendant and the witness. The father of the witness testified that the Studebaker automobile was brought to, and left at, the place of his residence, or, rather, the residence belonging to the mother of the defendant, some time between 12 and 1 o'clock on the morning of April 2d; that he called out to the person driving the automobile there, and received no answer, went out to see who it was, and the person who left the automobile ran away. The place where the automobile is thus said to have been left was about a mile and one-half distant from the residence of the defendant. The defendant denied all participation in the larceny, but admitted helping Mr. King load the two calves in the automobile driven by Mr. King, and in which the calves were by Mr. King taken away from his place of residence to the tin barn hereinbefore referred to. While that part of the corroborative testimony relating to the automobile tracks may be said to be exceedingly weak, owing to the fact of the large number of Federal automobile tires in use, and also due to the fact that the tread on all kinds of tires wear smooth, it is at least more than a coincidence that there should be found three smooth tires and one tire with the tread comparatively new on the automobile belonging to the defendant, and that his automobile should be found equipped with tires corresponding exactly with the manner in which an automobile should be equipped to make the tracks found near the Frishholz barn, from which the calves were stolen. This, taken in connection with the statement of the defendant that, if he was sent to the penitentiary, others would go with him, and the close measurement of the large tracks which we have referred to, to the size of the shoes worn by the defendant, and the admission by the defendant that he assisted Mr. King in loading the two calves into the automobile in which they were taken away by Mr. King, tended, in some measure, to connect the defendant with the larceny charged in count 1, and sufficiently fills the measure of proof required by section 1111 of the Penal Code.

[2] At the request of the people the court gave, among others, the following instructions to the jury, which, for convenience, we have numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4.

Instruction No. 1 reads:

"The court instructs the jury that the recent possession of stolen property, unless satisfactorily explained, is a circumstance tending to show the guilt of the defendant, and must be taken with the other evidence in this case to determine his guilt or innocence."

Instruction No. 2 reads:

"If the jury believes, from the evidence, the property mentioned in evidence was stolen from the premises described in evidence, and as seen in the possession of the defendant shortly after being stolen, the failure of the defendant to account for such possession, or to show that such possession was honestly obtained, is a circumstance tending to show his guilt, and accused is bound to explain the possession, in order to remove the effect of the possession as a circumstance to be considered in connection with other suspicious facts, if the evidence disclose such."

Instruction No. 3 reads:

"The court instructs the jury that the possession of recently stolen property is prima facie evidence of guilt, and throws upon the possessor the burden of explaining such possession, and, if unexplained, may be sufficient to itself to warrant a conviction, yet, when recently stolen property is found in the possession of another, if the attending circumstances, or from any explanation made, or in view of all the evidence or lack of evidence, if any, there remains a reasonable doubt as to whether or not such person stole the property, he should not be convicted."

Instruction which we have marked No. 4 reads as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that the testimony of an accomplice is competent evidence, and the credibility of such accomplice is for the jury to pass upon as they do upon any other witness; and, while the testimony of an accomplice will not sustain a verdict when uncorroborated, but if the testimony carries conviction, and the jury are convinced of its truth, they should give to it the same effect as would be allowed to a witness who is in no respect implicated in the offense."

In the consideration of these instructions it must be borne in mind that the stolen calves were not found in the possession of the defendant, and the only evidence of the defendant's ever having had possession thereof consists of the testimony of the accomplice, Mrs. King. Other instructions were given by the court to the jury, but these are the ones of which the appellant complains, and to which our attention is directed. Before considering these instructions, we will state that a reading of the other instructions given by the court fails to remove any errors contained in the challenged instructions, if they are found to be erroneous.

The instruction which we have called instruction No. 1 is taken literally from an instruction given in the case of State v. McCarty, 47 N. D. 523, 182 N. W. 754, and there approved as a correct instruction. An examination of the opinion of the court in that case, however, reveals that additional instructions were asked for by the defendant, which added to, and made, the quoted instruction complete. The instruction, taken alone, assumes the recent possession of stolen property on the part of the defendant. To make it a complete and accurate statement of the law it should have been predicated upon the jury believing from the evidence the fact of the recent possession of the stolen property by the defendant, and, then, that such possession, unless satisfactorily explained, was a circumstance tending to show the guilt of the defendant, and should be taken with other evidence in the case in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendant. The insufficiency of this instruction to properly advise the jury becomes apparent when we examine the instruction which we have called No. 2, given to the jury immediately after reading of instruction No. 1.

[3] In instruction No. 2 the court assumes the very fact of possession of the stolen property by the defendant shortly after the theft. Instruction No. 2 says:

"If the jury believes from the evidence the property mentioned in the evidence was stolen from the premises described in the evidence, and as seen in the possession of the defendant shortly after being stolen," etc.

Instruction No. 2 appears to have been taken from the case of People v. Alba, 52 Cal. App. 603, 199 P. 894, but in transcribing this instruction the error was made of changing the word "was" to the word "as." It might be suggested that this appears in the record as a clerical error on the part of the clerk in making up the transcript, but an examination of the reporter's notes as transcribed by him shows that the instruction was read to the jury just as we have quoted it. And, having gone to the jury in that language, it directly instructed the jury that the stolen property was recently seen in the possession of the defendant.

[4, 5] Instruction No. 3 was given by the court to the jury immediately after the reading of the instruction which we have called instruction No. 2. By instruction No. 3 the court instructed the jury that "the possession of recently stolen property is prima facie evidence of guilt, and throws upon the possessor the burden of explaining such possession, and, if unexplained, may be sufficient to (of) itself to warrant a conviction." This is not a correct statement of the law in the state of California, although it is a literal copy of an instruction given by a trial court in the state of Kansas, and found in the opinion of the Supreme Court of that state in the case of State v. Brundige, 114 Kan. 849, 220 P. 1039. As given in that case, it was held not to be prejudicial, being a burglary case, in view of the fact that there was "no basis in the evidence for a substantial doubt that whoever stole the wheat (subject of the larceny) also broke into the house in which it was stored." The opinion in the Brundige Case is based upon two earlier cases decided by the Supreme Court of Kansas, to wit: State v. Hoffman, 53 Kan. 700, 37 P. 138, involving the theft of cattle, where it was held that "the possession of stolen property recently after it is stolen is prima facie evidence of guilt, and, if unexplained, may be sufficient of itself to warrant a conviction." In the case of State v. White, 76 Kan. 654, 92 P. 829, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 556, the instruction to which we have referred was criticized, but not condemned.

Beginning with the case of People v. Chambers, 18 Cal. 383, the courts of this state have laid down, and consistently followed, the statement of the law set forth in that case relative to the recent possession of stolen property. It is there said:

"Possession of stolen property is not alone sufficient to convict of larceny, though such possession is a circumstance to be considered in determining the guilt of the possessor."

In People v. Gassaway, 23 Cal. 51, the trial court instructed the jury as follows:

"In the absence of evidence of good character, the recent possession of stolen property, unexplained, is prima facie evidence that the possessor is guilty of larceny."

For the giving of this instruction the case was reversed, the court citing the cases of People v. Chambers, 18 Cal. 383, and People v. Ah Ki, 20 Cal. 177.

In People v. King, 8 Cal. App. 329, 96 P. 916, upon the subject of possession of stolen property the trial court instructed the jury as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that the mere possession of stolen property, unexplained by a defendant, however soon after the taking, is not, of itself and standing alone, sufficient to justify a conviction, even if it be shown to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the alleged burglary was committed. But it is a circumstance which, taken in connection with other incriminating evidence in the case, if any there be, is to be considered by the jury in determining the question of the guilt or innocence of a defendant so charged. The failure of a defendant to account for such possession, or to show that such possession was honestly obtained, if it is found that there was such possession, is a circumstance tending to show his guilt, and he is bound to explain such possession in order to remove the effect thereof as a circumstance, considered in connection with other incriminating facts, if any such are found in the evidence."

This instruction is supported as a correct and accurate statement of the law by a long list of authorities cited on page 332 of the opinion in the case of People v. King, supra.

In the case of People v. Alba, 52 Cal. App. 603, 199 P. 894, from which the instruction which we have called No. 2 was attempted to be taken, is to be found a correct statement of the law as held by the courts of this state, to wit:

"The mere possession of stolen property, unexplained by the defendant, however soon after the taking, is not sufficient to justify a conviction; it is merely a guilty circumstance, which taken in connection with other testimony is to determine the question of guilt."

Then follows the application of the instruction to the particular facts involved in that case. To tell the jury that the possession of stolen property recently after the alleged larceny constituted prima facie evidence of guilt was, in and of itself, sufficient to tell the jury that nothing further was necessary to warrant conviction, but the instruction with which we are now dealing went further, and did tell the jury that that fact alone was sufficient upon which a conviction might be based. As said in State v. Hardelein, 169 Mo. 579, 70 S. W. 180, "a prima facie case is that amount of evidence which would be sufficient to counterbalance the general presumption of innocence, and warrant a conviction, if not encountered and controlled by evidence tending to contradict it," etc. And, as defined in State v. Lawlor, 28 Minn. 216, 9 N. W. 698:

"Prima facie evidence is evidence which, standing alone and unexplained, would maintain the proposition and warrant the conclusion to support which it is introduced."

Practically all of the authorities follow the definition found in Bouvier's Law Dictionary, to wit:

"Prima facie evidence of a fact is in law sufficient to establish the fact, unless rebutted."

See, also, 6 Words and Phrases, p. 5549. The correct statement of the law to be given to the jury is also found in 15 California Jurisprudence, p. 932, § 26.

Without further citation of authorities, it is sufficient to state that all the California cases having to do with the question of recent possession of stolen property as an incriminating circumstance hold that evidence of possession alone does not constitute prima facie evidence of guilt, and is not sufficient to warrant conviction.

[6, 7] The instruction, which for convenience we have called No. 4, has been taken from the case of Shiver v. State, 41 Fla. 630, 27 So. 36, where the court had to do with a conviction founded upon the testimony of an accomplice, and where it is held contrary to the Code rule in this state that conviction can be had upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. The instruction there given is worded as follows:

"The testimony of an accomplice is competent evidence, and the credibility of such accomplice is for the jury to pass upon as they do upon any other witness; and, while the testimony of an accomplice will sustain a verdict when uncorroborated, yet the testimony of an accomplice must be received with great caution; but if the testimony carries conviction, and the jury are convinced of its truth, they should give to it the same effect as would be allowed to a witness who is in no respect implicated in the offense."

The instruction given to the jury in the instant case omits the cautionary portion thereof, and inserts the word "not" after the word "will," and before the word "sustain." In commenting upon this instruction, the Supreme Court of Florida stated that, while it was somewhat inartificially worded, it substantially set forth the correct rule of law as laid down in that state. While instruction No. 4, as given by the trial court in this case, might not, in and of itself, be held sufficient to compel a reversal of the judgment, it is not a correct statement of the law. The instruction tells the jury that the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice will not sustain a verdict, but the jury is immediately advised that, if the testimony of an accomplice carries conviction, and if the jury be convinced of its truth, the jury shall give to it the same effect as would be allowed to a witness who is in no respect implicated in the offense. This is not correct. No matter if the jury be convinced of the truth of the testimony of an accomplice, such testimony cannot be given the same effect as may be given the testimony of one who is not implicated in an offense, unless such testimony be corroborated by evidence tending to connect the defendant with the crime charged, separate and apart from the testimony of the accomplice. In any view that may be taken of this instruction, it leads to a confused state of thought, and does not place before the jury a clear or accurate statement of their province when acting upon the testimony of an accomplice.

Our attention is called by respondent to the language of this court in the case of People v. Hoosier, 24 Cal. App. 746, 142 P. 514, where this court, speaking through Mr. Justice Hart, said:

"If there is other evidence which measures up to the requirement of said section tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime charged, then the testimony of the accomplice is to be considered by the jury, as is any other testimony, and given such weight as they may conclude that it is entitled to."

This is far different from telling the jury that the testimony of an accomplice may be given the same effect as the testimony of one who is not an accomplice. One requires corroboration before it can be given any effect; the other may be acted upon independently. The language of the instruction, which, for convenience, we have called No. 4, fails to make this distinction, and directly tends to leave the jury in doubt as to just what the powers of the jury may be under such circumstances. As we have stated, the opinion in the Florida case sets forth the law only where conviction is permitted upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. As no instruction was requested, based upon the language of subdivision 4 of section 2061, Code of Civil Procedure, comment upon its constitutionality would, so far as this case is concerned, be mere obiter, and therefore is omitted.

[8] In view of the instructions given to the jury as hereinbefore stated, which we must hold to be erroneous, does section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution apply? We think not. The corroborating testimony in this case is just barely sufficient to warrant sending it to the jury upon count 1 set forth in the indictment. It is one of the borderline cases where it became necessary to search the transcript diligently in order to cull therefrom sufficient testimony tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime charged before it could be said that there was any corroborating testimony whatever. Without the giving of the erroneous instructions to which we have adverted, we cannot say that the jury would have brought in a verdict of guilty. Where the people elect to avail themselves of the testimony of one of a band of thieves, section 1111 of the Penal Code and the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state apply, and we have nothing to do with the policy of the law as enunciated in that section.

Some minor points have been raised by the appellant, but they are not of sufficient importance to demand consideration in this opinion.

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment and order of the trial court are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: HART, Acting P. J.; WEY-AND, Justice pro tem.

86 Cal. App. 332

JONES v. POLICE COURT OF CITY OF ALHAMBRA et al. (Civ. 5092.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 25, 1927.

1. Criminal law § 258(3)—Imposing penalty for violation of vagrancy law of $300 or 300 days held within police court's power (Pen. Code, §§ 1205, 1446, and § 647, subd. 5).

Imposition by police judge of a fine, for violation of the vagrancy law (Pen. Code, § 647, subd. 5), of $300 or a sentence of 300 days or such proportionate part of 300 days as was not paid by fine, held warranted under section 1446; section 1205, that $2 must be allowed for each day's imprisonment, not being applicable to proceedings in justices' or police courts.

2. Certiorari § 49—Return to writ of review constitutes answer and evidence, case being heard thereon, unless, upon motion, additional or amended return is made.

The return to the writ of review constitutes the answer as well as the evidence, and the case is heard thereon unless, upon motion, an additional or amended return is made.

3. Criminal law § 90(2)—Police court held to have jurisdiction of vagrancy prosecution (Pen. Code, § 647, subd. 5).

Police court held to have jurisdiction of the subject-matter, where defendant was accused of violation of Pen. Code, § 647, subd. 5, relative to vagrancy.

4. Criminal law § 1134(7)—That evidence was insufficient to sustain conviction could not be raised by certiorari, being matter for appeal.

Certiorari held not proper remedy to raise question whether evidence was sufficient to sus-tain conviction of petitioner for vagrancy in police court, proper method being by appeal.

5. Criminal law § 260(2)—Where appeal could have been taken from conviction in police court to superior court, resort could not be had to writ of review (Pen. Code, §§ 1466-1470; Code Civ. Proc. § 1068).

Where an appeal from conviction for vagrancy in police court could have been taken to superior court under Pen. Code, §§ 1466-1470, resort could not be had to a writ of review, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1068, even though time for appeal had elapsed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Petition by B. H. Jones for certiorari to the Police Court of the City of Alhambra and another to review a judgment of that court. Petition denied, judgment affirmed, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Paul M. Nash and Charles P. Huey, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

T. C. Gould, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

COLLIER, Justice pro tem. B. H. Jones, the appellant, was arrested by police officers of the city of Alhambra. A complaint was duly filed against him in the police court of said city, charging that:

"On the 11th day of June, 1923, in said county of Los Angeles, state of California, a misdemeanor was committed by B. H. Jones, as follows: That the said B. H. Jones did at the time and place last aforesaid was wilfully and unlawfully a lewd and dissolute person. All of which is contrary to the form, force and effect," etc.

Thereafter a warrant was issued, and on June 13, 1923, the defendant was duly arraigned. The complaint was read to him, and he was informed of all of his legal rights; he pleaded not guilty, whereupon a trial by the court was had, a jury having been waived. Witnesses for the prosecution and defense were sworn and testified, and on June 14, 1923, the court found Jones guilty and entered judgment that Jones pay a fine of $300, and in case said fine be not paid by 12 o'clock noon of July 14, 1923, that Jones be imprisoned in the county jail of Los Angeles county until the fine be satisfied in the proportion of 1 day's imprisonment for every dollar of the fine, and on the payment of such portion of said fine as should not be satisfied by imprisonment at said rate that Jones be discharged from custody. Jones gave notice of appeal. Thereafter a proposed statement on appeal was delivered to said police judge, but was returned by him to the attorney for the appellant, and was not filed, for the reason that it did not contain a true statement of the evidence produced at said trial.

Thereafter Jones filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county his petition for review. From the judgment of affirmance therein this appeal is taken. The affidavit of his attorney filed therewith recites that after said proposed statement of appeal was returned to said attorney by said police judge, said attorney prepared a new statement of appeal, incorporating therein the amendments proposed by said police judge, and returned the same to said police judge for signature, but that said police judge refused and still refuses to sign the same.

The return of said police judge to said writ of review recites the delivery to him of said first proposed statement, and his return then says, "that thereafter and up to the present time no new or true statement of appeal has been filed." There is, therefore, a clear contradiction in the record as to that matter. It does not appear that any legal effort was made by mandamus or otherwise to compel said police judge to sign any statement on appeal. The appeal was never perfected.

The writ of review came on duly for hearing and was submitted to said superior court on briefs. Apparently no evidence was taken (for none is presented in the transcript herein). Both sides rely on the written record composed of the petition for the writ, the affidavits attached thereto, the writ itself, and the return of the police judge, all of which are before us. Thereafter the superior court duly entered its judgment denying said petition and affirming the judgment of said police court. From that judgment of said superior court Jones appeals.

The appellant presents but one point with several subheads, as follows: (1) That the police court judgment was irregular and void for the following reasons:

(a) Because the trial of the police judge exceeded his authority when he imposed the alternative penalty of imprisonment that in lieu of the payment of a fine the defendant should be imprisoned for 300 days, relying upon that portion of section 1205 of the Penal Code, as follows:

"But the judgment must specify the extent of the imprisonment, which must not exceed one day for every two dollars of the fine, nor extend in any case beyond the term for which the defendant might be sentenced to imprisonment for the offense of which he has been convicted."

(b) That the return does not disclose "any evidence upon which the appellant was convicted of the crime charged, and hence the return does not certify the facts showing the court's jurisdiction."

(c) That the remedy through a writ of review has not been lost by failure to perfect the appeal.

[1] We will discuss the points in the order above set forth. Appellant's point (a) is clearly untenable. Section 1205 of the Penal Code has no application to proceedings in justices' or police courts. Section 1446 of the Penal Code is the one which applies. Under the latter section the judgment pronounced was one within the power of the police court. See In re Kennerly, 190 Cal. 774, 214 P. 857, where the question has been exhaustively discussed and determined by Mr. Justice Wilbur, and his opinion concurred in by the full court. See, also, In re Glavich, 196 Cal. 723, 239 P. 708; In re Kinney, 53 Cal. App. 792, 200 P. 966; and In re Adams, 61 Cal. App. 239, 214 P. 469.

[2] Coming now to appellant's point (b):

"The return to the writ constitutes the answer, as well as evidence, and the case is heard thereon, unless upon motion an additional or amended return is made." Stumpf v. Supervisors, 131 Cal. 364, 366, 63 P. 663, 664 (82 Am. St. Rep. 350). (Italics ours.)

"The province of certiorari is to review the record of an inferior court, board, or tribunal, and to determine from the record whether such court, board, or tribunal has exceeded its jurisdiction. The reviewing court is bound by the record, which must be taken as true. If the contrary is the fact, it must be corrected by motion or suggestion to the court below. Roe v. Superior Court, 60 Cal. 93." Halpern v. Superior Court, 190 Cal. 386, 212 P. 917. (Italics ours.)

The rule to be applied in the instant case is well stated in the following language:

"The rule that when a court once obtains jurisdiction of the subject-matter of an action, it then has jurisdiction to decide a question arising therein erroneously as well as correctly, has no application to a case where the very question to be determined is whether the court has the legal authority to hear and determine the matter before it. The rule simply means that when the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and makes error during the course of the trial or in its final decision, such error is correctible, not through a jurisdictional writ, but solely by appeal. Obviously, if the trial court is called upon to decide whether it has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action and determines the question erroneously, or, having no jurisdiction, nevertheless claims it, it can be prevented from proceeding to exercise the usurped authority or, having exercised it, its action may be annulled and vacated by means of the remedy appropriate thereto." Rich v. Superior Court, 31 Cal. App. 689, 694, 161 P. 291, 293. (Italics ours.)

[3] It needs no citation of authority to show that the police court of the city of Alhambra had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, to wit, a violation of subdivision 5 of section 647 of the Penal Code. That being so, the "jurisdictional" error claimed by appellant is that:

"It appears from the return to the alternative writ that there was an entire absence of facts showing upon what basis of accusation or proof the offense of 'vagrancy' or 'lewd conduct' could be, or was, established. It is not sufficient to declare a citizen of California a vagrant, or a lewd person, without some proof to establish the assertion. We cannot indulge the conjecture. Nothing in the mentioned 'return' nor in the several purported statements of fact, as shown in the proposed appeal, cast any light upon the subject."

[4] This is but another method of saying that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the judgment; in other words, that the court has made an "error during the course of the trial or in its final decision," but we are at once met with that portion of the rule just quoted, that "such error is correctible, not through a jurisdictional writ, but solely by appeal." Rich v. Superior Court, supra. "Where a court is invested with jurisdiction to determine the question of the guilt or innocence of one charged with a public offense, as was the police court in this case, by the filing of the complaint and by acquiring jurisdiction over the person of the defendant, its determination on the question of guilt or innocence, whether based on sufficient evidence or not, is a determination arrived at in the exercise of its jurisdiction, and however erroneous it may be, it is not void for want of power in the court to render the decision. Invested with the jurisdiction to determine the matter, the court has the power to determine it wrongly upon the evidence as well as correctly, and, under our law, the defendant's only remedy in the event of an incorrect decision is by appeal. On certiorari, as approvingly quoted in Matter of Hughes, supra [159 Cal. 360, 113 P. 684], 'upon every question except the mere question of power, the action of the inferior tribunal is final and conclusive.' In such a case a claim of insufficiency of evidence to show guilt of the offense charged does not go to the jurisdiction. It has been said that 'an exception to the rule that the sufficiency of the evidence will not be reviewed is made when the question is whether jurisdictional facts were or were not proved' (Stumpf v. Board of Supervisors, 131 Cal. 364, 367, 63 P. 663, 82 Am. St. Rep. 350), that is, whether facts upon which the jurisdiction of a board or inferior tribunal depends were or were not proved. We have in our reports many decisions wherein this exception has been applied, the case in which this declaration was made being one, and the case of Thrasher v. Board of Medical Examiners, 44 Cal. App. 26 [185 P. 1006], relied on by petitioner, being another. But the exception has no application whatever to a tribunal invested with jurisdiction to try and determine a fact in issue, with reference to proof of that fact. In such a case that fact is not what is known as a 'jurisdictional fact.' It is the fact to be determined by the court having jurisdiction to determine it, and the determination of such court thereon is not void, however defective the evidence upon which it is based. (See 15 Corp. Jur. p. 729, §§ 25 and 26.)" Roberts v. Police Court, 185 Cal. 65, 68, 69, 195 P. 1053, 1054. (Italics as quoted.) See, also, Halpern v. Superior Court, supra, and Fleming v. Superior Court, 196 Cal. 344, 238 P. 88.

Hence we conclude that the police court of the city of Alhambra had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and that the other questions raised by appellant under this point cannot be presented in this proceeding.

We will now discuss point (c). All questions raised by the appellant on this appeal could have been determined by an appeal to the superior court.

The jurisdiction of a police or justice's court to hear or determine any case may be settled by an appeal to the superior court. Hochheimer & Co. v. Superior Court, 65 Cal. App. 206, 223 P. 564. Our Penal Code, §§ 1466 to 1470, provides for such appeals.

Section 1068 of the Code of Civil Procedure governs the issuance of a writ of certiorari. "From this provision it is made manifest that three concurring requisites are essential to the issuance of the writ of review, viz.: 1. An excess of jurisdiction by the inferior tribunal, etc., exercising judicial functions. 2. That there is no appeal. 3. That there is no other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. * * * That the writ will not lie under our statutes where there is a remedy by appeal is equally settled by the Code of Civil Procedure, and by the adjudications of this court" (citing cases). Noble v. Superior Court, 109 Cal. 523, 526, 42 P. 155, 156. (Italics ours.) "What is meant by the words, 'there is no appeal,' is not an open question. It is settled that, if the law has provided for an appeal but the time for taking it has been suffered to elapse, the writ of certiorari cannot be resorted to as a substitute. Milliken v. Huber, 21 Cal. 166; Bennett v. Wallace, 43 Cal. 25." Faut v. Mason, 47 Cal. 7, 8. "The statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1067) was intended to supply a remedy where none existed in the first instance." Bennett v. Wallace, 43 Cal. 25. It was never intended that it should be substituted for an appeal. Faut v. Mason, 47 Cal. 7." Valentine v. Police Court, 141 Cal. 615, 617, 75 P. 336.

In Postal, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 22 Cal. App. 770, 774, 136 P. 538, 539, it was also said:

"It is not, of course, the consideration whether the petitioner takes advantage of the right of appeal, but whether the right of appeal exists in his favor that is decisive of the question. For instance, he cannot allow the time for appeal to lapse and then successfully urge this circumstance as a legal justification for the writ of certiorari." (Italics ours.)

[5] We may well conclude this opinion with the following:

"That the defendant might have appealed to the superior court from the * * * judgment there can be no question. And it is well settled that when an appeal may be taken resort cannot be had to a writ of review. The cases so holding are numerous and need not be cited." Tucker v. Justice's Court, 120 Cal. 512, 514, 52 P. 808.

See, also, Stuttmeister v. Superior Court, 71 Cal. 322, 12 P. 270; Noble v. Superior Court, 109 Cal. 523, 526, 42 P. 155; Elliott v. Superior Court, 144 Cal. 506, 77 P. 1109, 103 Am. St. Rep. 102; Candeias v. Superior Court, 51 Cal. App. 128, 196 P. 86; Olcese v. Justice's Court, 156 Cal. 82, 84, 103 P. 317; Hochheimer & Co. v. Superior Court, supra.

It follows from the foregoing that the judgment appealed from must be and it is hereby affirmed.

GILMAN et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR NEVADA COUNTY.★
(Civ. 3339.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 22, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 19, 1927.

1. Pleading ⚡252(2)—Admitting original complaint and attaching it to amendment rendered amended complaint immune from collateral attack, since original complaint was superseded.

Where there was doubt as to whether amended complaint superseded original complaint or was amendment thereto, since court admitted original complaint, and permitted it to be attached to the amended complaint, amended complaint was immune from collateral attack because original complaint was superseded by amended complaint.

2. Injunction ⚡219—Failure to allege that defendants claimed interest in property adverse to judgment liens held not to render judgment void in contempt proceedings.

In suit to enjoin directors of corporation from transferring its property to defraud plaintiff and create unlawful preference, conceding that complaint was defective in failing to allege that defendants other than corporation claimed some interest in property adverse to plaintiff's judgment liens, such defect did not render judgment void as against directors when sought to be punished for contempt for violation of judgment's injunctive provisions.

3. Injunction ⚡223(1)—Assertion, in violation of restraining order, of interest adverse to judgment liens, held to constitute "contempt."

Where corporation's directors were restrained from asserting claim to interest in corporation's property adverse to judgment liens of plaintiff, assertion by defendant directors in another county of adverse claims held to constitute "contempt."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Contempt.]

4. Fraudulent conveyances ⚡255(2)—All persons claiming present interest or affected by decree are necessary parties defendant in action to set aside fraudulent conveyances.

Generally, all persons claiming present interest in property or interest in controversy, or who may be affected by decree, should be made parties to action to set aside fraudulent conveyance.

5. Appeal and error ⚡447—Pending appeal from order granting prohibitive injunction, lower court can punish its violation.

Since prohibitive injunction is self-executing, pending appeal from order granting it, lower court has full power to punish its violation.

Original certiorari by C. E. Gilman and another to review an order of the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Nevada adjudging the petitioners guilty of contempt. Judgment in contempt proceeding affirmed.

Sherman & Peters and Marcel E. Cerf, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

E. E. Wright, of Los Angeles, Lynne Kelly, of Grass Valley, and Henry B. Neville, of Downieville, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an original proceeding to review the action of the respondent in adjudging the petitioners guilty of contempt of court.

December 5, 1925, the Alpha Hardware & Supply Company commenced an action in the superior court of Nevada county against the Ruby Mines Company and other defendants, including the petitioners herein. The complaint therein set up six alleged causes of action, in the first five of which judgment was entered in favor of the defendants. In the sixth cause of action it is alleged that the Ruby Mines Company "is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $4,838.19 on account of" five judgments in favor of plaintiff or its assignors against the defendant company; that all of the judgments have been docketed in Sierra county, and constitute liens on all real property of the Ruby Mines Company in that county; that said company is the owner of the lands in Sierra county described in the trust deed hereinafter referred to; that petitioners and other defendants were the directors of the Ruby Mines Company, and, as such directors, "for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding plaintiff and plaintiff's said assignors, and creating an unlawful preference or gift to the defendant Dwight Hutchinson, * * * and without any valuable consideration therefor, * * * caused to be executed * * * the promissory note and deed of trust * * * described in Exhibit A attached hereto and made a part hereof"; that the Ruby Mines Company "has never at any time been indebted to any of the defendants herein"; that "defendant M. C. Mitchell claims some right, title, or interest in and to said property under and by virtue of said trust deed, and that defendants H. L. Breed and W. M. Thornton, trustees named in said trust deed, and defendant M. C. Mitchell, have taken, and are prosecuting, proceedings under the terms and conditions of said trust deed * * * to sell said property * * * and to foreclose all the right, title, and interest of said defendant, the Ruby Mines Company, in and to said property"; that executions upon said judgments were issued and "returned wholly unsatisfied"; that the defendant Ruby Mines Company is insolvent; that it is controlled by said defendant directors, and "is prevented by said defendants from taking any action to pay the indebtedness owing to plaintiff as aforesaid"; and that the petitioners herein and certain other defendants are stockholders of the Ruby Mines Company, and were such when the alleged debts were incurred. The alleged trust deed was executed by the Ruby Mines Company to Breed and Thornton as trustees to secure the payment of its promissory note to Hutchinson for $40,000.

The defendants demurred to the complaint, and apparently it is conceded that the demurrer was sustained, although the petition does not so allege. Thereafter the plaintiff filed a pleading, designated as "First Amended Complaint," and, in so far as material here, reading as follows:

"Now comes the above named plaintiff, and amends the complaint on file herein as follows, to wit: * * * That paragraphs I to VI, both paragraphs inclusive, in the sixth cause of action, set forth in the original complaint, are hereby referred to and made a part hereof as fully for all purposes as if set forth at length herein; that the deed of trust attached to said original complaint is hereby referred to and made a part hereof as fully for all purposes as if set forth at length herein."

The sixth cause of action, as stated in the original complaint, contained but six paragraphs. The prayer of the amended complaint is for judgment:

"That each of said defendants may be required to set forth the nature of his claim in and to the stock, note, trust deed, and property of said defendant, Ruby Mines Company, or either of them, and that all adverse claims of the said defendants, or either of them, be determined by this court; * * * that it be adjudged, decreed, and determined that said deed of trust and promissory note are fraudulent and void; * * * that the title of said defendant, Ruby Mines Company, in and to the said property, be quieted against any and all claims of said defendants; * * * that said defendants, other than said defendant, Ruby Mines Company, * * * be forever debarred from asserting any claim whatever in or to said land, property, and premises adverse to the said defendant, Ruby Mines Company, or to the said liens of this plaintiff; * * * and for such other and further relief as is meet and agreeable to equity."

The defendants other than the Ruby Mines Company demurred to the amended complaint, and, their demurrer being overruled, they answered the allegations of the original complaint referred to in the amended complaint. Upon the issues so framed, the court found, among other facts, as follows:

That the Ruby Mines Company is the owner of the real property described in the trust deed; that the alleged judgments in favor of plaintiff constitute valid liens thereon; that the trust deed is a fraudulent conveyance, "executed for the purpose * * * of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of said defendant Ruby Mines Company and * * * plaintiff and plaintiff's assignors, in the collection of the several debts then owing them from said defendant, Ruby Mines Company; * * * that plaintiff's claims and liens in and upon the title to said real property are superior to the right, title, and interest of said defendants, and each of them, in and to said real property."

Judgment was entered on the findings, canceling the said promissory note and trust deed; adjudging that the Ruby Mines Company is the owner of the real property in controversy, subject to plaintiff's judgment liens, but "not subject to any valid right, title, estate, lien, or interest of any or all the other defendants, * * * and that the aforesaid judgment liens of plaintiff are superior to the claims of all such * * * defendants; that said defendants, and each and every of them, * * * be, and they are hereby, forever debarred and restrained from asserting any claim whatever in or to said real property and premises, or any part thereof, adverse to the said defendant, Ruby Mines Company, or adverse to the said judgment liens of plaintiff."

The petitioners herein and certain other defendants appealed from the judgment, and thereafter commenced an action in the superior court of Sierra county against the Ruby Mines Company, the Alpha Hardware & Supply Company, and others to have it adjudged "that the claims and liens of the defendant Alpha Hardware & Supply Company and its assignors, against the hereinabove described properties (the real properties described in the aforesaid trust deed) by virtue of judgments obtained against the Ruby Mines Company, or otherwise, be declared null and void; that the plaintiffs' title be quieted in said properties; * * * that the defendant Ruby Mines Company holds the record title to and possession of the said properties only as trustee for the benefit of the plaintiffs herein"; and that the Alpha Hardware & Supply Company "be forever enjoined and restrained from * * * asserting or enforcing any claims of liens or otherwise, or exercising any acts of ownership or control over the said properties or any part thereof by virtue of any judgments or rights against the defendant Ruby Mines Company, or otherwise."

It is clear that the prosecution of the Sierra county action was a violation of the injunctive provisions of the Nevada county judgment. Petitioners contend that those provisions are void on several grounds.

[1] It is first urged that the judgment is entirely void because the original complaint was superseded by the amended complaint, and that the latter "is no complaint at all"; that the references in the amended complaint to the allegations of the original complaint are wholly ineffectual, because neither the original complaint nor a copy thereof was attached to the amended complaint. It is uncertain whether the amended complaint was intended as such, or merely as an amendment to the original complaint. At the trial the court granted the plaintiff's motion to attach the original complaint to the amended complaint, stating:

"The court will admit the original complaint, and it may be attached to the amendment to the complaint. * * * The original complaint is not admitted as evidence in the case. The court is admitting it as part of the pleadings in the case and attached to the amended complaint."

[2] Surely this rendered the amended complaint immune from collateral attack on the ground urged by petitioners. It is further urged that the complaint as so amended does not state facts sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to render the judgment in question. Conceding that the complaint is defective in failing to allege that the defendants, other than the corporation, claimed some interest in the property adverse to the plaintiff's judgment liens, the defect is not such as to render the judgment void as against the petitioners. In Estate of Ross, 180 Cal. 651, 659, 182 P. 752, 755, it is said:

"It is thoroughly settled in this state that the failure of a complaint to state a cause of action is not a defect going to the jurisdiction of the superior court, and that a judgment given upon such a complaint cannot be held void upon collateral attack. * * * Of course the same thing is true as to an objection that the findings do not support the judgment given."

In another case it is said:

"A judgment is not void if the court has jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, irrespective of whether or not the complaint states a cause of action so long as it apprises the defendant of the nature of the plaintiff's demand." Christerson v. French, 180 Cal. 523, 525, 182 P. 27; Trans-Pacific T. Co. v. Patsy F. & R. Co., 189 Cal. 509, 513, 209 P. 357. "The court having jurisdiction of such an action has power to determine what facts are put in issue by the pleadings, where they are ambiguously or imperfectly stated, and, having such power, it may make an erroneous decision of the question, and such decision cannot be questioned collaterally." Koehler v. Holt Man- ufacturing Company, 146 Cal. 335, 338, 80 P. 73, 74.

[3] Petitioners concede that the Nevada county court "had jurisdiction to render a decree setting aside the deed of trust. Woodbury v. Nevada, etc., Ry. Co., 120 Cal. 463, 52 P. 730." But they contend that the court did not have jurisdiction "to quiet title against unlitigated and unpleaded claims of the individual defendants in the suit." It is true that the judgment purports to quiet title in the Ruby Mines Company, but it was not for the violation of that provision alone that the petitioners were adjudged guilty of contempt. The judgment in the contempt proceeding recites that the petitioners violated the quoted injunctive provisions of the Nevada county judgment by asserting, in the Sierra county case, "a claim or claims in and to said real property and premises referred to in said judgment, adverse to said defendant, Ruby Mines Company, and adverse to the said judgment liens of said plaintiff therein referred to," and that "said claim or claims of said defendants were and are based upon alleged title or titles to said real property alleged by said defendants to have been vested in them prior to the entry of said judgment, and which said claim or claims were concluded by said judgment adversely to said defendants." Irrespective of the finding that petitioners asserted claims which were adverse to the Ruby Mines Company, it was sufficient to constitute a contempt that they asserted claims of interest adverse to the judgment liens of the Alpha Hardware & Supply Company, unless the injunctive provisions of the Nevada county judgment are void. As between that company and the petitioners, the action was one to determine priority of liens or interests rather than to quiet title to the real property.

[4] "The general rule is that all persons claiming a present interest in the property should be made parties defendant in an action to set aside a fraudulent conveyance thereof." 27 C. J. 751. "All persons interested in the controversy or who may be affected by the decree should be made parties to an action to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, though the interest of all may not be affected alike." 12 Cal. Jur. 1048.

In such an action, of course, the court has jurisdiction to restrain a party from further assertion of an invalid claim adversely to a valid claim of another party. Petitioners make no contention to the contrary.

[5] Petitioners contend that the appeal "rendered the judgment ineffective," and that therefore the court was without power to punish them for violation of the injunction. "By a line of decisions beginning with the early history of the state, the rule has been settled that an appeal does not stay the force of a prohibitive injunction. Such an injunction requires no execution for its enforcement. It acts directly without process upon the defendant, or, in other words, it is self-executing, and, pending an appeal from an order granting such injunction, the lower court has full power to punish its violation." 2 Cal. Jur. 439.

The judgment in the contempt proceeding is affirmed.

McGUINNESS et ux. v. LESTER et al.
(Civ. 3309.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 31, 1927.

1. Trusts ⚡93—Purchaser, whose deed includes by mistake lands paid for by another, cannot claim ownership of such other's lands (Civ. Code, § 2224).

Where prospective vendor and purchasers of land agreed that latter would purchase tract in two separate parcels, and a dividing line between such parcels was agreed upon in advance, but, unknown to any of the parties, the dividing line in the deeds subsequently given did not correspond with the line agreed on in advance, so that the purchaser of one part had paid for part of that which the other received by his deed, held, that the purchaser whose deed called for more than the original agreement was not, in view of Civ. Code, § 2224, in a position to claim ownership under his paper title, as against the equitable title of the other purchaser.

2. Trusts ⚡93—Plaintiff had notice of defect in grantor's title to lands paid for by adjoining owner and fenced by him at time plaintiff purchased (Civ. Code, § 19).

Where, through mistake in a deed, one of the purchasers of adjacent land parcels received a paper title to part of the land for which the other paid, one who took conveyance knowing of such mistake in the description and of dispute as to title and that adjoining owner had fenced his lands had such notice, because of Civ. Code, § 19, of the other landowner's rights as to preclude his asserting his rights under the paper title as against one having the equitable title.

3. Evidence ⚡441(8)—Evidence of adjoining owners' oral understanding as to dividing line held admissible in suit by one who purchased with knowledge or notice.

In action to quiet title where defense was that the paper title of plaintiff, due to a mistake, showed the dividing line at a place other than that agreed upon by the parties at the time of plaintiff's grantor's purchase, all of which plaintiff knew, evidence of an oral understanding of the parties at the time plaintiff's grantor purchased was admissible to show the true dividing line.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Henry McGuinness and wife against William Lester and another. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Taylor & Tebbe and J. P. McNamara, all of Yreka, for appellants.

Horace V. Ley, of Yreka, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action to quiet his title to a strip of land of which he holds the record title, but which is in the possession of the defendant Jane Lester and within her inclosure, they being the respective owners of adjoining parcels of land. The defendant William Lester filed a disclaimer, and Jane Lester will be referred to as the defendant. Henry McGuinness will be referred to as the plaintiff. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed.

In the year 1917 the Pacific Improvement Company owned a tract of land near the town of Dunsmuir, containing 80 acres. About 20 acres on the west end of the tract "is waste land, nothing but gravel and overflow." An "old river channel divided the agricultural (land) from the gravel and sand." "There are about 9 acres lying east of the river channel that is flat agricultural land, very good soil." The remainder of the land apparently lies in the hills and is valuable only for the timber upon it. S. D. Root "was a brick mason and handled sand and gravel at Dunsmuir. Mr. Root was figuring on a new project" and "was quite anxious to get this gravel. * * * He didn't want the agricultural land." Dall Kalbaugh and John R. Jones "wanted some additional farming ground. They were putting this land into some vegetable gardens." Root, Kalbaugh, and a representative of the Pacific Improvement Company met upon the ground and there came to an agreement to the effect that Root would purchase the land west of and including the old river channel for $650, and that Kalbaugh and Jones would purchase the remainder of the 80 acres for $2,850. These prices, fixed by the grantor, were based on an estimate of the value of the timber on the respective parcels and the further fact that Kalbaugh and Jones were to get the agricultural land. The purchasers thereafter employed a surveyor who established on the ground the dividing line agreed upon. Subsequently the Pacific Improvement Company entered into separate contracts with the purchasers for the sale of the land to them and later conveyed the land to them by deeds. Both in the contracts and the deeds the boundary line between the two parcels of land was described in accordance with the field notes of the said survey. These field notes do not agree with the boundary line fixed by the purchasers and laid out upon the ground by the surveyor, hence the present controversy. According to such field notes and description, a considerable part of the 9 acres of agricultural land within the defendant's inclosure was conveyed to Root. Kalbaugh and Jones "built a fence together * * * right on the line the surveyor surveyed." This fence has stood in its present location continuously since July 3, 1918, but the evidence does not show definitely when it was built. The land east of the fence has been in the open and notorious possession of the defendant and her predecessors in interest since the early part of 1918. Most of the 9 acres of agricultural land "is now cultivated, and has been from the beginning of the deal." The defendant testified:

"I am familiar with the land mentioned in this case lying east of a certain fence, and have known that land since 1917 and have been living there since the 3d day of July, 1918. The improvements on the land consist of that little house that they were talking about, a barn, woodshed, chicken house, and several cabins. We farm there and raising strawberries. We have water on the place that we get from the mountain above by a 6-inch pipe, 8-inch pipe, and 2-inch pipe. * * * During the time that I resided there, Mr. Root nor any one else claimed the land on our side of the fence. Mr. Root hauled gravel out of there every day for a long time, using his land as a gravel pit, up to the time Mr. McGuinness took it over. I am acquainted with Mr. Root and saw him frequently during the period while he was there. Root never tore the fence, never disputed the fence."

Root conveyed the land which he acquired from the Pacific Improvement Company to the plaintiff. The plaintiff testified:

"I received the deed early in 1924. * * * At the time I was on the premises during the lifetime of John R. Jones, a fence was on the premises. I don't know how many years it has been there. It was there * * * when I purchased from Mr. Root. * * * When I purchased the land I knew that there was a dispute as to where the line was and that Mr. and Mrs. Jones were living there, I didn't know how long. They were living there when I prepared the agreement with the Rainbow Mill & Lumber Company (March 9, 1920), but I don't know how long before that."

The defendant is the successor in interest of Kalbaugh and Jones. The lands were assessed in accordance with the descriptions contained in the deeds executed by the Pacific Improvement Company, and the parties and their predecessors in interest have paid all taxes levied upon their respective lands as so described.

Respondent relies upon the foregoing facts as showing an agreed boundary line. Appellant contends that only the owners of adjoining lands can establish their dividing line by agreement, and that at the time of the agreement proved in this case neither Root nor Kalbaugh and Jones had acquired any interest in either parcel of the land. Respondent also claims title by adverse possession, relying on Price v. De Reyes, 161 Cal. 484, 489, 119 P. 893, Raney v. Merritt, 73 Cal. App. 244, 251, 238 P. 767, and Wagner v. Meinzer, 53 Cal. App. 783, 784, 200 P. 838. It is not necessary to determine either of these questions, nor is it necessary to determine whether, under the principles of law discussed in Grants Pass Land, etc., Co. v. Brown, 168 Cal. 456, 461, 143 P. 754, the plaintiff is estopped to claim any interest in the land in dispute.

[1, 2] The evidence shows without conflict that Root came to an understanding with Kalbaugh and Jones that he would purchase a part of the 80 acres of land involved, and that they would purchase the remainder, which included the land in dispute; that their grantor fixed the prices to be paid by the purchasers in accordance with the estimated values of such respective parcels; that, in pursuance of such understanding, Kalbaugh and Jones purchased and finally paid for the land in dispute at the price so fixed therefor; and that through a mistake in description, unknown to any of the parties to the deeds of conveyance, Root was given a paper title to part of the land so purchased and paid for by Kalbaugh and Jones. The court found:

"That the deeds do not correctly describe the lands as selected by said predecessors in interest, but through a mistake of said predecessors in interest the lines separating the respective parcels of land selected and purchased by each of them was erroneously described in said deeds; that the true line dividing the parcels of land so selected and purchased is marked by the fence now and for more than five years existing upon said line."

Root was not in a position to claim ownership under his paper title as against the equitable title of Kalbaugh and Jones. "One who gains a thing by * * * mistake * * * is, unless he has some other and better right thereto, an involuntary trustee of the thing gained, for the benefit of the person who would otherwise have had it." Civ. Code, § 2224. "The general rule is that the real nature of the transaction concerning property conveyed * * * can be investigated and determined unless where in good faith interests of third parties have intervened and would be injuriously affected. It may be shown that the taking of a conveyance in the name of the grantee, or one of them, was a mistake, * * * or was taken under such circumstances as created a resulting trust or trust of some other character." Parks v. Parks, 179 Cal. 472, 475, 177 P. 455, 456. At the time of his purchase from Root, according to his own testimony, the plaintiff knew, and for several years prior thereto had known, the location of the division fence, and that the defendant and her predecessors in interest held exclusive possession of the land in controversy, and he also knew that there was a dispute as to the location of the dividing line. He was in no sense an innocent purchaser, but, on the contrary, he had at least constructive notice of the defendant's ownership of the land which he now claims under his deed from Root. Civ. Code, § 19; Scott v. Henry, 196 Cal. 666, 671, 239 P. 314; Gibbons v. Yosemite Lumber Co., 190 Cal. 168, 172, 211 P. 4. Plaintiff's rights, therefore, are no greater than were those of his grantor.

[3] Appellant contends that the trial court erred in admitting evidence of the oral understanding between Root and Kalbaugh and Jones relative to the division of the land to be purchased by them. What has already been said shows that such evidence was properly admitted. There is no evidence in the record which would warrant a judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

TAYLOR v. VOLFI. (Civ. 3300.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 22, 1927.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨705(2)—Automobile driver held negligent in not seeing plaintiff's automobile approaching from right at intersection.

In action for injuries suffered in an automobile collision occurring at intersection, testimony by defendant that he was traveling 15 to 17 miles per hour and looking to the left, and did not see plaintiff's automobile approaching from the right until he was within 3 or 4 feet of it, and did not turn to right to see if there was any car at right showed that defendant was negligent.

2. New trial ⇨71—Trial ⇨139(1)—New trial is allowable under conflicting evidence if verdict is against weight of evidence, but nonsuit or directed verdict cannot be granted unless evidence, as matter of law, fails to support verdict.

Trial court may grant motion for new trial, notwithstanding there may be substantial conflict in evidence on every material issue, if, in opinion of court, verdict is contrary to weight of evidence, but trial court cannot grant motion for nonsuit or direct verdict for defendant unless evidence is insufficient, as matter of law, to support verdict for plaintiff.

3. New trial ⇨70—New trial for insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict for plaintiff held properly allowed under evidence, raising justifiable inference that plaintiff was negligent.

Where evidence in action for injuries from automobile collision showed defendant was guilty of negligence continuing up to collision, and justifiable, though not necessary, inference from plaintiff's testimony was that he did not exercise ordinary care to avoid collision in failing to stop after becoming aware of probability thereof through continuing negligence of defendant, it was not error for court to grant new trial on ground of insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict for plaintiff.

4. New trial ⇨70—Trial court is not bound by implied findings of jury, if evidence sustains contrary findings.

In passing on motion for new trial, trial court is not bound by implied findings of jury, if there is sufficient evidence to sustain contrary findings.

5. Negligence ⇨100—Whether defendant was grossly negligent is immaterial in determining defense of contributory negligence.

In action for injuries resulting from automobile collision at intersection, it is immaterial in determining defense of contributory negligence whether defendant was guilty of gross negligence or not.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Action by Leonard T. Taylor against John Volfi, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, and W. H. Hatfield, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Irving D. Gibson, of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages suffered in an automobile collision, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. The answer denies the allegations of negligence and alleges that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The defendant also filed a cross-complaint for the recovery of damages to his automobile, alleged to have been caused by the plaintiff's negligence. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for damages in the sum of $6,139 and against the defendant on his cross-complaint. Judgment was entered accordingly. The defendant thereafter moved the court for a new trial, and the motion was granted on the "ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain or justify the verdict." This appeal is from the order granting the motion.

The collision occurred at the intersection of Thirty-Sixth street and Fourth avenue, in the city of Sacramento. Sacramento boulevard, running from northwest to southeast, includes within its boundary lines the northeast corner of such intersection. At the time of the collision the plaintiff was driving his automobile north along Thirty-Sixth street and the defendant was driving his machine, a half-ton Ford delivery truck, east on Fourth avenue.

[1] The defendant testified that he was traveling 15 to 17 miles an hour; that he was looking to the left at an automobile on Sacramento boulevard and did not see plaintiff's automobile until he was within 3 or 4 feet of it, "or a little bit more"; and that he "did not turn to the right side to see if there was any car at the right." It is clear that such conduct on the part of the defendant constituted negligence.

The plaintiff testified that he had reached about the south curb line of Fourth avenue, when he looked to the left and—

"saw a machine (that of defendant) coming up this street * * * about 10 feet outside of the intersection, and he (defendant) was looking around; I started in blowing my horn. I supposed he would see me. * * * He did not look at all until he struck me. * * * I was going not any faster than 6 miles an hour. * * * The motor was cold and would not pick up. I just got in the high gear. * * * He was looking around to his left, around back, like he was looking in his machine. * * * He was traveling * * * 25 to 30 miles an hour. * * *

"Q. Why didn't you stop? A. I thought I had plenty of time to go in front when I first saw him. * * * If I could have speeded up my motor, I would have got across. I could not speed it up on account of it being cold. * * * I thought the man would look around and see me. * * * He did not look around, * * * never looked around at all. * * *

"Q. Did he slacken up any? A. He did not. * * * He was looking right around back into the machine.

"Q. Could you see what he had there inside of his machine? A. Looked to me like he was working something back. * * * I did not realize but what he was going to stop. I had plenty of time to stop—plenty of time when I saw him 10 feet below the crossing. * * *

"Q. You could have stopped your car coming in here at 6 miles an hour? A. I could have stopped; yes. * * *

"Q. Do I understand your testimony now, that Mr. Volfi was looking around the whole time, from the time you first saw him until this accident happened? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did not turn his head at all? A. No, sir."

In appellant's opening brief it is said:

"The true test of the question as to whether the trial court was correct in granting the defendant's motion for new trial could be reached by determining the question as to whether * * * the trial court, * * * upon exactly the same evidence, * * * could grant a motion for a nonsuit."

[2] The distinction between the power of the trial court to grant a motion for a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence and that to grant a motion for a nonsuit or a directed verdict has been pointed out so often that citation of authorities on the question is deemed unnecessary. The trial court has the power to grant a motion for a new trial, notwithstanding there may be a substantial conflict in the evidence upon every material issue, if, in the opinion of the court, the verdict is contrary to the weight of the evidence, but such court is not authorized to grant a motion for a nonsuit or to direct a verdict for the defendant unless, as a matter of law, the evidence is insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff.

[3, 4] It is clear in this case that the defendant was guilty of negligence, and that his negligence continued up to the very instant of the collision. A justifiable, though not a necessary, inference from the plaintiff's testimony is that he did not exercise ordinary care to avoid the collision, in failing to stop, after becoming aware of the probability thereof through the continuing negligence of the defendant. As said by appellant in another part of his brief:

"Whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, or whether any acts or omissions on his part, caused or directly contributed to the accident, * * * were questions of fact peculiarly to be determined by the jury."

In passing on a motion for a new trial, however, the trial court is not bound by the implied findings of the jury if there is sufficient evidence to sustain contrary findings.

[5] Appellant contends that the defendant was guilty of gross negligence, and that, in such a case, contributory negligence is not a defense. "It makes no difference in the analysis of a defense based upon the contributory negligence of a person injured or killed whether the negligence of the defendant was gross, ordinary, or slight." Tucker v. United Railroads, 171 Cal. 702, 704, 154 P. 835, 836.

The order is affirmed.

In proceeding to recover compensation for injuries, finding by Industrial Commission that workman hired by foreman working under supervision of contractor, and injured in performing work necessary to carry out contractor's agreement, was employee of supervising contractor, held justified by evidence sustaining award of compensation, notwithstanding contract with owner provided for payment of fixed sum to contractor for services and equipment, in addition to day wages.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279) by Clyde Rhone, employee, opposed by A. M. Thompson, employer and the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, insurance carrier. From an order of the Industrial Accident Commission, awarding compensation for injuries, the insurance carrier brings certiorari. Award affirmed.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

YORK, J. On writ of review of a finding and award by the Industrial Accident Commission, rendered in favor of one Clyde Rhone and against petitioner, as insurance carrier of A. M. Thompson.

The sole question raised is whether or not Clyde Rhone was an employee of Thompson, alleged to be the contractor in charge of the work. It is admitted that Thompson was a supervising contractor and "builder," the terms of whose contract are hereinafter stated. He denies that he ever employed Clyde Rhone, and there is evidence to show that he had no direct knowledge of the employment of Rhone until he received a time-card and made out a check in Clyde Rhone's favor for the amount of this card.

At the time of the injury Rhone was working on certain iron grill work, and was injured by a piece of steel or iron flying from the hammer and anvil to his eye and lodging in the eye, which later necessitated the removal of the eye itself.

Petitioner's claim of nonliability rests upon the further claim that Rhone was not an employee of Thompson, and that Louis E. Plummer, the owner of the job at Fullerton for which the ironwork was being prepared, was paying Thompson only a fixed sum for his services in building the house, and was furnishing Thompson the money to make payments for material and labor as the work progressed in sums of approximately $1,000 at a time. Although in his answer Thompson denies that the applicant in the proceedings before the Industrial Accident Commission had received a check for the sum of $15.41, "or for any other sum, from this answering defendant as his employer," yet Mr. Plummer testified at the hearing:

"Q. (by Referee). How did this grill work happen to be turned over to the boys in the structural iron course of the school? A. At my suggestion to Mr. Thompson.

"Q. Who took up the matter with Mr. Hart, you or Mr. Thompson? A. I took the matter up with him informally; all plans, drawings, etc., were submitted to him by Mr. Thompson.

* * *

"Q. Mr. Plummer, who paid for the materials that went into the ironwork on your job? A. Mr. Thompson."

Hart was acting as foreman of this work, under supervision of Thompson.

Mr. Plummer's testimony as to the contract and its terms is best set forth in the exhibit following, which he testified fully set out the only agreement with Contractor Thompson:

"Defendant Plummer's Exhibit 1.

"Harry Kenneth Vaughn, Architect,

"736 So. Flower St., Los Angeles.

"30th November, 1925.

"Mr. Louis E. Plummer, Fullerton Union High School, Fullerton, California.—Dear Louis: The following is a confirmation and memo of changes and suggestions regarding the drawings and specifications; also methods of procedure pertaining to the building of your residence.

"Decision was made to have the house built by Mr. A. M. Thompson. He was to charge $400 for his services and equipment, and in addition to receive $1 per hour for the time he is actually engaged as a workman or mechanic on the building.

"Mr. Thompson's estimated cost was $12,593 complete, as per plans and specifications, exclusive of painting. The foregoing estimate is to be reduced by certain revision and changes in the drawings and specifications.

"Before ordering any material, the builder is to submit to the owner for his approval the quantity of materials, the estimated cost in unit and in total, and the names of the person or persons or firms from whom the purchase is to be made.

"Portions of the material and all of the labor are to be paid by check by the contractor. At a time agreed upon, the contractor is to submit an itemized statement with the bills to the owner. Upon approval of the same, the owner is to deposit money to the contractor's credit for the payment of the labor and material called for in the statement, or an approved revision of the same.

"Permit for the building to be taken out for the amount of $10,000, by the contractor.

"Very faithfully,

"[Signed] Harry K. Vaughn."

It was stipulated at the hearing that Clyde Rhone received between June 12, 1925, and July 12, 1925, the total sum of $116.74, this being at the rate of 35 cents per hour, and it was further stipulated that such sum should be considered as the applicant's earnings as an ornamental iron worker during that period. The evidence shows that the $15.41 received by Rhone from Thompson was paid by Mr. Thompson out of amounts paid to him to his credit as such contractor for the purpose of paying "for the labor and material called for in the statement, or approved revision of the same."

The commission has made its direct finding on the foregoing evidence and other evidence taken, which showed in detail the nature of the work to be done, and the persons ordering the same, and the supervision or exercising of supervision over the work and the employee, Rhone, and has made a direct finding that at the time Clyde Rhone was injured he was performing work as an employee of Thompson, and was to be paid by Thompson as the contractor supervising the entire work.

It is plain that Rhone was the employee of some one. He was hired directly by Hart, but the evidence shows that Hart was an employee, and in engaging the services of Rhone was acting as such employee. Both of them were working for Hart's employer, and the liability for injury to Rhone is necessarily the liability of that employer. Under the terms of the building contract, as evidently understood and acted upon by the several parties, the commission was justified in finding that the men working under Thompson, on the jobs necessary to carry out his agreement, were his employees.

The award is affirmed.

GAMBLE v. UTLEY. (Civ. 4970.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 28, 1927.

1. Garnishment $\S$ 63—Salary of district attorney is not subject to garnishment, office being created by Constitution (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 710; Const. art. 11, $\S$ 5).

Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 710, providing for garnishment of moneys owing a judgment debtor from any county, city, or other municipal or public corporation, is not applicable to salary received by a district attorney, such office being created by Const. art. 11, $\S$ 5.

2. Exemptions $\S$ 48(1)—Exemption statute is not restricted to those who do physical labor (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 690).

Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 690, exempting earnings of a debtor for his family, supported in whole or part by his labor, is not restricted to physical laborers.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Garnishment proceeding by A. W. Gamble against Ernest R. Utley. From an order releasing certain money from garnishment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robert G. Hill, of El Centro, for appellant.

Harry W. Horton, of El Centro, for respondent.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. This is a proceeding under section 710 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing for garnishment of moneys owing a judgment debtor from any county, city and county, city, or other municipal or public corporation. In this proceeding the county auditor filed his warrant for the sum of $250 with the clerk of the court in the above-named action. The defendant filed notice of motion to order said sum paid to the defendant, upon the ground that said sum is the earnings of a judgment debtor for his personal services rendered within 30 days next preceding the levy of the garnishment, and that said earnings are necessary for the use of his family, residing in this state, and supported in the whole by his labor; and upon the further ground that the sum garnished is the compensation of a constitutional officer of the state of California and is, therefore, not subject to garnishment under the provisions of section 710 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In support of the motion the defendant filed an affidavit stating:

That he "receives a monthly compensation of $250 per month from the county of Imperial in full compensation for all his services rendered as said district attorney. That the income of affiant does not exceed the total sum of $250 per month, and that affiant has no other or further income than the said sum of $250 per month received as compensation as district attorney of the aforesaid county of Imperial. That the said income of $250 a month and the whole thereof of this affiant above mentioned is necessary for the use of affiant's family residing in the city of El Centro, county of Imperial, state of California, and that the said family consists of his wife, a minor daughter and affiant himself, and that said three named persons are supported, in whole by the labor, services, and compensation of affiant as district attorney of the county of Imperial. That affiant is the head of a family consisting of his wife and minor daughter and himself, all of whom reside together in the said city of El Centro, and each and all of said persons are dependent entirely upon the earnings of affiant for their support and maintenance and the necessities of life, and that all of the earnings of said defendant as said district attorney are necessary and indispensable for the use and support of his family, and that affiant has no other earnings and receives no other compensation than as herein mentioned."

Plaintiff filed three counter affidavits, one of Robert G. Hill, a resident of El Centro, stating:

"That a grocery account of $50 per month is sufficient for the necessary provisions for a family consisting of the husband and wife and one child about 6 years old of the defendant; that $40 per month rent for a house in which to reside is a suitable and appropriate expenditure for house rent; that $60 per month in addition thereto is a sufficient sum for any and all necessary expenditures for a family, making a total of $150 which is sufficient to support the family of the defendant herein per month."

Another of C. H. Whitecotton, stating:

"That he resides in Imperial county, Cal., and is working for Imperial irrigation district and has a family consisting of himself, wife, and two children; that his grocery account for his entire family is approximately $50 per month, and that a grocery account for provisions for a family of three persons would be approximately $35 per month; that he believes that $40 per month for a house to reside in in El Centro, being fairly well acquainted with rentals for residences in El Centro, would be $35 to $40 per month which would be suitable for a man, wife, and one child, and that $50 or $60 per month would be amply sufficient for any additional expenditures per month necessary for a man, a wife, and one child."

And another of J. C. Cox, a grocer of El Centro, stating that the average grocery account of a man and wife and one child is $35 per month.

Upon submission, the court granted the motion of the defendant, ordered the money released from garnishment, and the clerk was ordered to pay over and deliver to the defendant the warrant filed by the county auditor. Plaintiff appeals from the order, and the appeal has been submitted upon appellant's brief, no brief having been filed by the respondent.

Plaintiff asks a reversal upon the following grounds:

"First. That the salary of a district attorney is subject to garnishment under section 710 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Second. That exemptions allowed under section 690 exempt earnings of the debtor for his family, 'supported in whole or in part by his labor,' and a lawyer is not (a) laborer as contemplated by the statute. Third. That no more than what is necessary for the use of the family is exempted from garnishment, and the amount that is necessary for the use of the family is a question of fact to be determined by the evidence, and the burden of proof is on the defendant to establish the amount necessary, and that the defendant failed in his proof."

It has generally been held that statutes authorizing garnishment of the salary or wages of public officers or employees are within the legislative power. 22 A. L. R. 760. In California the power of the Legislature to determine the state's policy in respect to legislative officers, as distinguished from constitutional officers, of subjecting their salaries to garnishee process, was upheld in Ruperich v. Baehr, 142 Cal. 190, 194, 75 P. 782, wherein the court said, in construing section 710 of the Code of Civil Procedure:

"It may be conceded that it is as much against public policy to subject the salaries of public officers and employees to garnishee process as it is to subject the public funds to such process or the public property to liens or executions. The Legislature, however, undoubtedly has the power to determine its own policy on this subject with respect to the offices, officers, and employees within its control. We are not here concerned with constitutional officers and officers, and we do not wish to be understood as holding that the act under discussion can be applied to them. But with respect to those clearly within legislative control, if it fairly appears that by this act, properly construed, the legislative intent to declare as its policy that the salaries or wages may be thus diverted to the payment of debts of such officers and employees, is manifested by the language used, then the courts are bound by this declared policy, with respect to the officers to whom it can be applied, and the rule of construction above mentioned becomes, to that extent, inapplicable."

In a concurring opinion, Justice Van Dyke said (page 197 [75 P. 784]):

"I concur in the foregoing, as it is expressly limited to such offices as the Legislature may create or abolish at its pleasure in the interest of the public service. As to such offices, the Legislature may doubtless subject the employees or officers appointed or elected to fill the same to the garnishee process. The act under consideration, adding a new section to the Code of Civil Procedure, is, however, broad enough in its terms to cover all offices in the state. As to constitutional officers, however, the salary or compensation of the incumbents of which is provided for by the Constitution, it is clearly not within the power of the Legislature to interfere with the payment of such salary or compensation in the least."

In Lawson v. Lawson, 158 Cal. 446, 447, 448, 111 P. 354, the court said:

"It is established by the decision in Ruperich v. Baehr, 142 Cal. 190 (75 P. 782), that section 710 of the Code of Civil Procedure is not violative of the provisions of our Constitution inhibiting special legislation and requiring that a general law shall have a uniform operation. It is further established by that decision and the decision in Payne v. Baehr, 153 Cal. 441 (95 P. 895), that the section is applicable to the salaries of all such public officers and employees as do not come within the term 'constitutional officers' as that term is used in Ruperich v. Baehr, 142 Cal. 190 (75 P. 782). In that case the court, expressly reserving the question whether the Constitution prohibited its application to certain officers, said: 'But with respect to those clearly within legislative control, if it fairly appears that by this act, properly construed, the legislative intent to declare as its policy that the salaries or wages may be thus diverted to the payment of debts of such officers and employees, is manifested by the language used, then the courts are bound by this declared policy, with respect to the officers to whom it can be applied.' The effect of the two cases cited is that the section must be held applicable to the salaries of all officers as to which its application is not inhibited by reason of some provision of the Constitution. Assuming for the purposes of this decision that with relation to some officers the effect of existing constitutional provisions may be to prevent the application of this section, we are satisfied that there is nothing in the Constitution precluding its application to salaries or fees of justices of the peace. Such salaries or fees are not fixed by the Constitution, and there is no provision therein, as in the case of some officers, that they 'shall receive for their service' a compensation, fixed either by the Constitution or to be fixed in some other way. Nor is there as to such officers any provision, as in the case of some officers, to the effect that the compensation so to be received, whether fixed by Constitution or otherwise, shall not be diminished during the term for which the incumbent shall have been elected."

The office of district attorney is one created by the Constitution (art. 11, § 5), wherein it is provided that:

"The Legislature, by general and uniform laws, shall provide for the election or appointment, in the several counties, of * * * district attorneys, * * * and shall prescribe their duties and fix their terms of office. It shall regulate the compensation of all such officers, in proportion to duties. * * *"

A district attorney can hardly be said to be an officer within the control of the Legislature, as required by Ruperich v. Baehr, supra. There is a provision in the Constitution that the Legislature shall "regulate the compensation" of district attorneys; but there is no provision in the Constitution in the case of district attorneys to the effect that the compensation to be received shall not be diminished during the term for which the incumbent shall have been elected. Salaries of public officers or employees have been held subject to garnishment under the provisions of section 710 of the Code of Civil Procedure in the following cases: A city and county stenographer (Ruperich v. Baehr, supra); a justice of the peace (Lawson v. Lawson, supra); a stenographer of a city and county police court (Payne v. Baehr, 153 Cal. 441, 95 P. 895); and a deputy city treasurer (Trow v. Moody, 27 Cal. App. 403, 150 P. 77). As has already been seen, the Legislature cannot constitutionally subject to garnishee process the salaries of the holders or incumbents of constitutional offices which are provided for by the Constitution; that is, the offices over which it has no control, as distinguished from those offices which it may create or abolish at its pleasure in the interests of the public service. Ruperich v. Baehr, supra.

[1] In no case have the provisions of section 710 of the Code of Civil Procedure been held applicable to the salary of a district attorney or similar officer whose office is directly created by the Constitution. In our opinion, the office of district attorney is a constitutional office, and the provisions of section 710 of the Code of Civil Procedure should be held inapplicable thereto.

[2] The foregoing conclusion renders it unnecessary to discuss the other grounds for reversal as raised by appellant. Suffice it to say that we do not agree with plaintiff's contention that only laborers, or those who do physical labor, are entitled to the benefit of exemptions as provided in section 690, Code of Civil Procedure. The defendant's affidavit is, in our opinion, sufficient to support the ruling of the trial court in ordering the money paid to the defendant.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

WATTS v. PEERS et al. (Civ. 3313.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 31, 1927.

Highways  180—Judgment for injuries to horses from collision with automobile held not warranted without finding of negligence and proximate cause.

Where, in an action for negligent injury to plaintiff's horses from being struck by defendant's automobile, judgment was rendered for plaintiff although the trial court's findings did not show that defendant was negligent or that his negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, held, that the findings were insufficient to support the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; Raglan Tuttle, Judge.

Action by James E. Watts against Robert Stewart Peers and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Johnson & Lemmon and Evan J. Hughes, all of Sacramento, for appellants.

W. H. Slade, of Auburn, and C. H. Stilson, for respondent.

HART, J. The action is for damages for the alleged negligent maiming of two horses belonging to the plaintiff. Judgment was awarded the plaintiff in the total sum of $334, which included the sum of $9 for expenditures made by plaintiff in the procurement of the medicine necessary to the treatment of the injured animals. The case was tried by the court without the aid of a jury. The defendants appeal from the judgment.

The defendant Robert Stewart Peers was, at the time of the filing of the complaint herein, a minor of the age of about 19 years, and the defendant Robert A. Peers is the minor's father. It is alleged in the complaint, and admitted by the answer, that upon an application in writing of Peers, Sr., prior to the accident in which the alleged injuries were inflicted upon the animals mentioned, the state division of motor vehicles issued to said minor a license authorizing him to operate a motor vehicle within the limits of the state of California, said application having also been signed by the defendant minor. It further appears that on the 2d day of January, 1925, at or about the hour of 5:35 p. m., the said defendant Robert Stewart Peers was in the act of driving or operating an automobile on the highway near a point about two miles in a general southerly direction from the town of Colfax, Placer county. The complaint alleges that the said automobile was at said time the property of the defendant Robert A. Peers "and was so being operated and driven by his said minor son" with his (the said Robert A. Peers') assent. It is also alleged:

"That on said day, and at or about said hour, said plaintiff commenced to drive his two horses across the state highway opposite his home adjoining said highway, and at the aforementioned place, about two miles in a general southerly direction from the said city of Colfax, in said county and state; that said plaintiff was at that time within the side boundary lines of said highway right of way and immediately in the rear of said horses; that as plaintiff so started said horses across said highway he looked and saw said motor vehicle approaching at a rapid pace; that said plaintiff then and there had a lighted lantern in his hand, and immediately upon seeing said motor vehicle approaching proceeded toward the center of said highway, driving said horses ahead of him and waving said lighted lantern to warn the driver or operator of said motor vehicle, to wit, the said Robert Stewart Peers, of the danger before him.

"That the said Robert Stewart Peers, notwithstanding the said warning signal of the said plaintiff, so carelessly, recklessly and negligently operated said motor vehicle that he drove the same into and struck down the smaller of said horses, then and there the property of said plaintiff; that said horse, as a result of being so struck down, was so injured that it was incapacitated and unable to perform the work which it was accustomed to perform for a period of 54 school days (said horse being a pony used by plaintiff's child to ride to school); that said injuries are permanent in nature; and that by reason thereof the value of said horse has been reduced to the extent and in the amount of $25."

In another count of the complaint it is alleged that another horse was likewise run into by said minor and was thereby so seriously injured as to wholly incapacitate said animal as a work horse, to which use the same had been put by the plaintiff. It may be stated that as to this particular animal, the evidence shows that some four or five months after it was injured it died.

The damages claimed were for the value of the injured animals for the respective purposes for which they were and had been used by the plaintiff and the loss of the use thereof for the periods, respectively, of 52 and 82 working days.

The answer specifically denies each of the material allegations of the complaint and also sets up the defense of contributory negligence.

The testimony as presented by the record is such that a reviewing court would not perhaps legally be at liberty to hold, as a proposition of law, that proper findings made either in accord with the allegations of the complaint or in favorable response to the claim by the defendants of contributory negligence were without evidentiary justification.

The case, however, presents an unusual situation, in that, while there was an attempt to make findings, such attempt was, so far as is concerned the essentially important issue made by the pleadings, entirely futile. What purports, and undoubtedly was intended, to be a finding upon the pivotal issue in the case reads:

"That on the 2d day of January, 1925, the said defendant, Robert Stewart Peers, while operating a motor vehicle, ran into two horses of plaintiff, resulting in the death of one and the total uselessness of the other, plaintiff being thereby damaged in the sum of $325."

Obviously, unless the act of Robert Stewart Peers in running into and injuring the property of plaintiff was the direct result of his negligence as charged in the complaint, then the defendants are not liable for damages for such injury to his horses as may have been sustained by plaintiff by reason of said act. There is no finding that the act of the defendant minor was negligent, or that the injury to the horses was proximately caused by his negligence.

The judgment is devoid of support and must be reversed. Accordingly, the judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF PARK RAPIDS v. PRAY. (Civ. 6015.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 1, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 29, 1927.

1. Limitation of actions $\S$ 151(3)—No effect could be had on running of statute against action on note by admissions or acknowledgments prior to maturity (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337, 339, 360).

No effect could be had on running of statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337, 339), under section 360, against action against guarantor of note by admissions or acknowledgments prior to maturity of note, except possibly as waiver of right to plead limitations statute.

2. Limitation of actions $\S$ 148(4)—Acknowledgment is sufficient to lift bar of statute of limitations, if it shows writer treats indebtedness as subsisting, and that debtor is willing to pay (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337, 339, 360).

Code Civ. Proc. § 360, does not prescribe any form in which an acknowledgment or promise sufficient to lift bar of statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337, 339) shall be made, and it is sufficient if it shows that writer treats indebtedness as subsisting and one which debtor is liable and willing to pay, and from this acknowledgment law implies promise to pay.

3. Limitation of actions —148(1)—Express promise to pay besides acknowledgment is not required, where statute has not already run against debt (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337, 339, 360).

Code Civ. Proc. § 360, does not require express promise to pay as part of, or in addition to, acknowledgment of indebtedness to lift bar of statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337, 339), where it has not already run against indebtedness.

4. Limitation of actions —151(1)—Debtor, stating that he did not wish to "stall" matter in letter claimed to toll limitations statute, meant that he had no desire to postpone payment (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337, 339).

Debtor, stating that he did not wish to "stall" matter off in letter, which it was claimed tolled running of statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337, 339), meant that he had no desire to postpone or delay payment or to feign or simulate or to frame up any defense to notes.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Stall.]

5. Limitation of actions —151(1)—Term "settlement" in letter tolling limitations statute by guarantor on note replying to letter containing offer of compromise did not refer to such offer "payment" (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337, 339).

Where payee wrote guarantor on note offering compromise, term "settlement" in guarantor's letter, which payee claimed tolled statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337, 339), wherein guarantor wrote that he believed distribution received from trustee of maker should be applied on notes before making settlement, should not be construed to refer to such offer of compromise; term "settlement" including within it more than term "payment," since it includes an ascertainment of balance and adjustment of credits.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Payment; Settle—Settlement.]

6. Limitation of actions —150(4)—Liability of guarantor on note was fixed, leaving only amount necessary to extinguish liability to be determined by extent of principal's performance.

As respects definiteness of acknowledgment of liability of guarantor, liability of guarantor on note was fixed, definite, and certain, leaving only amount of money necessary to fully extinguish this liability to be determined by extent of his principal's performance.

7. Limitation of actions —148(3)—Letters by guarantor on note held to acknowledge liability so as to lift bar of statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337, 339, 360).

Letter from guarantor on note to payee, stating that, after distribution by trustee of insolvent maker, guarantor would be glad to hear from payee again, and that he did not wish to stall matter off, but believed it was only proper to apply distribution before making settlement, held to acknowledge liability on note so as to lift bar of statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337, 339), under section 360, relating to acknowledgment necessary to take case out of operation of statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action on a written contract of guaranty by the First National Bank of Park Rapids against R. F. Pray. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Willard P. Smith, of San Francisco (Kennett B. Dawson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Albert A. Rosenshine and Goldman, Nye & Surr, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff brought this action to recover from defendant upon a written contract of guaranty, as will more fully appear hereinafter. In the court below judgment went for defendant, and thereafter a motion for a new trial, interposed by plaintiff, was denied. Plaintiff appeals.

The only question before us relates to the application of section 360, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that no acknowledgment or promise is sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract, by which to take the case out of the operation of the statute of limitations, unless the acknowledgment or promise is contained in some writing signed by the party to be charged thereby.

The facts follow:

At Park Rapids, in the state of Minnesota, on the 22d day of March, 1915, the White Stores Company made, executed, and delivered to plaintiff its promissory note in writing which said note was in the usual form, containing a waiver by all signers and indorsers of demand, notice of nonpayment, and protest. The note was signed "the White Stores Company, by J. Shere, Pres. and by R. F. Pray, Secretary." Indorsed on this note is as follows: "For value received I guarantee the payment of the within note at maturity or any time thereafter, waiving demand, protest and notice of protest. [Signed] R. F. Pray." Indorsement on principal: "On principal 5/7/18 $993.21. Balance due, $3,506.79."

Nothing has been paid on said note or guaranty save and except the sum of $993.21.

This action was commenced on November 20, 1922.

The trial court found that the action was barred by the statute of limitations of the state of California and by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and by section 339 of said Code.

It is the claim of appellant herein that this finding is erroneous, and he bases his claim upon a chain of correspondence between plaintiff and defendant running over a number of years, in which correspondence it contends the defendant did make written acknowledge sufficiently evidencing a new or continuing contract by which to take the case out of the operation of the statute of limitations. We pass then to an examination of the correspondence and the writings presented.

[1] The letters comprising the correspondence may be classed in three groups; the first group being letters written prior to the due date of the instrument. Obviously these can be of little aid, as excepting possibly the case of a waiver of the right to plead the limitations statute, no effect could be had upon the running of the statute by admissions or acknowledgments prior to maturity.

The second group consists of letters and correspondence following maturity, but prior to the time when ordinarily the statute would have barred the enforcement of the claim. Payment on original note was due on March 22, 1916. It is admitted that at or about this time the White Stores, maker of the note, became insolvent, and its affairs went under the management of a trustee. In June of 1916 the plaintiff wrote defendant concerning the indebtedness here sued on, and requested some new arrangement whereby defendant could have the note guaranteed canceled and replaced by a new note executed directly by defendant. In reply, dated June 22, 1916, defendant stated that, inasmuch as plaintiff already had the notes indorsed by himself and Shere, he could not see how it could add to the strength of plaintiff to sign another bunch.

In November, 1916, defendant again wrote plaintiff, stating that he was awaiting word from the trustee and his coguarantor Shere, saying, "Do not wish to appear as delaying, but I must hear from them before stating definitely what I can do." On December 28, 1916, defendant again wrote plaintiff, wherein he requests that, if plaintiff decides to sue on the notes, he make the coguarantor Shere a party to the action, saying, "There is no reason why he should escape his liability and the loss be placed upon me, where it does not belong." In this same letter defendant says further that with what plaintiff can get from the trustee and such equities as plaintiff may have against other securities "it would seem that you are pretty well fortified, and I hope you will not see fit to crowd the collection on the indorsement of the paper until the interest of the trusteeship is ascertained."

These letters of 1916 are not relied upon in themselves to offset the bar of the statute of limitations. Giving these letters their utmost strength, the statute would have barred the claim on December 28, 1920. They are referred to here merely to illustrate the situation as it then existed between the parties and to show no repudiation of the contract up to that time.

After this correspondence of 1916 the matter rests until 1918. On November 19th of that year plaintiff again wrote to defendant, advising him of balance due on note. In this letter plaintiff makes an offer of compromise and adjustment, in which offer it agrees to accept one-half of the amount, waiving claim for accrued interest. In reply to this letter, and under date of November 26, 1918, defendant replies, acknowledging receipt and thanking plaintiff for the kind manner in which he refers to the notes. In the letter defendant states:

"By same mail I also had a letter from the new trustee of the White Stores Co. in regard to a final hearing, and have written my attorneys for a little further information. I should hear from them in a few days and will then communicate with you."

On December 2, 1918, plaintiff acknowledges receipt of this last-cited letter, and requests consideration at an early date, and for defendant's final answer before the 15th of December, 1918. On December 11, 1918, defendant writes plaintiff as follows:

"Referring to our recent correspondence in regard to the White Stores Co. notes I have just received a letter from my attorneys at Duluth, saying there was in the hands of trustee considerable amount for distribution to creditors of that company and the distribution would soon be made. When this is done I should be very glad to hear from you again. Please understand I do not wish to stall this matter off, but believe it is only proper to apply the distribution which you receive on these notes before making settlement."

In July of 1919 the matter was by plaintiff placed in the hands of an attorney for action, and the correspondence hereafter is between this attorney and defendant. On July 31, 1919, the attorney wrote defendant, advising him of his handling the matter, and requesting his attention. The result of the letters back and forward up to October 4, 1919, shows but little other than defendant's statement of his effort to get his coguarantor Shere to pay his half, in which case defendant promises to send the other half and get it out of the way. In 1920 defendant finally, without express repudiation of the debt, invites suit to determine just what his legal liabilities are. This ends the correspondence, and constitutes all of the writings upon which appellant rests its claim that the statute has been tolled to the extent that the present action is not barred.

The law applicable seems undisputed; in fact, both parties here cite much of the same authority in support of their conflicting contentions.

At the outset section 360, Code of Civil Procedure, is cited, and its application conceded to be determinative of the issue involved. This section reads:

"No acknowledgment or promise is sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract, by which to take the case out of the operation of this title, unless the same is contained in some writing, signed by the party to be charged thereby."

The title referred to in the section is title 2, c. 4, General Provisions as to Time of Commencing Actions.

[2] It is well established that the Code section does not prescribe any form in which an acknowledgment or promise sufficient to lift the bar of the statute of limitations shall be made. It is sufficient if it shows the writer treats the indebtedness as subsisting, and one which the debtor is liable and willing to pay. From this acknowledgment the law implies a promise to pay. Concannon v. Smith, 134 Cal. 14, 66 P. 40; Foster v. Bowles, 138 Cal. 346, 71 P. 494, 649; Clunin v. First Fed. Trust Co., 189 Cal. 248, 207 P. 1009; Searles v. Gonzalez, 191 Cal. 430, 216 P. 1003, 28 A. L. R. 78. The California cases on this subject are reviewed at some length in the case of Clunin v. First Fed. Trust Co., supra, and this conclusion reached by Shaw, C. J.:

"It is clear from all these decisions that no writing is sufficient as an acknowledgment under section 360, unless it contains some reference to a debt, which, either of itself or with the aid of permissible evidence of extrinsic facts in explanation, amounts to an admission that there is a debt existing to the creditor to whom the writing is sent which the debtor is liable to pay and willing to pay."

Such acknowledgment may be made to an agent of the creditor or to some person authorized to receive it. Searles v. Gonzalez, supra.

In the Clunin Case the court quotes from Southern Pacific v. Prosser, 122 Cal. 415, 52 P. 837, 55 P. 146, as follows:

"The distinct and unqualified admission of an existing debt, contained in a writing, signed by the party to be charged, and without intimation of an intent to refuse payment thereof, suffices to establish the debt to which the contract relates as a continuing contract, and to interrupt the running of the statute of limitations against the same."

There appears at first blush a difference between the Prosser Case and the Clunin Case, inasmuch as it appears from the conclusion of the court in the latter case that the acknowledgment must contain an admission of a debt which the debtor is liable and willing to pay. However, in the Clunin Case all that the court was called upon to decide, and all that was decided, was that the writings offered contained no reference to any debt, or any language which could be said to be uncertain in its meaning and subject to explanation by the aid of extrinsic circumstances so as to be made to refer to a debt.

[3] In the instant case respondent concedes that the law does not require an express promise to pay as a part or in addition to the acknowledgment of indebtedness, where the statute has not already run. In Foster v. Bowles, 138 Cal. 351, 71 P. 495, it is said:

"It was not necessary that respondents should promise to pay the indebtedness in order to establish a new date for the statute to commence running. * * * All that was required was a plain and distinct acknowledgment in writing of the existence of the mortgage."

In the more recent case of Searles v. Gonzalez, supra, no promise was held necessary to bring the acknowledgment within the terms of the statute.

In the case of Shirley v. Shirley, decided in this court on May 26, 1927, now found in 256 P. 823, the rule is announced as in Concannon v. Smith, 134 Cal. 14, 66 P. 40, that it is sufficient if the writing shows that the writer regards or treats the indebtedness as subsisting, and from the acknowledgment of a subsisting indebtedness the law implies a promise to pay based upon the consideration of the old debt. See, also, Minifie v. Rowley, 187 Cal. 481, 202 P. 673; Curtis v. Holee, 184 Cal. 726, 195 P. 395, 18 A. L. R. 1024; Worth v. Worth, 155 Cal. 599, 102 P. 663; 16 Cal. Jur. 585, 587.

Before proceeding to apply the doctrine of these cases to the facts before us, there is one additional fact to be noted. The note in controversy here constituted the only indebtedness from defendant to plaintiff, and the letters in evidence from defendant referred to this particular note.

The letters which appellant offers to constitute the written acknowledgment are particularly the letters of November, 1918. Upon these letters rests the determination of the question involved. True, we consider all of the correspondence for whatever facts therein may be pertinent in showing the general relationship between the parties, but in themselves any of the correspondence of 1916 could hardly extend the running of the statute to the time this action was commenced. Taking up then the 1918 correspondence: On November 19, 1918, plaintiff wrote defendant Pray that there was no longer any hope of getting anything from White Stores Company, the maker of the note, and advising defendant of the balance due on the said note. Then plaintiff makes the offer that, if defendant will send one-half of the balance, without consideration of the interest, the defendant will be released from further liability. On November 26, 1918, defendant writes acknowledging receipt of letter of plaintiff, and says: "Wish to thank you for the kind manner in which you have referred to the notes"; in the letter also stating that defendant has written to his attorneys to learn more about the affairs of the White Stores Company and that when he gets this information he will communicate with plaintiff. In reply comes the letter of December 2, 1918, from plaintiff to defendant, again requesting due consideration of plaintiff's letter of November 26, 1918, and asking to finally answer before December 15, 1918. Now comes the letter of December 11, 1918, from defendant to plaintiff, upon which letter, it may be said, the present controversy centers. We will give this letter in full, omitting date and address:

"Referring to our recent correspondence in regard to the White Stores notes, I have just to-day received a letter from Courtney & Courtney, attorneys at Duluth, saying that there was in the hands of trustee considerable amount for distribution to creditors of that company, and the distribution would soon be made. When this is done I should be very glad to hear from you again. Please understand I do not wish to stall this matter off, but believe it is only proper to apply the distribution which you receive on these notes before making settlement."

[4, 5] In interpreting this letter counsel have devoted some effort in an endeavor to give us the meaning of the term "to stall." An accepted definition as given by Webster is: "In contests, to do less than one's best, as to deceive for any purpose or to husband strength." There is also another definition, "To delay or postpone payment of an obligation or debt." The word, however, has become current in vernacular, and in its generally accepted sense is accurately defined in the first reference, and which might also include the latter given definition. We think that the word in common usage has a shade of meaning somewhat broader than that embraced in either definition. When one states his intention to desist from "stalling" he expresses thereby a determination to forego further evasive argument, and cut through all needless preliminaries, and come direct to the subject or matter in hand. Therefore this letter of December 11, 1918, said in just so many words:

"When we learn how much the White Stores Company have paid, I will be glad to hear from you again. Please understand I have no desire to postpone or delay payment or to feign or simulate or frame up any defense to these notes, but I think that the amount you receive from the principal debtor or maker of the note should first be applied thereon before I as guarantor make any settlement."

[6, 7] It is urged by respondent that this letter of defendant, being in reply to a letter wherein an offer of compromise was presented, was in itself, if anything, merely referring to such offer, and the term "settlement" should be construed accordingly. We think this construction would be too strict. While plaintiff had offered to accept less than the amount due, the defendant neither accepted nor rejected the offer, nor made any reference thereto. It must be borne in mind that the entire liability of defendant was as a guarantor. Though his contract or guaranty was a contract separate and distinct from the contract of the maker of the note, yet his liability was contingent upon, and measured by the performance or nonperformance of the original obligation. The term "settlement" includes within it a little more than the term "payment." It includes an ascertainment of the balance and an adjustment of credits. Naturally it might be argued then that the acknowledgment was thus uncertain, and not within the statute or the decisions cited. However, the obvious answer to this is that the liability of the guarantor was fixed, definite, and certain, leaving only the amount of money necessary to fully extinguish this liability to be determined by the extent of his principal's performance. There seems little room for doubt but that the liability was acknowledged and settlement deferred only until exact amount was computed, coupled with disavowal of intent to unnecessarily defer. It is our opinion that plaintiff has brought himself within the statute.

The only dispute in this case was on the point of the statute of limitations. Execution and nonpayment are admitted. Therefore there are no further issues found against plaintiff to warrant a new trial.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff for the face of the note, less amount found paid thereon; namely, for the sum of $4,500, less $993.21, together with interest as in the note provided.

BLAKE v. BLAKE et al. (Civ. 5384.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 27, 1927.

1. Fraudulent conveyances $\hookrightarrow$ 264—Complaint to subject property to satisfaction of judgment need not recite that statutory steps relating to proceedings supplementary to execution had been taken (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 717-720).

In action to subject to judgment property conveyed by judgment debtor to grantee, complaint alleging prior judgment and issuance of execution which was returned unsatisfied was not defective, because plaintiff did not recite therein that steps provided by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 717-720, relating to proceedings supplementary to execution, had been taken against grantee prior to filing of suit.

2. Execution $\hookrightarrow$ 397—Where judgment creditor claims title under conveyances is invalid, issue as to ownership and title should be made.

In proceedings supplementary to execution, where judgment creditor claims that title under conveyances is invalid, issue as to such ownership and title should be properly made and tried in appropriate action in which judgment may be had and parties conclusively bound.

3. Fraudulent conveyances ⚡239(2)—Remedy by supplementary proceedings to reach property conveyed by judgment debtor did not supersede remedy by action, where transferee of judgment debtor asserts title (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 717-720).

While remedy by supplementary proceedings under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 717-720, to reach property conveyed by judgment debtor was intended as substitute for a creditor's bill, it did not supersede remedy by action, where grantee or transferee of judgment debtor asserts title.

4. Pleading ⚡214(1)—On demurrer, allegations of complaint must be taken as true.

For the purposes of demurrer, all allegations of complaint must be taken as true.

5. Judgment ⚡913—To plead judgment of court of general jurisdiction, it is sufficient to allege judgment was recovered in designated action in named court (Code Civ. Proc. § 456).

In pleading judgment of court of general jurisdiction, it is sufficient, under Code Civ. Proc. § 456, merely to allege that judgment was obtained or recovered in designated action, in such court, or to make equivalent averment.

6. Judgment ⚡913—Allegations of recovery of judgment, unappealed from, and stating where it was recorded, held sufficient pleading of judgment.

Allegation in complaint to subject property to satisfaction of judgment that on stated day in named county plaintiff recovered judgment in action for divorce, stating number of action, that judgment was docketed in book of judgments in certain volume and at certain page, that judgment was not appealed from, that final decree was signed by judge of superior court and filed and recorded, held sufficient pleading of judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Adelaide U. Blake against Alfred E. Blake and another. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

H. L. McAllister, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Action in equity to subject certain property to the satisfaction of a judgment. Plaintiff alleges, in substance, that defendants Alfred E. Blake and Elizabeth V. Blake intermarried on March 7, 1921, and still are husband and wife; that prior thereto on November 13, 1919, plaintiff, in an action for divorce against defendant Alfred E. Blake, prosecuted in the city and county of San Francisco and numbered 99,681, recovered a judgment in the sum of $125 per month for the support and maintenance of herself and minor child beginning with said month and continuing; that said judgment was docketed in the office of the county clerk of said city and county in book 138 of Judgments at page 195; that said judgment was never appealed from or modified, and is still in full force and effect; that a final decree was signed by Hon. E. P. Shortall, judge of said superior court of said city and county, and filed and recorded on the 16th day of November, 1920; that there is a balance now due upon said judgment so recovered in the sum of $2,300. It is then alleged that defendant Alfred E. Blake is the owner of certain described property situated in the city of Menlo Park, San Mateo county, and that said property stands of record in the name of defendant Elizabeth V. Blake, wife of Alfred E. Blake, who claims to be the owner in fee thereof under and by virtue of deeds thereto from said defendant Alfred E. Blake, her husband; that execution was issued out of the superior court of the state of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco, directed to the sheriff of said city and county against the property of defendant Alfred E. Blake on the 12th day of December, 1923; and that said execution was returned wholly unsatisfied. It is then charged that prior to their marriage and subsequent thereto defendants conspired between themselves to defraud plaintiff of the proceeds of her judgment. Then follows allegations to the effect that defendant Alfred E. Blake had acquired by purchase certain real property and conveyed the same to defendant Elizabeth V. Blake prior to her marriage with defendant Alfred E. Blake under her then name Elizabeth Enright; that this property was subsequently sold and the proceeds derived therefrom, was, with money received by Alfred E. Blake from other sources, used to construct a residence upon the property located in San Mateo county above referred to. It is then alleged that these transactions were acts of insolvency which left defendant Alfred E. Blake wholly insolvent. Allegations of no speedy or adequate remedy in plaintiff are made, for which reason it is prayed that defendant Elizabeth V. Blake be charged with a constructive trust of all the real and personal property found to have been conveyed or transferred to her subsequent to the rendition of the judgment above referred to, and for other relief. To this complaint a general demurrer was filed and sustained. Plaintiff was given ten days in which to amend. She refused to do so, and judgment that plaintiff take nothing by her action followed such refusal, and this appeal is from such judgment.

[1-3] The contention raised by defendant and respondent was and is that nowhere in the complaint is there a recital that the statutory steps provided for in sections 717 to 720, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to proceedings supplementary to execution, had been taken against defendant Elizabeth V. Blake prior to the filing of the instant suit in equity against defendants. It is also claimed that the demurrer was properly sustained, for the reason that plaintiff's judgment is insufficiently pleaded. We are of the opinion there is no merit in either contention, and that the demurrer was improperly sustained. Upon the question of plaintiff not having exhausted her legal remedies, before seeking equitable relief, it seems clear to us that the complaint has alleged all that is necessary to entitle her to prosecute her present suit, and this is certainly true as against a general demurrer. She alleges the procurement of her judgment and the issuance of an execution thereon which has been returned wholly unsatisfied. She alleges that Elizabeth V. Blake claims to be the owner in fee of the property sought to be impressed with the judgment, under and by virtue of deeds thereto, from defendant Alfred E. Blake, which were executed with the intent of defrauding her. No order under the provisions of the Code supplementary to execution could be legally made requiring Elizabeth V. Blake to surrender the property in satisfaction of plaintiff's judgment, otherwise than upon her admission that it was the property of the judgment debtor. Under the provisions of the Code referred to, a court has no jurisdiction to order a grantee of a judgment debtor, who claims title to the property conveyed, to surrender it or to subject it to the satisfaction of a judgment. McDowell v. Bell, 86 Cal. 615, 25 P. 128. Where a judgment creditor claims that title under a conveyance is invalid, an issue as to such ownership and title should be properly made and tried in an appropriate action in which a judgment may be had and the parties conclusively bound. Lewis v. Chamberlain, 108 Cal. 525, 41 P. 413. While the remedy by supplementary proceedings, where property may be reached, is intended as a substitute for a creditor's bill, these proceedings do not supersede the remedy by action where the grantee or transferee of a judgment debtor asserts title in himself, for the reason that they are not adequate to accomplish the purpose of the action. The reason is, that to make an order directing the application of property claimed by a person in his own right, if it could have any effect, would be to deprive him of his property upon a summary proceeding and without due process of law. 11 Cal. Jur. p. 157.

[4-6] Under such circumstances, the seeking and obtaining of an order upon supplementary proceedings to institute an action, upon the theory that a creditor must exhaust his legal remedy before commencing a suit, would therefore be an idle act and of no avail to plaintiff. Rapp v. Whittier, 113 Cal. 429, 45 P. 703; Phillips v. Price, 153 Cal. 146, 94 P. 617. Here it is alleged that defendant Elizabeth V. Blake claims to be the owner in fee of the property described in the complaint. For the purposes of the demurrer all the allegations of the complaint must be taken as true. Spangenburg v. Spangenburg, 19 Cal. App. 439, 126 P. 379. There is no merit in the contention. The same may be said of the claim that plaintiff's judgment is insufficiently pleaded to sustain a cause of action. Section 456 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that in pleading a judgment it is not necessary to state the facts conferring jurisdiction, but such judgment may be stated to have been duly given or made. Here it is alleged that on a certain stated day in a certain county plaintiff recovered a judgment in an action for divorce, and the number of the action is pleaded; that such judgment was docketed in the book of judgments in a certain volume and at a certain page; that it had never been appealed from, and was in full force and effect; that the final decree of divorce was signed by a particular judge of the superior court of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco; that it was filed and recorded in the office of the county clerk of said city and county on the 16th day of November, 1920. An allegation in a pleading that a judgment was recovered, entered, and docketed is sufficient. McCutcheon v. Weston, 65 Cal. 39, 2 P. 727. In pleading a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction it is sufficient merely to allege that a judgment was obtained or recovered in a designated action, in such a court, or to make an equivalent averment. High v. Bank of Commerce, 95 Cal. 385, 30 P. 556, 29 Am. St. Rep. 121; Weller v. Dickinson, 93 Cal. 108, 28 P. 854; 15 Cal. Jur. p. 283. The complaint contains all of these requisite allegations. Moreover, the demurrer was a general one.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

In re McCRAY'S ESTATE.★

McCRAy et al. v. CITIZENS' TRUST & SAVINGS BANK OF LOS ANGELES, CAL. (Civ. 5688.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 25, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 22, 1927.

1. Perpetuities ⇐3—English perpetuity statute held part of common law under Code (Pol. Code, § 4468).

English perpetuity statute (Thelluson Act, 39 & 40 Geo. III, c. 98) that maximum period during which power of alienation could be restrained was lives in being and 21 years 9 months, held part of common law under Pol. Code, § 4468, providing that common law of England is rule of decision unless repugnant to Constitution or laws of the state.

2. Perpetuities ⇐3—Perpetuities forbidden by Constitution held to be limitations restraining alienation, according to English statute (Const. 1879, art. 20, § 9; Pol. Code, § 4468).

Perpetuities forbidden by Const. 1879, art. 20, § 9, held to be limitations restraining power of alienation for longer than lives in being and 21 years 9 months, according to English perpetuity statute (Thelluson Act, 39 & 40 Geo. III, c. 98), which is applicable under Pol. Code, § 4468, making common law of England state rule of decision.

3. Perpetuities ⇐3—Statute authorizing suspension of power of alienation for 25 years held void (Const. 1879, art. 20, § 9; Pol. Code, § 4468; Civ. Code, § 715, subd. 2).

Civ. Code, § 715, subd. 2, authorizing suspension of power of alienation for 25 years, held void under Const. 1879, art. 20, § 9, which forbids suspension of power of alienation for longer than lives in being, and 21 years 9 months thereafter, according to English perpetuity statute (Thelluson Act, 39 & 40 Geo. III, c. 98), which is applicable under Pol. Code, § 4468, making common law of England state rule of decision, unless it is repugnant to Constitution or laws of the state.

4. Perpetuities ⇐3—Statute confining suspension of power of alienation to less than time allowed by common law held valid (Const. 1879, art. 20, § 9; Pol. Code, § 4468; Civ. Code, § 715, subd. 1).

Civ. Code, § 715, subd. 1, prohibiting suspension of power of alienation for longer than continuance of lives in being at creation of limitation or condition, held valid, although less than time allowed by English perpetuity statute (Thelluson Act, 39 & 40 Geo. III, c. 98), made a state rule of decision under Pol. Code, § 4468, and which is applicable in defining perpetuities meant by Const. 1879, art. 20, § 9, forbidding perpetuities except for eleemosynary purposes.

5. Perpetuities ⇐6(5)—Provision in will that real estate be held in trust 10 years at least held void as suspension of power of alienation for longer than lives in being (Civ. Code, §§ 715, 716, 749).

Provision in will that real estate be held in trust 10 years at least, then to be distributed among sons, held void under Civ. Code, §§ 715, 716, 749, as suspending the absolute power of alienation of the realty for a period beyond the continuance of the lives of persons in being at time of testatrix's death.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Ella McCray, deceased. From that part of decree directing distribution which appointed the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles, Cal., as trustee of real property, Harold A. McCray and others appeal. Reversed with directions.

T. Frank Courtney and D. Webster Egan, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Henry Merton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Ella McCray, residing in Los Angeles county, died on the 19th day of February, 1925, leaving an estate which consists of both real property and personal property. She left a holographic will bearing date August 20, 1924, which was duly probated; the executor being Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, of Los Angeles, Cal. Omitting those parts of the will which refer to personal property, we find therein the following language referring to real property:

"The real estate held in trust 10 years at least and income equally divided among the sons."

On the back of the document the testatrix had written the following:

"I want this real estate fixed so that the McCray estate will be held in trust for a time so that it cannot be squandered & wasted."

There was no appointment of a trustee other than such as may be inferred from the words hereinabove quoted.

Decedent had three sons, all of whom survived her, viz. Richard H. McCray, aged 32 years, Wilbur D. McCray, aged 28 years, and Harold A. McCray, aged 26 years. Richard died in February, 1926, and his widow is administratrix of his estate. The appeal now before this court is from that part of the decree which reads as follows:

"To Citizens Trust & Savings Bank, a Corporation, of Los Angeles, California, as trustee, all the real property belonging to said estate, herein described, to be held in trust for 10 years from August 20, 1924, and the income therefrom to be equally divided annually hereafter share and share alike, one-third to Harold A. McCray, his heirs and assigns, one-third to Wilbur D. McCray, his heirs and assigns, and one-third between the heirs of Richard H. McCray, now deceased, their heirs and assigns, until August 19, 1934, on which last date this trust shall terminate, and the title in fee of all said real property shall thereupon vest, an undivided one-third in Harold A. McCray, his heirs and assigns forever, an undivided one-third in Wilbur D. McCray, his heirs and assigns forever, and an undivided one-third in the heirs of Richard H. McCray, now deceased, their heirs and assigns forever, free from the control of said trustee, or its successors."

Appellants contend that for several reasons the will failed in its inception to create a valid express trust; that, if there was a valid trust, the attempted appointment by the superior court, sitting in probate, of a trustee, as accomplished in the decree of distribution, was void for want of compliance with certain statutory requirements, that the will does not dispose of the real property, and that therefore it passed to the heirs by succession.

We select, as the first item for consideration, point VI of appellants' brief, which is there stated as follows:

"That, if the will otherwise contained all the elements of a valid express trust, it was still void as an express private trust in real property by a limitation or condition suspending the absolute power of alienation for a longer period than during the continuance of the lives of persons in being at the creation of the limitation or condition in violation of sections 715, 716, and 749, Civil Code."

Sections 715, 716, and 749 of the Civil Code read as follows:

Civil Code, § 715:

"Restraints upon Alienation. Except in the single case mentioned in section seven hundred seventy-two, the absolute power of alienation cannot be suspended, by any limitation or condition whatever, for a longer period than as follows:

"1. During the continuance of the lives of persons in being at the creation of the limitation or condition; or

"2. For a period not to exceed twenty-five years from the time of the creation of the suspension."

Civil Code, § 716:

"Future Interests Void, Which Suspend Power of Alienation. Every future interest is void in its creation which, by any possibility, may suspend the absolute power of alienation for a longer period than is prescribed in this chapter. Such power of alienation is suspended when there are no persons in being by whom an absolute interest in possession can be conveyed."

Civil Code, § 749:

"Time of Creation, What. The delivery of the grant, where a limitation, condition, or future interest is created by grant, and the death of the testator, where it is created by will, is to be deemed the time of the creation of the limitation, condition, or interest, within the meaning of this part of the Code."

The future interest of the beneficiaries, provided for by the terms of the will as interpreted by the decree of distribution, was the fee-simple title which at the termination of the trust would "thereupon vest" in the three sons. During all of the intervening ten years that title, according to the decree, is to be vested in the trustee. Since one or all of the sons might die at any time, but the title of the trustee was to continue at all events for the full period of ten years, there was from the very beginning of the trust period a possibility that the absolute power of alienation would be suspended for a longer period than the lives of the beneficiaries. It is the contention of appellants that those terms of the will and decree which attempt to establish a trust subject to such a possibility are void.

[1] Section 9 of article 20 of the California Constitution of 1879 reads as follows: "No perpetuities shall be allowed except for eleemosynary purposes." This is an exact repetition of the same provision contained in article 11, § 16, of the Constitution of 1849. Having in mind that the common law of England is the rule of decision in this state "so far as it is not repugnant to or inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, or the Constitution or laws of this state" (Pol. Code, § 4468), it is clear that the "perpetuities" forbidden by the Constitution are those perpetuities defined by the common law in relation to that subject. The Supreme Court of California has held that our Legislature, in the use of the phrase "common law," had in contemplation the whole body of that jurisprudence as it stood, influenced by statute, at the time when the Code section was adopted. Martin v. Superior Court, 176 Cal. 289, 293, 168 P. 135, L. R. A. 1918B, 313. This particular Political Code section was enacted in 1872, but was based on a similar statute of 1850. In the Martin Case, Mr. Justice Shaw, with the concurrence of Mr. Justice Sloss, stated a modified view of the subject as follows:

"In 1850 there were in England, I have no doubt, many general acts of parliament in force which no one would claim were adopted as parts of our law by the act of our Legislature. The statement of what is included by that section needs more qualification and elaboration than is given to it in the main opinion."

[2, 3] We are of the opinion, however, that an English statute of the year 1800, dealing with restraints upon the power of alienation, will be conceded to be a part of the common law adopted in this state. "By the Thelluson Act (39 & 40 Geo. III, c. 98), the maximum period during which the power of alienation could be restrained was lives in being and twenty-one years and nine months." In re Walkerly, 108 Cal. 627, 658, 41 P. 772, 779 (49 Am. St. Rep. 64). From the foregoing it follows that the Constitution forbids the enactment of any statute having for its purpose to permit a suspension of the power of alienation of property for a period beyond the lives in being and 21 years and 9 months. By amendment of section 715 of the Civil Code, approved May 18, 1917, the Legislature added to that section the subdivision 2 which we have quoted, and thereby attempted to authorize such suspension of the power of alienation "for a period not to exceed twenty-five years from the time of the creation of the suspension." This amendment being in direct violation of the rule against perpetuities as declared in the Constitution, we are of the opinion that such amendment is void.

[4] But it was within the power of the Legislature to confine the suspension of the power of alienation to a period of time less than that allowed by the common law. This has been accomplished by subdivision 1 of said section 715, which prescribes a limitation of such power to "the continuance of the lives of persons in being at the creation of the limitation or condition."

[5] Therefore, if the attempted creation of a trust in real property, as shown in the case at bar, cannot be recognized and enforced without at the same time suspending the absolute power of alienation of said real property for a period beyond the continuance of the lives of persons in being at the time of the death of the testator, then it must be held that the provisions of the will or of the decree attempting to create such trust are void. And we think that they are void. As was said in the case of In re Walkerly, 108 Cal. 627, 646, 41 P. 772, 775 (9 Am. St. Rep. 64), where a similarly defective will was in question:

"The fatal defect in the trust is that it provides for an absolute period of years for its determination, during which period the power of alienation is suspended."

It was pointed out that every express trust, valid in its creation, vests the whole estate in the trustees. "If this trust be not valid in its creation, the trustees would take no estate, but neither would the beneficiaries whose rights are dependent upon the validity of the trust. If it be valid, then the 'whole estate' vests in the trustees." In that case, as in the present case, it was suggested by those seeking to sustain the trust that a given remainder was vested, which remainder would be alienable by the remainderman, subject only to the prior interest limited to the trustees. But the court said:

"The fact that a given remainder is vested renders it absolutely alienable, so far as it is itself concerned, but the absolute fee may at the same time be inalienable. Therefore, to convey this absolute interest in possession, the beneficiaries would be compelled to unite with their conveyance that of the trustees in whom the fee is vested. But the trustees cannot convey until the expiration of 25 years. An attempt by them to convey before that time would contravene the trust, and be a void act (Civ. Code, § 870), and so even by this method of progression our path leads to that barrier of perpetuity which cannot be surmounted. So, even though the beneficiary should be a remainderman under such a trust as this, he still could not alienate the land within the trust period so as to avoid the statute. Such a trust cannot be terminated or destroyed during the period fixed for the existence, even by the consent and joint act of all the trustees and beneficiaries."

The decision in the Walkerly Case has been mentioned with full approval in Estate of Maltman, 195 Cal. 643, 234 P. 898.

The conclusion to which we have come upon those phases of the case which we have attempted to discuss renders it unnecessary to give particular attention to the other points argued by counsel. That part of the decree of distribution described in the notice of appeal is reversed, with the direction that an amended decree be entered distributing the real property of said estate to the persons entitled therein as heirs at law of the decedent.

We concur: HOUSER, J., YORK, J.

86 Cal. App. 347

SANER v. KNIGHT et al. (Civ. 3305.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 25, 1927.

1. Adverse possession §43(3)—Where defendant's predecessors in interest made correction deeds to include land in controversy, successive adverse possessions could be tacked.

Where predecessors in interest of cross-complainant, claiming adverse possession and asking that his title be quieted, made correction deeds to land in controversy reciting that land conveyed had been inadvertently omitted from original deed, it was proper to tack successive adverse possessions of occupants.

2. Adverse possession §70—One claiming adverse possession of disputed land need not connect paper title of predecessor in interest with patentee, where she occupied premises through her tenants.

One claiming adverse possession of property and asking that title be quieted did not have to connect paper title of predecessor in interest with patentee, where land in question had been in one inclosure since 1904 and had been occupied through tenants by all predecessors in interest.

3. Adverse possession §114(1)—Evidence sufficiently established 20-year period of occupancy of land adjoining cross-complainant's lot (Code Civ. Proc. § 749).

In action to determine adverse claims to real property in which defendant filed cross-complaint alleging ownership by prescription of certain parcel and asking that his title thereto be quieted, evidence held sufficiently to establish 20-year period of occupancy by cross-complainant and his predecessors in interest of land adjoining his lot and inclosed by fence, under Code Civ. Proc. § 749.

4. Quieting title §44(4)—As against stranger to title, actual possession of lands makes prima facie case of ownership in action to quiet title.

As against an entire stranger to title, actual possession of lands makes prima facie case of ownership and is sufficient to support judgment in action to quiet title.

5. Adverse possession ⇨114(1) — Evidence held to establish more than five years' adverse possession of property adjoining cross-complainant's lot (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 321-325).

In action to determine adverse claims in which defendant filed cross-complaint alleging ownership by prescription of certain parcel and asking that his title thereto be quieted as against plaintiff, evidence held sufficient to establish more than five years' adverse possession by cross-complainant of tract adjoining his lot under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 321-325.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1056(4)—Excluding patent showing record title to disputed land in county judge for public uses in suit to quiet title held not reversible error, where court found plaintiff had no title.

In action to determine adverse claims in which defendant filed cross-complaint asking that his title to certain parcel be quieted, plaintiff could not complain of exclusion of evidence of patent to county judge covering land in dispute for public uses therein designated, for purpose of showing that defendant could not acquire adverse title, where court found that land in controversy was at all times in possession of cross-complainant and his grantors and plaintiff had no title thereto.

7. Judges ⇨42—Excluding evidence of patent to county judge in trust for public of land in dispute, offered to disqualify judge, held not error; "interest" (Code Civ. Proc. § 170).

In action to determine adverse claims to real property, in which defendant filed cross-complaint, exclusion of evidence of patent from United States to county judge of land in dispute in trust for benefit of occupants of town site, offered for purpose of disqualifying trial judge, held not error, since interest of trial judge, if any, was only that of a successor of trustee for occupants of town site and would not have disqualified him; word "interest," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 170, implying only a direct, proximate, substantial, and certain interest in result of action.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Action to determine adverse claims to real property by Irene Saner against N. A. Knight and others. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and Noah C. Crewdson later appeared and filed answer and a cross-complaint. From a judgment for cross-complainant and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ira B. Langdon and Paul D. Dexter, both of Stockton, for appellant.

Berry & Watson, of Stockton, for respondents.

BURROUGHS. Justice pro tem. This action was brought under the provisions of section 749 of the Code of Civil Procedure to determine all adverse claims to the land described in the complaint. The action was originally entitled "Irene Saner, Plaintiff, v. N. A. Knight and All Persons Unknown, etc., Defendants." There was no appearance by any person claiming to be a defendant, and on September 8, 1924, upon the evidence presented by the plaintiff, the court entered its judgment in favor of the plaintiff as to all of the said land. On May 18, 1925, after appropriate proceedings for that purpose, Noah C. Crewdson appeared in the action and filed an answer denying plaintiff's ownership to the easterly 50 feet of lot 12 of block 1 of Thomas' new addition to the town of Woodbridge, said parcel of land being a portion of the land described in plaintiff's complaint. He also filed a cross-complaint alleging ownership by prescription of said easterly half of lot 12 and asking that his title thereto be quieted as against the said plaintiff. The issue thus raised was tried by the court and findings and judgment entered in favor of the said defendant and cross-complainant. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from said judgment and from the order denying her motion for a new trial.

The court made the following finding of fact:

"That said defendant and cross-complainant, Noah C. Crewdson, has, by himself and his predecessors in interest, been in the actual, exclusive, and adverse possession of the real property, described in his cross-complaint herein, continuously for 20 years prior to the filing of the plaintiff's complaint herein, to and including the present time, claiming to own the same in fee against the whole world."

It is appellant's contention that the foregoing finding is not warranted by the "law or the evidence." However, an examination of the record discloses the fact that this finding is not only warranted, but the little evidence there is to the contrary is so palpably weak that it can hardly be said to raise a conflict. The facts are that lots 8, 10, and 12 of block 1 of Thomas' new addition to the town of Woodbridge are located in the northeasterly corner of said block 1, said block lying adjacent to Indiana street on the north and Orange street on the east. It is not disputed that lot 8 of said block is owned by the defendant and cross-complainant Crewdson. It has a frontage on Orange street. Lot 10 is owned by the plaintiff and lies to the west of and adjoining lot 8. Lot 12 is an irregular shaped tract of land lying to the north of, and is directly in front of and adjoining, both lots 8 and 10. Lot 12 extends to Indiana street on the north and Orange street on the east. The westerly half of said lot 12 has been, for many years past, and now is, used in connection with lot 10 owned by the plaintiff; in fact plaintiff's house is partly on the westerly half of lot 12 and partly on lot 10, and it is not disputed that this portion of lot 12 belongs to the plaintiff. The easterly 50 feet of said lot 12 has been, and now is, used in connection with lot 8. The house of the cross-complainant is situated partly on lot 8 and partly on the easterly 50 feet of lot 12.

It was stipulated by both parties that said lot 12 had not been assessed nor any taxes levied thereon for more than 20 years prior to the filing of the complaint in this action.

The testimony shows that at least as early as 1905 there was a line fence between lots 8 and 10 and that it extended across lot 12 to Indiana street, and thence along Indiana street in an easterly direction to Orange street and southerly along the latter street to an old barn on the back of lot 8. It is true that at times this fence was broken down in places and was not kept in very good repair, but nevertheless it existed and was sufficient at all times to show that lot 8 and the easterly 50 feet of lot 12 were in one inclosure.

The evidence also discloses that the easterly 50 feet of said lot 12 has been used continuously since 1904 in connection with and as a part of lot 8; that the children of the people who occupied the house on lot 8 used it for a playground, and that a Chinaman who occupied the house for about three years used the lot as a place for drying almonds, and that after the cross-complainant had purchased the property early in the year 1921, he employed a man named Davis, whose wife was then the owner of lot 10, to plow and level the easterly 50 feet of lot 12. Said cross-complainant also renewed the fence between lots 8 and 10 and dividing lot 12, and around the exterior boundary of lot 8 and the easterly 50 feet of lot 12, and planted fruit trees on all of said land. This was all done with the knowledge of the owner and the occupants of lot 10 and without any objection on their part. When Mrs. Davis, the owner of lot 10, conveyed it to plaintiff, who is her daughter, lot 12 was not described in the deed, and, according to the testimony of the plaintiff, the latter did not know of the existence of lot 12, she believing that lot 10 extended to Indiana street. When cross-complainant Crewdson bought the property described in his cross-complaint from Mrs. Kyber, his predecessor in interest, Mrs. Kyber told him lot 8 extended to Indiana street.

As against this testimony there are some contradictions as to the fence having been in existence at the times testified to by the cross-complainant and his witnesses. There is also some testimony that occasionally Davis, the father of the plaintiff, who for a short time was engaged in street sprinkling, parked his sprinkling wagon on the east half of lot 12; that at times he staked his milk cows thereon, and occasionally cut some grass there. Davis also testified that he plowed and leveled the easterly portion of lot 12, but the evidence is satisfying that this was done under the employment of the cross-complainant, who paid him for the work.

The plaintiff was asked on cross-examination when she discovered that there was such a piece of land as lot 12 in block 1. She replied that it was three years previous when she wanted to sell it, discovering it then from the abstract of title, and thereafter commenced this action to quiet her title thereto. After obtaining the original judgment in this action, plaintiff, on November 9, 1924, wrote a letter to the cross-complainant demanding that he remove his fences from lot 12 and stating to him, "You are no longer in possession of it." This was the first intimation she ever gave the cross-complainant that she claimed any title to the land in dispute, and it was a clear recognition of the cross-complainant's possession.

The evidence is overwhelming that the plaintiff's claim to this land was an afterthought based upon her discovery that there was such a piece of land as lot 12; and her claim to that portion of the Crewdson land as lies within the latter's inclosure is without merit.

[1] It is further contended on behalf of appellant that the judgment is erroneous because in extending to cross-complainant Crewdson the benefit of adverse title, the court was compelled to tack successive adverse possessions and that no priority of title was shown to exist between said cross-complainant and the former adverse occupant. Many cases are cited by appellant in support of this view, and there is no doubt that the law as cited is sound. Allen v. McKay & Co., 120 Cal. 332, 52 P. 828, and Messer v. Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, 149 Cal. 122, 84 P. 835. But record title in the case at bar shows a conveyance of lot 8 to Blanchie Frazier, January 12, 1905; that in 1910 the latter conveyed said lot to Stella Kyber and the latter conveyed the same to cross-complainant Crewdson in 1921. On July 23, 1925, Blanchie Frazier made a correction deed to Stella M. Knight, formerly Stella M. Kyber, of said easterly half of lot 12 of block 1, and the latter, on July 28, 1925, made the same character of deed to cross-complainant Crewdson, both of these deeds containing a recital that the parcel conveyed had been inadvertently omitted from the original deed. These deeds remedied the defect complained of by the appellant herein, and clearly bring the case within the rule laid down in Allen v. McKay & Co., supra, and Messer v. Hibernia, etc., Society, supra.

[2] Appellant urges that respondent did not offer proof at the trial that Stella M. Knight was in the possession of the disputed land and therefore she must connect her paper title with the patentee. A large number of cases are cited in support of this view, and the principle of law thus cited by counsel is sound, but is not applicable to the facts of this case for the reason that all of lot 8 and the easterly half of lot 12 were under one inclosure in 1904 and were rented to tenants by Dr. Brown, the predecessor in interest of Blanchie Frazier, and that the former conveyed lot 8 of said premises to the latter, and that during the ownership of said Blanchie Frazier the premises were occupied by her tenants and that after she conveyed the title to Stella Kyber, the latter also occupied the said premises through her tenants.

[3. 4] We are of the opinion that this sufficiently establishes the 20-year period of occupancy required by section 749 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but even if the evidence was held to be insufficient to establish the 20-year period required by section 749 of the Code of Civil Procedure, cross-complainant has clearly established that he and his predecessors have been for many years last past and that at the time of the filing of the plaintiff's complaint and at the time of the trial he was in the actual and exclusive possession of the land in controversy, and as against the plaintiff, who was never in possession, nor ever had a record title to said land, and is a stranger to the title, she cannot complain of the judgment, for, as held in Davis v. Crump, 162 Cal. 513, 123 P. 294, as against an entire stranger to the title, actual possession of lands has uniformly been held in actions to quiet title to make out a prima facie case of ownership and sufficient to support a judgment.

[5] There is also another reason why the plaintiff cannot prevail in this action, and that is because the proof on behalf of the cross-complainant is sufficient to establish more than 5 years' adverse possession under the provisions of sections 321 to 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the allegations of the cross-complaint are broad enough under the provisions of section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure to sustain the judgment herein.

In Faxon v. All Persons, etc., et al., 166 Cal. 707, 137 P. 919, L. R. A. 1916B, 1209, and Ernst v. Tiel, 51 Cal. App. 747, 197 P. 809, it is held that where an action is brought under the provisions of section 749 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the issue of title is raised by the pleadings of the parties and is properly before the court for determination, the court, upon proof, may render judgment quieting plaintiff's title to the property under the general provision of law relating to actions of that character, although the proof is not in strict accordance with section 749 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[6] Plaintiff's next contention is that the court erred in not receiving in evidence the patent from the United States to W. E. Green, county judge of San Joaquin county, in trust for the benefit of the occupants of the townsite of Woodbridge, which, according to the claim of appellant, includes the easterly 50 feet of lot 12 of block 1; the objection being that the record title would thus be shown to rest in the county judge and his successors, for the public uses therein designated, and that no adverse title could be acquired there-to by an individual.

We are not called upon to pass upon this question, because the public is not here complaining, and it is no concern of the appellant for the reason that the trial court has found that the parcel of land in controversy was at all times in the possession of the cross-complainant and his grantors and plaintiff has no title thereto. Plaintiff's principal reliance in support of the foregoing point is the case of Placer County et al. v. Lake Tahoe Ry. Transportation Co., 58 Cal. App. 764, 209 P. 900. But in that case the facts are that a public commons had been legally dedicated to public use and therefore became the property of the public and the county of Placer was the plaintiff, and it was there held that as to such a parcel of land title by prescription could not be acquired against the public.

The case of Tripp v. Duane, 74 Cal. 85, 15 P. 439, while not directly in point, is somewhat analogous, and it is there held that in an action to quiet title a defendant against whom the plaintiff's title is properly quieted to an undivided interest in the premises cannot object, on an appeal taken by himself alone, that the decree as against the other defendants not appealing quieted plaintiff's title to a greater extent than was justified by the evidence.

[7] The last contention that we are called upon to answer is that the court erred in not receiving evidence of the patent which was offered by the plaintiff, it being offered for the purpose of disqualifying the trial judge, and arises upon the following offer of evidence:

"Mr. Langdon: We will introduce testimony * * * to show the title to this property in point, lot 12, and the only existing title we are able to show, the only registered title, stands in the judges of San Joaquin county, * * * and that patent to this land was issued to the judges of San Joaquin county and their successors, which would disqualify the judge of San Joaquin county to hear and try this case."

It further appears from counsel's offer of proof that the patent referred to was issued "in trust for the benefit of the occupants of the townsite of Woodbridge." This offer of evidence was refused and is now assigned as error. In support of his contention appellant cites Lindsay-Strathmore I. Dist. v. Superior Court, 182 Cal. 315, 187 P. 1056; but in that case it was held that the trial judge, through ownership in his own right of a parcel of land, held a direct interest in the water underlying it, which was the subject-matter of the litigation, and that it was im-material how small that interest might be, it was sufficient to disqualify the trial judge.

In the case at bar the interest of the trial judge, if in fact there was any interest, was only that of a successor of the trustee for the occupants of the townsite, and, as said in Oakland v. Oakland Water Front Co., 118 Cal. 249, 50 P. 268, where the question of disqualification involved was that of the judge being a taxpayer of the city and might benefit by a diminution of taxes as the result of revenue to be derived from the water front, the subject-matter of the litigation, in case of the success of the city, the word "interest" as used in section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure embraces only a direct, proximate, substantial, and certain interest in the result of the action. In the language used by Judge Olney in his concurring opinion in Lindsay-Strathmore I. Dist. v. Superior Court, supra, the judge's "right, if he has any, is purely theoretical and his so-called interest is not a thing of reality."

Under the circumstances it does not appear that, even though the court had permitted the introduction of the evidence offered and there had been no rebuttal thereof, the interest of the trial judge, as shown by such evidence, would have disqualified him. There was therefore no error in rejecting the testimony.

We have examined each of the assignments of error, and in our opinion they are without merit.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

PEOPLE v. HARDWICK. (Cr. 1507.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 31, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 29, 1927.

1. Assault and battery §64—Peace officer in arresting for misdemeanor need not retreat before using extreme measures to prevent receiving injury, but must press forward to accomplish his purpose.

While a private citizen may be obliged to retreat to avoid the necessity of resorting to extreme measures to prevent receiving great bodily injury, a peace officer in making an arrest for a misdemeanor is not under such compulsion, but must press forward to accomplish his purpose.

2. Assault and battery §96(2)—Jury should have been instructed that defendant in making arrest for misdemeanor was not obliged to retire to avoid conflict.

In prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon, under evidence that defendant was endeavoring to make an arrest for a misdemeanor, jury should have been instructed he was under no obligation to retire in order to avoid a conflict.

3. Criminal law §757(6)—Instruction that witness convicted of felony was less likely to be truthful than one not so convicted held reversible error.

In prosecution for assault with deadly weapon, where to impeach defendant as a witness evidence was introduced that he had been convicted of manslaughter in Oklahoma, instruction that one convicted of felony is less likely to be honest and truthful in his testimony than one who has not been convicted held reversible error, where credibility of witness was for jury and court was unauthorized to suggest as matter of law that former conviction deprived witness of credit presumptively due him.

4. Criminal law §823(12)—Error in charge on credibility of witness convicted of felony held not cured by general statement jury were sole judges of evidence.

In criminal prosecution, where evidence that defendant was convicted of manslaughter in Oklahoma was admitted to impeach his credibility as a witness, error in instruction that one convicted of felony was less likely to be honest and truthful in testimony than one not so convicted held not cured by general instruction that jury were sole and exclusive judges of effect and value of evidence.

5. Witnesses §345(4)—Pardon of witness convicted of felony is admissible and to be considered by jury in determining his credibility.

In criminal prosecution, where conviction of defendant of felony is admitted to impeach him as a witness, if pardon has been granted him, it is admissible in evidence so that jury may determine his credibility thereafter.

6. Witnesses §345(4)—Whether witness convicted of felony was wrongfully convicted cannot be inquired into because of admission of pardon on issue of credibility.

In criminal prosecution, where conviction of witness of felony is admitted as affecting his credibility, if pardon is introduced in evidence, whether conviction was wrongful may not be inquired into, since to do so would require examination into collateral matter.

7. Criminal law §778(3)—Instruction that presumption of innocence continues throughout trial should always be given.

In criminal prosecution, charge that presumption of innocence continues with defendant throughout trial and deliberations of jury should always be given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; A. C. Finney, Judge.

Joe Hardwick was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals. Reversed.

Edgar B. Hervey and M. W. Conkling, both of El Centro, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Dep. Atty. Gen., and Elmer W. Heald, of Brawley, for the People.

THOMPSON, J. The defendant was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon upon William A. Taylor and appeals from the judgment of the court pronounced upon the verdict and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The undisputed facts are that on the evening of February 3, 1927, Taylor, in company with his wife and six male companions and their wives, had been at the Climax Café in Mexicali, Mexico, from about 7:30 in the evening, eating, drinking and dancing; that about 8:50 p. m. they recrossed the international line into Calexico, Cal.; that upon their arrival in Calexico they separated into two groups of seven each, for the purpose of driving home in two automobiles; that very soon after Taylor and a Mrs. Booker seated themselves in one of the machines, the defendant, who was a peace officer, approached the automobile and demanded that they not make so much noise; that in the conversation which immediately ensued the defendant said in effect that he ought "to throw" Taylor "in"; that Taylor demanded to see Hardwick's authority; that Hardwick grabbed Taylor in an effort to pull him out of the machine and shortly after shot him; that the bullet entered the body near the left nipple and lodged under the skin in Taylor's back, whence it was subsequently removed; that after the shooting Taylor was taken into the police station, where the officers secured the services of a physician. This, in substance, comprises the undisputed facts. There is a sharp conflict on other matters. The defendant and several of his witnesses testified that the party returning from Mexico was very noisy and boisterous. The defendant asserts that his attention was attracted to the car in which Taylor and Mrs. Booker were sitting by the noise made by a woman and that as he approached it he heard her exclaim, "Oh! Oh!" "Quit; let me alone!" several times. Appellant further testified that when Taylor demanded his authority he threw back his coat and displayed his badge, not once but twice; that after he tried to pull Taylor out of the machine Taylor made a move with his right hand toward his right hip pocket as though to draw a gun, accompanying the move with profanity; and that he, being fearful of his life, shot. He testified further that the only members of Taylor's party in or at the automobile were Taylor and Mrs. Booker. He was corroborated in this testimony by his nephew, who said that he heard a woman screaming; that his uncle went over to see what the trouble was and a few minutes later called him and his cousin, Roly Hardwick, over there, saying something about trouble; that he saw his uncle show Taylor his badge, saw the attempt to pull Taylor out of the automobile, followed by the motion of Taylor as though to draw a gun, and saw the shooting; that Roly was there with him until he was told by his uncle to get a policeman and get him quick; and that no member of Taylor's party was present except Taylor and the one woman. The testimony of the people's witnesses may be fully illustrated by stating in substance the testimony of Taylor, who was corroborated in all important points by four of his witnesses who claimed to have been in a position to see and hear. He testified that Mr. and Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Jones branched off from his party of seven, the three of them going to the rest rooms of a Shell Oil Company station near by and did not come up to the car until about the time that he told the defendant that he was not aware of the fact that they were making any noise and also told the defendant to leave the young lady "out of the conversation"; that Hardwick at no time placed him under arrest or showed him an emblem of authority; that after his refusal to show his authority he resisted the defendant when he tried to pull him out of the car, whereupon Hardwick called out, "Come over here, you fellows," and after a few more words, pulled his gun and shot.

The appellant's first complaint is the refusal of the court to give the following instruction:

"An officer having legal authority to make an arrest who is resisted by the person whom he attempts to arrest is under no obligation to wait for assistance or retire in order to avoid a conflict with the person he thus attempts to arrest, or to retire in order to avoid injury at the hands of any such person whom he attempts to arrest, or to wait for assistance in the making of any such arrest by reason of any resistance offered, and that it is the duty of all persons who commit any crime be it felony or misdemeanor in the presence of an officer to peacefully submit to arrest and not to offer any resistance." (Italics ours.)

The court refused to give the instruction in toto, but did give the italicized portion, and also gave an instruction, a portion of which reads as follows:

"If you believe from the evidence in this case that Taylor, at the time of his arrest, if he was arrested, or at the time defendant was approaching the car which Taylor and Mrs. Booker had entered, was drunk or committing a disturbance of the peace or any other public offense, then and in either such case it was the duty and right of the defendant to arrest Taylor, and for that purpose he was authorized to use whatever force was necessary to take Taylor into custody, and if Taylor resisted such arrest, and in the course of such resistance threw back his hand as if to draw a gun, and if from that act and other circumstances in the case the defendant honestly believed, and, as a reasonable man, had good cause to believe, that he was in imminent danger of suffering death or great bodily harm at the hands of Taylor, then the defendant was justified in shooting Taylor for the purpose of disabling or killing him, if that appeared to be necessary in order to protect himself, and in such case the defendant would not be accountable, and you should acquit him even though it should afterwards appear that Taylor was unarmed, and that the indication on which the defendant acted was wholly fallacious, and that he was not in actual peril. On the other hand, if, after considering all of the evidence in this case, you believe, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Taylor had neither committed, nor was in the act of committing, any public offense at the time the defendant approached the car on the night in question, then the arrest of Taylor by the defendant, if he was arrested, would be unlawful, and Taylor would have a right to resist such unlawful attempt to arrest him, though he would not have a right to resort to extreme measures such as using a gun, or other dangerous weapon in such resistance, unless circumstances existed at the time the arrest was being attempted which were reasonably sufficient to justify him in the belief that he was about to be injured in body or limb, or that his life was in danger from the defendant. If the arrest of Taylor was unlawful and was made without probably [sic] cause, or, if the arrest was made by the defendant in bad faith and for the purpose of oppression, then and in either such case the defendant, as between himself and Taylor, would be the first aggressor, and the defendant would not be permitted under the law to justify his act of shooting Taylor on the ground of self-defense, unless he had in good faith, before he fired the shot that wounded Taylor, desisted from all threats, if any, and all acts of violence, if any, and had withdrawn from his attempt to arrest Taylor, if he was attempting to arrest him."

There was another instruction which stated the conditions under which the right of self-defense may be asserted, including the following:

"That the party may not himself be the first aggressor, or, if the aggressor, that he has in good faith withdrawn from the contest before the fatal blow."

[1, 2] It is the claim of appellant that in these instructions, together with others which define with greater particularity the element of apparent necessity to resort to extreme measures to prevent receiving great bodily injury, the trial judge overlooked the distinction between a peace officer and a citizen; that while the citizen may be obliged to retreat to avoid the necessity, that the officer is under no such compulsion, but rather is obligated to press forward for the accomplishment of his purpose. There can be no doubt that appellant's statement of the law is correct, but in this connection we must bear in mind that there is a substantial difference, in using an undue amount of force to prevent escape, from that of using all the force necessary to overcome resistance. In Krueger v. State, 171 Wis. 566, 177 N. W. 917, it is said that:

"While in order to apprehend the person charged with a misdemeanor only an officer may not take the life of the person so charged, it does not follow by any means that any resistance offered to the arrest may not be overcome to the extent of taking life, if that be necessary to overcome the resistance. * * * It was not only his privilege but his duty to overcome such resistance, and the taking of life necessary to do so constitutes justifiable homicide under section 4366, Stats."

And in State v. Dierberger, 96 Mo. 666, 10 S. W. 168, 9 Am. St. Rep. 380, the court says:

"The officer must of necessity be the aggressor. His mission is not accomplished when he wards off the assault. He must press forward and accomplish his object. He is not bound to put off the arrest until a more favorable time. Because of these duties devolved upon him the law throws around him a special protection."

Further quotations might be added to the same effect from the old books of the common law, which are to-day accepted as guides to our modern law. See quotations and citations, Bishop's New Criminal Law, vol. 2, §§ 647 et seq. Under this state of the law the jury should unquestionably have been told, in view of the testimony which justified them in believing that the defendant was endeavoring to make an arrest for a misdemeanor, that he was under no obligation to retire in order to avoid a conflict. They were informed that before the defendant could possibly be justified in the use of a deadly weapon he could not have been "the first aggressor, or, if the aggressor, that he" had "in good faith withdrawn from the contest before the fatal blow." As is stated in the quotation from State v. Dierberger, supra, the officer must under the law be the aggressor. The court endeavored, however, to define what was meant by the term aggressor as used in the instruction by saying that if the arrest were unlawful or oppressive the defendant would be the first aggressor. Did the jury understand from this that the defendant in the eyes of the law would only be the aggressor in the event of an unlawful attempt to make an arrest? Ordinarily, it may be said that the statement of one instance where the person would be an aggressor would not conclude the possibility of his being an aggressor otherwise. However, as a part of this same instruction, the jury were told that if Taylor was in fact committing any offense at the time of the attempted arrest, "it was the duty and right of the defendant to arrest Taylor, and for that purpose he was authorized to use whatever force was necessary to take Taylor." Reading the two portions of these instructions together, we think the jury could gather no other idea than the one that only in the event the attempted arrest were unlawful or oppressive would the defendant be the aggressor, and that otherwise it was his duty to press forward and make the arrest, using all the force necessary to accomplish that purpose.

[3] During the trial of the defendant, who was a witness, evidence was introduced, for the purpose of impeachment, establishing that the defendant had been convicted of the offense of manslaughter in the state of Oklahoma, and thereafter the defendant sought to introduce an unconditional pardon by the Governor of that state in which it is recited that the defendant was first granted a parole on the recommendation of the board of prison control, and that "since the granting of said parole" the defendant has "lived the life of a good, upright, law-abiding citizen, and as such is entitled to a full pardon." The court excluded the pardon and in connection with this phase of the case instructed the jury as follows:

"Where the defendant in a criminal case, testifies as a witness in his own behalf, he may be impeached by showing that he has been convicted of a felony, if such is the fact; and such showing may be made by examination of the defendant himself or it may be shown by the record of the judgment of the conviction. Such impeachment affects only the credibility of the witness. It is permitted upon the theory that a man who has been convicted of a felony is less likely to be honest and truthful in his testimony than a man who has not been convicted of a felony. It does not, however, impeach the character of defendant for the peace and quiet, or prove, or tend to prove, in any way, the charge upon which he is on trial, and no such inference should be drawn from the impeachment or from the judgment of conviction upon which the impeachment is based (Code Civ. Proc. § 2051), and anything said or done in the presence of the jury concerning a pardon, which may or may not have been granted to defendant, it having been stricken from the record, is of no consequence in this case, and must be disregarded by the jury, as must all other evidence which has been ruled out or stricken, or to which objections have been sustained."

Counsel complains of the action of the court in this respect for two reasons: First, that the court erred in giving the instruction, and particularly that portion in which it is stated that one "who has been convicted of a felony is less likely to be honest and truthful in his testimony" than one who has not been convicted, asserting that the court should have given a requested instruction to the effect that it is for the jury, and the jury alone, to say what effect the conviction will have upon their mind; second, that, the conviction being admitted, the pardon was admissible, together with the circumstances attending the conviction. He also asserts that the record disclosing that the district attorney having knowledge of the pardon, it was prejudicial error for the district attorney to mention the conviction before the jury. However, inasmuch as appellant concedes the admissibility of the conviction regardless of the pardon, it is impossible to conceive any legitimate reason why the district attorney should not mention the conviction.

Should the court have given that portion of the instruction just mentioned and refused to give the following instruction:

"A previous conviction of a felony does not necessarily destroy the credibility of any witness, nor does it raise a presumption that the witness has or will testify to that which is false. It is simply a circumstance of more or less weight which you are authorized to take into consideration in determining what credit shall be given to him with respect to his testimony."

[4] It is not debatable that the instruction asked by defendant correctly states the law applicable to the situation. It was for the jury to say, in view of all the circumstances, what credit should be given the witness, and the court has not the authority to suggest that, "as a matter of law," a former conviction "deprived the particular witness of any portion of the credit presumptively due to the testimony of witnesses [sic]." People v. McLane, 60 Cal. 412. It has been held that the effect of a former conviction, where introduced for the purpose of impeachment must be left to the jury. Leventhal v. Home Ins. Co. (Sup.) 165 N. Y. S. 323. But here the trial judge in no uncertain terms informed the jury that the witness was not entitled to the same credibility as one who had not been convicted. And in so far as he did so he stepped beyond the judicial function and attempted to discharge the duty of the jury. This he could not do, nor was the error cured by a general statement included in the instruction usually if not always given, to the effect that the jury are the sole and exclusive judges of the effect and value of evidence. In this instance they were given to understand that, as a matter of law, a person who has been convicted is deprived of a part, at least, of the credibility presumptively due the witness. We have heretofore recited sufficient of the testimony to disclose that the testimony was in sharp conflict and that had the jury not been misinstructed the trial might have terminated otherwise. We cannot say that the error is not prejudicial or that it has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

While the error found to exist requires a reversal, yet, in view of the fact that the admissibility of the pardon will probably arise on a retrial, we must determine the law upon that question.

[5, 6] In our consideration of the problem thus presented, and especially at a period in our civic development when there is being given great attention to procedural reform in an effort to secure sure and speedy justice, with the hope that it will result in a lessening of the commission of crime, it is most desirable that we realize that while the certain and swift conviction of the guilty is an end "devoutly to be hoped for," yet, more important still, in the aim to free the citizens from violence, is the certain acquittal of the innocent. It is obvious that whenever in any country, in a mistaken zeal for conviction, the administration of the law has reached a point where the innocent are not safe, that respect and reverence for institutions and regard for the rules of social intercourse are blighted. There is no surer avenue to the increase of social crimes than for the state to permit the punishment of those who are not guilty. Long ago it was discovered that convictions were sometimes had where there was a doubt concerning the guilt, and that sometimes a man was guilty who was not really bad at heart and who evinced a sincere desire to atone for his misdeed. Such persons were fit subjects for pardon by the crown, in much the same manner as many persons who may have rebelled under a sense of grievance, mistaken or otherwise, were proper objects of a general amnesty. And as a general amnesty blots out the offense from the memory, so we find the early authorities concerning pardons making like statements. In Hay v. Justices of the Tower, 24 Q. B. 561, we read from Baron Pollock's opinion:

"By the prerogative of the crown the pardon extends far beyond the mere discharge of the prisoner from any further imprisonment. It is a purging of the offense. The King's pardon, says Hale, 'takes away poenam et culpam.' 2 P. C. 278. This points to the character, condition and status of the convict. Again, in 2 Hawkins, P. C., s. 48, the author says that pardon 'does so far clear the party from the infamy and all other consequences of his crime that he may not only have an action for a scandal in calling him traitor or felon after the time of the pardon, but may also be a good witness. * * *'"

And Justice Hawkins, in his opinion in the same case, says:

"I cannot believe that it was the intention of the Legislature that if a man had the great misfortune to be wrongly convicted, and was pardoned on the ground that the conviction was wrong, the queen's pardon, although absolving him from the pains of imprisonment, should nevertheless leave him to suffer the penal effect of his conviction by being prevented in future from following his avocation, notwithstanding the rectification of the error which had occurred." (Italics ours.)

And in an earlier case (Cuddington v. Wilkins, 1 Hob. 67, 80 English Rep. [Full reprint] 216), which was an action for slander by Cuddington, who had been convicted of larceny and subsequently pardoned, against Wilkins, who called the plaintiff a thief and attempted to justify his words by the conviction, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, because "the felony is by the pardon extinct." Later, in the case of Osborn v. U. S., 91 U. S. 474, 23 L. Ed. 388, Mr. Justice Field, delivering the opinion of the court, says:

"The pardon of that offense necessarily carried with it the release of the penalty attached to its commission, so far as such release was in the power of the government, unless specially restrained by exceptions embraced in the instrument itself." (Italics ours.)

And in Oklahoma, where the defendant in this case was formerly convicted and pardoned, we find that:

"Pardon reaches both the punishment prescribed for the offense and the guilt of the offender; it obliterates, in legal contemplation, the offense itself, and hence its effect is to make the offender a new man." (Italics ours.) Ex parte Collins (Okl. Cr. App.) 239 P. 696, citing Ex parte Crump, 10 Okl. Cr. 133, 135 P. 428, to the same effect.

Mr. Chief Justice Wallace, in discussing a restoration to citizenship as distinguished from a full pardon, in the case of People v. Bowen, 43 Cal. 439-443 (13 Am. Rep. 148), says:

"It did not purport to remove the guilt of Davis, nor wipe away the infamy by the law of the land attaching upon him by reason of his conviction. It sought to restore him to all the rights of citizenship possessed by him before his conviction of the offenses 'above referred to,' and to so restore him, while he yet remained a convicted felon, and with the consequent legal infamy attaching by law to that status. The stain of his iniquity flowing from his conviction, is still left upon him by the executive. The judgment of the law upon that fact is that the credit of his oath is so absolutely and effectually destroyed that he cannot be trusted to testify at all; that it is not to be hoped that he will speak the truth, but must be conclusively assumed that he will not. If the judgment be reversed, the disability is, of course, necessarily removed; if the offense be pardoned the same consequence, too, would follow." (Italics ours.)

Also, in a disbarment proceeding (Matter of Emmons, 29 Cal. App. 121, 154 P. 619), founded upon a conviction of a felony which had subsequently been pardoned, after quoting from Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall, 333, 18 L. Ed. 366, to the effect that pardon not only releases the person from punishment but also blots "out the guilt thus incurred, so that in the eye of the law he is as innocent of that offense as if he had never committed it," and other authorities of like wording, it is said:

"Notwithstanding that the respondent at one time stood convicted of a felony and that the record of conviction might have been used as the foundation for this proceeding while the judgment of conviction was in force, it is no longer possible, after the pardon, to disbar him by this statutory proceeding wherein, if it is maintainable at all, judgment must go against him without any opportunity to defend against any present imputation against his moral character." (Italics ours.)

We conceive of this case as being particularly in point, because the record of conviction when introduced for impeachment purposes is a "present imputation against" the "moral character" of the witness.

Basing the opinion in part upon the authority of Sims v. Sims, 75 N. Y. 466, wherein it is held that a conviction in a foreign jurisdiction, if admissible at all, is not conclusive, but may be rebutted by proof of innocence, the court in the case of Sisson v. Yost, 53 Hun. 609, 12 N. Y. S. 373, not only decides that the pardon is admissible, but also that the witness may show "the promptitude with which the pardon itself was granted, the reason why it was granted, and the time when the defendant was discharged," the statement being added that "all these facts would necessarily have had a very important bearing on the question of the credibility to be given to the witness." The judgment was reversed for this error. As long as it remained the law that the witness was disqualified by the conviction there was a unanimity in the decisions that the pardon removed the disqualification. The pardon was consequently always admissible to effect the removal. Gradually the law was changed in many jurisdictions so that the conviction does not work a disqualification. And with this change has come a small measure of difference in the language of the opinions. The only authority which we have been able to discover wherein the pardon was refused admission by the court of last resort is the case of Gallagher v. People, 211 Ill. 158, 71 N. E. 842, and although the appellate court in a former hearing of the same matter, then entitled O'Donnell v. People, 110 Ill. App. 250, decided that the pardon was admissible on the ground of "common fairness to the witness," the Supreme Court dismissed the argument with these words:

"Under the statute" (permitting the conviction for impeachment purposes only) "the guilt or innocence of the defendant of the crime for which he had been convicted, his punishment, his term of service, etc., are wholly immaterial and incompetent. That he may have been pardoned proves nothing as to his credibility, and to permit evidence of that fact would simply be to introduce into the case a collateral issue."

This statement is at variance with the history of the reason for and the effect of a pardon. Respondent relies upon a statement in the case of People v. Mackey, 58 Cal. App. 123, 208 P. 135, but the question there was whether one who had pleaded guilty and been granted probation and served his probationary period might be confronted with the record, and it was held that he could not. The declaration that, "although the grant of a pardon makes a 'new man' of the pardoned individual, his manhood is not revived to the extent that he may not be confronted with the record of his conviction whenever he testifies as a witness," although obiter, correctly states the great weight of authority, concerning which we might have grave doubt, were it not for section 2051, Code of Civil Procedure, and the almost unanimous voice of the decisions. It does not, however, decide the inadmissibility of the pardon. Counsel attaches considerable importance to the remarks of the district judge in the case of Wallamet R. T. Co. v. Oregon S. N. Co., 29 Fed. Cas. 88 (No. 17,106) to the effect that:

"It is, or certainly was at the date of this pardon, an ex parte proceeding, taken upon the ex parte statements, representations and solicitations of sympathizing friends and interested and uninformed parties, and cannot be said to prove anything except its own existence and the fact that the party was entitled to have, or had the influence requisite to procure the application of the executive clemency to this case. A pardon does not profess to be a reversal of the judgment of conviction, but only a relief from the punishment imposed by it. In every other respect the judgment stands as if no pardon had been granted."

This statement is certainly in sharp contrast with the opinions heretofore noted from the United States Supreme Court and does not fit as well with our notion of official duty performed by the executive as another found to have been quoted from 1 Starkie's Ev. (7th Am. Ed.) 99, in the case of Bennett v. State, 24 Tex. App. 73, 5 S. W. 527, 5 Am. St. Rep. 875:

"And although a pardon cannot convert a wicked man into an honest one, and confer credibility upon one who through the infamy of his conduct is not credible, yet such a pardon must be presumed to have been conferred after inquiry, upon good and sufficient ground, on an object worthy of the indulgence, and therefore worthy of being heard, but the degree of credit is still to be left to the jury."

From this rather lengthy résumé of the authorities it is apparent that sound reason and a proper sense of justice dictate that the jury should be left to determine the credibility of the witness after having laid before it the pardon; that while the subject of the wrongful conviction, if such in fact it was, may not be inquired into, because that would require a lengthy examination into collateral matters, nevertheless the pardon is a proper subject of evidence.

[7] We have examined the other assignments of error, but find nothing requiring further comment other than to say that the instruction, in substance, that the presumption of innocence continues with the defendant through the trial and the deliberations of the jury should always be given. People v. Ye Foo, 4 Cal. App. 730, 89 P. 450.

86 Cal. App. 269

KENYON v. HARTFORD ACCIDENT & INDEMNITY CO. (Civ. 3351.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 22, 1927.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 931(1)—On appeal from judgment for plaintiff, it is presumed that trial court believed plaintiff's testimony.

In action to recover damages for false imprisonment, it is presumed, on appeal from judgment for plaintiff, that trial court believed plaintiff's testimony that officer had circular on day of arrest, and that his attention was called to fact that description in circular did not fit plaintiff.

2. False imprisonment $\S$ 7(3)—Plaintiff could not be held without warrant by city marshal for misdemeanor committed in Oregon (Pen. Code, $\S$ 836).

Under Pen. Code, $\S$ 836, city marshal had no authority to hold plaintiff, suing for false imprisonment, without warrant for misdemeanor committed in Oregon.

3. False imprisonment $\S$ 15(3)—City marshal is not liable for imprisonment merely because arresting officer may have been subject to his orders.

In action for false imprisonment, mere fact that officer making arrest may have been subject to orders of city marshal does not make marshal liable for arrest or imprisonment.

4. False imprisonment $\S$ 15(3)—Superior officer, directing arrest, or personally co-operating therein, is liable for false imprisonment.

Superior officer is liable for false arrest or imprisonment when he has directed such acts to be done, or personally co-operated therein.

5. False imprisonment $\S$ 15(3)—City marshal, shown to have directed plaintiff to be held in county jail, held liable for false imprisonment.

In action to recover damages for false arrest, brought against surety of city marshal, evidence that city marshal received telegram from sheriff requesting arrest, placed same on office desk where it was observed by officer making arrest, and that immediately after arrest city marshal directed plaintiff to be held in county jail, was sufficient to make city marshal liable for subsequent false imprisonment.

6. False imprisonment $\S$ 29—Published article giving account of plaintiff's arrest and release held admissible to show damage for false imprisonment.

In action for damages for false imprisonment, evidence of article published in newspaper, giving fair and unbiased account of plaintiff's arrest, and subsequent release, which was natural consequence of arrest and imprisonment, was admissible to show damage suffered by plaintiff.

7. Torts $\S$ 15—Wrongdoer is liable for all natural consequences, though produced by intervening agents set in motion.

Generally, person committing illegal or wrongful act is answerable for all consequences that ensue in ordinary and natural course of events, though consequences be merely brought about by intervening agents, provided such agents were set in motion by primary wrongdoer, or acts causing damage were necessary or legal consequence of wrongful act.

8. False imprisonment $\S$ 34—Publication of article concerning arrest held natural consequence of false imprisonment as regards right to damages.

In action for damages for false imprisonment, publication in newspaper of account of arrest is a natural and ordinary consequence of false imprisonment, and must be deemed to have been contemplated as regards right to recover damages therefor.

9. Appeal and error $\S$ 1051(1)—Admitting letter given plaintiff suing for false imprisonment, reciting that plaintiff was not person whose arrest was requested, was not prejudicial, where facts contained therein were otherwise proved.

In action for damages for false imprisonment, admission of letter given to plaintiff on his release, stating that he was not same person as was wanted, was not prejudicial, where it recited no fact which had not already been proved, and it was not contended at trial that plaintiff was person whose arrest was requested.

10. False imprisonment $\S$ 36—\$1,000 for false imprisonment for five days causing loss of job held not excessive.

In action for damages for false imprisonment of plaintiff, locked in cell for five days, suffering humiliation and mortification, losing employment, and finding great difficulty in securing another job, damages at $1,000 held not excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by W. D. Kenyon against the Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 260 P. 954.

James T. Matlock, of Red Bluff, for appellant.

Ralph Lewis and George E. Foote, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff was given judgment against the defendant in the sum of $1,000, as damages for his false imprisonment by W. F. Montgomery, city marshal of Red Bluff, on whose official bond the defendant was surety. The court found, among other things, as follows:

"That * * * the said W. F. Montgomery, acting in his capacity as city marshal of said city of Red Bluff (maliciously and with force), and without an order, or warrant, or process of any court authorizing him so to do, did arrest and imprison and cause to be arrested and imprisoned the plaintiff herein, W. D. Kenyon, and did then and there restrain and deprive him of his liberty on a pretended charge of failing to provide for a wife or minor child, claimed by the said W. F. Montgomery to have been committed by this plaintiff in the state of Oregon, and for no other reason whatsoever; that thereupon the said W. F. Montgomery, acting in his official capacity aforesaid, did imprison and cause to be imprisoned this plaintiff in the county jail of the county of Tehama, * * * and did there cause the said plaintiff to be restrained of his liberty, without bail and without any provision for bail for the period of five days thereafter; that said W. F. Montgomery did, during all of said time, maliciously and forcibly keep the said plaintiff in his said custody, and restrained and deprived of his liberty without bail, and refused to permit said plaintiff to give bail or be admitted to bail during all of said time; that, by reason of said imprisonment and restraint of the liberty of plaintiff, the said plaintiff was injured in his good name and reputation and subjected to humiliation from the citizens of the said county of Tehama and of the county of Sacramento, and among his friends and acquaintances and was thereby damaged in the sum of $1,000."

The plaintiff testified that at the time of his arrest he was, and for three or four years prior thereto had been, a resident of Sacramento; that he was then receiving $30 a week and expenses for driving a truck between Sacramento and Redding; that on February 15, 1925, between 3:30 and 4 o'clock in the morning, he was arrested in Red Bluff by the "night officer" of that city, Fred Griffith, who "called the sheriff and made reservations" for the plaintiff in the county jail, to which he was then taken and "locked up"; that between 8 and 9 o'clock of the same morning Montgomery appeared at the jail with a circular which contained a description of R. B. Kenyon and a request for his arrest for "desertion and nonsupport in Polk county," Or.; that the plaintiff demanded an immediate hearing, but received "no response"; that the sheriff "stated in the presence of Mr. Montgomery that I was not the man that the circular called for," but that Montgomery said "to hold me in the county jail until he had further orders"; that the plaintiff was held in the county jail for five days; that he then employed an attorney, who procured the issuance of a writ of habeas corpus for his release, but that, prior to the time set for the return thereon, Montgomery released him from custody; that the circular contained a picture of R. B. Kenyon, but there was "absolutely no resemblance whatever" between the picture and himself; and that he lost his job by reason of his arrest and imprisonment and was out of steady work for several months thereafter.

[1, 2] The circular, to which reference has been made, was headed, "$100 Reward," and it contained the following description:

"Ross B. Kenyon, age 35, weight 170-180, height 6 feet, ash blond hair with gray mixed through, blue eyes, heavy brows, meeting on bridge of nose; gold bridge work in upper jaw; two gold teeth on each side of two central teeth on upper jaw, no lobes on ears, very broad shoulders."

The defendant's eyes are gray. His brows do not meet on the bridge of his nose. He has no dental work in his mouth and no indication of dental work. His teeth are absolutely whole. He has normal lobes on his ears. His shoulders are not unusually broad, but medium only. Montgomery testified that he did not receive this circular until three days after the plaintiff's arrest, but it must be presumed on appeal that the trial court believed the plaintiff's testimony that Montgomery had the circular on the day of the arrest and that his attention was then called to the fact that the description in the circular did not fit the plaintiff. Regardless of such discrepancy, however, the city marshal exceeded his authority in holding the plaintiff without a warrant for a misdemeanor committed in Oregon. Pen. Code, § 836; In re Milstead, 44 Cal. App. 239, 186 P. 170; Miller v. Turner, 49 Cal. App. 653, 194 P. 66.

[3-5] Appellant contends that the city marshal had nothing to do with the arrest or imprisonment of the plaintiff. The mere fact that the policeman who made the arrest may have been subject to the orders of the city marshal does not make the latter liable for the arrest or imprisonment. Michel v. Smith, 188 Cal. 199, 201, 205 P. 113, 114. The case cited, however, recognizes the rule that the superior officer is liable for a false arrest or imprisonment when "he has directed such acts to be done or has personally co-operated therein." Montgomery received a telegram from the sheriff of Polk county, Or., on February 14, 1925, requesting the arrest of R. B. Kenyon. He placed the telegram on his office desk and left it there. He testified:

"The telegrams and descriptions of people that comes there, I take it and lay it on the office—on the desk, and the night man comes and looks over the telegrams and descriptions of people and whatever comes in during the day when he comes there at 6 o'clock. * * * The telegram was there, come just the same as all other telegrams. Mr. Griffith picked up the telegram that night and arrested the man at 4 o'clock in the morning. * * * I did not see the night man the next morning. He left a note in the jail box saying that he had arrested Mr. Kenyon and taken him to the county jail."

Montgomery wired the Oregon sheriff, "We have got your man." Whether or not Montgomery directed the arrest, there is sufficient evidence to show that, almost immediately thereafter, he directed that the plaintiff be held in the county jail, and he is certainly liable for the subsequent false imprisonment. Michel v. Smith, supra; Adair v. Williams, 24 Ariz. 422, 210 P. 853, 26 A. L. R. 278; Grimes v. Greenblatt, 47 Colo. 495, 107 P. 1111, 19 Ann. Cas. 608.

[6-8] Over defendant's objection that "it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial," there was introduced in evidence an article published in the Sacramento Bee, giving a fair and unbiased account of plaintiff's arrest and subsequent release. The publication was a natural consequence of the arrest and imprisonment, and the article was admissible to show the damage suffered by the plaintiff. "The general rule of law is that whoever does an illegal or wrongful act is answerable for all the consequences that ensue in the ordinary and natural course of events, though those consequences be immediately brought about by intervening agents, provided such agents were set in motion by the primary wrongdoer, or provided those acts, causing the damage, were the necessary or legal and natural consequence of the wrongful act. The publication was such a natural, usual, and ordinary consequence of defendant's act [false imprisonment] that it must be deemed to have been contemplated." Filer v. Smith, 96 Mich. 347, 355, 55 N. W. 999, 1002 (35 Am. St. Rep. 603); Burke v. Watts, 188 Cal. 118, 127, 204 P. 578; Ray Wong v. Earle C. Anthony, Inc., 199 Cal. 15, 18, 247 P. 894.

On the day of the plaintiff's release from custody, he was taken by Montgomery to the office of the district attorney, and there, in the presence of Montgomery, the district attorney dictated and he and the sheriff of Tehama county signed and delivered to the plaintiff a letter reading as follows:

"To Whom It May Concern:

"The bearer of this letter is Mr. W. D. Kenyon of Sacramento, who was recently detained in Red Bluff on a telegraphic warrant from Dallas, Oregon, for R. B. Kenyon. After investigation by the undersigned it has been clearly established that W. D. Kenyon is not the same person as R. B. Kenyon and peace officers detaining him by reason of Oregon circulars, or upon warrant, or request of Oregon authorities for R. B. Kenyon will undoubtedly be laying themselves liable for such detention."

[9] This letter was introduced in evidence over defendant's objection that "it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and hearsay." It need not be determined whether or not the letter was admissible in evidence. It states no fact which had not already been proved by uncontradicted evidence, and no pretense was made at the trial, and none has been made here, that the plaintiff is the person whose arrest was requested by the Oregon sheriff. The defendant therefore could have suffered no prejudice by the admission of the letter.

[10] It is urged that the judgment is excessive. The language of the trial court in fixing the amount of damages is a fair statement of the case, as follows:

"I think I will assess the damages at $1,000. I am quite sure that in doing that I am not making it excessive. The arrest was not technical. It was substantial. The imprisonment was not a mere detention in the city or in an outer room or held for a few hours until his train came in. This man was put in a cell and locked up there for five days, slept on a prison cot, ate prison fare, and suffered the humiliation and mortification and real grief that a man must feel under those circumstances. He lost employment. He lost a job that was remunerative and has encountered a great deal of difficulty in securing another."

In Gomez v. Scanlan, 155 Cal. 528, 533, 102 P. 12, 15, it is said:

"The amount of money which will compensate one for an unwarranted restraint of his person is not the subject of exact computation. * * * The extent to which the allowance may go must, in large measure, be left to the sound discretion of the jury."

The record in this case shows no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in fixing the amount of damages to be awarded.

The judgment is affirmed.

KENYON v. HARTFORD ACCIDENT & INDEMNITY CO. (Civ. 3043.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 22, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 19, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇐965—Venue ⇐52(1) —Motion for change of venue for convenience of witnesses is addressed to trial court's discretion, to be disturbed only for abuse.

Determination of motion for change of venue on ground of convenience of witnesses rests largely in sound discretion of court to which it is addressed, and its order therein will be disturbed only for abuse of discretion.

2. Venue ⇐52(1)—Denial of motion for change of venue for convenience of witnesses in action for false imprisonment was not abuse of discretion.

In action for false imprisonment, denial of motion for change of venue on ground of convenience of witnesses held not abuse of discretion under evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by W. D. Kenyon against the Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company. From an order denying motion for change of venue, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 260 P. 952.

James T. Matlock, of Red Bluff, for appellant.

Ralph H. Lewis and George E. Foote, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an appeal by defendant from an order denying a motion for a change of the place of trial from the county of Sacramento to the county of Tehama.

The complaint alleges that W. F. Montgomery, as city marshal of Red Bluff, Tehama county "maliciously and with force, and without an order, or warrant, or process of any court authorizing him so to do, did arrest and imprison the plaintiff herein * * * in the county jail of the county of Tehama * * * for a period of seven days," and that the defendant was at that time surety on Montgomery's official bond. The complaint contains other appropriate allegations, including an allegation that by reason of such imprisonment the "plaintiff was injured in his good name and reputation." The answer denies that Montgomery arrested or imprisoned the plaintiff and denies that the plaintiff was injured in his good name or reputation by the alleged arrest and imprisonment.

The complaint was filed May 15, 1925, and the answer on the 23d of June. On June 29th, the court made an order setting the cause for trial on the 24th of September, 1925; counsel for defendant being present in court and having notice of the order. August 31st the defendant served and filed notice that it would move the court, on the 8th day of September, 1925, for an order changing the place of trial to Tehama county. In support of the motion, affidavits were filed, from which it appears that the defendant's witnesses, six in number, three of them being officers of Red Bluff and three of them officers of Tehama county, all reside in Red Bluff; that their official duties require their personal attention; that their attendance as witnesses in the superior court of Sacramento county would cause them great inconvenience, the distance from Red Bluff to Sacramento being 140 miles; and that "defendant would be unable to procure the personal attendance of any of the witnesses" at Sacramento, on account of such distance.

In opposition to the motion, plaintiff made affidavit that he had resided in Sacramento for three years next preceding his arrest; that he was scarcely known in Red Bluff or Tehama county, and that no one knew him there who could testify as to his innocence of the charge upon which he was arrested, but that five witnesses, naming them, residing in Sacramento, would so testify; that four other named witnesses, also residing in Sacramento, would testify that the plaintiff "has always borne a good reputation, * * * and that, on account of said arrest, affiant lost his position"; and that defendant "has deferred its application for a change of venue to this late date solely for the purpose of delay and procrastination."

From the foregoing, it would be difficult to decide whether the convenience of witnesses would be best served by the trial of the case in the one county or the other.

[1, 2] "The determination of a motion of this character upon the ground of the convenience of witnesses rests largely in the sound discretion of the court to which it is addressed, and its order thereon will be disturbed only for an abuse of such discretion." Scott v. Stuart, 190 Cal. 526, 527, 213 P. 947, 948. No abuse of discretion appears in this case.

The order is affirmed.

CALIFORNIA BREEDERS' SALES & PEDIGREE CO. v. SHOWERS. (Civ. 3203.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 22, 1927.

1. Estoppel ⇐63—Defendant, inducing plaintiff to purchase bull purchased by defendant at auction sale, held estopped from denying validity of sale or setting up own fraud (Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3; Civ. Code, § 1797, and § 1710, subd. 3).

Defendant purchasing a bull at an auction sale under contract of conditional sale, which was subsequently assigned to plaintiff, having himself induced plaintiff to make the purchase, held estopped from denying validity thereof or setting up his own fraud as defense to an action on the contract, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3, Civ. Code, § 1710, subd. 3, in that defendant was employed by seller of the bull to bid at the sale without intention on part of defendant actually to buy or on part of seller to enforce the bid contrary to section 1797.

2. Estoppel ⇐114—Estoppel could be urged against defense of fraud, though not pleaded by plaintiff (Civ. Code, § 1797).

In action by assignee of contract of sale, fraudulent because in violation of Civ. Code, § 1797, prohibiting by-bidding at auction sales, where defense was fraud between defendant and seller, plaintiff held entitled to set up an estoppel to urge such defense, notwithstanding failure to plead estoppel, since affirmative allegations of answer are deemed denied, and all affirmative matters by way of replication are deemed to have been pleaded by plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by the California Breeders' Sales & Pedigree Company against F. F. Showers. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Adolph M. Schwarz, of San Francisco, and John J. Coghlan, of Madera, for appellant. Barcroft & Barcroft, of Madera, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. In the summer of 1922 D. G. Maxwell, being the owner of a herd of registered Holstein cattle, entered into an agreement with the plaintiff, by the terms of which the latter engaged to conduct an auction sale of the cattle. The agreement provided that there should be "no by-bidding, direct or indirect," and that the owner should pay a penalty of 25 per cent. in case of proof of by-bidding. The sale was conducted August 30 and 31, 1922. The defendant purchased a bull at this sale for $1,150, of which sum he paid $385 in cash, and agreed to pay the remainder of $765 on August 31, 1923, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum, upon the payment of which it was agreed that Maxwell would deliver to the defendant "a good and sufficient bill of sale of the said property, together with warranty of title." The contract provided that title should remain in Maxwell, or his assigns, until payment was made in full, but that the defendant "assumed all responsibility for loss or damage of said property by reason of fire or improper care thereof, or any other cause whatsoever, and hereby agrees to insure said property against loss or damage by fire or death from any cause to the full value of the same, the loss, if any, to be payable to the parties hereto, as their interests may appear." This agreement was executed on August 31, 1922, and on the same day Maxwell assigned it to the plaintiff. The defendant did not take possession of the bull, but left it in the possession of Maxwell. The defendant made at least two subsequent payments on the contract, the first of which was made in February, 1924. At the time the suit was commenced there remained due and unpaid $367.62 principal and $19.02 interest, for the amount of which the plaintiff prayed judgment. The court found all the allegations of the complaint to be true, and all the denials and allegations of the answer to be untrue except the "third and separate defense," which the court found to be true, and, based on that defense alone, judgment was entered "that plaintiff take nothing by its action against defendant." The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment. The third separate defense to which reference has been made reads as follows:

"That another consideration for the execution of the instrument sued upon herein was the request of payee Maxwell that bid in the bull referred to therein, and the promise of said Maxwell that, if defendant would bid for and nominally purchase said bull, said Maxwell would retain possession of said animal, and would sell him, and divide the profits of said sale. That, pursuant to said agreement, defendant bid in said bull at an auction sale, and executed the instrument, but said Maxwell wholly failed, neglected, and refused to sell said bull after taking possession thereof, and said bull died while in the possession of said Maxwell."

In support of such alleged separate defense, the defendant testified:

"I was in attendance at the sale, and purchased a number of females, and in the course of the sale a bull * * * was sold, and the bids were not, as Mr. Maxwell thought, sufficient, * * * so he sent his manager, McDonald, over to me, and asked me to bid the bull in, or to buy the bull, and the bull would be left there on the ranch under Mr. Maxwell and Mr. McDonald's supervision until he was sold. He said, in fact, they had a purchaser already lined up for the bull. I made a bid on the bull and some one made a counter bid, * * * and I refused to go any higher, or to bid any more, and Mr. Maxwell come over * * * personally and said, 'We will agree to sell this bull and keep him here until he is sold, so that we can divide the profits, or whatever he brings above the price that you give,' and I agreed to that, and bid, I think $1,150 * * * on the bull, and he was knocked off at that price."

The written agreement referred to herein was thereafter, on the same day, executed by Maxwell and the defendant.

Charles L. Hughes, sales manager of the plaintiff, testified:

"On the date preceding the sale, Mr. Showers introduced to me * * * one of the directors of the Carlton College Corporation. * * * He said to me that Carlton College was in the market for some cows, that Mr. Showers was there to purchase them for that account, and told me that whatever purchases were made by Mr. Showers would be settled for by Carlton College. He asked me if arrangements could be made for a year's credit on any purchases that they made. * * * I told him that we were not in a position to buy their note from Mr. Maxwell for the total amount of their purchase on a year's time, but that, if it was agreeable to Mr. Maxwell to take their promissory note for one-third of the amount, we would take their lease contract note for the balance of the contract. * * * Mr. Maxwell was willing to do this, did subsequently. * * * Mr. Showers purchased certain females, * * * and he also purchased the bull. * * * When it came to settling for these cattle after the sale was over, Mr. Showers * * * told me that, while he had purchased the females for the account of Carlton College, he had purchased the bull * * * on his own account, and told me that he expected me to extend him the same terms in payment that I had extended to Carlton College, or that Mr. Maxwell, rather, had extended to Carlton College. We took this matter up then with Mr. Maxwell, * * * and the settlement was made in that manner."

The witness further testified that he had no notice or knowledge of any agreement or understanding between Maxwell and the defendant, as alleged in the third separate defense of the answer, until informed thereof by the defendant in the early summer of 1924. The foregoing evidence of Hughes is uncontradicted. Maxwell was not a witness at the trial; his whereabouts being then unknown.

It need not be determined whether, the contract between Maxwell and the defendant having been reduced to writing, evidence of their prior oral negotiations was admissible in evidence to vary its terms, because the judgment must be reversed on other grounds.

"The employment by a seller of any person to bid at a sale by auction, without the knowledge of the buyer, without an intention on the part of such bidder to buy, and on the part of the seller to enforce his bid, is a fraud upon the buyer, which entitles him to rescind his purchase." Civ. Code, § 1797.

[1] While section 1797 is intended for the protection of purchasers at auction sales, the conduct thereby denounced constitutes a fraud upon the public. Dealey v. East San Mateo Land Co., 21 Cal. App. 39, 130 P. 1066. It is not necessary, however, to determine the effect of such fraud as between Maxwell and the defendant. While the contract sued on is not negotiable, the evidence shows without conflict that the plaintiff took the assignment thereof at the special instance and request of the defendant, and without notice of the fraud of the parties thereto. His conduct constituted an implied representation that his apparent purchase of the bull was a bona fide transaction. Irrigated Valleys L. Co. v. Altman, 57 Cal. App. 413, 428, 207 P. 401. The transaction with the plaintiff constituted, in effect, a loan by the plaintiff to the defendant of the balance due Maxwell upon the purchase price of the bull. This fact alone is sufficient to overcome the affirmative defense upon which the judgment is based. But, further, the defendant having himself induced the plaintiff to make the purchase, he is estopped from denying the validity thereof or setting up his own fraud as a defense to an action thereon. Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3; Civ. Code, § 1710, subd. 3; 10 Cal. Jur. 631; 21 C. J. 1150.

[2] The plaintiff did not plead an estoppel, but, under the circumstances proved, such a plea was unnecessary. "Under our system of pleading the affirmative allegations of the answer are deemed denied, and all affirmative matters by way of replication are deemed to have been pleaded by the plaintiff." Hale v. Gardiner, 186 Cal. 661, 664, 200 P. 598, 600; Wenban Estate, Inc. v. Hewlett, 193 Cal. 675, 703, 227 P. 723.

The only inference to be drawn from the evidence is that, when the defendant asked the plaintiff to extend him credit on the same terms as had been agreed upon with Carlton College, he intentionally suppressed the fact of his fraudulent understanding with Maxwell, because he must have known that such credit would have been refused if he had communicated that fact to the plaintiff, and it is a reasonable inference that the plaintiff would not have given such credit with knowledge of that fact.

Pursuant to the provisions of article 6, § 4¾, of the Constitution and section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure as added by St. 1927, p. 583, in addition to the facts found by the trial court, this court hereby makes the following findings of fact: That, at the special instance and request of the defendant, and for a valuable consideration, the plaintiff purchased the contract described in the complaint and all of said Maxwell's rights and interest therein and thereunder; that at the time of such purchase the defendant had full knowledge of the secret agreement between himself and Maxwell alleged in the third separate defense set up in the answer, but that the plaintiff had no notice or knowledge thereof; that, for the purpose of misleading the plaintiff, and inducing it to make such purchase, the defendant represented to the plaintiff that he had purchased the bull referred to in such third separate defense, and intentionally suppressed and omitted to communicate to the plaintiff any information of or concerning such secret agreement; that the plaintiff believed and relied on said representation, and was misled thereby and by such suppression and omission, and was thereby induced to, and did, make such purchase, which it would not have made but for such suppression and omission.

As conclusions of law from the foregoing facts, together with the facts found by the trial court, it is hereby found: That the defendant is estopped from denying the validity of the contract described in the complaint or his obligation to make payment to the plaintiff of the balance due thereon in accordance with the terms thereof; that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendant in the amount prayed for in the complaint.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is hereby directed to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant for the amount prayed for in the complaint.

O'FARRELL v. ANDRUS. (Civ. 6028.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 1, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 29, 1927.

1. Appeal and error ⇐1002—Where evidence is conflicting, verdict will not be disturbed on appeal.

Where there is a conflict in the evidence, the judgment of the trial court on a verdict will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Municipal corporations ⇐706(6)—Negligence of automobile driver striking pedestrian at night held for jury.

In pedestrian's action for injuries when struck by automobile when crossing street on a dark foggy night on the highway, whether driver was guilty of negligence held for the jury.

3. Municipal corporations ☞706(7)—Contributory negligence of pedestrian, struck by automobile at night, held for jury.

In an action by a pedestrian struck by an automobile when crossing street on a dark foggy night, whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence held for the jury.

4. Negligence ☞136(9)—Contributory negligence is for court where evidence leaves no fact in doubt, and no inferences other than negligence can be drawn.

It is only where no fact is left in doubt nor inference other than negligence can be drawn by the jury from the evidence that the court can say, as a matter of law, that contributory negligence is established.

5. Trial ☞296(4, 5)—Instruction, if objectionable as omitting element of contributory negligence, held not error, in view of further instruction.

In pedestrian's action for injury when struck by automobile, instruction, predicated upon proposition that defendant's lack of ordinary care was proximate cause of injury, therefore precluding anything else as proximate cause, if open to criticism as omitting element of contributory negligence standing alone, held not misleading, in view of further instruction that if defendant was negligent and plaintiff was also negligent, and his negligence proximately contributed to the accident, then he could not recover.

6. Trial ☞191(7)—Instruction relative to automobile driver's control and excessive rate of speed held not to assume defendant's negligence and absence of contributory negligence.

In pedestrian's action for injury from automobile, an instruction that if defendant was driving at such an excessive rate of speed that he did not have his automobile under proper control, and by reason thereof he struck the plaintiff, then, in the absence of any contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff proximately causing the injury, plaintiff could recover held not to assume defendant's negligence nor an absence of contributory negligence.

7. Municipal corporations ☞705(10)—Last clear chance doctrine held applicable where automobile driver observed pedestrian, but relied upon pedestrian's stopping.

Evidence showing that driver of automobile striking pedestrian had observed the pedestrian before the accident, but relied upon the pedestrian's stopping, when in fact he kept on going, held to render last clear chance doctrine applicable.

8. Trial ☞260(1)—Refusal to give instruction is not error where covered by others given.

Error cannot be predicated upon the refusal to give an instruction requested, where the substance of the instruction refused is covered by other instructions given.

9. Trial ☞260(8)—Refusing instruction that, if plaintiff deliberately walked into automobile, he could not recover held not reversible error, in view of further instruction.

In pedestrian's action for injuries when struck by automobile, refusal of instruction precluding recovery if plaintiff deliberately walked into automobile held not reversible error, where jury were repeatedly told that even slightest negligence on part of plaintiff proximately contributing to accident would bar recovery.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Patrick O'Farrell against George Andrus. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Barry J. Colding and Theodore Hale, both of San Francisco, and B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. P. Black, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment entered on the verdict of the jury awarding respondent $2,000 damages for personal injuries received by being struck by an automobile operated by appellant.

Appellant assigns the following errors upon which he relies for a reversal of the judgment:

"(1) The verdict is contrary to the evidence and is contrary to law in this: (a) The proof discloses negligence on the part of the defendant; (b) the plaintiff himself, as shown by all the testimony, was guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, in placing himself in a position of danger in the street and in failing to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, said negligence contributing directly and proximately to his injuries. (2) The court erred in giving an instruction to the jury making the defendant liable if guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to plaintiff's injuries, irrespective of and ignoring the issue of plaintiff's contributory negligence, which was pleaded by defendant and upon which substantial evidence was introduced thereon. (3) The court erred in giving to the jury a certain instruction which suggests and assumes negligence on the part of defendant, and suggests and assumes an absence of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff. (4) The court erred in giving an instruction upon the doctrine of the 'last clear chance' for the reasons: (a) That the doctrine has no application to the facts of this case, and the evidence is insufficient to justify such an instruction; (b) that the instruction is insufficient in form to present fully the doctrine of 'last clear chance.' (5) The court erred in refusing to give to the jury certain instructions requested by defendant upon his theory of the case which there was sufficient evidence adduced to support the same."

The material facts as disclosed by the record in narrative form are as follows: According to the testimony of plaintiff, on the evening of August 27, 1923, he went to a grocery store on Mission street, in San Francisco, to get some eggs. On his way home he walked westerly along the northerly side of Twenty-First street. When he reached Valencia street he looked both north and south, and a street car passed northerly on the easterly track on Valencia street. He then looked north and stepped into the street. He looked two or three times to the right to see if there were any street cars or automobiles coming toward him. When a street car passed going north he saw some machines on the other side of the street going south, but when he got out into the middle of the street and looked to the right he did not see any machine anywhere near him. He had looked the very second he was struck; the last time he looked before that was when he crossed the car rails, and when crossing the rails he looked all the time to the right. The machine was 20 feet away when he first saw it, and it was going at such speed it would go 20 feet in a second. Before he started to cross the street at the time the street car passed he saw other machines going south. He saw there was a good show to get across the street, and he walked out into the car tracks; then he looked north and did not see any machine coming anywhere near him. It was misty or foggy, but he could see about 200 feet; his eyesight was good, and he could hear well and did not hear any horn sounded. When he got to a point about 6 or 7 feet from the westerly curb of Valencia street he first saw the machine coming, and he did not have time to get out of the way of it. The machine must have been 20 or 25 feet away. He had no time to stand. The left front fender hit him. He was watching carefully when he was crossing the street, and defendant was driving at a high rate of speed—came like a shot—and he thought he was going 35 or 40 miles an hour, though it might have been more or less.

Charles Heslin, a passenger in defendant's car, called as a witness for plaintiff, said O'Farrell was 6 or 8 feet from the westerly curb when he was struck. The machine swung around into Twenty-First street and stopped. When he saw O'Farrell coming, it might be 75 or 80 feet. He could not tell whether they carried O'Farrell from where he fell on Valencia street around to the side of the automobile. The machine did not stop on Valencia street, but on the corner when it went around. He did not see the accident.

Both the defendant and Peter J. Schmitt, called for the defense, testified that defendant's car was moving slowly; that defendant kept blowing his horn, but that plaintiff paid no attention to it and walked right into the right-hand side of the car, the witness Schmitt saying that he walked into the rear of the machine, and defendant, Andrus, testifying that he walked into the right rear fender of the car. According to the witness Schmitt, there was a drizzling rain on the street; that the accident happened about 5 feet from the intersection of Valencia and Twenty-First streets; that it had been raining about 15 minutes and the streets were real greasy; and that they were about 50 feet from the corner when he first saw Mr. O'Farrell. Appellant in his testimony placed this distance from 50 to 75 feet.

[1] From this summary of the evidence it is apparent that there is a direct conflict as to material facts, plaintiff testifying that defendant was driving at a high rate of speed—35 or 40 miles, more or less, at a crossing on a rainy or foggy night. "It came like a shot," he said, and the defense witnesses testified that defendant was going "real slow." Plaintiff stated that he was struck by the left front fender, while defendant and his witness Schmitt testified that plaintiff walked into the rear of the machine or at the rear wheel on the right-hand side of the car. Plaintiff testified that his hearing was good and that he heard no horn, while defendant testified that he sounded his horn when he first saw plaintiff on the car track when he was practically in the middle of the street, and defendant's witness Schmitt said defendant kept blowing his horn. Upon this conflict the finding of the jury must stand under the well-established rule that where there is a conflict in the evidence the judgment of the trial court will not be disturbed on appeal.

[2, 3] Appellant urges that the proof discloses no negligence on the part of defendant, and that the evidence shows that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law. We do not agree with appellant's contention, but on the contrary are of the opinion that whether defendant, driving his automobile at a high rate of speed or at the rate of speed of 35 or 40 miles an hour within 5 feet of a crossing after dark on a foggy or rainy night, was or was not negligence, or whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence under the circumstances here disclosed, was a question of fact for the jury to decide.

Appellant concedes that it is settled law in this state that where the evidence is conflicting, or where there is some substantial evidence to support the verdict, the appellate court will not order a reversal, but contends that the evidence here, according to the testimony of the witness Schmitt, shows that respondent was wandering about with his head down, apparently not paying any attention to the approach of defendant's car and the constant honking of the horn, and that the evidence is incontrovertible that plaintiff walked into and against defendant's car. We do not agree that these facts stated by the witness Schmitt are without dispute and incontrovertible. They are certainly disputed by plaintiff, who testified that he continually looked up the street in the direction from which defendant's car approached; that he could see about 200 feet; that he saw no car approaching until it suddenly loomed up about 20 feet from him, coming at a high rate of speed; and that he did not walk into the rear of the car or near the right rear wheel, but was struck by the left front fender of defendant's car. Nor is the fact that defendant constantly honked his horn admitted; on the contrary, plaintiff testified that his hearing was good and he heard no horn sounded, from which the inference could be drawn that the horn was not sounded. Again, as there was at least 20 feet between plaintiff and the middle of the street and defendant had ample room to have driven in safety to avoid hitting plaintiff, the jury may have drawn the inference that defendant was not watching the road ahead of him and did not see the plaintiff.

Appellant cites us to Diamond v. Weyerhaeuser, 178 Cal. 540, 174 P. 38. In that case the court held negligence is not to be inferred from the mere fact of injury; that giving all the weight which plaintiff's testimony could fairly bear, it went no farther than to show that there had been a collision between the wagon and the automobile. "There was a total lack of any circumstances from which it might reasonably be inferred that the collision was caused by any want of care on the part of the driver of the automobile, rather than by the negligence of the driver of the wagon." Here, however, as has been shown, there are facts and circumstances aside from the fact of the injury from which the jury could have inferred negligence. While it is true that "high rate of speed" and "like a shot" and such statements have been held to be entirely too uncertain to serve as a basis for a finding that the rate of speed was in excess of the maximum rate which would be dictated by the demands of ordinary prudence (Diamond v. Weyerhaeuser, supra), here, however, in addition to such expressions there is evidence that it was raining; that the street was real greasy; that defendant saw plaintiff 50 or 75 feet before the accident; that he did not alter his course nor slow down; that he was driving, under such weather conditions, 35 or 40 miles an hour; that he covered 20 feet distance in practically a second of time; that he had ample room to pass behind plaintiff and avoid the accident, but did not do so.

[4] Tower v. Humboldt Transit Co., 176 Cal. 602, 169 P. 227, cited by appellant, was reversed because the court applied the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, and as to that the court said:

"It has no * * * application to the case of a collision between a street car and a pedestrian on the street."

Nor should the present case be reversed on the authority of Zibbell v. So. Pac. Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513, cited by appellant; rather it is an authority to sustain the judgment. There the court uses this language:

"The real decision of the question by the court is a decision of fact. When the evidence is such that the court is impelled to say that it is not in conflict on the facts, and that from those facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his own injury, then, and only then does the law step in and forbid plaintiff a recovery. * * * Again, the question whether or not a plaintiff has been guilty of contributory negligence is usually one of fact for the jury's verdict. 'It is only where no fact is left in doubt, and no deduction or inference other than negligence can be drawn by the jury from the evidence, that the court can say, as a matter of law (italics ours) that contributory negligence is established. * * *'"

Applying this standard to the facts and circumstances here, we cannot but conclude that the question of negligence was one of fact for the jury.

[5] As to the court's instructions it may be said that, taken as a whole, they correctly state the law governing accident cases. Appellant complains of instruction 15 as omitting the element of contributory negligence. This instruction is predicated upon the proposition that defendant's lack of ordinary care was the proximate cause of the injury, and therefore precludes anything else as the proximate cause. If, however, standing alone, the instruction is open to criticism, taken in conjunction with instruction 18, the jury could not have been misled. That instruction is as follows:

"If you find from the evidence that the defendant was negligent in the manner charged in the complaint but that the plaintiff was also negligent, no matter how slightly, and that his negligence proximately contributed to the accident, then and in such event I charge you that your verdict must be against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendant."

The instructions thus given are in harmony and not subject to the criticism called forth in Pierce v. United Gas & Elec. Co., 161 Cal. 176, 118 P. 700, stressed by appellant. In the Pierce Case the instructions were in conflict and could not be harmonized, but here it stands as though the court had instructed the jury:

"If you find the defendant did not use ordinary care to avoid running into and injuring the plaintiff, and you find that such a lack of care was the proximate cause of the accident, then you should find for the plaintiff and against the defendant, but if you find that the plaintiff was also negligent, no matter how slightly, and his negligence proximately contributed to the accident, then your verdict must be against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendant."

Not only does instruction 18 instruct the jury that plaintiff cannot recover if he has been guilty of negligence proximately contributing to his injury, but it was also so instructed in instructions 20 and 21.

[6] The point urged that instruction 16 assumes negligence on the part of defendant and assumes in absence of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff is without merit. The instruction does not assume defendant's negligence nor an absence of contributory negligence. The instruction expressly states that:

"If you find from the evidence that the conditions surrounding the crossing at Valencia and Twenty-First streets at the time plaintiff was injured were such that you are satisfied from the evidence the defendant was driving at such an excessive rate of speed that he did not have his automobile under proper control when he approached the crossing and by reason of said lack of proper control he struck the plaintiff, then, in the absence of any contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff proximately causing the injury, it is your duty to find for the plaintiff and against the defendant."

[7] Appellant urges that the court erred in its instruction upon the doctrine of the "last clear chance," and that such doctrine has no application to the facts; that the contributory negligence of plaintiff continued down to the very instant of the accident and was therefore concurrent and contemporaneous, and cites us to Wallis v. So. Pac. Co., 184 Cal. 662, 673, 195 P. 408, 412 (15 A. L. R. 117), as holding:

"The rule is well settled in this state that in order to make the defendant liable, notwithstanding contributory negligence of the plaintiff, the defendant must not only be aware of the danger in time to avert it, but must also know or have reason to believe that the plaintiff is oblivious of the danger and is in a position where he cannot extricate himself from it. Arnold v. San Francisco-O. T. Rys., 175 Cal. 1, 164 P. 798; Basham v. So. Pac. Co., 176 Cal. 320, 168 P. 359; Young v. So. Pac. Co., 182 Cal. 369, 190 P. 36."

And also to Matteson v. So. Pac. Co., 6 Cal. App. 318, 326, 92 P. 101, 105, holding:

"The last clear [chance] * * * rule can never apply * * * where, * * * the negligence of the injured party continued up to the very moment of the injury, and was a contributing and efficient cause thereof."

In the present case, however, the defendant testified:

"O'Farrell gave no evidence of realizing I was approaching him. I thought he was going to stop, but he kept on. I continuously blew the horn and still he didn't look up. So at that time I was almost on top of him."

And defendant further testified that at the speed he was driving he could have stopped his machine in a distance of one foot.

[8, 9] Lastly, appellant complains of the court's refusal to give certain instructions requested by him covering the presumption that one possessed of normal faculties of sight and hearing must see and hear that which is in the range of his sight and hearing, and that if plaintiff deliberately walked in front of the machine or against it, he is guilty of negligence as a matter of law and cannot recover. With the exception of that portion of the instruction dealing with plaintiff's walking deliberately into the automobile, the principles of law in the instructions, the refusal of which is complained of, are fully covered in instructions 18 and 25. As to the requested instruction regarding the plaintiff deliberately walking into the automobile, while it was proper to give it, it cannot be said that its refusal constitutes error, as the jury were repeatedly told that even the slightest negligence on the part of plaintiff proximately contributing to the accident would bar his recovery. It certainly cannot be said that the jury did not understand, under the instructions of the court, that walking deliberately into a moving automobile would come under the instruction that plaintiff could not recover, if slight negligence on his part contributed to the accident.

The issues in the case were simple, and certainly under the instructions no confusion could arise. Was defendant guilty of negligence? Was plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence? If defendant alone was guilty of negligence which was the proximate cause of the injury, plaintiff is entitled to the verdict; but if plaintiff was also guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to his injury, defendant is entitled to the verdict. These issues were amply covered by the court's instructions, which, taken as a whole, correctly stated the principles of law involved and were as full and fair as either party could reasonably expect.

The judgment is affirmed.

FERGUSON v. GARDNER et al. (Civ. 6018.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 29, 1927.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 28, 1927.

1. Pleading $\S$ 8(15)—General allegations of fraud, wrong, and oppression in assessing tax added nothing to complaint to declare tax void, allegation of specific facts being required.

Complaint to have a tax levy for road purposes declared null and void and for injunction is not strengthened by general allegations of fraud, wrong, and oppression in assessing tax, but the pleader is required to allege the specific facts from which such conclusions will follow as matter of law.

2. Counties $\S$ 190(1)—Taxing power of county board of supervisors must be expressly given by Legislature.

Whatever taxing power rests in county board of supervisors must necessarily come from Legislature and be expressly given.

3. Counties $\Leftarrow$ 190(1)—Taxing power is measured by statute conferring power, and taxes not assessed in accordance with statute are void.

Statute conferring taxing power on county board of supervisors affords measure of power, and taxes not assessed in accordance with provisions of statute are void.

4. Counties $\Leftarrow$ 190(2)—County board of supervisors had power to levy tax for general county purposes of 80 cents on \$100 of taxable property, to constitute county general fund to be used for general purposes (Pol. Code, §§ 2639, 2651, 2653-2655, and section 4041, subds. 13, 38).

Under Pol. Code, §§ 2639, 2651, 2653-2655, and section 4041, subds. 13, 38, conferring on county board of supervisors power to levy taxes for all county purposes, board had power to levy tax for general county purposes, fix rate of tax at 80 cents on each $100 of taxable property, and create county general funds from such tax to be used for general purposes.

5. Appeal and error $\Leftarrow$ 909(6)—Conditions precedent to levy of tax for general purposes are presumed to have been complied with on appeal from judgment refusing to avoid tax levy.

On appeal from judgment refusing to declare tax null and void, appellate court must presume that all conditions precedent to levy of tax for general county purposes were complied with.

6. Counties $\Leftarrow$ 191—County supervisors are not limited by statute in determining rate of taxation for general county purposes (Pol. Code, §§ 2639, 2651, 2653-2655, and section 4041, subds. 13, 38).

Under Pol. Code, §§ 2639, 2651, 2653-2655, and section 4041, subds. 13, 38, rate of taxation which supervisors of various counties may fix is not limited, power to tax being expressly conferred on board of supervisors without restriction as to amount to be raised thereby for general county purposes.

7. Counties $\Leftarrow$ 23—Courts cannot inquire into anticipated needs of county after determination by county supervisors of tax rate necessary for county general purposes.

Where board of county supervisors determined that tax rate fixed for general county purposes was necessary to meet anticipated needs of county, it is not within province of court to inquire further into these necessities.

8. Counties $\Leftarrow$ 191—Supervisors in fixing tax rate for general purposes must anticipate every necessary expense, including expenses for construction and maintenance of roads (Const. art. 11, § 18; Pol. Code, §§ 2639, 2640, 2651, 2653-2655, and section 4041, subds. 13, 38).

Under Pol. Code, §§ 2639, 2651, 2653-2655, and section 4041, subds. 13, 38, and Const. art. 11, § 18, county board of supervisors in fixing rate of taxation for general purposes must determine amount necessary to be raised, and anticipate and provide for every necessary expense, including such expense as might arise for acquisition or construction of new road or repair and maintenance of existing roads, under section 2640, and fact that board may have intended to expend moneys obtained in certain way would not affect legality of levy.

9. Highways $\Leftarrow$ 99¼—Expenditures for construction and maintenance of roads from general fund of county held authorized (Pol. Code, §§ 2640, 2712, 4041, 4043).

Pol. Code, §§ 2712, 4041, 4043, authorizes general fund of county to bear expense of construction and maintenance of roads, in addition to section 2640 specifically providing for payment for roads from general fund.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Keith Ferguson against Casper Gardner and others, as and constituting the Board of Supervisors of Marin County, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jordan L. Martinelli, of San Rafael, and Keith Ferguson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Henry E. Greer, Dist. Atty., of San Rafael, for respondents.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff, as a taxpayer, commenced an action against defendants, seeking certain relief to be hereinafter more fully detailed. Defendants filed a general demurrer to the complaint, which demurrer was sustained by the court below, and plaintiff was allowed 10 days to amend. Plaintiff declined to amend, and, the time elapsing, a judgment was entered that plaintiff take nothing and that the relief sought be denied. The question before us for review is on the sufficiency of the complaint as against a general demurrer.

The complaint alleges:

That the plaintiff is a citizen, resident, and taxpayer and at all times was such in supervisor district No. 1 of Marin county, alleging, likewise, the division of the county into supervisor districts as by law provided.

That the defendants named constitute the board of supervisors of said Marin county, and that the additional defendants are treasurer and auditor of Marin county, the remaining defendant being a person who was a supervisor at the time of the proceeding complained of, but since out of office.

Then follow the allegations by which the cause of action is sought to be embodied, namely:

That the defendant supervisors, excepting Barr, constituting four-fifths of the members of the board, did at a regular meeting on Thursday, September 2, 1924, with the intent to violate the provisions of the Political Code of this state and without authority of law, and with the intent to violate the rights of the plaintiff as a citizen of Marin county, and with the unlawful intent to oppress plaintiff and the citizens of supervisor district No. 1 of Marin county and to compel him and them to bear more than his and their just share of the burdens of taxation, and with the intent to unfairly and unjustly assess against the taxable property of plaintiff and the taxpayers of supervisor district No. 1 a part of the cost of permanent road construction in Marin county not lying within the territorial limits of said supervisor district No. 1, levy a special tax, to wit, a tax of 50 cents upon each $100 of assessed valuation on all taxable property in Marin county for the unlawful purpose and with the fraudulent intent of wrongfully and unlawfully raising a fund to be expended for permanent road improvement and construction in that portion of Marin county outside of the territorial limits of supervisor district No. 1, and with the fraudulent intent and purpose of levying a tax for the creation of a fund for permanent road improvement and construction in Marin county.

Plaintiff further alleges that for the purpose of concealing and disguising the unlawful purpose of said special tax, with the fraudulent, unlawful, and wrongful intention of violating the rights of plaintiff and oppressing plaintiff and the citizens and taxpayers of supervisor district No. 1, and of unfairly and unjustly compelling him and them to pay more than his and their just share of taxation, and with intent to unfairly and unjustly assess against the taxable property of supervisor district No. 1, a part of the cost of permanent road improvements and construction in Marin county outside of the territorial limits of supervisor district No. 1, the said supervisors willfully, knowingly, wrongfully, unlawfully, and fraudulently caused said special tax to be levied with and as a part of the general fund of 80 cents upon each $100 of assessed valuation of all taxable property in Marin county for the year 1924, said defendants knowing and in fact having decided then and there that a levy of 30 cents upon each $100 of the assessed valuation of all taxable property in Marin county for the year 1924 was a sufficient tax levy to raise money sufficient to defray the general expenses of said county during the period for which said tax was levied.

That said action of the board of supervisors, in levying said 50-cent tax under the name and style of "General County Fund" and including said 50-cent tax in said levy of 80 cents as and for said general county fund, was a scheme, fraud, and subterfuge to evade the laws of the state of California and to create a fund for permanent road improvement and construction in Marin county for the construction and improvement of the main county public road lying without the territorial limits of supervisor district No. 1, contrary to law.

The complaint then further sets forth the collection of the tax pursuant to the assessment and levy, and, further, that the board of supervisors of Marin county has, in the execution of the original plan of road building, let numerous contracts for the furnishing of materials and performance of permanent road improvement and construction and repairs in Marin county, outside of the territorial limits of supervisor district No. 1, and that the cost of this work has been willfully and unlawfully charged to the moneys in the general fund derived and collected by the levy of the 50-cent tax aforementioned, and further alleges many claims against said fund by reason of similar work.

Further, it is alleged that defendants will, unless restrained, continue the acts complained of; namely, the execution of road contracts outside supervisor district No. 1, and the payments to the exhaustion of the fund.

The relief asked is that the court adjudge that the 80-cent general county tax includes the 50-cent special tax, raised for the purpose of creating a fund for the doing of permanent road improvements in Marin county, and that the tax levy of 50 cents be declared null, void, and of no effect; that the supervisors be enjoined from allowing, and the auditor and treasurer from auditing and paying, demands against said fund, and that any balance in said fund be repaid to plaintiff and the other taxpayers within the county of Marin.

It may be here repeated that all of the acts of the board of supervisors throughout are characterized as having been wrongful, fraudulent, oppressive, evasive, and with intent to evade the laws of the state of California, and oppressive as to the plaintiff and the taxpayers in general.

The complaint is thus set forth in its particularity to the end that the subject-matter of the controversy may be more intelligently discussed and understood.

The question raised concerns the power of the board of supervisors in making the original levy for general county purposes.

Summing up the allegations of the complaint, this situation is disclosed: The supervisors at the time appointed for fixing the annual tax rate determined that the amount that could be legally raised by a tax levy for road purposes would not suffice for the general highway needs of the county. The board, apparently feeling that throughout the ensuing year there would arise occasions when general road construction costs would have to be paid from the general fund, therefore fixed a rate sufficient to assure a general fund which would meet the demands foreseen.

[1] At the outset it may be stated that the allegations of fraud, wrong, and oppression add nothing to the force of the complaint, and the complaint is in no way strengthened by the conclusions of the pleader thus expressed. Mere general allegations of fraud are insufficient in stating a cause of action: the pleader must state the specific acts or language constituting the fraud complained of. General allegations that certain acts or proceedings are illegal or void are mere conclusions of law, and wholly insufficient in the absence of facts from which such conclusions will follow as a matter of law. For example, such averments as the following have been held to be legal conclusions, viz., that a certain tax or assessment was illegal and void, or was not levied in accordance with law, or that the tax valuation on the property was unequal and unjust. 5 Stand. Ency. of Proc. 217; Carlson v. County Comm., 38 Wash. 616, 80 P. 795; Osborn v. Hoyt, 181 Cal. 336, 184 P. 854; Glenn v. Cal. Trona Co., 38 Cal. App. 601, 177 P. 178.

The contention of plaintiff and appellant is that the levy of the 50-cent tax was for permanent road improvements outside of supervisor district No. 1, and the inclusion of this tax within the amount levied for the general county fund was obviously a subterfuge and an evasion.

The appellant seems to rely upon the sections of the Political Code having to do with the levy of taxes and the creation of funds to be devoted exclusively to road and highway purposes; namely, sections 2639, 2653, 2654, 2655, and 4041.

Section 2639 provides, in enumerating the powers and duties of supervisors over highways, that the supervisors must, by proper order, levy a tax on property for road purposes, and cause the road tax collected each year to be apportioned to the several road districts entitled thereto, and kept by the county treasurer in separate funds.

Section 2651, Political Code, reads:

"The board of supervisors may, at the meeting at which they are required to levy the property tax for road purposes, establish a general road fund and order to be apportioned thereto an amount not exceeding thirty-five per centum of the aggregate road tax collected from all sources."

Section 2653, Political Code, reads:

"The board of supervisors must, each year, at the meeting at which they are required to levy the property tax for county purposes, estimate the probable amount of property tax for highway purposes which may be necessary for the ensuing year, over and above the road tax, and must regulate and fix the amount of property highway tax, and levy the same thereby, provided, that said property tax for highway purposes shall not exceed the sum of forty cents upon each one hundred dollars of assessable property in any one year."

Section 2654 provides the method of assessment, levy, and collection of the annual property tax for road purposes, and provides that the moneys thus collected shall be turned over to the county treasurer for the use of the road districts from which it is respectively collected.

Section 2655 provides that all property road tax collected in each road district shall be expended for road purposes within the district in which it is collected.

Section 4041. The board of supervisors in their respective counties shall have jurisdiction and power, under such limitations and restrictions as are prescribed by law:

Subdivision 13. To levy taxes upon the taxable property of their respective counties for all county purposes, and also upon the taxable property of any district for the construction and repair of roads and highways and other district purposes; provided, that no tax shall be levied upon any district until the proposition to levy the same has been submitted to the qualified electors of such district and received a majority of all the legal votes cast.

Subdivision 38. To levy a special road fund tax, not to exceed 2 mills on the $1 of assessed valuation on all property in such counties outside of any incorporated city or town. Such tax shall be in addition to all taxes otherwise provided for, and the funds so created shall be expended for the construction and maintenance of the main public roads or county highways in the several road districts in proportion to the amount collected from such districts; provided that in addition to the tax mentioned in this subdivision the board of supervisors shall have the power, and it shall be their duty upon petition of a majority of the property owners of any road district, to levy a special road fund tax, not to exceed 2 mills on the $1 of assessed valuation, on all property in such road district, to be expended in the maintenance of the public roads of such district.

We have incorporated these Code provisions herein for the reason that appellant contends that in these sections is to be found the source of whatever taxing power may be in the board of supervisors to raise funds by direct taxation for use in the acquiring, construction, or maintenance of public roads or highways within the various counties of the state. It is appellant's theory that the Legislature intended by the enactment of these sections to specifically limit the taxing power of the supervisors to the extent set forth. He urges that the provisions found in the sections cited are all-embracing and embody the complete grant of power to the supervisors as far as the subject of roads and highways within a county is concerned, and that there is no way authorized by law through which the taxpayers, directly or indirectly, may be compelled to assume the burden of road maintenance through taxation other than as therein stated. Here it may be incidentally stated that the subject of bonds or bonding is not under discussion and is particularly disregarded for the purposes hereof.

[2, 3] Without detailing appellant's argument, we can concede that whatever taxing power rests in the supervisors must necessarily come from the Legislature and be expressly given. Abundant authority supports this conclusion. Estate of Potter, 188 Cal. 55, 204 P. 826; Connelly v. San Francisco, 164 Cal. 101, 127 P. 834; Merced County v. Helm, 102 Cal. 159, 36 P. 399; 24 Cal. Jur. 26. The statute not only confers the power, but affords the measure thereof, and taxes not assessed in accordance with the provisions of the statute are void. Huntington v. Central Pac. R. R., 2 Sawy. 503, Fed. Cas. No. 6,911; Moss v. Shear, 25 Cal. 38, 85 Am. Dec. 94.

[4] The statutes quoted do, however, in addition to providing for road funds, specifically confer upon the supervisors the power to levy taxes upon taxable property of their respective counties for all county purposes. As alleged in the complaint, the supervisors of Marin county did levy a tax for general county purposes and fixed the rate of such tax at 80 cents on each $100 of taxable property, which sum, when collected, constituted what is known as the county general fund. It is conceded that there is sufficient and specific grant of power authorizing the board of supervisors to levy such a tax and create such a fund, and that such a fund may be used for general purposes.

[5] We must presume that all conditions precedent to the levy of the tax for general purposes were complied with. Cooley on Taxation, § 1017, and cases cited.

[6, 7] The rate of taxation which the supervisors of the various counties may fix is not limited by statute, the power to tax being expressly conferred upon the board of supervisors without restriction as to the amount to be raised thereby for general county purposes. The statutes of the state provide for detailed statements to be presented to the supervisors by the various county officers at stated intervals to the end that the board may be constantly aware of the financial condition of the county and the needs thereof. No question is presented here as to the power of the board of supervisors to fix a tax rate for general county purposes sufficient to raise an amount equal to that required to meet the general running expense of the county for the ensuing year. It is not here urged or pleaded that the rate fixed by the board in the instant case, to wit, 80 cents on each $100 of taxable property within the county, is unreasonable or excessive. It must be conceded in the instant case that, if the board of supervisors of Marin county determined that the rate fixed for general county funds was necessary to meet the anticipated needs of the county, it is not within the province of the courts to inquire further into these necessities. Indeed, it would be a useless procedure and an assumption of power not resting in the judicial branch of government.

Appellant contends in this respect that the board did determine that the rate of 80 cents on the $100 was not necessary, but that a rate of 30 cents on the $100 was sufficient, and that the difference, 50 cents, was levied as and for the general fund by way of subterfuge and to evade the controlling provisions hereinbefore cited which limit the power of the board in raising funds for road purposes. He alleges that the board, after determining the lesser amount sufficient, then resolved that there should be raised the additional 50 cents on each $100 of taxable property "for the purpose and intent of wrongfully and unlawfully raising a fund to be expended for permanent road improvement and construction in that portion of Marin county not included in or incorporated within the territorial limits of supervisor district No. 1, to wit, for the construction and improvement of the main public county road lying between Manor and the boundary lines of road districts Nos. 4 and 5 westerly from Milleston on Tomales Bay in said Marin county."

Section 2670, Political Code, at the time of the levy, read as follows:

"Whenever it is determined by a four-fifths vote of the board of supervisors of any county that the public convenience and necessity demand the acquisition or construction of a new road or the grading, regrading, paving, macadamizing, surfacing, repairing or maintaining of any existing road, and that the cost of such new road when acquired and constructed, or the cost of grading, regrading, paving, macadamizing, surfacing, repairing or maintaining such existing road, is too great to pay out of the road fund of the district, the board of supervisors may, by resolution passed by a four-fifths vote of said board, determine to acquire or construct such new road, or grade, or regrade, pave, macadamize, surface, repair or maintain such existing road, and charge the cost thereof to the general county fund."

[8] The appellant contends that this section is to be read apart from and in no wise connected with the sections hereinbefore referred to, and that it has no reference to the taxing power or the means by or through which the funds that may be required under this section are to be raised. His argument seems to be that while the general fund of the county may be used to defray costs of road construction or repair and maintenance, the supervisors may not anticipate the necessities therefor and provide a general fund sufficient to meet them. Such a construction would render the section meaningless for the reason that if in any one fiscal year there should be insufficient funds in the general fund to meet conditions as might arise under this section the board would be powerless to make any future levy. In the very nature of things it is incumbent upon the board, in fixing the general rate of taxation, to provide for and anticipate every legitimate expense that might arise. As a general scheme of finance and revenue it is contemplated that the tax rate shall be sufficient to provide sufficient funds for the entire fiscal year, and the activities and progress of the county are dependent upon the rate being adequate. The idea is elemental and is manifest in the constitutional provision limiting the county in incurring liability exceeding the income provided for the year. Const. art. 11, § 18.

We conclude that the board of supervisors had the right and power when fixing the rate of taxation for general purposes to determine the amount necessary to be raised thereby, and in determining the amount it was proper and legal that they should anticipate every requirement, including such expense as might arise under section 2640; and the fact that the board may have had in mind or by resolution expressed any intention to expend the moneys obtained in any certain way would neither add to nor take away from the legality of the levy. Mr. Cooley, in his work on taxation, supporting his text by abundant and authoritative citations, says:

"If a lawful tax can be defeated because the power which is manifested by its imposition may when further exercised be destructive, it would follow that every lawful tax would become unlawful and therefore no taxation whatever could be levied. The financial needs of a county may outrun any human calculation, so the power to meet those needs by taxation must not be limited even though the taxes become burdensome. The judiciary can afford no redress against oppressive taxation so long as the Legislature in imposing it shall keep within the limits of legislative authority and violate no express provision of the constitution." Cooley on Taxation (4th Ed.) § 72.

The plaintiff is not left without redress, nor can the funds raised be dissipated or expended to his injury. Whenever any expenditure is made or threatened which is without warrant or authority of law, the courts are always solicitous of the taxpayer's prayer and full protection and relief are accorded.

In so far as the complaint herein prays injunctive relief against further expenditure of the funds, it does not appear but that the provisions of section 2640 have been and are being fully complied with, and that the exact situation exists as in the section contemplated and that situation determined by the board of supervisors to exist in Marin county.

There is no allegation in the complaint as to the condition of the funds in the various districts; neither is there any allegation that the public convenience and necessity does not demand the construction, repair, and maintenance of the roads contemplated. In fact, there are no allegations sufficient to sustain the prayer for the relief asked or for any relief if, as we have found, the levy for the general fund was legal.

Appellant cites the case of Spitzer v. Munroe County (D. C.) 274 F. 819. A reading of this case will show that it has no application to the case at bar. Detached statements would in a measure support the contention of appellant, but taken as a whole it throws no light upon the question here involved.

[9] We think it well settled as the policy of this state expressed in various legislative enactments that the acquisition, construction, maintenance, and repair of roads and highways are undisputed functions of government. In many instances it is readily apparent how impracticable and impossible it would be to restrict all progress or improvements to the old idea of purely local or district benefit and liability. The general law, in addition to section 2640, makes abundant provision for the general fund of the county bearing this expense, and the entire body of the law comprises the general road improvement scheme of the state. Sections 4041, 4043, 2712, Pol. Code.

Judgment affirmed.

MOODY v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 5885.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 27, 1927.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 22, 1927.

1. Master and servant ⇨417(7)—Whether nurse, claiming compensation for blood infection, contracted it from employer, held question of fact for commission (Workmen's Compensation Act).

In proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended), by professional nurse for disability as result of blood infection, whether claimant contracted infection from employer was question of fact, final determination of which rested with Industrial Accident Commission.

2. Master and servant ⇨405(4)—Circumstantial evidence is sufficient to show nurse claiming compensation contracted blood infection from employer.

In determining whether nurse, claiming compensation for blood infection, contracted infection from employer, positive proof is not indispensable and absolute or mathematical demonstrations not essential, but evidence of circumstances from which inference could be fairly and legitimately drawn was all that was necessary.

3. Master and servant ⇨405(4)—Evidence held to support finding that nurse claiming compensation contracted blood infection from employer (Workmen's Compensation Act).

In proceeding under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended) by professional nurse for disability resulting from blood infection, evidence held sufficient to support Industrial Accident Commission's finding that claimant contracted such infection from employer.

4. Master and servant ⇨362—Employment of nurse to attend patient as long as he remained in hospital held not "casual" (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 8 [c]).

Employment of professional nurse, who claimed compensation for disability resulting from blood infection contracted from employer, held not "casual" within Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 835) § 8(c), where, at time of employment, it was contemplated her services should continue as long as employer remained in hospital, which was more than two months, during which she was to receive $6 a day.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Casual.]

5. Master and servant ⇨367—Professional nurse held not "independent contractor" within Workmen's Compensation Act (Workmen's Compensation Act, §§ 8[b], 19[d]).

Professional nurse, seeking compensation for disability resulting from blood infection, held not "independent contractor" within Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, pp. 835, 849) §§ 8(b), 19(d), though she was under supervision of doctor rather than patient, where she was paid and subject to dismissal by the patient.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Independent Contractor].

6. Master and servant ⇨367—Whether claimant for compensation is "independent contractor" is determined by power of control and right to interfere; "employee" (Workmen's Compensation Act).

In determining, in proceeding under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended), whether claimant is "employee" or "independent contractor," question is, Who has power of control? not as to result of work only, but as to means and method, and it is not fact of interference, but right of interference, that is material.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé.]

7. Master and servant ⇨403—Finding that nurse was performing service for patient when she contracted blood infection raised presumption that she was "employee" (Workmen's Compensation Act).

Where Industrial Accident Commission found, on sufficient evidence, that nurse, claiming compensation, contracted blood infection from patient, there was presumption that she was "employee" within Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended) placing burden on patient to show she was independent contractor or engaged in an excluded employment.

8. Master and servant ⇨417(7)—Whether presumption that injured nurse was employee was controverted was question of fact for commission (Workmen's Compensation Act).

Whether presumption that nurse claiming compensation was employee of patient, within Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended) was controverted by evidence showing she was independent contractor, was fact question for Industrial Accident Commission to determine.

9. Master and servant ⇨417(7)—Industrial Accident Commission's findings, supported by substantial evidence, are conclusive.

Findings of Industrial Accident Commission on questions of fact are conclusive, and are not subject to review, where there is any substantial evidence to support them.

10. Master and servant ⇨405(2)—Commission should determine reasonable inference from circumstances surrounding contract, considered with its nature, to determine whether nurse was independent contractor.

In determining whether injured nurse was employee of patient or independent contractor, Industrial Accident Commission should determine reasonable inference to be drawn from all circumstances surrounding making and execution of contract considered in conjunction with nature of contract and duties ordinarily to be performed thereunder.

11. Master and servant ☞403—Evidence held insufficient to operate, as matter of law, to nullify presumption nurse, contracting infection while performing services for patient, was employee (Workmen's Compensation Act).

In proceeding under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended) by nurse for disability resulting from blood infection contracted from patient, evidence held insufficient to operate, as matter of law, to nullify legal presumption that nurse was employee, resulting from finding that she was performing service for patient when she became infected.

12. Master and servant ☞405(2)—Presumption that nurse, contracting infection while performing services for patient, was employee of patient, will support finding that she was employee (Workmen's Compensation Act).

Presumption that nurse was employee of patient within Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended) arising from fact that she was performing services for him when she contracted infection, is legally sufficient to sustain finding that she was employee.

13. Master and servant ☞348—Rights of parties under Workmen's Compensation Act arise from, and are measured by, definitions embodied in act.

Substantive rights of parties under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended) and liability of employer for compensation arise from, and are measured by, definitions embodied in act rather than on any agreement of parties.

14. Master and servant ☞417(7)—Authority of court to review Industrial Accident Commission's determination that nurse was employee is restricted to ascertainment whether commission exceeded jurisdictional power (Workmen's Compensation Act).

Where Industrial Accident Commission determined that injured nurse was employee, and not independent contractor, within Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended), authority of reviewing court is restricted to ascertainment of whether commission had exceeded jurisdictional powers.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Ida M. Dracket, opposed by Fred S. Moody, employer. An award of compensation was made, and the employer applies for certiorari to annul the order of the Industrial Accident Commission. Award affirmed.

R. P. Wisecarver, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. Ida M. Dracket, a professional nurse, hereinafter referred to as respondent, was hired on behalf of petitioner, Fred S. Moody, to attend him as a "special" nurse in a hospital, and, while thus employed, became disabled as a result of a blood infection found by the Industrial Accident Commission to have been contracted from petitioner, for which disability respondent was granted compensation. Petitioner seeks by this proceeding in certiorari to have the award annulled upon the ground that respondent's status at the time she was stricken was not that of an employee, but was that of an independent contractor, and that therefore she is excluded from receiving the benefits of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended). He contends also that the award is void, for the reasons that the finding of the commission to the effect that respondent's infection was contracted from petitioner was based solely upon conjecture and surmise, and that, even though it be held that petitioner was an employee, her employment was casual.

The circumstances relating to respondent's employment were as follows: For three or four days preceding November 2, 1926, petitioner had been confined to his home and under the medical care of Dr. I. W. Thorne, suffering from the effects of an abscessed tooth which had been extracted some two weeks before. On the day mentioned petitioner's condition became serious. A large red area had appeared on his body, showing acute inflammation of the deep structures of the neck and posterior left shoulder, indicating a pus pocket in the shoulder. Besides suffering great pain, he was running a high fever, and was delirious. Believing that immediate draining of the infected shoulder was necessary, Dr. Thorne ordered petitioner sent to the Stanford Hospital, and thereupon requested the hospital to assign petitioner a room, to prepare the operating room, and to call in a special nurse. Respondent had been connected with said hospital for about ten years, as a regular and a special nurse, the distinction between the two employments being that the former is a regular employee of, and paid by, the hospital, whereas the latter is called in by the hospital at the instance of, and is hired and paid directly by, the patient. In response to Dr. Thorne's request, the hospital management summoned respondent to attend petitioner, her name being taken from a waiting list of nurses maintained by the hospital. Neither at the time she arrived at the hospital to assume her duties nor at any time during her employment did she have any express agreement or understanding with any one as to the nature of her duties, the right to control her services, hours of employment, or wages. The two latter matters, however, were covered by an operating schedule existing between the management of the hospital and the association to which respondent belonged, the working hours fixed thereby being from 7 a. m. until 7 p. m., and the wages at the rate of $6 a day. Following the operation, petitioner's delirium continued for a week or ten days, and it was two months before he was in a condition to leave the hospital.

The operation consisted of opening the cellulitis on the neck. Blood cultures were then made, and, although the character of the germ could not be definitely typed, petitioner's infection was eventually diagnosed as streptococcus of the blood stream type. Acting under the doctor's instructions, respondent was required, as part of her duties as nurse, to apply compresses to the wound caused by the operation, which she applied with the aid of forceps, but without using rubber gloves. On November 8, 1926, which was the seventh day after petitioner entered the hospital, respondent complained to Dr. Thorne of having a sore thumb, whereupon she was immediately retired from the case; her wages being paid directly to her by petitioner's wife. The soreness in her thumb developed immediately into a case of streptococcus infection of the erysipelas type, and she, too, became very ill, remaining in the hospital as a patient upwards of two months.

Regarding the origin of respondent's infection, Dr. Thorne testified that rarely was infection inoculated through an unbroken skin; that, when respondent complained of soreness in her thumb neither he nor respondent after a careful examination, were able to find any abrasion or portal of entry on her thumb through which she might have become inoculated; and that he had no absolute knowledge as to the origin of her infection, that is, whether she picked it up from the patient or on the outside; but he further testified that her type of infection might have been the outgrowth of the type suffered by petitioner; that it could be communicated through a puncture wound too small to be visible, such as a prick of a needle or pin, a hang nail, or a nick from a knife; and that, since petitioner's infection was of a virulent type, and respondent had been caring for him as nurse, the reasonable inference was that she contracted her infection from petitioner.

[1-3] The question of whether or not respondent did become so inoculated was, in any event, one of fact, the final determination of which rested with the commission. Positive proof was not indispensable, nor was absolute or mathematical demonstration essential. Evidence of circumstances from which an inference could be fairly and legitimately drawn was all that was necessary. Santa v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 175 Cal. 235, 165 P. 689.

Dr. Thorne gave what on the facts before him and in the light of medical science appeared to him to be the most plausible explanation of the event; and we are of the opinion that his deduction, when viewed in the light of the circumstances from which it was drawn, was legally sufficient to support the commission's finding as to the origin of respondent's infection. Santa v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra; Shell Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 36 Cal. App. 463, 172 P. 611.

[4] Equally without merit is the contention of petitioner that, if respondent be deemed an employee, her employment was casual. Section 8 (c) of said act declares that the term "casual" as used in said act "shall be taken to refer only to employments where the work contemplated is to be completed in not exceeding ten working days, without regard to the number of men employed, and where the total labor cost of such work is less than $100.00. * * *" The evidence here shows that, when respondent entered upon her duties, it was contemplated that her services would continue as long as petitioner remained in the hospital, and it further shows that the nurse who succeeded her continued in such employment at the rate of $6 a day during the entire period of petitioner's confinement in the hospital, which, as before stated, lasted for over two months. It is apparent, therefore, that respondent's employment was not casual within the meaning of that term as it is defined by said act.

[5] Petitioner's contention with reference to respondent's status as an independent contractor is, in substance, that, at the time respondent became inoculated with the infection, the legal relationship of employer and employee did not exist between them; that, so far as he was concerned, at least, she was pursuing an independent calling, which brought her status within the excluded classification of the statute. This contention is in turn based upon the assertion that the evidence adduced at the hearing established the fact that respondent retained entire control over the manner and method of performing her duties as special nurse, without the right of interference on the part of petitioner.

Section 8 (b) of the Workmen's Compensation Act provides that any person rendering service for another, other than as an independent contractor, or as expressly excluded herein, "is presumed to be an employee" within the meaning of said act; and that the term "independent contractor" shall be taken to mean, for the purposes of said act, any person who renders service for a specified recompense "for a specified result," under the control of his principal as to the result of his work only, and not as to the means by which such result is accomplished. Section 19 (d) of the act provides:

"The burden of proof lies upon the party holding the affirmative of the issue. The following are affirmative defenses, and the burden of proof shall rest upon the employer to establish them: (1) That an injured person claiming to be an employee is an independent contractor or otherwise excluded from the protection of this act, where there is proof that such injured person was at the time of his injury actually performing service for the alleged employer." (Italics ours.)

[6] "In determining in any given case whether a person was an employee or an independent contractor," says the Supreme Court in the case of Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 191 Cal. 404, 216 P. 578, 43 A. L. R. 1304, "there are usually present various circumstances which are persuasive to one conclusion, and other circumstances persuasive to the opposite conclusion. But an analysis of the cases makes it plain that the determinative factor is usually found in the solution of the question: Who has the power of control, not as to the result of the work only, but as to the means and method by which such result is accomplished?" And it is not the fact of actual interference or noninterference with control, but the right to interfere, that makes the difference between an independent contractor and a servant or agent. Hillen v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 199 Cal. 577, 250 P. 570.

[7-9] The commission in the present case, having found upon sufficient evidence that respondent, at the time she became infected, was actually performing service for petitioner, was at the outset of the hearing required by the act to presume that respondent's status was that of an employee within the scope of the provisions of said act (Roman Catholic Archbishop v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 194 Cal. 660, 230 P. 1; County of Monterey v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 199 Cal. 221, 248 P. 912, 47 A. L. R. 359), and the burden was upon petitioner to overcome this presumption with evidence sufficiently strong to convince the commission either that respondent was an independent contractor or that she was engaged in an excluded employment at the time of her disability. Hillen v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra; Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra; Pacific Employers' Insurance Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm. (Cal. App.) 249 P. 33; Dearborn v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 187 Cal. 591, 203 P. 112. Whether or not such presumption was so controverted was a question of fact for the commission, as the trial court, to determine (Gilmour v. North Pasadena Land, etc., Co., 178 Cal. 6, 171 P. 1066); and its ultimate finding the respondent was an employee was, in effect, a determination that such presumption had not been so controverted. As to the conclusiveness of such determination, it is a well-recognized rule that findings of the commission, upon questions of fact, are conclusive, and are not subject to review, where there is any substantial evidence to support them (Western Pac. R. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 193 Cal. 413, 224 P. 754; Massachusetts, etc., Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission, 176 Cal. 488, 168 P. 1050; Southern

Pac. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 177 Cal. 378, 170 P. 822; Western Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 182 Cal. 709, 190 P. 27). It is also a settled rule that, where from the evidence two opposing inferences may be drawn, that inference which is accepted by the commission must be sustained, if there is evidence in the record to support it, and if it is a reasonable inference to be drawn from the evidence. Eastman Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 186 Cal. 587, 200 P. 17; Roman Catholic Archbishop v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra. That is to say, the commission is the final arbiter where there is a conflict in the evidence, or where opposing inferences may be drawn. Tartar v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 191 Cal. 703, 218 P. 39; Clapp's Parking Station v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 51 Cal. App. 624, 197 P. 369. Therefore the commission's finding here is binding upon this court (Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 180 Cal. 497, 181 P. 788, unless there is such an entire absence of evidence in the record to render the finding unreasonable or in excess of the commission's jurisdictional powers (Hillen v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra). In other words, this court, in reviewing awards of the commission, does not act as a court of appeal, and the right to review its findings, even where there is no evidence to support them, is not based on the theory that they are not supported by evidence, and that we are weighing evidence to determine that proposition, but on the theory that the commission has no jurisdiction to make a finding where there is no evidence to support it. Southern Pacific Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra.

The testimony relied upon by petitioner as overthrowing the statutory presumption mentioned was that given by respondent and Dr. Thorne, which was, in substance, that, in accordance with the ethics and the established practice of respondent's profession, her duty required her to follow implicitly the directions and instructions of the attending physician, and that, if a situation had arisen where such instructions were unavailable, and respondent and petitioner disagreed as to the propriety of doing, or refraining from doing, some particular act pertaining to petitioner's care and treatment, respondent would have ignored the request or suggestion made by petitioner in that behalf, and would have acted entirely upon her own responsibility and pursuant to the dictates of her professional training and skill. The witnesses mentioned, however, disclaimed that any express agreement to that effect had ever been made with, or on behalf of, petitioner, nor does it appear that any such dispute did arise.

[10-12] Upon analyzing this testimony, however, it becomes evident that the effect thereof did not tend to establish the express terms of any agreement which had theretofore been made between the parties, because, as stated, there were none agreed upon. The testimony, as is apparent, was hypothetical in its character, and consequently at most amounted to no more than the opinions of the witnesses upon the question of the respective rights and duties of parties to a contract for the employment of a professional nurse, which, obviously, the commission was not compelled to adopt in preference to its own construction of the rights of the parties under such employment, because, in the absence of express terms affirming or negating the power of control and direction, its existence was to be determined by reasonable inference to be drawn from all the circumstances surrounding the making and execution of the contract considered in conjunction with the nature of the contract, and the duties ordinarily to be performed thereunder (Press Publishing Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 190 Cal. 116, 210 P. 820); and clearly the testimony above referred to did not alone operate, as a matter of law, to nullify the legal presumption declared by the legislative act. It follows, therefore, in view of the established fact that respondent, at the time she became inoculated with the infection, was actually performing service for petitioner, the commission was warranted, in the exercise of its power as judge of the facts, to base its finding that respondent was an employee solely upon the statutory presumption; and, if it did, such presumption was legally sufficient to sustain its finding. As stated in California Jurisprudence (vol. 10, p. 747):

"The reports are replete with decisions to the effect that disputable presumptions are evidence, often of sufficient force to require clear and convincing evidence to overcome them, and having such force as may in some cases, outweigh positive evidence against them."

However, the finding of the commission does not appear to have rested alone upon the statutory presumption, but, in direct support thereof and in opposition to the testimony relied upon by petitioner as establishing the right of control, the evidence shows without conflict that petitioner at all times retained the right to discharge respondent if her services should prove unsatisfactory; and, as held in Press Publishing Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra, this right undoubtedly gave respondent "the potential power of control." Upon this point the court in that case said:

"This power of the employer to terminate the employment at any time is a strong circumstance tending to show the subserviency of the employee, since it is incompatible with the full control of the work usually enjoyed by an independent contractor. Perhaps no single circumstance is more conclusive to show the relationship of an employee than the right of the employer to end the service whenever he sees fit to do so. 14 Ruling Case Law, p. 72."

And later on in the same opinion the court said:

"As was held in Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 417, 156 P. 491, 495 (Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390) 'The real test by which to determine whether a person is acting as the servant of another is to ascertain whether, at the time when the injury was inflicted, he was subject to such person's orders and control and was liable to be discharged for disobedience or misconduct.'" Italics ours.

Furthermore, and aside from the question of the weight of the evidence, it will be observed that the act defines an independent contractor as one "who renders services * * * for a specified result * * *" (italics ours); and it has been held in effect that, where the element of "a specified result" is wanting, there can be no independent contract. Brown v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 174 Cal. 457, 163 P. 664. In the present case the evidence does not show that in hiring out her services as special nurse respondent contracted to obtain any "specified result." The only result which was to be obtained in connection with petitioner's illness was to effect a cure by medical and surgical treatment; and the means by which that result was to be accomplished rested entirely in the judgment of the attending physician, and not the nurse. The duties of the nurse and the purpose for which she was hired on behalf of petitioner, were, as the evidence shows, merely to carry out the treatment prescribed and ordered by the doctor; and, in order to receive a full day's wages, she was obliged to devote all of her time during certain hours of the day to the performance of this work, part of which was to apply the compresses which resulted in her disability; and, in our opinion, the fact that, after being thus employed, her services were directed and controlled by the doctor, did not operate to terminate her legal status as an employee of petitioner, by whom she was hired and paid, and who retained the peremptory power of dismissal. Our conclusion in this latter respect finds full support, we think, in the case of Claremont Country Club v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 174 Cal. 395, 163 P. 209, L. R. A. 1918F, 177. There a boy was injured on the golf links conducted by the club while caddying for a club member. The caddies were employed by the caddy master or greens committee of the club, in whom was vested the power to discharge; but, while actually caddying, the control of their activities was wholly with the members using them, and the club, as a club, had no means of knowing what particular orders or directions a member might give to his caddy, nor what unusual or dangerous duties the caddy might be called upon to perform. For these reasons it was contended that, although a caddy was the servant of the club while rendering personal service at the direction of the club, the relationship of master and servant ceased entirely when he was actually caddying for a member, since by virtue of that engagement he no longer was entirely under the control and direction of the members. The court declared this contention to be without merit, and, grounding its decision upon the proposition that the right of the club to control in the matter of the employment and discharge was the determinative factor in the case, held that the caddies were employees of the club.

In concluding this point, it may be stated that, if respondent had been serving as regular nurse, employed, paid, and subject to dismissal by the hospital, but whose services necessarily were under the immediate control of the attending physician, there could be little doubt but that she would have been an employee of the hospital within the meaning of the act. That being so, we think that having served as special nurse, employed, paid, and subject to dismissal by the patient, constituted her an employee of the patient, even though her services as special nurse, like those of a regular nurse, were under the control of the attending physician.

[13, 14] The cases cited by petitioner from other jurisdictions in support of his theory that respondent was an independent contractor are essentially different, we think, from the present one, both as to the nature of the actions and the principles involved, and therefore are not controlling here. The courts there were exercising either a trial or an appellate jurisdiction in considering the application of the doctrine of respondeat superior in connection with the relationship of master and servant as it exists under common-law rules. In other words, the issue upon which those cases were decided was as to the extent of the master's liability for the tortious acts of the servant as such liability attaches under the common law. No such question is, or could be, involved in the present proceeding. Here we are dealing with a question of employment as it is expressly defined by a statute designed to provide for the payment of compensation to certain employees who are injured in the course of their employments. The legislation rests upon the idea of status, not upon implied contract, and the substantive rights of the parties and the liability of the employer for compensation arise from, and are measured by, the definitions, embodied in the act rather than upon any agreement of the parties. North Alaska Salmon Co. v. Pillsbury, 174 Cal. 1, 162 P. 63, L. R. A. 1917E, 642. The determination of the question of whether the status of a person hired for personal service is that of an employee or of an independent contractor rests with a commission, operating under broad judicial powers conferred by the act; and, it having determined that question, the authority of this court to review such determination is restricted to an ascertainment of whether the commission has gone beyond the limits of those definitions, and consequently exceeded its jurisdictional powers. As was said in Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 P. 721, the courts, in exercising this authority, should not discard the wisdom and learning of the past in its efforts to decide what the Legislature intended by the language used in the act. But where, as here, the definitions embodied in the act seem plain and definite, they must be held as controlling.

After a review of the entire record, we are of the opinion that for the reasons given, and in the light of the legal rules announced in the cases hereinabove cited, the inference drawn by the commission from the peculiar facts of this case that respondent was an employee, and not an independent contractor, cannot be declared to be unreasonable, and that it finds substantial support in the evidence.

The award is therefore affirmed.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH-CABLE CO. v. PA-CIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO.
(S. F. 11203.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 31, 1927.

1. Electricity ⇨20—Electric power line's field of force interfering with telegraph line, held not nuisance, giving telegraph company right of action (Civ. Code, § 3479).

Field of electrical force around electric power line carrying current of high voltage, causing inconvenience in sending messages over telegraph line nearby, does not constitute nuisance, within Civ. Code, § 3479, nor give telegraph company right of action for damages.

2. Electricity ⇨20—Telegraph company's complaint for interference by electric power line, held demurrable.

In telegraph company's action against electric company for damages from interference with transmission of messages because of field of electrical force around power lines near telegraph line, allegation stating that defendant's power lines between certain cities and in various other parts of state were negligently constructed, and that defendant had negligently failed to keep them in repair, causing damage to plaintiff's telegraph line between such cities and other portions of plaintiff's line and equipment in state, was too general and insufficient on general and special demurrer.

Shenk, J., and Waste, C. J., dissenting in part.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company against the Pacific Gas & Electric Company for damages. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Willard P. Smith, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Thomas J. Straub, L. H. Susman and Chas. E. Finney, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment against it after a demurrer to the complaint had been sustained and plaintiff had declined to amend. The complaint, after alleging the corporate capacity of the parties and the nature of their respective businesses, as disclosed by their corporate names, sets out, in the first count, that one of the power lines of the defendant extends from the city of Sacramento to the city of Suisun, a distance of about 40 miles, over which the defendant transports normally an alternating electric current of high potentiality of about 53,000 volts, and that said line parallels the portion of said plaintiff's telegraph line for the entire distance between said cities, "being at no point more than 210 feet from the line of plaintiff, and for a distance of about 8 consecutive miles between said cities not more than 21 feet from plaintiff's line, and for a distance of 5 consecutive miles between said cities not more than 25 feet from plaintiff's line; and that the portion of said lines of defendant between said cities was constructed many years after the construction of plaintiff's said line."

It is then alleged:

That by reason of the said high voltage of defendant's line, "there extends, in all directions about it, a field of force for more than 210 feet, and said field of force carries within such field many electric currents of high and varying intensity which are not controlled by or confined to said power lines and due to said proximity and parallelism of plaintiff's and defendant's said lines between said cities of Sacramento and Suisun, and the fact that said field of force extends in every direction about its said power lines and carries within such field many currents of high and varying intensity which are not controlled by or confined to said power lines, a portion of the electric current transported by defendant on said lines is at all times inducted on to plaintiff's said lines, thereby interfering with the transmission of telegraphic messages thereover and greatly decreasing the quickness and accuracy with which telegraphic messages can be transmitted over plaintiff's said line as compared with what would be the case if such induction did not exist. That said inductive interference has been increasing within the past three years and particularly interferes with the use of machine transmission of messages, and at times completely prevents the operation of said machines. That there have been within the past three years interruptions and breaks in the said lines of the defendant, causing at such times the current passing through defendant's said line to surge and rise in voltage, and said high voltage to be inducted on to plaintiff's said line between said cities whereby the said portions of plaintiff's said telegraph line and equipment thereof in this state have been burned out, destroyed, and damaged, and on many occasions it has been impossible, for several hours at a time, to transmit telegraphic messages over said line, and the physical damage to plaintiff's said line and the equipment thereof, from such surges and induction, within three years last past has amounted to the sum of $2,000."

[1] Appellant contends that these allegations constitute the defendant's power lines a nuisance, within the meaning of section 3479, Civil Code. On the other hand, the respondent maintains that a distinction exists between cases where a plaintiff has been making an ordinary use of his property and is prevented from doing so by inductive interference, and cases where both plaintiff and defendant are making an extraordinary use of their property and inconvenience results to one in this extraordinary use of his property by reason of the use of the other. The case of Eastern and S. A. Tel. Co. v. Cape Town Tram Co. (1902) C. C. 381, 2 British Ruling Cases, 114, 126, contains the following language:

"A man cannot increase the liabilities of his neighbor by applying his own property to special uses, whether for business or pleasure. The principle of Ryland v. Fletcher, which subjects to a high liability the owner who uses his property for purposes other than those which are natural, would become doubly penal if it implied a liability created and measured by the nonnatural uses of his neighbor's property."

In the instant case the use of each party is extraordinary, and each makes a similar use, though different in degree. The distinction between the rights of parties thus situated and the respective rights of parties where one is engaged in the ordinary development of his land and the other is subjecting his land to an extraordinary use is pointed out in the case of Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 48 Ind. App. 584, 589, 92 N. E. 939, 991, 95 N. E. 596, where the court says:

"This controversy is between users of electricity; appellant using light currents, and comparatively delicate instruments, which are interrupted by escaping currents from the wires carrying exceedingly high voltage belonging to the appellee. It is not a question between one engaged in the ordinary development of his land and the customary and appropriate employment of it according to its inherent qualities and its surroundings, without bringing upon it artificially of any substance not naturally found there (Evans v. Reading, etc., Co., 160 Pa. 209, 28 A. 702; Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 113 Pa. 126, 6 A. 453, 57 Am. Rep. 445), and one engaged in the unnatural and extraordinary use of his property, calling for the application of the maxim 'Sic utere tuo,' etc., which is the governing principle in Fletcher v. Rylands [1 L. R. Exch. 263] supra, and Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 330. In this case the use of electricity is common to both parties, and both are acting under legislative grants. In such cases it seems to be the consensus of opinion, both in England and in this country, that where one is acting under legislative authority, and within the right thus given, and reasonably within the exercise thereof, using care and caution regarding the rights of his neighbor, any inconvenience or incidental damage which may arise in the absence of any negligence from the reasonable use of his own property will be regarded as within the rule damnum absque injuria."

In Phillippay v. Pac. Power & Lt. Co., 120 Wash. 581, 207 P. 957, 211 P. 872, 23 A. L. R. 1251, the telephone company brought action against the power company for the cost of metalicizing a telephone line to prevent inductive interference and for loss of profits occasioned by such interference. A judgment for plaintiff was reversed upon appeal. This case reviews, at some length, the conflicting authorities concerning the relative rights of telephone and telegraph companies and power companies and accepts the rule of nonliability for inductive interference, using the following language:

"The appellants contend that it, being rightfully on the highway by reason of a franchise properly granted, was under no duty of metalicizing or bearing the cost of metalicizing of the telephone line. The respondent contends that, since the power line interfered with the use of the telephones, that company should bear the expense of metalicizing. The controlling question, then, is whether the power company was under obligation to bear such cost. This question is one of first impression in this court. It should be remembered, in considering the question, that the telephone company did not own the land through which, with its single line system, the current returned to the point of origin. The weight of authority, so far as the question has been determined, is in favor of nonliability of the power company."

The case of Yamhill County Mut. Tel. Co. v. Yamhill Elec. Co., 111 Or. 57, 224 P. 1081, 33 A. L. R. 373, is in harmony with the view above quoted, as are the cases of Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 49 Ind. App. 697, 97 N. E. 20; Citizens' Telephone Co. v. Ft. Wayne, etc., Co., 53 Ind. App. 230, 100 N. E. 309, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 132. The rule is summarized in 20 C. J. 315, as follows:

"As has been said, however, the right of the first licensee is not exclusive. So long as it is not disturbed in its occupancy, it must submit to such unavoidable inconvenience as may result from a reasonable and fair exercise of the junior licensee's franchise. Damages which are merely a natural incident to and the direct and immediate result of the junior licensee's operations are not actionable and such operations will not be enjoined. To give the prior licensee the right of action, the junior licensee must have been guilty of negligence, trespass, or malice."

The federal court rule also seems in harmony with the cases hereinbefore cited, for in Cumberland Tel. & Tel. Co. v. United Elec. R. Co. (C. C.) 42 F. 273, 284, 12 L. R. A. 544, it was said:

"We think the obligation is upon the telephone company to adopt it, and that defendants are not bound to indemnify it; in other words, that the damage incidentally done to the complainant is not such as is justly chargeable to the defendants. Unless we are to hold that the telephone company has a monopoly of the use of the earth, and of all the earth within the city of Nashville, for its feeble current, not only as against the defendants, but as against all forms of electrical energy which, in the progress of science and invention, may hereafter require its use, we do not see how this bill can be maintained."

[2] It seems unnecessary to multiply authorities to the same effect, and we shall pass to the second cause of action, which was based upon negligence. In considering the complaint, we must remember that the demurrer interposed thereto was both general and special, and when the order was made sustaining it the plaintiff was given leave to amend, but declined to do so.

After reiterating the pertinent allegations of the first cause of action, the statement of the second cause of action continues:

"That the portion of defendant's power lines between said cities of Sacramento and Suisun, and its power lines in various other portions of said state of California, all of which are connected up with said power lines between said cities of Sacramento and Suisun, are negligently constructed, and defendant has at all times negligently failed to keep the same in repair, and the same are negligently constructed, maintained, operated, and equipped; that old, weak, wooden poles, with single-pin insulators are used, and that many of said poles have rotted and broken off near the bottom, and have not been replaced by other poles, and have been imperfectly stubbed, and that said portions are too weak to properly support the wires strung on the same, and that said wires are negligently placed so that the wires of plaintiff are within the field of force of said 53,000 volt current.

"That by reason of the premises, there have been breaks in the defendant's lines, causing the current passing through defendant's said lines to surge and immediately rise in voltage above the said 53,000 volts, and to be inducted on to the plaintiff's said line between said cities, whereby the same and other portions of plaintiff's said line and equipment in this state have been burned out, destroyed, and damaged; and that the physical damage to plaintiff's said lines and equipment thereof from such surges and induction has been $2,000."

It needs no citation of authority to support a ruling against such general allegations. Defendant is not required to meet, without notice, evidence regarding lines of plaintiff and defendant all over the state of California. Neither the time, the place, nor the nature of the negligence relied upon are fixed by plaintiff's pleading, and the special demurrer thereto was properly sustained.

In the exercise of its regulatory power, the Railroad Commission has already made an order, affirmed by this court, for the relocation of appellant's line, the cost thereof to be borne equally by appellant and respondent herein, Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. v. Railroad Commission, 197 Cal. 426, 241 P. 81. There is involved in this appeal, therefore, no question of a continuation of the difficulties and damage for which compensation is sought, and under the rule of the authorities herein cited, defendant is not liable for the damage caused under the circumstances set forth in the complaint.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; SEAWELL, J.; CURTIS, J.

SHENK, J. I concur in the foregoing opinion in so far as it holds that the special demurrer to the second cause of action was properly sustained, but I dissent from that portion of the opinion which holds that the first count fails to state a cause of action. The first count in my opinion clearly alleges a continuing nuisance in that the defendant so installed and maintained its transmission lines that its high voltage currents were inducted onto and interfered with the operation of the plaintiff's telegraph lines, causing substantial damage thereto. It is alleged that the induction interferes with the use of machine transmission of telegraph messages and at times completely prevents the operation of said machines.

Included in the definition of a nuisance is the obstruction to the free use of property. Section 3479, Civ. Code; 20 Cal. Jur. 261. Section 731 of the Code of Civil Procedure specifically provides for an action for damages for the maintenance of a nuisance, and the complaint shows that the alleged inductive interference is the direct and immediate result of the defendant's use of its property. The question of the superior right of a subsequent licensee in a public street or highway by reason of the paramount right of the public in the service performed by the subsequent licensee is not involved in this case. Here the two corporations, each exercising rights under a public grant of franchise for the purpose, are maintaining parallel lines on private rights of way in such manner that the defendant, the junior licensee, is so exercising the right as substantially to destroy the use to which plaintiff, a prior licensee, is reasonably putting its property. It is true that each is exercising what is called an extraordinary use, but I fail to comprehend the distinction endeavored to be made between the mutual rights and obligations of those putting their property to such extraordinary use.

The rule announced by the main opinion is too broadly stated. It must be conceded that wanton or negligent damage is actionable without regard to priority. And it may be assumed that the prior licensee may not complain of unavoidable inconvenience as a result of the junior licensee's operations. But when the interference by the junior licensee is avoidable and substantial damage ensues, a right of action should lie. As I read the numerous authorities cited in the briefs, this proposition cannot be successfully controverted. Reason and justice demand that it must be so. It is inconceivable that a junior licensee, merely because it has the right from the public to exercise the franchise and maintain its high tension power lines, may so exercise that right as to exclude the prior licensee from the exercise of its lawful rights when such interference may reasonably be avoided. The prior licensee has the right to carry on its operations without substantial impairment. Deiser on Law of Conflicting Uses of Electricity and Electrolysis, pp. 54-57, and cases cited. That the damage claimed by the plaintiff herein is substantial is shown by the allegations of the complaint. That it is avoidable is evidenced by the order of the Railroad Commission in directing a separation of the lines sufficient to obviate the damage. Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. v. Railroad Commission, 197 Cal. 426, 241 P. 81. The exercise of the police power is not here involved, and in no sense may the damage alleged be reduced to damnum absque injuria.

BERONIO v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 5886.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 5, 1927.

1. Master and servant §417(7)—Industrial Accident Commission's conclusion on conflicting evidence is conclusive.

Weight of evidence is for Industrial Accident Commission, and its conclusion on conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed by appellate court.

2. Master and servant §417(4½)—Industrial Commission has no jurisdiction, pending appeal, to consider new evidence adduced on petition for rehearing.

Where an appeal has been taken from a decision of the Industrial Accident Commission, the commission loses jurisdiction of the case, and cannot while such appeal is pending consider new evidence presented on a petition for rehearing.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Louis Beronio, employee, against the Beronio Lumber Company, employer, and another, insurance carrier. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding permanent disability rating and denying rehearing, employee applies for certiorari. Award affirmed.

Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. It appears from the evidence that on April 12, 1924, petitioner sustained an industrial injury while employed by respondent Beronio Lumber Company by being squeezed between a truck and a pile of lumber. The truck struck him directly over the kidney region, severely injuring his back, fracturing his third, fourth, and fifth transverse processes, and necessitating his immediate removal to a hospital. Thereafter application for industrial benefits was made by the employee, and on January 30, 1925, respondent Industrial Accident Commission made its findings and award in petitioner's favor and against respondent insurance carrier, by which petitioner was granted compensation until the termination of his disability or the further order of the commission. Petitioner received the compensation and medical treatment provided for from the insurance carrier. About a year after his injury a genito-urinary condition appeared in petitioner which was treated by the physicians of respondent insurance carrier under an authorization of its attorney. A claim was made by petitioner before the commission that his condition was the result of his original injury. The claim was disputed by the insurance carrier. A hearing was had by the commission upon the application, and on March 14, 1927, an order was made awarding petitioner a permanent disability rating based primarily upon the injuries to his back, but relief for the alleged genito-urinary condition was denied, the finding in this respect being that said injury disability referable to the urinary system was not caused nor aggravated by injury or strain arising out of and in the course of said employment. On April 1, 1927, petitioner's present counsel filed a petition for rehearing directed toward the findings concerning the genito-urinary condition above referred to. This petition for rehearing was answered by the insurance carrier, and it was denied April 27, 1927. On May 25, 1927, petitioner filed the present petition for a writ of review. Notwithstanding this fact, petitioner on May 23, 1927, filed a second petition for rehearing before the commission, setting forth the existence of certain new evidence. The insurance carrier opposed the granting of this petition upon the ground that the time provided for in which a rehearing could be filed, had expired. On June 3, 1927, the application was again denied. On June 13, 1927, a third petition for rehearing was filed, and it was denied on July 11, 1927. We are here only concerned with the question of whether or not the first petition for rehearing was properly denied, as the commission was without jurisdiction to entertain more than one application for rehearing. Crowe Glass Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm. (Cal. App.) 258 P. 130.

[1,2] It is petitioner's contention that there is no evidence to sustain the finding of the commission that "disability referable to the urinary system * * * was not caused nor aggravated by injury or strain arising out of and in the course of employment." The contention that is here made and the grounds in support thereof were presented to the commission on the application for a rehearing. The medical testimony upon the subject as to whether the injury now complained of originated from the original injury was conflicting. It is claimed that the weight of the evidence was in favor of the applicant. This was a matter for the commission to determine, and its conclusion upon this conflict is a matter that cannot here be disturbed. The new evidence presented on the second petition for rehearing could not be considered by the commission, as that body had lost jurisdiction of the case at the time it was presented.

The award is affirmed.

METCALFE v. STEUR. (Civ. 5849.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 7, 1927.

1. Account stated ~~§~~19(3)—Finding against account stated on conflicting evidence as to plaintiff's acceptance of check with understanding that he should pay defendant part of amount held not without substantial support.

Court's finding against defense of account stated on conflicting evidence as to whether plaintiff accepted check from defendant's debtor for more than amount which defendant contended was due plaintiff, with understanding that latter should cash it and pay difference to defendant, held not without substantial evidentiary support.

2. Appeal and error ~~§~~1079—Proposition barely asserted, and not regarded as ground of appeal, held not presented for decision.

Proposition, barely asserted by appellant, and apparently not regarded by him as ground of appeal, held not properly presented for decision by appellate court.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by G. A. Metcalfe against Jacob Steur. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edgar C. Levey, of San Francisco, for appellant.

William Klein, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Plaintiff recovered judgment for eight hundred odd dollars upon this action for a balance due for electrical work and materials furnished defendant. The defense of the defendant in the court below and his ground of appeal as appellant here is that the parties had agreed between themselves upon the correct balance due and that such balance had been paid. He pleaded this defense as an account stated. The trial court made a finding against this defense, and it is urged here that such finding has no support in the evidence.

[1] The appellant's claim is as follows: That the parties met in the office of the Great Western Power Company; that at that meeting the plaintiff claimed some $4,000 balance due and the defendant contended for only $2,900 balance due; that the parties agreed upon $2,900; that thereupon a sum of $3,200 due defendant from the Great Western Power Company was paid by check to plaintiff; that plaintiff accepted it with the understanding that he should cash the check and pay the difference ($300) to the defendant. Defendant presented a cross-complaint for the $300. Plaintiff admitted being present at the meeting, admitted discussion of the $2,900 and $300 amounts, and admitted the receipt of the $3,200, but denied that he agreed to the compromise or account stated as claimed by defendant.

It is appellant's contention that there is no substantial conflict in the evidence, and quotes testimony of plaintiff, given upon his cross-examination, in which his denials are not positive. There is other testimony quoted by respondent in which the plaintiff positively denied the alleged agreement of compromise or account stated. The witness Hardin an employee of the power company, who was present at the time and place of the meeting between the parties, was unable to remember whether such an agreement was made or not. From this record we cannot say that there is no substantial evidence to support the finding attacked by appellant.

[2] Appellant makes the bare assertion that it was improper for the court to allow as an item of labor a part of the wages of a superintending foreman where the written contract between the parties specified a 15 per cent. cost plus basis.

No argument is advanced in support of this assertion. Apparently appellant does not regard this as one of his grounds of appeal.

It is at least not properly presented for our decision.

The judgment is affirmed.

KESSLER v. YOUNG. (Civ. 4495.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 10, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 9, 1928.

1. Costs ⇨189—Statutes do not authorize employment of another than official reporter to take down evidence in shorthand as regards taxation of costs (Code Civ. Proc. § 269).

As regards right to tax costs, there is no provision in statutes authorizing employment of any other person than official phonographic reporter appointed by court under Code Civ. Proc. § 269, where it is desired that testimony, objections, and rulings be taken down in shorthand.

2. Costs ⇨189—Official reporter's fees for transcribing shorthand notes held taxable against defendant as costs, though private stenographer took notes of evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 274).

Fees of official phonographic reporter for making transcript of shorthand notes of testimony, objections, and rulings pursuant to order of court, which transcript was used in preparing proposed amendments to defendant's proposed bill of exceptions, held taxable as costs against defendant under Code Civ. Proc. § 274, notwithstanding that defendant had private stenographer take notes of evidence and that they were used as basis of motion for new trial and proposed bill of exceptions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by Mae H. Kessler against Marie J. Young. From an order denying a motion to retax costs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles Lantz, W. P. Hyatt, and F. O. Huber, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Samuel R. Blake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. This is an appeal from an order denying the defendant's motion to retax costs after appeal from the judgment upon the merits, which was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. It is admitted that appellant had a private stenographer take notes of the evidence, and that a motion for new trial and proposed bill of exceptions were based upon that stenographer's report; that the official phonographic reporter also was present and made a record of the evidence, and the plaintiff and respondent requested and obtained an order for the official transcript, which was used in preparing proposed amendments to the bill of exceptions proposed by appellant. Respondent paid the official reporter, and the amount of such charge was taxed as part of the costs. Appellant moved the trial court to strike out the reporter's fees, upon the ground that a stenographer had already prepared a transcript, and that the official one was therefore unnecessary.

[1, 2] It is provided by section 269 of the Code of Civil Procedure that the court may appoint a competent phonographic reporter, who, at the request of either party, must take down in shorthand all of the testimony, objections, and rulings, and that, if so ordered by the court, he must write out the same. There is no provision authorizing the employment of another person for the performance of such services. Section 274 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the fees of the official reporter shall be taxed as costs and paid by the unsuccessful party, and the Supreme Court has held that the allowance of the reporter's fees for transcription, when order therefor is made by the court, is proper, and that a motion to strike out such item should be denied. Barkly v. Copeland, 86 Cal. 493, 25 P. 3; Bell v. Pleasant, 145 Cal. 410, 78 P. 957, 104 Am. St. Rep. 61.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

B. L. CLARK, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. E. W. MORRIS et al., Defendants and Appellants. (Civ. 5969.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 7, 1927.

Appeal by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Walton J. Wood, Judge, in an action for money due under contract of employment.

Dave F. Smith and Walter T. Casey, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Hilton & Critchley, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KING, P. J., pro tem. The action is for a sum claimed under an oral contract of employment at $120 per week and 10 per cent. of all business secured by plaintiff, amounting to $3,268.50.

The answer of E. W. Morris, Daisy L. Morris, and Morris Audit Company (no other defendant appearing) admits that plaintiff entered into the contract of employment with defendant E. W. Morris, by which plaintiff was to receive $120 per week and 10 per cent. "commission on all fees or charges paid to the defendants by its clients over and above the sum of $25,000; that under said sum of $25,000 plaintiff was to receive no commission." The answer also denies that E. W. Morris and Daisy L. Morris were copartners conducting business under the firm name and style of Morris Audit Company (as alleged in the complaint), "but allege that the Morris Audit Company is E. W. Morris."

Defendants filed an amendment to the answer, alleging that the amount of "fees obtained by plaintiff for the defendants" was $30,320.02. The court found for plaintiff, and gave judgment against the defendants for $3,032, commissions on this full amount, and $80 balance of salary. Defendant's motion for a new trial was denied, and appeal taken from the judgment and from the order denying motion for new trial.

The main contention by appellants is the highly technical claim that: "(1) There was no partnership. (2) Daisy S. Morris was not a copartner in Morris Audit Company. (3) No contract was entered into by the plaintiff to which Daisy L. Morris was a party, and under which she incurred any obligation or had any liability. (4) The contract sued upon was between the plaintiff and E. W. Morris only, and E. W. Morris alone is liable thereunder."

It is true that no evidence was introduced as to the Morris Audit Company being a copartnership, nor was Daisy L. Morris mentioned in the testimony. However, counsel for defendants announced at the beginning of the trial: "There is only one issue, I believe. Our contention is that he was to receive 10 per cent. after the sum of $25,000 had been solicited." He then by consent filed the amendment to answer mentioned above, which alleged the amount of fees obtained by plaintiff "for the defendants" was $30,320.02.

Again, on page 28 of the reporter's transcript, appellants' counsel remarked to the court: "As I said in the beginning, there is only one point at issue." In the answer appears this language: "Defendants allege that plaintiff was to receive 10 per cent. commission on all fees or charges paid to the defendants by its clients over and above the sum of $25,000." And again: "Defendants allege that plaintiff was employed as a traveling man for defendants," etc. And: "These defendants deny that they have failed, neglected, and refused, and still refuse, to perform their part of the said contract." And "allege that they did not become indebted to plaintiff in excess of the sum of $688 under said contract." And "allege that all of the alleged indebtedness owing to plaintiff by defendants has been satisfied by reason of the overpayment to plaintiff by defendants."

From the evidence and from the statements of counsel above quoted the court made its findings: "(1) That the defendants entered into a contract with plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff was to render service to the defendants for the year 1920 at the agreed wage or salary of $120.00 per week and the further sum of 10 per cent. on all business that the plaintiff should procure for the defendants. That the plaintiff procured business for the defendants in the sum of $30,320 during the said calendar year of 1920," etc.

The court having chosen to believe plaintiff's testimony as to the contract between the parties, these findings and the judgment following them are in accord with the statement of defendants' counsel to the court and with the allegations of defendants' answer.

The judgment is affirmed.

KNOWLES v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 5999.)*

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 9, 1927.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 5, 1928.

1. Master and servant $\S$ 405(6)—Finding that contractor's failure to provide safety lines for workman rigging scaffolding was willful misconduct, warranting penalty, held sustained by evidence (St. 1913, p. 50, $\S$ 2, as amended by St. 1921, p. 451; Compensation Act, $\S$ 6b; Pen. Code, $\S$ 402c).

In proceedings for death under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831), evidence held to support findings of Industrial Accident Commission that injury and death of workman rigging scaffolding were caused by serious and willful misconduct of contractor, who failed to install tie backs or life lines for workmen's safety, as required by St. 1913, p. 50, $\S$ 2, as amended by St. 1921, p. 451, thus warranting additional award of penalty under Compensation Act, $\S$ 6b; violation of law requiring safety lines being offense under Pen. Code, $\S$ 402c.

2. Master and servant $\S$ 352—That contractor deemed safety devices unnecessary by reason of character of scaffolding held not to excuse failure to provide safety lines (St. 1913, p. 50, $\S$ 2, as amended by St. 1921, p. 451).

Contractor was not excused from providing safety lines from roof of building for scaffolding, required by St. 1913, p. 50, $\S$ 2, as amended by St. 1921, p. 451, by fact that he was unfamiliar with faulty construction of fire wall to which scaffolding was suspended, and that he deemed safety devices unnecessary, by reason of character of scaffolding employed.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Elsa Lundgren and others against A. Knowles for compensation for death. Order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation, and employer applies for certiorari. Award affirmed.

R. P. Wisecarver, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission.

The petition sets forth that on December 10, 1926, one John Swanson was in the employ of petitioner working on the Relief Home of San Francisco. He was a laborer, and it was part of his duty to rig the scaffolding used in connection with the work. Subsequently, while he and certain plasterers were on the scaffolding, in the course of their employment, the wall to which the same was attached gave way and fell, precipitating the men to the ground some 50 feet below. As a result of the accident Swanson was killed, and the respondents Lundgren, applicants before the commission, were awarded compensation as partial dependents in the amount of $1,560. This award was accepted by the insurance carrier of petitioner, and was paid. In the same proceeding an additional claim was made that petitioner was guilty of serious and willful misconduct. On June 20, 1927, the commission made and entered its findings of fact, and, in addition to normal compensation, it found:

"Said injury and death was caused by the serious and willful misconduct of the employer and the amount of compensation otherwise recoverable for said injury and death found herein is increased one-half, said one-half to be paid directly by the employer and to be in addition to the normal compensation."

[1, 2] Thereafter, within 20 days, petitioner asked for a rehearing. It was claimed that the commission acted without and in excess of its powers; that the evidence did not justify the findings of fact; that the findings of fact did not support the order, and the findings and award were unreasonable. This petition was denied. The same contentions are here made in support of the present application. We are of the opinion that they are without merit, as there is evidence in the record to fully support the conclusion by the commission. So much thereof as is necessary to support the findings shows that petitioner had a contract to do certain plastering on the Relief Home in San Francisco. In the performance of his work he used a scaffold which was suspended to the fire wall of the building by means of hooks. This fire wall had not been constructed in conformity with the law governing the erection of buildings. The additional weight of the scaffolding and the men caused it to collapse, with the result as above narrated. Petitioner and his superintendent had concluded that, owing to the character of scaffold used, it was unnecessary to install tie backs or life lines to insure the safety to the workmen, and none were used, notwithstanding they were familiar with the fact that the law required these precautions to be taken. It is petitioner's contention that the accident was not due to a lack of these instruments of safety, but rather to the faulty construction of the fire wall, and that the accident would have happened just the same had the hooks been tied back to the roof and life lines installed. But this may or may not be true. How can we say that the fire wall might not have received support from the tie back, or that the presence of life lines would not have afforded the employee an opportunity to protect himself by grasping the same? The law provides that it shall be the duty of an employer who uses scaffolding to furnish safety lines to tie all hooks and hangers back to the roof of the building upon which the work is being performed, and, in addition, to provide safety lines hanging from the roof securely tied thereto. Stats. 1913, c. 48, § 2, p. 50, amended by Stats. 1921, p. 451. The violation of this law is by the statute made punishable under section 402c of the Penal Code. Similar provisions are contained in the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831) and the safety orders of the Industrial Accident Commission. It was the duty of the employer to comply with these safety provisions, irrespective of the fact that he was unfamiliar with the faulty construction of the fire wall, and he had no right to conclude that these safety devices were unnecessary by reason of the character of scaffolding he employed. He was familiar with the law and regulations upon the subject, and his failure to comply with them justified the commission under the provisions of section 6b, Compensation Act, in penalizing petitioner in the manner which it did. Blue Diamond Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 188 Cal. 403-407, 205 P. 678.

The award is affirmed.
